Mr. PEARCE. I ask the permission of the Senate to make a statement of fact, which I think it is due to myself and to others that I should make. There was a misunderstanding yesterday between the honorable Senator from Mississippi [Mr. DAVIS] and the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] which I think was owing to an innocent mistake of my own. It will be recollected that yesterday, when the bill for the support of the Army was before the Senate for consideration, in remarking upon the amendment of the Committee on Finance, which proposed to strike out the appropriation for the alteration of the old muskets into breech-loading guns, I stated that I had sent the papers to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I beg leave to say that by that I meant that I had sent to him the papers relating to Burnside's carbine, including the letter of the Secretary of War, asking an appropriation of $45,000 for the purchase of those arms. I did not intend to say that I had sent him all the papers relating to that amendment, because, in fact, I was not aware that any other papers than those relating to Burnside's arm were in the possession of the committee. The paper which was afterwards read here from the Secretary of War, with the letter of Major Bell appended, had not been seen by me up to that time, though it was among the papers of the committee. It was, I believe, a statement cut from a newspaper, in which were set forth the letter of the Secretary and the letter of Major Bell. I had not seen them at that time, and when I said I had sent all the papers to the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, I said what I supposed to be strictly true, because I was not aware that any other papers were in the possession of the committee, the Secretary's letter, and the newspaper copy of Major Bell's, having been brought to the committee room by the clerk of the House Committee of Ways and Means, and not communicated to the Committee of Finance by the Secretary himself.

Now, sir, the Senator from Louisiana was well warranted, knowing there was such a letter as that from the Secretary of War, with Major Bell's letter appended, in supposing that I had sent that letter to the chairman of the Military Committee. The chairman of the Military Committee having the papers, to which I have alluded, sent to him by me, was not apprised of the existence of these letters, which were known to the Senator from Louisiana; and it is very manifest that these two gentlemen were acting under a mistaken view of the facts, the one not being aware of the letter of Major Bell and the Secretary's recommendation, these papers not having been sent to him, and the other not being aware of the fact, as I suppose, that the papers which I said I had sent to the Military Committee related only to the breech-loading carbines. It is evident, therefore, that these two gentlemen were speaking and replying to each other with a knowledge of a different state of facts, and it is easy to see how the Senator from Mississippi might conceive that the Senator from Louisiana was putting him in a false position in regard to the Secretary, and how he might suppose that the Senator from Louisiana, in the remarks which he made, was perverting a plain statement which the other had made. It is equally obvious that if both these gentlemen had been aware of all the facts, they could not have fallen into the error of misconceiving each other's purposes and remarks.

I beg leave of the Senator from Mississippi to add that I think there was, in one of his remarks, (the second reply he made to the Senator from Louisiana,) an asperity of tone which would not have characterized his remarks if he had been aware of all this. I think, sir, he would not and could not have supposed that the Senator from Louisiana intended to pervert anything which he had said; and I am very sure that if he had known all the facts he would have been one of the last members of the Senate to say anything which could wound the feelings of the Senator from Louisiana.

I have felt myself obliged to make this statement—and I have purposely made it brief—because I think it is owing to the fact that I was not aware of the existence of a portion of these letters, and so led the Senator from Louisiana to suppose that I had communicated them, as well as the others, to the Senator from Mississippi, that the misconception arose.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President, I did generally know that the Secretary of War wanted an appropriation to convert muskets into breech-loading arms. It is, however, true, as stated by the Senator from Maryland, that I did not know of the papers which were afterwards read at the table, and some of which I heard, I must say with surprise; still less was it possible for me to know that the Senator from Louisiana was not aware of the character of the paper which had been before the Committee on Military Affairs, and which constituted a part of the amendment presented from that committee. A misunderstanding, I perceive, would very naturally result from his knowledge of one set of papers, and my attention and special knowledge being of a different set of papers, of which, it seems, the Senator from Louisiana knew nothing.

The Senate will perceive that there is some delicacy in my position towards the Secretary of War, and that there is some justification in a sensitiveness on my part towards anything which would seem to put me in an attitude of endeavoring to undermine a recommendation of his, and that if all the facts had been known, it could not have been that the Senator from Louisiana would have made the remarks he did unless he was willing to impute to me a purpose to apply an appropriation asked for by the Secretary of War to another purpose, which he did not desire, and to do that without the knowledge of the Senate.

I have such entire confidence, as well in the judgment as in the character of the Senator from Maryland, that I cannot gainsay his opinion that my manner implied more than my heart meant. When I used the expression which was taken to have been in a sneering tone, as to the $100,000 appropriation, it is due to myself and to others that I should say there was nothing offensive intended, and I think it is due to myself that I should say I am incapable of committing a wanton aggression on the feelings of any man. I always feel pained, nay, more, I feel humiliated, when I am involved in a personal controversy with anybody. It is my wish with every Senator to hold friendly and cordial relations. There is an infirmity which sometimes may involve me, when my attention is directed simply to the transaction of a public affair, into controversies which partake more or less of a personal character. I regret it whenever it occurs. Towards the Senator from Louisiana I had no other feelings than those of kindness and respect; and it was not until I thought he exhibited anger towards myself that I felt it. Then, it is true, I intended to be offensive. Anger is contagious; the manifestation of it by one is very apt to engender it in another.

The whole transaction has been clearly presented by the Senator from Maryland, and I think it is due to the Senate that I should say to them that neither on that nor upon any other occasion have I ever intended, at any time, to bring into the discussions of the Senate a feeling, if I had it, which might be manifested outside of the Chamber; and in response to the remarks of the Senator from Maryland, I have only to say, that if my manner is unfortunate, and is sometimes, as my best friends have told me, of a character which would naturally impress others with the belief that I intended to be dogmatic and dictatorial, it is the result of the characteristic of my mind, connected with the fact that I have not been trained to debate. My pursuits have not led me to minute discussion, and when I get up to address the Senate, it is but simply to state a conviction; and when I am matched with one as skillful, as acute by nature, and as trained by his profession, as the Senator from Louisiana, it is but natural that I should appear to have been the hasty man in the debate, whilst he must have the advantage resulting from that skill which his training gives.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, it is certainly a matter of no small embarrassment to reply publicly to the observations which have been made by the Senator from Mississippi, as well as those of the Senator from Maryland. I think I may appeal with perfect confidence to my brother Senators that upon no occasion have they ever observed, in my deportment towards them in the Senate, any but the most courteous manner. Patient, myself, of any difference of opinion in debate, it is but natural that I should expect a similar forbearance on the part of others, and I have endeavored, upon all occasions, that my manner towards my brother Senators should be such that whilst we differ in opinion upon important subjects, there should be left no sting behind in the debates which might occur between us, that none but the kindest and best feelings may exist. I have listened with great gratification to the statement of the Senator from Mississippi. I think it does him honor. I will say, sir, that I was utterly surprised when I found him charging me yesterday with misrepresentation of his remarks. That surprise has been accounted for this morning, by the statement made by the Senator from Maryland. We were speaking of different papers; we were each advised of a different state of facts; and, under the circumstances, it is less surprising to me now than it was then, that the Senator from Mississippi could, by possibility, have supposed that I was endeavoring to misrepresent his remarks. I will say, further, that I did feel at the time that there was an asperity, an undue asperity, in the manner and tone of the Senator from Mississippi towards me. Feeling so, it was but natural, as he himself has said, that I should express resentment in relation to it, tempered, I trust, by that tone of dignity which ought always to be observed in the Senate, and by that respect for my fellow-members which it is my desire always to manifest. I am very much gratified to hear this morning that his feelings towards me have been such always as he has stated. I am sure I have had for him none but sentiments of esteem, and I may add candidly, admiration—I say it without flattery. I shall be very happy to forget everything that has occurred between us, except the pleasant passage of this morning.

Mr. HAYNE. I rise, gentlemen, in the cause of humanity, to say but one word. I congratulate the Senate upon the amicable manner in which this business has been accommodated; and I would say but a single word, especially in reference to my young friends, that whenever they are called to the field in a case like this, let them always select sensible seconds as their friends, who, in the first instance, must decide whether blood ought to be spilt; and if blood ought not to be spilt, the responsibility will be upon the seconds. That is all, sir.

HON. H. M. RICE.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate of the 15th of May, instructing them to inquire into certain charges made by citizens of Iowa against HENRY M. RICE, a Senator from Minnesota, have directed me to submit a report, which I ask may be read.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

That, under the authority of the resolution, the committee procured from the War Department and elsewhere papers exhibiting the facts in the case, and had before them twenty-two witnesses, who testified under oath as to the allegations made against Mr. RICE; and after an examination of all the testimony adduced, they do not find that it sustains any allegation which imputes criminality to, or arraigns the integrity of, Mr. RICE; and, finding nothing in the developments of the investigation which, in the opinion of the committee, tends to disqualify him for a seat in the Senate, they herewith submit the record in the case, as a part of this report, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. KING. As one of the members of the committee, I deem it proper to state that, having been present and heard the testimony in the case, I condemn the management and conduct of the sale of these lands in December, and therefore did not concur in the report of the committee.

Mr. WILSON. I rise, Mr. President, simply to say that I could not quite concur in the report of the committee; for this reason. I think the evidence requires that I should disapprove of the manner of conducting the sale; but at the same time, I do not think the proof sustains any charge of criminality against the agent who conducted it.

Mr. HARLAN. Mr. President, I think it due to myself that I should express my gratification on learning the result of the investigation. I do so in consequence of my previous connection with it, and because of remarks made in the Senate on a previous occasion, of a personal character, which I thought uncalled for and unjust. I am satisfied with the committee. I believe that the investigation has been thorough and impartial, and am gratified with the result attained.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the report be adopted and printed.

The motion was unanimously agreed to.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts and joint resolution:

An act for the relief of Mrs. Harriet O. Read, executrix of the late Brevet Colonel A. C. W. Fanning, of the United States Army;

An act for the relief of Keep, Bard & Co., J. Caulfield, and Joseph Landis & Co.; and

A resolution authorizing the Secretary of War to expend the appropriation made July 8, 1856, upon such channel of the St. Mary's river as he may select.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that its Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

An act to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register or enrollment and license to be issued in the name of the President or Secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel," approved March 3, 1825; and

An act to change the time of holding the spring term of the district court of the United States, for the western district of Texas.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the bill (H. R. No. 555) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1858, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It had been reported from the Finance Committee with an amendment to add as an additional section:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That none of the moneys herein appropriated to the Indian service, in the Territories of Oregon and Washington, shall be paid, until the claims which they are intended to satisfy shall have been audited and stated by a commissioner, to be sent to the said Territories by the Secretary of the Interior, and approved by the said Secretary. The said commissioner shall be appointed as soon as may be practicable, by the Secretary of the Interior, to receive a compensation of eight dollars a day and his actual traveling expenses, whilst engaged in the service herein prescribed; and it shall be the duty of the said commissioner to examine the vouchers and to take testimony, if necessary, in regard to the claims or accounts which may be presented against the Government, and to report the result of his investigation, and his opinion thereupon, to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall pay such claims, if he approves them, so far as the appropriations herein made shall be sufficient for the purpose.

Mr. HUNTER. A word or two of explanation in regard to this amendment. Very heavy deficiencies have been reported for the Indian service in the Territories of Oregon and Washington. These deficiencies have been accumulating for more than a year. Representations are made by the agents, that, unless these deficiencies be met, the credit of the Government will suffer; and that, indeed, there may be danger of incurring the hostility of various Indian tribes. The Committee on Finance thought it was impossible, with the evidence before us, to determine whether these representations of the agents were true or not. While they felt on the one side the necessity of providing for all fair expenditures which looked to the public service there, even although there might not have been appropriations to meet it, on the other side they believed it was due to the public that some such check as this should be provided. We propose to send out a competent person, to examine and audit the accounts, and look at the vouchers, before the money is paid.

Mr. HALE. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Finance Committee, if this is to pay any of the war claims?

Mr. HUNTER. Nothing of that sort.

Mr. HALE. Then I have not a word to say. The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended; and the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I wish to offer an amendment at the suggestion of the Delegate from New Mexico; and I appeal to the Senator from Virginia to allow the bill to pass over informally, so that I may have time to prepare the amendment.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection; and the bill will be laid aside.

MAIL STEAMER BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I move to take up the ocean steamer bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail, by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill had been reported from the Committee on Finance with amendments, the first of which was to strike out the following clause:

"For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, $346,500; and it is hereby provided that there be paid to the Post Office Department, out of said appropriation, such sums as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, on such days as the Collins line may fail to take them from New York," and in lieu thereof insert:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, in pursuance of the contract with E. K. Collins and others, $346,500. And it is hereby provided, That, for such days as the said Collins and others shall fail to perform said service, the Postmaster General is authorized to contract with the owner or owners of any other steam vessel or vessels to perform said service, by transporting the mails from such port in the United States to such port in Great Britain as he may select, and pay therefor a sum equal to the amount of ocean and inland postages required by the United States. And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton.

Mr. HUNTER. As a proviso to that, not from the committee, but on my own motion, I offer this amendment:

Provided, That said contractors shall, in case of any such charge, receive for such transportation, instead of the contract price, the amount of ocean and inland postages received by the United States.

I will explain the purpose of my amendment. As the amendment of the Committee on Finance now stands, we propose to give to those who may carry the mails, if the Collins line fails to do so, only the postages. At the same time we propose to alter the terminus of the Collins line, and to change it from Liverpool to Southampton, which is an advantage we give to Collins that we are not bound to give him. It seems to me that, if we give him that advantage, he, receiving this annual stipend under the old contract, he ought, if he carries the mails to Southampton, to carry them for the postages; and, because we propose to confine the Bremen and the Havre lines to the postages, equality, it seems to me, would require that, in that event, if we have the power, we should put the Collins line upon the same terms. For that reason, I propose, not from the Committee on Finance, but from myself, to add this proviso. If Collins chooses to go to Liverpool, he takes his contract price; but if he chooses to go to Southampton, it seems to me he ought to be put on the same terms on which we propose to put the other two lines.

Mr. SEWARD. The effect of the amendment offered by the Senator from Virginia will be utterly to defeat all the benefits which could be derived, either to Mr. Collins or the Government of the United States, by the provision which is contained in the printed amendment submitted to the Senate by the Committee on Finance. I wish to ask whether the amendment the Senator now proposes to the amendment, submitted by the committee, has the assent and approbation of the Finance Committee, or whether it is his own distinct individual proposition?

Mr. HUNTER. I stated twice that it was my own amendment, and did not come from the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I wish to hear how far the Committee on Finance sustains or supports the views of the mover of the amendment.

Mr. PEARCE. I proposed the amendment originally reported from the committee. I was perfectly willing that the terminus of the voyage should be changed to Southampton. I could not see how the Government would lose by that in any event. I did see, it was true, that it would be a benefit to the Collins line; it would be less expensive to them, because it would shorten the voyage to some extent, and would enable them to avoid the danger of collision in the difficult navigation of the Mersey. I was not unwilling to make this change, because I did not see that the postal arrangements would be in the least inconvenienced by it. The contract of the Collins line has not been terminated nor forfeited. It is not void because they have failed to make their trips according to their contract. They are liable to the penalty of the loss of the payment of each voyage which they fail to make. A recent opinion has been given by the Attorney General to that effect. We are bound, by the contract, to make the appropriation, not to be paid to them, to be sure, unless they render the service; but if we entered suit against the company, and we failed to make the appropriation, I take it they might have a very good defense to our suit. They stipulated to repay annually one tenth of the advance originally made, over four hundred thousand dollars; and if they fail to perform any trip they fail to receive the contract price for that trip, less its proportion of that tenth.

The Senator from Virginia, if I understood him aright, seemed to think that this might operate as an injustice to the Havre and Bremen lines. The Havre and Bremen lines have no contract with the Government now, as I understand; their contract is at an end. We propose, however, to allow them to carry the mails, they taking the postages in pay. I do not perceive that the new arrangement proposed by the Collins line can do them any injury. They do not sail on the same days; they sail on alternate weeks; and I take it for granted that letters will be sent by the next steamer following their date, and these lines will get all the letters they would under other circumstances. No person, I suppose, would delay sending a letter by the Havre or Bremen line, because he knew a Collins steamer was about to go. I presume, therefore, there will be no injurious effect from this provision to any other lines at all. I see no reason why we should not agree to it, though it is beneficial to the Collins line, it is true. Although I have not favored that line as much as some others, and did not vote for the continuance of the large subsidy we gave, it struck me the misfortunes they have suffered were circumstances which should naturally induce us to extend to them the benefit of a provision which will not hurt the service of the Government, nor, so far as I can see, damage any other line. I trust the Senate will agree to the amendment of the committee.

Mr. HUNTER. It seems to me this is making an unjust discrimination. The old contract is for so much per trip from New York to Liverpool. Now, Collins desires us to change it by giving it a different terminus, Southampton, which is for his advantage; that is to say, he asks a new contract. If we make this new contract, in this respect, it seems to me we ought to impose the same condition on him that we propose to impose on the Bremen and Havre lines. Our object is, in these amendments, to institute a system of steam lines which are to be supported by the ocean postages; and in order to do that we ought to have a fair competition, and not give the Collins line, which terminates at Southampton, more than we give the Bremen and Havre lines, which go by way of Southampton. The Senator from Maryland says he does not see how this can injure those lines. I think it is manifest, because those lines are supported, not merely by postages, but by postages and passengers; and if we pay another line to run to the same terminus, from New York to Southampton, of course that line will take a portion of the passengers, and a portion of the mails, which would otherwise go by those boats, and I think it would injure them.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Virginia will be adopted, for a very satisfactory reason. The amendment, as reported by the committee, evidently changes Mr. Collins's contract, and gives him all the benefits of the old contract. You enable him to run to a different point, which is beneficial to him, with a large subsidy, and you propose to let him go to the same place to which other parties run for nothing. That is not fair.

Has this Collins line any claims on you? In the first place, you built a large portion of his ships which ought to have been paid for at once, but which, by a fraudulent construction at the Departments, runs through ten years—nothing else but a naked fraudulent construction. Then, by means that everybody knows, after giving him $387,000 a year, you gave him an additional sum, I think of $475,000 per annum for five years—I speak in round numbers. You afterwards stopped the extra allowance upon notice, and he stopped running. The Senator from Maryland says his contract has not been forfeited. I say it has never been complied with from the first day to this hour. There has never been a main stipulation in it complied with. He never did build the ships he was bound to build, and what he did build were to a large extent paid for with public money. Now, if you are going to alter your system, if you are going to endeavor to carry your mails as you ought to do for the postages, is it not unjust, and a mere scheme to break down the Southampton line, to allow this subsidized line to run to the same point, taking letters to the same place? It is defeating the very policy inaugurated in the bill, and I presume is intended to defeat it. That is its effect. You are under no obligations to Mr. Collins at all. I would forfeit his contract for non-user, non-performance; I care not if forty Attorneys General were to say the contract is good. That is my judgment. You employ a man to carry the mail, and though he may not carry it for five years, you say that you must continue to appropriate so as to have money ready to pay him if he does run. I am amazed at my friend from Maryland; and I apprehend there is some mistake as to the Attorney General having made such a decision. It is not carrying out the contract in spirit or in letter. He has violated his contract; he never built his ships according to the original contract; he has come here, and by various legislation—legislation, too, at least according to the general impression of the country, shameful to Congress—has obtained more than double the original compensation. Now, after having suspended the trips for more than a year, after breaking up the contract and denying his indebtedness to the Government, and being at this very day indebted to the Government in large sums of money for the very building of his ships, he comes here and asks you to give him additional legislative favors, and it seems that by some means or other they are always to be had. I say, by some means or other, Collins legislation generally gets through Congress; and when, from the very beginning to this hour, he has complied with no part of his contract.

Mr. SEWARD. Mr. President, if there has been anything wrong, as intimated by the honorable Senator from Georgia, in the past legislation with regard to the Collins steamers, I am very sure that time, which generally corrects all errors, will show that the fault was less with Collins than with the Congress of the United States, and that the misfortunes which have followed that error have fallen chiefly upon him, and not upon the United States. That is a transaction of the past. That was legislation by which Mr. Collins, under an agreement to expedite the carrying of the mails in the passage of steamers across the ocean, both ways, so as to excel the speed of the British steamers, and of all other steamers on the ocean, and so to make a triumph in ocean steam navigation for the United States, was to receive an addition for a voyage to the stipulated price contained in the original contract. Accidents and disasters of the most fearful kind, destructive of his property and of his wealth, and even of his family, broke down that enterprise, while Congress withdrew the additional compensation; and the question now comes before us independent of all that subsequent transaction, upon a simple proposition to provide the money to enable the Government to pay the price originally stipulated to Mr. Collins for performing the very service stipulated in the original contract. That is the amount proposed to be appropriated by this bill. There could be no objection to it unless Congress were prepared to declare the contract forfeited, and to arrest the transportation of the mails by that line altogether. The committee do not propose that, the Government do not propose it, nobody proposes it. On the contrary, the Attorney General declares the contract to be in force; the Government recognizes it to be in force. Collins is prepared to go on in performance of his contract. He simply asks for the money which the Government has stipulated to pay for the services which are to be performed during the year while he is performing the contract; but, at the same time, Mr. Collins represents to Congress what, indeed, they very well know outside of any representations of his—that this contract has proved a losing one—a failing one. The company which he represents, even with the large gratuity they for a time enjoyed, have never paid the stockholders one cent of dividend. The stock is exhausted; the ships have been seized and sold for debt. There is no money to be made by the transaction, and it is difficult to determine whether the mails can be carried at all according to the strict terms of the original contract, while the experience we have had in the last year of opening them to competition, has proved that they cannot be carried in any other way more certainly, more speedily, or more promptly.

Mr. Collins asks, in view of these circumstances, that the contract may be so modified that he may have leave to shorten his voyages, by stopping at Southampton, a matter which the officer at the head of the postal service has examined, which the Committee on Finance have examined, and which they unanimously agree will not diminish the value of the service to the United States in the least, while it will render the performance of his contract easier, and enable him to go through with it. Why should it not be granted? Why should the United States not allow this concession which will, when it is made, only secure more effectually a certain and speedy transportation of the mails, attaining all the purposes of the original contract? I can see none.

So far as the question arises whether you shall regard the contract as forfeited, no one is prepared to say that he does not want the mails carried; no one is prepared to say he does not want the mails carried by this line; no one is prepared to say that if they are not carried by this line, they must fall as they originally were, into the care and management of the British Government altogether. It is one of those concessions which are beneficial to a citizen of the United States, and cost nothing whatever to the Government.

What can be the unfairness towards the other line—the Bremen line? The Bremen line had a contract as Mr. Collins had, for a term of years.

That contract expired. They have no claims in law on the Government of the United States. Their contract was continued for one year by the Government, and no more, and has terminated. In law they have now no claim on the Government of the United States to carry these mails at all. The Government, as I understand, proposes to begin with them a new arrangement, by giving them the carrying of the mails for the postages received from the mails. So far, so good. I have doubts about the success of that experiment with that line; but is it not enough to try it with that line? We are under no obligations to give them any better terms, because we are under no contract to do so; but here is our contract with Mr. Collins to pay the sum which is stipulated in the bill; and the facts of the case show that if we pay this sum, and allow him the concession of shortening the voyage, by stopping at Southampton, instead of going off to the Mersey to deliver his mails, it will be no inconvenience whatever to the United States, this line will be restored, reinvigorated, perfected, and we shall attain all the advantages we ever expected to derive from it. If not, the whole enterprise may fail, and we shall be without any regulations, besides having failed, according to my understanding, in carrying out the letter of our contract. Sir, there have been misfortunes enough on this enterprise, which has been conducted by very valuable citizens, who have done a great deal for the country. If there have been faults and errors, it will be found that Mr. Collins has been far more sinned against than sinning, and he has been more unfortunate than the Government which has employed him in its service.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have one remark to make in reference to the extraordinary argument of the Senator from New York. He speaks of breaking faith with Mr. Collins. I do not understand that the Government breaks faith by not choosing to alter a contract against its policy or its interest. That is all there is involved in the amendment. The amendment is that we shall allow him to shorten his line, and go to Southampton instead of Liverpool, to go to the very point where the Government is now attempting to build up a line which must rely exclusively on its business, as it ought to rely on its freights and letters for pay. We are asked to pay $387,000 a year to Collins for running to that point and breaking down the very policy that the bill seeks to inaugurate. We are breaking the faith of the Government! The amendment of my friend from Virginia leaves the appropriation, (which I shall vote against,) and only provides that if his contract be altered, so as to allow him to go to this place, he shall go on the same terms as the other lines; that is only to compel him to carry out the contract as he made it. We have already altered the contract to the extent I stated before, and I think gave him above two millions of money—more than the value of the ships he lost. We gave him that much extra compensation, which would be more than the value of his ships, even if he had no insurance. The result only shows that he was incompetent to the business. I do not rely upon the statement that the stockholders have not been paid anything. I do not know where the money has gone, but I think it is a general rule that money badly got is badly spent. Samuel Swartwout died insolvent, though he robbed the Treasury of hundreds of thousands of dollars. I believe it is the general result of all such money; it comes over the devil's back and goes under his belly; and that is where it ought to go. There is wisdom in the proverb. I hope that will be the result of all attempts improperly to get money out of the public Treasury—that there will be an avenging Nemesis that will follow him who is improperly plundering the public Treasury, and visit him with the severest penalties that Providence can inflict.

I say the amendment of the Senator from Virginia does not in any way affect this man's contract. I do not believe the contract has any validity; but the amendment leaves it where it is. It leaves those who are willing to carry your mails to England for the postages and for the freights, as a business transaction, without competitors; but now, in order to defeat them, you propose to give greater privileges to this monopoly that you have fattened, unavailingly, for eight years; that you have given millions upon millions to. Now you propose to give it $387,000 a year to break down the only wise and just system, in my judgment, that the country ought ever to adopt on this subject. I have heard enough of the talk about the mastery of the seas; I have heard enough about beating England. That was the pretext under which millions of public money were squandered, a few years ago, in this contract. That is all over now. If England will carry my letters for twenty-five cents, and I cannot carry them myself for less than half a dollar, I will let her do the business; and if I was her enemy, I would give her as much of it as I could; for there is certainly no money to be made at that. We paid Mr. Collins for the five years he run twice as much as the British Government paid Mr. Cunard; and yet you say he is insolvent, and has broken down under it. We paid him as much for twenty-six trips as the British paid for fifty-two; and yet he broke down under it. That his ships went to the bottom may have been the result of mismanagement. I have generally found, in all the ordinary business of life, that bad luck generally followed bad management. He does not present himself to the country as a very favorable contractor. If you want to make a contract to maintain your equal supremacy on the seas, I would advise you, at least, to get a lucky man; and, in getting a more competent one, you will be apt to get a more lucky one.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to show to the Senate the conclusion of the opinion of the Attorney General on this subject. He says:

"Inasmuch as they have kept their covenants literally, and there is no evidence that can justify a suspicion of bad faith, I see nothing in the case on which I can rest my conscience in advising you to withhold from them the money which the Government has promised to pay them."

That is the report of the Attorney General. All the misfortune there is in this case results from the fact that it is left for Mr. Collins to suggest this change in the contract so as to allow him to stop at Southampton, instead of the Postmaster General; for it is more to the advantage of the United States than it is to Mr. Collins. It costs the United States nothing and secures to them greater benefits, as it does to him. By this arrangement the mails will reach London twelve hours sooner, by stopping at Southampton, than they would if he was obliged to carry them, according to the original contract, to Liverpool; and the mails for Paris will reach that capital twenty-four hours sooner than they would if the contract was preserved in its original shape; and the Government of the United States saves twenty-five per cent. upon the postages by transferring the mails for the continent at Southampton, instead of carrying them through England. Passengers for the continent also gain time by this arrangement.

Mr. CAMERON. As a member of the Committee on Finance, it is proper I should say that I voted for this change in Mr. Collins's contract, and I believe the committee were unanimous in making the alteration. I think there were only two gentlemen in the committee who had any doubts about its propriety. We considered it not as giving any particular advantage to Mr. Collins, not as taking anything from the Government at all, but as allowing him to stop at Southampton, by which he will save a day, and by which he will be enabled to continue his line in operation. It is understood that unless he be permitted to stop at Southampton instead of Liverpool, the line must cease, and the effect will be to reduce the number of lines across the ocean, and materially injure the commerce and traveling people of this country. The Government can lose nothing, but will gain by the change. Why, then, should it not be made?

We have nothing now to do with the former legislation in regard to Mr. Collins. If it were proposed now to make such a contract, and I was called upon to vote to pay for establishing lines of this kind, I might not be disposed to do so; but this contract is upon us, and the question is whether these ships shall not, or whether they shall be used for the benefit of the country? whether the creditors of Mr. Collins, who have purchased them, shall be enabled to use them, and receive, during the existence of the contract, a portion of the debt due from Mr. Collins to them, thus paying them and relieving Mr. Collins of a portion of his burdens? It is a fact that that gentleman entered the service of the country one of the richest merchants of New York, and he is now a bankrupt. He has done a great deal for the country by his ships. They are acknowledged to be the best in the world. He has conducted them with a speed greater than any other vessels have ever made across the ocean; and, in every respect, it has been a line of which the whole country might well be proud. We propose now only to permit the broken down old man to change the stopping place, so as to enable him to get to the end of his journey one day sooner, and thus save a portion of his expenses.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not want to go into this debate; for the matter of the Collins line has been often discussed in both Houses; but I cannot stand here and permit such arguments as we have heard to pass without notice, as if this line had peculiar claims on the consideration of Congress. I think, when we look to the past legislation of the country, it has very little claim in that regard; but I have no desire to go into that. I believed, from the start, that the whole system was wrong; that the policy was wrong of supporting lines of ocean steamers out of the Treasury of the United States. I believed it ought to have been left, like any other trade, to competition; and I thought if it were so left we should get a sound system of ocean steam navigation, which would be self-supporting. So far as we have gone, I think experience has proved that; or, at any rate, it has proved that if we attempt to sustain it out of the Treasury of the United States it is an expense imposed on the great body of the people at large which they ought not to bear.

But, sir, the Committee on Finance have attempted to commence a new policy, which, if it shall turn out to be successful, will be a great improvement on the past. It is a policy which looks to ocean postage as a self-sustaining system, and in order to inaugurate that, it will be necessary to put all upon fair and equal terms. If, on the contrary, we are to insist that we are to keep up this old system of maintaining ocean steam lines, which really are designed for commerce more than for postages, out of the Treasury of the United States, then we may prepare ourselves for applications from almost every seaport on the coast, and applications which we can hardly resist with justice; for surely there can be no justice in subsidizing lines out of the Treasury of the United States from one port, and from none other. That system can no longer be kept up as an exclusive system, and we thought it better to abandon it at once, and to endeavor to commence this other system, which will be fair and equal, and will leave to each port the enjoyment of its own peculiar advantages. I believe, under that, New York would enjoy great advantages, because her commerce and her intercourse with the rest of the world would enable her to maintain lines that could not be supported at the other ports of the Union. I believe it is fairer to the whole country, and a far more wholesome system than that which is vindicated by the Senator from New York and the Senator from Pennsylvania. I do not wish now to enter into these general considerations. The simple question for the Senate to determine is, are they willing now to commence this new system by which steamers are to be sustained by ocean postages; and if they are, is it not fair to put the Collins line on equal terms with all the others? It seems to me that if we admit the first, the second will follow as an inevitable consequence.

Mr. STUART. I do not desire to enter at length into this debate, but if I understand the proposition it is very different from the statement that has been made on the other side. The Committee on Finance propose to insert this provision: "And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton." If the Postmaster General does not choose to make the change, the Collins line will run to Liverpool. If the Postmaster General deems it for the benefit of the United States to make the change, why should you alter the pay? If the change is beneficial to the United States, why take away the contract price? If it is not beneficial to the United States, why assume that the Postmaster General will make the change? It will be seen from the reading of the proposition that it is not in the power of the contractors to make the change. The proposition is not to authorize them to change the termination of the line, but to authorize the Postmaster General to change it with their consent. But the amendment of the Senator from Virginia is, that if it shall be found beneficial to the United States to allow the line to go to Southampton instead of Liverpool, the contract pay shall be taken away and it shall run for the postages; and this the Senator calls equality. If I had time, it would be very easy to show that there is no equality in it. These ships were made on the invitation of the Secretary of the Navy for a specific purpose—not merely to carry this mail, but under the belief that the construction of these steamers would be beneficial to the United States for war purposes, and reserving the right to buy them. I suppose it is true to-day that either of them is worth more money than all the steamships that run to Southampton; it cost more money to build it; and yet this is said to be equality. Here is an investment that is required to be made on the invitation of the Secretary of the Navy, an immense investment, not necessary to carry these mails, but to build a certain character of ships that have been built at enormous expense and great outlay of capital. Now, it is proposed to take these ships and allow them to run to Southampton, if the Government wants that, for, as I said before, they cannot run to Southampton unless the Government wants it. If the Government deems it beneficial to itself to run to Southampton instead of Liverpool, then you say this change shall not be made, though it may be beneficial to the line to make it, unless the contract pay be taken away! I confess I neither see the equality nor the justice of this. If the Committee on Finance are right, and I think they are, in proposing this amendment to the House bill, let its effect be available to the country; do not hamper it with an amendment which certainly must destroy it. I have no disposition to continue this debate.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Will the honorable Senator from Michigan be good enough to inform the Senate how long the contract of Mr. Collins continues to run?

Mr. STUART. Two years.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I had occasion to look into this morning, and I found that it will expire on the 27th of April, 1860.

Mr. STUART. In about two years.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, this whole system of ocean-mail postage is a very large one, and I dislike to see it go by without any observations at all on the part of any of those Senators who have turned their attention to it. I am not willing to see this subject disposed of without some reference to the general principles that ought to govern us in our postal communications with foreign countries. I am perfectly willing that, in the establishment of our postal communications with European nations, we shall be guided by a consideration of the amount of postages that can be collected, and that that amount of postages should not be materially exceeded in the contracts made by the Government for the conveyance of the mail.

Mr. YULEE. Will the Senator allow me to suggest, that if he proposes to go into the general discussion of the subject of ocean-mail service, it might, perhaps, be advisable that I should send to the Clerk's desk an amendment which I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to offer, and which I intend to move when the Committee on Finance shall get through with their amendments.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I should be glad to have that read for information before I go on.

Mr. YULEE. I send the amendment to the desk, and ask that it be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports by steamship, allowing and paying therefor out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if by an American vessel, the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign vessel, the sea postage only, on the mails so conveyed: Provided, That the preference shall always be given to an American over a foreign steamship, when departing from the same port, for the same destination, within three days of each other.

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to provide for and maintain, if practicable, at a cost not to exceed, in any instance, the sea and United States inland postage on the mails conveyed, a weekly mail to and from Europe, by United States mail packets, to alternate at regular intervals with the British mail packets plying between New York and Liverpool, and Boston and Liverpool, the preference to be given to such line or lines of American steamships, suitable in all respects for the service, as shall offer the best permanent contract.

Mr. CLINGMAN. With the permission of the Senator from Louisiana, I ask, in this connection, that a short amendment which I desire to offer may be read, with a view of calling his attention to it.

The Secretary read the proposed amendment of Mr. CLINGMAN, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1860, a discriminating rate of postage of one hundred per centum additional shall be exacted upon all letters and other mail matter conveyed from foreign countries to the United States by vessels sailing under foreign flags, which shall receive a governmental bonus as mail carriers.

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, required to abrogate any existing postal convention with a foreign Government, the stipulations of which are calculated to prevent the execution of the preceding provision.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was going to observe that I yielded a cordial assent to the policy which proposes to maintain mail communications with Europe, for an amount not essentially exceeding the postages received; but to that portion of the policy which is directed to the establishment of lines, which lines shall themselves receive the precise postages, I am opposed. I have no idea of putting the foreign mail system at the mercy of what is now called competition, leaving it loose, undefined, and unregulated by the Government. I would as soon adopt a similar system in our inland postages. There are lines upon which the postages would make an amount per annum far exceeding what would be required by any ocean line of mail steamers for the service rendered to the Government. There are other lines which might be built up by the surplus postages collected on these favored lines, and in that manner redound to the interest and advantage of the country. There may be some particular short lines on which a very heavy business is done, and on which the postages received by the Government of the United States would far exceed any fair remuneration for the company carrying the mail, whilst, on the other hand, there are postal lines to which some advantage ought to be given by the Government, in order to enable them to carry mails which it is essential for the interests of the country to have regularly transported. It appears to me that the random system of giving to each line exactly the postages that it earns, is no more consistent with sound policy upon the sea than it is upon the land; and what would be thought now amongst us of a proposition that the mail in the different parts of the United States should be conveyed by different companies, under contract with the Post Office Department, for the postages collected upon the letters conveyed by those particular companies? What opportunity would there be for postal communication in the sparsely-settled portions of the country? What opportunity would there be for communication with our distant frontiers? This would be a subversion of the entire policy of the Government as established from its foundation. It would be, in my judgment, a very unwise and unwarrantable departure from a policy which hitherto has produced the most beneficial results. I am aware, that in saying this I run counter to the ideas of my friend from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] whose theory on the subject is, that the price of carrying the mail ought to be paid, as far as possible, by the persons for whose benefit it is carried; that we ought to look to the precise cost of carrying every letter, and, if possible, charge that cost upon the person for whom it is carried; and who does not consider it legitimate for us to look to the general interests of the country, to the advancing civilization of our western frontiers, to the necessity of facilitating settlements which cannot be established without postal facilities—who considers, I say, that these are considerations purely incidental, which ought not to be taken into account when we are establishing mail facilities. I do not agree with my friend from Georgia in these ideas of the policy of the Government. I cannot conceive that he is right so far as the postage on land is concerned, and I believe the policy will be equally at fault if carried out upon the sea.

Under the system upon which our mails have been carried for a few years past, the disfavor which has been cast on these lines, the amount of postages collected upon American lines has been gradually diminishing; and, whenever the postages upon American lines diminish, there is a correspondent augmentation on the postages gained by foreign lines, and this reacts upon our Government in a twofold manner. Not only are our own receipts diminished, but, under the arrangements by which foreign postages are now collected, large commissions are allowed to the postmasters for collecting the postages due to the foreign lines; and the consequence has been, strange as it may appear, that, as the number of our trips to foreign countries by our mail steamers has diminished, the expenses of our Government for those trips have increased. I have before me a statement showing a gradual diminution in the number of the trips of our steamers, and the quantity of mail matter carried abroad; and one would naturally suppose that the less the service the less the cost ought to be upon any judicious system; whereas, in point of fact, as our service diminishes our expenses increase under the system that now prevails. In 1855, we made fifty-two trips across the ocean; the Government of the United States collected $731,675 for postages, and paid out for commissions on foreign mail matter $100,768, leaving a balance to the credit of the Government of $630,907. Deducting that from the amount paid for the foreign service, and the cost to the Government in that year was but $104,000. In the following year the trips were diminished; but instead of the cost to the Government being diminished, the true expenses were increased to $135,000. In the year 1857 the trips were still further reduced to forty from the original amount, fifty-two; and that brought us in debt $433,000. So the fewer trips we make the more money we pay.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator will excuse me for interposing an explanation at this point to prevent an improper effect from the table he has before him. The postages received by the United States in 1855 were largely increased in consequence of the fact that several of the British steamers were withdrawn for transport service to the Crimea; and the income of the United States during the last year was greatly diminished by the fact that the Collins line substituted for their trips the steamer Ericsson, on board of which people generally would not send letters, because she was always behind time. That is the explanation of the difference; and it is proper that that explanation should be made to prevent a misconception of the results exhibited by the table.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was aware of those facts, and I was going to advert to them; but I am gratified that the Senator from Florida has spared me the necessity of doing so. They do not, however, touch my argument to this extent—and this is the point I am aiming at—that under our present system, from some cause which it is not necessary now to go into or to attempt to develop, there is something so faulty that the more you diminish the number of trips, the heavier appear to be the expenses of the Government. In 1855, wherever be the cause, we really performed fifty-two trips on the ocean, and the service cost the Government $100,000, over and above the postages received. In 1857 we had but forty trips across the ocean—twelve trips less—at a cost to the Government of $433,000. Now, whether the diminution in the number of trips arose from one cause or another, the fact is clear that there were fewer trips in that year, twelve trips fewer, and they cost the Government a great deal more.

Mr. YULEE. But the Senator misunderstood me. I did not mean that it was altogether because of the fewer trips; but because a part of those trips were performed by an inadequate vessel, which took no mails; that is to say, mails were put on board, but the mails contained very few letters, and we received no postage of consequence, and yet she received full pay.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is true to some extent, and may, perhaps, weaken the force of the argument I am advancing to a certain extent; but my intention now is to draw to the attention of the Senate the exceedingly defective system on which our foreign postal communication is carried on, and at the same time urge on Senators some considerations, which, in my judgment, ought to induce us to pause before we adopt the principle of giving to each line the postages made upon that line, as remuneration for carrying the mail.

I am satisfied that there are foreign mails on particular lines which would yield to the contractors, on such a system, a great deal more than any contract system would require us to pay; whilst, on the other hand, there are lines which it would be exceedingly important for the country to establish, that can never be put on a permanent footing with such a system as that. That is what I wish to call to the attention of the Senate.

Now, in relation to the particular amendment before the Senate as regards the Collins line, I must say that I do not share the opinions of the gentleman from Virginia, or my friend from Georgia, in this point of view. If it be once taken for granted, as the Finance Committee of the Senate concede by the measure which they have brought forward, that the Collins contract is still in force, I cannot conceive for what reason, if it be beneficial to our Government, we should not have the mails carried to Southampton, if that should also prove to be acceptable to the contractor. The Senator from Michigan has pointed out to the Senate that by the terms of the amendment there is no provision at all in favor of the contractor; there is nothing in it that authorizes the contractor to carry the mail to Southampton; but it is a provision which authorizes the Postmaster General to bargain with him to carry it to Southampton if he will consent.

Upon what basis is this proposition maintained? If I understand it, it is this: the Collins line comprises steamers which cost vastly more than any other line which connects us with foreign countries. I am not here to stand up in defense of that line; I believe it has been most miserably managed; I believe that it is owing to the mismanagement, and, I may add from public rumor, to the corruption which has accompanied the establishment of that line, that such a great disfavor is felt in the country towards the foreign mail service; but the contract is conceded to be still in existence by the Finance Committee. Now what advantages will the Government of the United States gain by carrying the mail to Southampton? That is all I look at. Is there any advantage the Government will attain by requiring the mail to be carried to Southampton instead of Liverpool? I think there is, both in point of time and in point of expense, an advantage so apparent to the Government that I cannot conceive why we should refuse to accept it, simply because it may also be beneficial to the contractor. That advantage consists in this: in the first place, your mails to the continent will reach the continent twenty-four hours sooner by touching at Southampton, and being carried across to Havre, than by taking them up the Mersey to Liverpool, from thence, conveying them to London across England, and thence to the continent. There must be at least a gain of twenty-four hours by that route. There is the gain of time. Next there is the gain of money. If you take your mails from this side, and deliver them at Southampton, and at Southampton put them at once on the small steamer which carries them across the Channel to the French coast, you avoid the payment of the entire amount that is charged by England for the passage of the continental mail through England, and that is a very heavy item.

Now, if we can economize time and economize money for the Government, for travelers, for the commercial community at large, shall we say that we will refuse these advantages because it may also be to the advantage of the contractor to accept this modification? I look upon this matter, as regards the Government, in the same light that I would look at it if I were myself personally interested. If I had made this contract with Collins, on the conditions which now exist, I would cheerfully change the terminus on the other side, if any advantage was to be involved in the change, even if it was a benefit to him. I would try to get out of him something for the change, if I thought I could; but if I could not, I would let it go, and reap all the advantages I could for myself. If it is believed that the advantages for Collins so far preponderate over those which may result to our own Government as to enable us to exact from him some diminution of his mail pay, I say at once, make the best bargain for the Government you can that is consistent with dealing not too severe, not too stringent; but if, on the other hand, the advantages are equally poised, I really cannot see why we should refuse a national benefit because the contractor is thereby also benefited. If gentlemen will show me that our Government is to be injured at all by the change, if we are not to receive an advantage, I say make no change unless he pays us an equivalent; but if we are benefited, and he also be benefited, let us, in God's name, do what is beneficial to all, and harms none.

Mr. YULEE. Mr. President, inasmuch as the action of the Senate upon the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance might be more or less affected by their disposition in respect to the general subject of ocean mail transportation, I deemed it proper to cause to be read to the Senate the amendment designed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and inasmuch as it has been read to the Senate, I think it may be proper to accompany it with a very few remarks, in explanation of the policy upon which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have placed themselves in respect to this subject.

There were a great many applications from parties desirous of establishing new lines of steamers, which were referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. They gave much consideration to the subject, and I believe unanimously concluded that it was not expedient to recommend, in the present condition of the Treasury, any contracts for new lines. While they were not disposed to disturb existing contracts, they were not disposed to recommend any new ones; but the committee were of opinion that the opportunity might be seized to inaugurate a new system upon which the postal service on the ocean might, so far as Europe, especially, was concerned, rest for the future, and that by legislating upon the matter now, the new system might acquire footing enough to be able to succeed the present contract service upon the expiration of their respective terms. At the same time it is to be conceded, as suggested by the Senator from Louisiana, that there are other routes which, in the opinion of Congress, may subserve a public interest that could not be sustained by the income from postages upon the letters conveyed. There may be lines which, from diplomatic considerations or from commercial considerations, it may be deemed advisable to establish. There may be continental lines, lines upon the American coast, to South America, the establishment of which may serve a diplomatic and American policy, but which could not be sustained by postages. If it be deemed advisable to establish such lines, the propriety of doing so would address itself to other considerations than postal; and the Post Office Committee did not deem the time propitious, if they were even charged with the subject in that view of it, for the recommendation of any new lines; but in their opinion, the legislation they proposed was likely to result in the establishment of a very successful trans-Atlantic European service, which would entirely supersede the necessity of special contracts.

The official returns of the Post Office Department exhibit the fact that the postages, sea and inland, upon the European mails, are very stable, and for several years past present a nearly similar amount. Including in the calculation the receipts by the British as well as American steamers, the total amount of postage on the mails which cross the Atlantic to Liverpool, Havre, and Bremen, is $1,473,283 61 a year—nearly a million and a half—and it is an increasing sum. There is a gradual increase, so that the increase of last year may be safely calculated upon in our legislation. The British maintain a weekly line, alternately, from Boston and New York. If we establish a weekly line alternating with them, with good steamers, we may fairly expect to receive one half the total amount, which would be nearly eight hundred thousand dollars—a sum quite equal to that which is paid by the British Government for weekly service by the Cunard line. If, therefore, the Post Office Department, with good judgment, make a contract for a weekly service, touching at such points as may best accommodate the postal requirements in the intercourse between the two continents, there is every reason to believe that an income may be derived from it fully equal to that which is received by the Cunard line, and therefore fully equal to the support of a line. Every postal purpose of the Government, all its postal policy in connection with the ocean steam service, so far as Europe is concerned, would be accomplished by the effect of this legislation.

The committee were further encouraged in the recommendation of this policy from the circumstance that, at the last session, they recommended the same legislation, and it then received the sanction of the Senate. The Senate, at the last session, agreed to a similar amendment to one of the appropriation bills, which only failed in consequence of the confusion of the last night in the conference between the two Houses.

Now, in reference to the hearing which the recommendation of the Post Office Committee may have on this particular amendment, I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the chairman of the Committee on Finance, for this reason: inasmuch as it is desirable to inaugurate this policy under the most auspicious circumstances, it being likely that a line touching at Southampton, and extending alternately to Bremen and Havre, will draw a larger amount from the British line of postage patronage, it is proper that the whole service should be placed upon the same footing. A line to Liverpool, as now contracted for, would not so much interfere with the successful inauguration of this policy as would a subsidized line with a subsidy of $19,000 per voyage to Southampton, superseding the vessels of another line which might be disposed to undertake the service. This matter being at the option of the Postmaster General, I agree that it is not very important; but I think, as an indication of the purpose of the Senate, it might be desirable, inasmuch as under the existing law we are not required to do more than to pay for the service to Liverpool, to leave that contract standing where it is, but with the permission to the contractors, if they please, to abandon that special contract, and to come into the policy of the Government, in its endeavor to inaugurate a new system upon a new basis. I would propose to give them the right to be participants in the policy by a privilege to take the line to Southampton, upon the basis determined upon by legislation, if this should be adopted.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me? It seems to me we are discussing here rather upon words than things. The gentleman terms it a right to participate in the benefits of the Government if they shall give up the contract. They consider that that is something which the Government is asking them to sacrifice. If you put it in the light that it is an advantage to them to give up $400,000 a year, the argument is sound.

Mr. YULEE. I think the Senator has misunderstood me. I do not propose to disturb that contract, nor do I understand the chairman of the Committee on Finance so to propose; but to leave Mr. Collins the right to run to Liverpool, and pay him the contract price, and to give him the privilege in preference to any other line to transfer himself to Southampton, if he chooses to bring himself within the policy which we may now adopt of putting all lines on the basis of the postages for income.

The objection to the amendment, as reported from the Committee on Finance, as it stands in the printed bill, is that it proposes to allow the Collins line to stop at Southampton, whereas it is important that the service should extend to the continent, that it should go to Havre and Bremen; and by permitting the Collins line to place itself upon the Southampton route, and there to stop, without carrying the mails further, you impose upon the Department the necessity of providing for the conveyance of the mails from Southampton to the continent, and you disable them from employing other vessels that would be willing to extend the trip to that point for a less sum than $19,000. Inasmuch as I believe—and it is evident the contractors so believe, from the circumstance that they apply for the authority to make the change—that they will profit by the change, I think it would be advisable to impose on them a gentle constraint in making the change, to fall into the policy of the country, by extending their trips to Havre or Bremen, as the Postmaster General may require, and to do it upon the basis of the legislation we may adopt at this session. Whether the Senate will determine to adopt the amendment proposed by the Post Office Committee or not, of course I cannot know; but if they mean to do so, I think it would be advisable to adopt the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to ask the honorable chairman of the Post Office Committee one question. Will the Government lose anything in the way of postages, if, according to the amendment of the Finance Committee, they alter the place of stopping in England?

Mr. YULEE. The Government will lose, as the amendment is proposed, all the expense of transporting the mails from Southampton to Havre and Bremen.

Mr. BAYARD. Would not that expense equally exist in transporting the mails from Liverpool to those points?

Mr. YULEE. I should have less objection to the amendment proposed by the Finance Committee if they would add the words "and Havre or Bremen," so that the Collins line might extend their trips to Havre or Bremen.

Mr. BAYARD. The amendment of the Finance Committee is to authorize the Postmaster General, in his discretion, with the consent of the owners of this line, to change the terminus of the route from Liverpool to Southampton. What I desire to know is whether, supposing the Government would have to pay the contract price in either case, the service would be less efficient to them, and whether they would lose in postages by changing the terminus from Liverpool to Southampton?

Mr. YULEE. I think not, in that respect.

Mr. BAYARD. Then it seems to me it comes to this: the recommendation of the committee is to allow the Postmaster General to propose to this company to change the terminus of the line from Liverpool to Southampton, which is an alteration of the contract if they assent to it; that is not to be injurious to the Government in any point of view; it is neither to lessen their postages nor to render the line less efficient. But the amendment of the honorable Senator from Virginia embodies, in connection with that, a proposition that the Postmaster General shall not have that discretion unless the owners of this line will consent to alter the terms of the contract on which you are to pay them and receive a less sum. I do not think that is justice.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I intend to support the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, notwithstanding the suggestions made in opposition to it. I shall not, however, enter into any argument upon that point; but with respect to the objections of the Senator from Louisiana that the postage might be excessive remuneration, that difficulty can very easily be remedied by providing that while the compensation paid for a line shall never exceed the amount of the postage on the letters carried, the Postmaster General, in his discretion, may allow a less amount. There is an objection of an opposite character presented by the Senator from Michigan. He argues that it will not be remunerative to carry letters in this way. Why, sir, there is no freight in the world that pays like letters. If you were to put these letters down to a cent an ounce it would be sixteen cents a pound, and there is no freight transported on the ocean at that rate. It is true, that if a vessel was of no use but to carry the mails, then it might be that it would not be sufficient; but we have regular lines of steamships and other ships running across the ocean, and of course they will be very glad to get the letters at any rate of postage that has ever been thought of.

But, sir, my object in asking the attention of the Senate for a few moments this morning, is to say that while I intend to support the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, and believe it the best thing we can do at this time, because Mr. Collins has nearly two years yet to run, and we shall be obliged, if he complies with his part of the contract, to go on until the arrangement is carried out, I think the proposition of the Senator from Virginia does not go far enough, and I intend to ask the Senate at a proper time to adopt an additional amendment. If the Senate will indulge me for a few moments, I think I can show reasons why my proposition—it has already been read—which may at first strike gentlemen unfavorably, is one that must be adopted. All our contracts for existing lines will expire in less than two years from this time. What are we to do then? The Cunard line will still be in operation. It has now until January, 1862, to run, and must run for one year thereafter if notice be given, and may continue to run longer.

The great objection in my mind to these subsidized lines is not merely the money they take out of the Treasury, though that is a serious one; but there is a still greater mischief in crippling private enterprise. If you leave private enterprise to determine this matter, and the passengers, the freight, and the letters, to be carried by those who can carry them cheapest, the United States will beat all the world. That is obvious to everybody who looks at the progress which our shipping has made. I have had occasion, during a run of years, to notice the comparative increase of the United States and Great Britain, and I find that we increase about five times as fast as they do when you leave it to private enterprise. If, however, you make it a Government matter, the Governments of Europe will advance larger sums to support their lines than our Government is willing to do. That is obvious from the large naval and military force they keep up. Hence, in 1852, when Congress was discussing the question of increased compensation to the Collins line, seeing at that time the difficulty in which we have since been involved, I attempted to get in an amendment to prevent this identical state of things. I barely allude to the subject now to show that it is one that has been discussed in the two Houses of Congress heretofore. If all our ships be withdrawn, Great Britain may continue to subsidize her lines, and in what position are we placed? The Cunarders get about $850,000 a year. Suppose they put down their freight and passengers to a rate that will barely pay the running expenses, the wear and the tear of the vessels: then $850,000 is a very handsome return, perhaps, on their investment. Suppose Mr. Vanderbilt, Mr. Collins, or anybody else, should run a line on the same terms, and run it with exactly the same economy he would have nothing upon the original investment if he had no subsidy, and of course his line must go down. The question, therefore, presents itself, whether we shall let this system continue?

If the United States and Great Britain gave one of the hotels in this city $100,000 a year as a subsidy, of course it would underwork other public houses. That might be a matter of no great moment to us if it was done by the British Government; and it would be a matter of very little consequence to us, provided a house was kept up that answered the purposes of the public, how it was done; but it is a very different thing when you come to look to ships. It is very important to us that we should have a large number of ships; not only important to our wealth and progress in time of peace, but eminently important in time of war. We are now brought to this pass, as was foreseen several years ago: our subsidized lines have gradually gone down; the people of this country are not willing to make large advances out of the public Treasury to keep up those lines; and if we were to keep up as many ships, at the rate we have paid heretofore, as Great Britain, the result would be that we should probably have to spend ten millions a year. What is the effect of that? You crush all other interests. Here is the case of Mr. Vanderbilt, who is running a line to Southampton, but gets no subsidy. He has to come in competition with the Cunarders, who get $17,000 a trip, and Mr. Collins, who gets $19,000 a trip. My friend from Maryland [Mr. KENNEDY] suggests to me that Mr. Vanderbilt does not run in the winter because of these disadvantages; but if the subsidies of these two lines be withdrawn, they will then have to charge the same rate that Vanderbilt does. It is a mistake to suppose that he has not as good ships as anybody. His ship, the Vanderbilt, is superior to any one that Collins has, except the Adriatic, and is, perhaps, quite equal to that; and it has made, according to the newspaper statements, the quickest trip ever made across the Atlantic. The Persia beat Collins's best time, and it is stated that the Vanderbilt was able to beat the Persia, I believe, about an hour. It is a mistake, therefore, to suppose that Vanderbilt has not good ships; but he cannot run under disadvantages if he has subsidized lines to compete with.

We must do, I take it, one of these things. First, we can go into a competition with Great Britain by subsidized lines; and the result of that will be, that our lines will gradually go down, as has been our experience heretofore. It is a well-known fact, if we are to rely on the statements repeatedly made in the public press, that Great Britain is getting the advantage of us in the number of ships. France can go into this system; and even Bremen—the little town of Bremen. We gave a subsidy to some vessels to run to Bremen; and I understand they are now running ships over here. I believe the greatest portion of the stock of the Bremen line was furnished by the Government of that country; and, of course, they were glad to have us allow them subsidies to keep up their vessels. By giving small subsidies, those foreign Powers can greatly underwork our private enterprise. Suppose you start a line from New York, and Philadelphia comes here and says, "Why should not we have a line?" If you grant it to Philadelphia, Boston and Baltimore and Charleston and New Orleans will make the same proposition. When you have got a dozen lines, why should not you go further? Why should San Francisco, Savannah, and other places, be cut out? It will be like the building of post offices. You build a post office in New York and one in Philadelphia, and then there must be one in every other city. If you go on, where are you to stop? I have no hesitation in saying that, if I found it was the settled policy of the Government to keep up a line of this sort from New York, I should not be willing to deny one to Philadelphia. Pennsylvania pays a part of the taxes to support these lines. I would no sooner do that, than I would vote a pension to A and deny it to B, who had performed the same service. If, then, we are to adopt this system, it will require a large expenditure; and the result will be mischievous and disastrous to us, because it will break down all our ships, except those that are subsidized in this way.

If we abandon that policy, in the second view of the case, and foreign nations choose to pay moderate subsidies, they will be gradually gaining upon us. I can state my notions on this point by a simple illustration. I hope the Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] will allow me to use it, because I know he is anxious to protect American industry. I myself am a free-trader, but I want fair play to everybody. Let us suppose we had no tariff at all on imports, though we have now a considerable one, but not so high as he thinks it ought to be; suppose there were free trade between Great Britain and the United States in iron and other things; but England, with a view of giving her establishments an advantage, proposed to allow ten dollars a ton for every bar of iron that was made: that iron would be brought to this country, and would undersell our Pennsylvania friends. If I saw that to be the case, I should vote at once to put a tax of at least ten dollars on it. I should say, "I will have fair play; if I am for free trade, I will give everybody an equal chance." That is just the situation in which we are likely to be placed here. If foreign lines get subsidies from other countries, they can underwork our people.

Then there is another view. These ships bring freights here; they bring silks, and iron, and sugar, and other articles; they may bring anything. Why should we advance money to pay those freights? I am not willing to impose a tax for mere protection, but why should we pay freight to get them here? Suppose I should move an amendment to this effect, that to enable the British to bring their goods here which come into competition with our own, we shall advance a certain sum of money out of the Treasury to pay the freight of bringing their iron, woollens, and cutlery, and other articles that come into competition with our enterprise, how would it be met by gentlemen on this floor? And yet that is the very thing we are now doing. I think that our manufacturers have a right to claim that they shall have the advantage of the freight, and whatever other advantages they have by reason of the difficulties of bringing foreign materials here. It is fair that they should have that, and I would not cut them out of it; but this very system enables the Cunarders and the Collins line, or others, to bring foreign merchandise here and undersell our own people, and the expense of doing it is either paid out of our own Treasury, or it is advanced by foreign Governments. I submit to gentlemen if there is anything fair in this. Do we intend to stand idly by and see our lines cut up in that way and our own system cut down? We have passed a great many laws, I know, to retaliate against foreigners. Our object was to get free trade, to obtain a removal of all restrictions, and when they gave bounties to cripple them to the extent of putting us on equal footing. If we do not intend to stand on that, I take it the only third thing we can do is to adopt a line of policy by which we may break down the subsidies altogether.

This brings me to the proposition I desire to submit as an amendment, and which I hope the Senate will adopt. It does not touch the subject for the next two years, but allows the Collins line contract to expire, which it will do on the 27th of April, 1860. I propose that from and after that time we put a discriminating postage of one hundred per cent. additional upon letters that are brought in all vessels that receive subsidies or bonuses from foreign Governments. Of course the effect of that will be, that if a man in London is going to send a letter here, and sends it by the Cunard line, he has to pay twice the postage he would if it came by some other line which was not subsidized. The effect would be to operate injuriously upon the Cunard line, and force them to give up the business, I take it. But gentlemen say Great Britain will retaliate if we do this. She cannot retaliate on these principles, for we have no subsidized lines. We do not propose to touch her lines, except those that are subsidized. She has a line of four ships running, I believe, to Canada, as regularly as the Cunarders, that get no subsidy from the British Government. So far from seeing a disposition on the part of the British Government to put any countervailing taxes on us, I think you will find that the strong feeling there is against these monopolies altogether.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Certainly, sir.

Mr. BENJAMIN. So far as the Senator's argument is concerned, which I have been following with interest, there appears to me to be this difficulty about it. The Senator's assumption seems to be, throughout, that the amount which he calls a subsidy given by the British Government to the Cunard line, exceeds the amount that they would receive from postage. They do not get the postage, and I cannot conceive in what sense he considers those lines subsidized lines, because they receive a sum certain, and our lines not subsidized lines because they receive a sum contingent, but which may perhaps exceed the amount certain the others receive.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I will not make any controversy about terms, as the Senator from Louisiana understands my meaning. So that I attain my object, I do not attempt to show any extraordinary precision or elegance of language.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is not on that, but on the substance of the argument.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I understand.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator says that if we tax the British lines, they cannot tax ours in return, because we give no subsidy. I understand that we are to give the postages which may be just as much as the British give in the way of a sum certain, and therefore the retaliatory system would be justifiable.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I was about to advert to that view. The proposition I intend to support, and which indeed formed part of my amendment, but I did not have it read because the amendment of the Senator from Florida goes very nearly to the same point, is to give the postages in all instances. That would be fair. I do not mean that I would always give the whole amount. I think it highly probable that where it is very remunerative you ought either to reduce the postage—and probably that would be the best course—or to diminish the amount paid to the line. My proposition is—and I think I have made myself sufficiently intelligible—to do away with the practice of paying sums of money from the Government. If Great Britain and the United States can come to an understanding by which all lines are to receive the postage, or certain proportions of the postage, that will be perfectly fair. The purpose of my amendment is to bring about that understanding. If we adopt a proposition of this sort it has two years to go into effect, and it will of course tend to bring the English Government and our own to some definite arrangement. How did we get rid of the Denmark Sound dues? We should probably not have been clear of them to-day if this Government had not taken a decided step, given the notice, and declared it would not pay them. That had a tendency to change the whole system. So if we make a provision of this kind the result will be that the Government of Great Britain will be obliged to abandon her subsidies. I do not think she will try any retaliatory system. The consequence will be that more equitable and fair arrangements can be made between the two countries, by which vessels may receive the postage, or part of the postage. In this way we shall relieve ourselves of all this drain upon the Treasury, and we shall put all lines upon an equal footing. I am for having free trade in letters; I am for having a sort of reciprocity system between the British ships and our own. I think that can be arrived at; but it can only be done when you break down these subsidized lines. Although the British Government cannot terminate the Cunard line before January, 1863, the company may terminate it themselves; and there is a provision by which they are authorized, on giving twelve months' notice, to require the Government to take their ships off their hands. If therefore we make this proposition at this time, and it is adopted, they will see that at the end of two years they will be subjected to this onerous burden, and it will be a question with them whether they will bear it or get clear of the arrangement.

My purpose was not to detain the Senate long, but to present this view. If any Senator can find a better mode of arriving at the same result, I shall gladly take it. In 1852, I brought forward, in the House of Representatives, a provision that after the termination of our subsidies there should be no freight or passengers brought into the ports of the United States for hire, by any vessel that was supported wholly, or in part, by a foreign Government. I made two or three attempts, at successive sessions, to get in that proposition. I may say further, that on consulting the Secretary of State, and the Attorney General, in 1854, they thought there was no objection to it. It seems to me that such a provision as this will be a simpler and more direct way of meeting it; but if any other suggestion can be made, I will take it very cheerfully. The great object I have in view is to prevent lines which get bonuses from Government coming in competition with private enterprise. Take the case of Mr. Vanderbilt. According to my recollection, Mr. Collins formed no purpose whatever of going to Southampton until Vanderbilt ran his ships there a few times, and was doing it without any bonus. The amendment of the Finance Committee, therefore, is to enable Mr. Collins to go to Southampton, and perhaps break Mr. Vanderbilt down. I do not think that is fair. If Mr. Collins chooses to run to Southampton now, and change his contract, let him do it; but let him do it on fair terms. If you simply adopt this amendment, you enable him to break down a rival—one who has beaten him, certainly, if you take in view the odds between them, beaten him vastly; and, in point of fact, I believe Vanderbilt runs his ships in about as good time, though there may not be much difference in that respect, and with more regularity.

The Senator from New York made one remark which I wish to notice. He says that Mr. Collins has been unfortunate in losing two of his ships. I think that is not to be laid at anybody's door but his. In 1852, when the proposition was before us to increase the compensation to him, he got permission from Congress, as I suppose the Senator from New York will remember, for there was a great deal of discussion about it, to dispense with that regulation which required him to carry a naval officer on board. I remember that some officers of the Navy complained about it. I do not know how it stands now.

Mr. COLLAMER. Precisely as it was then. It has never been dispensed with.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It was adopted in the House, and, I think, passed the Senate.

Mr. COLLAMER. When the line was put in operation I was then in the Post Office Department. They wished to be consulted in relation to the appointment of a mail agent, so that they might have a person acceptable to them. I was unable to see the use of one, as there was nothing to do but to put the mails on board and lock them up, and keep them locked until they reached Liverpool. I said I would decline appointing a mail agent until the necessity appeared for him. We have never discovered the need of that agent, and therefore have never required them to carry him; but the contract stands as it did in the beginning.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I still think, however, that the fact is as I was stating it, that an arrangement was made by which a naval officer was to be placed in command of those steamships.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator is mistaken in that.

Mr. CLINGMAN. What was the precise arrangement?

Mr. YULEE. They were required by the contract to receive on board four midshipmen, to serve as watch officers, and a mail agent.

Mr. COLLAMER. I spoke of the arrangement in relation to the mail agent. The mail agent was arranged for; but Mr. Collins has never been compelled to carry him. He was bound to furnish him with a cabin and carry him, but has never done so, because the Department has not felt the need of one; but in relation to the naval officers I know nothing.

Mr. YULEE. This is what was provided:

"And they will receive on board each of them, and suitably accommodate and subsist, four passed midshipmen of the United States Navy, detailed by the Department to serve as watch officers, and one agent to be appointed by the Postmaster General, and to have charge of the mails to be transported on board, such accommodation and subsistence to be without charge to the United States; the said midshipmen and agent to be paid by the Government."

That is the contract, but the Government has never deemed it necessary to use that provision.

Mr. CLINGMAN. It is not a very important matter, but I know that Captain Schenck, and other naval officers, did, at one time, command some of the vessels of this line, and Mr. Collins applied to get relieved from the burden of keeping them. It may be that the contract required him to carry a certain number of midshipmen, as the Senator from Florida suggests; but, at any rate, he was relieved from that, and the result was the bad management by reason of which the Arctic evidently was lost, and probably the Pacific, too. I shall not detain the Senate further. I have nothing in the world against Mr. Collins. I hope that the contract, as far as we owe him anything, will be carried out. I intend to vote to do it; but I think we ought to make, for the future, an arrangement such as I have suggested.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire to confine myself, as much as possible, to the amendment which is under consideration. Mr. Collins had a contract for running to Liverpool, which we all understand. His misfortunes we know something about. At whose door they should be laid, is not now material; they have happened. It is said that he is desirous of changing the termination of his route from Liverpool to Southampton; and the proposition is, to give the Postmaster General the power of making that change, with his consent. I suppose that means a mutual consent between them. Now, it is proposed by the Senator from Virginia, not as coming from any committee, but as an individual amendment, that the Postmaster General shall stipulate that, if he goes to Southampton, he shall have no more than the postages. I can merely say that I have always disliked undertaking to accomplish by any oblique method a purpose, however well designed, which it would be better to do by direction. It is more becoming the Senate, it is more becoming any gentleman, to accomplish his purposes directly. It is obvious that this is nothing more than saying the contract shall not be changed in this respect; and I would prefer that the Senator from Virginia, with his usual ingenuousness, had come up to opposing directly the purpose of the committee to allow a change of the terminus at all; because, practically, it amounts to that; and every man who knows anything about the matter, knows that perfectly well. If the contract should not be changed at all in this respect, say so; refuse to do it, if any sufficient reason is found for it; but if you think it ought to be changed, with the consent of the Postmaster General, do not put on such stipulations as to render it impracticable, but say directly that he may do it. I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia for that reason. It is undertaking indirectly, by some sort of disguise, to effect that which you should effect, if at all, directly.

But it is said that the reason why we should not agree to such a change is, that it will affect those lines that are now running by way of Southampton. There are two lines that run to Southampton—one is commonly known as the Southampton and Bremen line, called the Ocean Steam Navigation Company's line, and the other as the Southampton and Havre line, long known in the Department as the Livingston line. That Bremen line was the first ocean line that was set up in this country—set up by contract with the Postmaster General, and paid out of the postage money, in those times when you used to require the Department to pay its own expenses. The Bremen line was set up at a time when our commerce with Bremer-Haven amounted to $3,000,000 a year; and in the ten years of that contract it ran up to $15,000,000, and a profitable species of commerce to us it was. That line was a first attempt. The Washington and the Hermann, the first boats that ran on it, were an experiment—an experiment made by that company. They have not run as fast as the Cunarders or the Collins line have to Liverpool, but they have made their trips with great regularity; and, during the whole period, not a failure has happened, not a life has been lost. Recently, within the last few years, they have put on two new ships. Though their line was a first attempt, it was an extraordinarily successful one; and by putting on their other two ships, they have kept it in successful operation, and were doing a fair, reasonable, living business at the time their contract expired. Their contract price was only $200,000 a year. The Havre line was set up under the same species of contract, afterwards, by the Postmaster General, and paid in the same way. It ran to Havre by way of Southampton. That line has another difficulty to meet, which is not generally understood. The French have to this day a discriminating tonnage duty, by which foreign vessels have to pay a tonnage duty beyond their own ships upon entering the French ports; and that duty they pay upon their custom-house tonnage—the measurement of the ship. The steamship lines which run into Havre, start, for instance, with eight hundred tons of coal. They have burnt it out on the way; but yet they have to pay tonnage duties on the whole capacity of the ship.

When the Bremen contract ran out a year ago, an exertion was made on the recommendation of the Post Office Department to get a provision made simply authorizing the Department to continue the Bremen line as they wished to do a single year. The effort to do that was made by General Rusk, who was chairman of the Post Office Committee, on the recommendation of the then head of the Department. No attention was given to it, however, and no such provision was obtained. The Postmaster General, of course, had to end the contract with the Bremen line. He then offered to pay them the postage on the line, and knowing they could not live by it they did not take it, and their four ships have been laid up in New York for the past year, and are lying there now. Two of them are very nice vessels; the other two, the Hermann and the Washington, are old ships, but still capable of service, though not so good as new ones. That company forming our connection with Germany, and doing the service to our commerce which I have suggested, although it has been in successful operation during the whole period of its contract, is thrown aside, dismissed. Then you made a contract with Mr. Vanderbilt to run to Southampton and Bremen, in place of the Bremen line, for the postage, and he made the usual agreement to forfeit all trips that he did not make. What has been the effect? He ran during the summer, in pleasant weather, but when the fall and winter came he stopped. In fair weather he can carry the mails for you; but in bad weather he cannot carry a mail at all. I ask gentlemen seriously, if you mean to have a mail, what sort of good does that kind of service do? You cannot rely on it. He will only run when it is profitable, and that is merely in the pleasant season of the year. That is one of the experiments made on the idea of getting along by the postages.

The other line, which is what we call the Livingston or Havre line, had their ships on hand, nearly new vessels, and rather than have their line broken up they agreed to take the postages, and they have taken them with the hope that Congress would, at some time or other make them good. They are now running, but it is an unprofitable business. They hope, as it is said, that something will turn up, that something will be done.

It is true, that if Mr. Collins is permitted, according to the provisions of the amendment of the Finance Committee, to run his vessels to Southampton instead of to Liverpool, it will affect these two lines. They now run once a month each, and alternate; so that we have, by way of Southampton, either to Bremen or to Havre, a trip once in two weeks. If Mr. Collins alternates with them we shall then have a connection at Southampton every week as at Liverpool. It is true he will not run to Bremer Haven or to Havre, but English steamships run every other day from Southampton to Havre, and he can make his arrangements with them to run on the days he arrives, and they will receive his passengers and the mails at Southampton and carry them over. The effect of that will be that emigrants and passengers who come by the Bremen and Havre line now, from Southampton, will at least half of them go by the Collins line. That will be to the injury of these lines, and it may be that they will say to the Postmaster General, "if you allow Mr. Collins to run to Southampton he will take at least half our business away, especially the passengers and freight." By going in these lines they save transshipment. Passengers go by British bottoms just as well as American; but they would have to be transhipped from the Collins line to the British line at Southampton, and that would make a difficulty; whereas, now they are shipped originally on the continent and go through direct without being transhipped at Southampton. There these lines would have the advantage of Collins in freight, but not in passengers, because the transshipment would make very little difference to passengers. He would then have his part of the passenger business, which is a great matter in summer. That might injure their lines, and they might say to the Postmaster General "if you allow Mr. Collins to go to Southampton we cannot run our lines for the postages." It is not true that Mr. Vanderbilt is running for nothing, no doubt on his own hook. He is running for the postages.

Mr. SEWARD. He runs but one steamer.

Mr. COLLAMER. He runs that once a month, when there is fair weather.

Mr. YULEE. That is the case with Collins, too. In the four winter months in the year Collins only runs once a month.

Mr. COLLAMER. But the difficulty is that Vanderbilt does not run at all in winter.

Mr. YULEE. He would, if the Postmaster General, under this law, creates a line, or somebody else might.

Mr. COLLAMER. You agreed to give him the postages last year, but when the winter came he would not run, and did not run.

Mr. YULEE. The Postmaster General was not at liberty to pay, then.

Mr. COLLAMER. He is perfectly willing to lose the pay for those trips he does not run.

Mr. YULEE. The Postmaster General, although he made the contract with the two parties, has not been able to pay them, and they have not received their pay to this time.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is because you did not make an appropriation.

Mr. YULEE. We make it now.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Postmaster General agreed to give them the postages; but the postage money goes into the Treasury, and you have to make an appropriation to enable him to draw it out. That appropriation was not made last year, but that is not the reason why the trips were not performed. The parties knew very well that there would be no difficulty in getting the money. Vanderbilt did not run, not because he distrusted getting the money, but because it was bad weather, and he could not make anything by running.

It may be that these two lines would say to the Postmaster General, "you ought not to allow Mr. Collins to go to Southampton, because it will affect us, and we cannot afford to run for the postages if you do that." On that account he might say to Mr. Collins, "I cannot have you run to Southampton because it will break up my Havre and Bremen lines in the summer." That may be an objection; if it seriously affects him in relation to those contracts, it may be a material objection; but it will be remembered that this amendment does not say he shall run there; it only leaves it to the Postmaster General to permit him to run there. He can say to Mr. Collins, "Congress has allowed me to give you the right to run to Southampton, if you wish to do so, and I consent; but inasmuch as it would injure my other two lines, I will not agree to let you do it." I suppose if it was any essential injury in regard to those two lines, he would not agree to it. The amendment leaves that matter entirely to him. If it would not affect him—and of that he is to be the judge, and has the means of judging—I cannot see any reason why we should not be willing to let him consent that Collins may run to Southampton as well as to Liverpool, and better, for the reason he gives that it is a quicker connection with London, and will carry our mails sooner to the continent, because it will carry them to a place where he can ship them directly across, instead of carrying them overland through Great Britain.

Having done with this particular amendment, I will take occasion, while I am up, to make a few general remarks in regard to this subject. I do not know that I understand the views of the Senator from North Carolina [Mr. CLINGMAN] in relation to his project, but it seems to consist in this: that in the first place he will put an end to our postal treaties; for we can do nothing of the kind he mentions except by his putting an end to the postal treaties. He would obliterate them to commence with. I have nothing to say about that now, particularly, whether it would be good or bad policy; but suppose them all obliterated: he is going to carry out his plan, as I understand him, by laying a discriminating postage on the same principle as we impose discriminating tonnage duties. He is going to charge double postage, I understand, on letters brought by foreign ships over that charged on those brought by American ships.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Only on those foreign lines that get bonuses or subsidies from other Governments.

Mr. COLLAMER. The treaties being out of the way, everything would be left to legislation. Now, does not every gentleman understand that legislation is a thing common to all men? According to a common saying, it is a game that two can play at. You never get any advantage by discriminating duty or discriminating tonnage or discriminating postage, when the other side have the power to do the same thing. They will just double the postage on all letters we carry to them, if we double it on those they carry to us; and so we shall be even. We can never get along in that way. Discrimination in that manner is impracticable. We should have to make a trade in the form of a law instead of having it in a treaty, as now.

I agree fully with the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] and others, that we cannot expect our steam lines to Europe to go on and sustain a competition, when the British Government pay such a price to their lines. It cannot be done by individual enterprise: the thing is impracticable. That is our condition; that is the condition of the steam service of the world now. We have got to take it as it is; we cannot change it. Other Governments make their own subsidies in their own way. They are not peculiar to England; other Governments do the same thing. England has many lines, not only across the Atlantic, but through the Mediterranean, up the Baltic and the Black sea, around the Cape of Good Hope, and so into India, and six or seven lines to the West Indies, and all along the east and west coast of South America, making various connections, and keeping up constantly a communication across North America by lines crossing the Cunard lines from Halifax to Jamaica.

This being the condition of things, the question is, what shall we do? The Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] says that if the Cunarders can carry our letters cheaper than we can, let them do it. That is his view. I do not believe it is best to do that, because the result is to give them the carrying trade, especially in light goods. It is subsidizing the world to England, making Liverpool, London, Portsmouth, and Southampton the centers of the commercial world, forming all their connections there and subsidizing the commerce of the world to them. I do not believe that is the best policy. I think we should do something. It ought to be done with more precaution. Taking the postages will not do. The policy of the world has been to make postages cheap for the benefit of correspondence; and making the postages cheap, you cannot therewith buy service to compete with the subsidies of England. It can never be done in that manner. It not only cannot be done with individual lines, but I think it cannot be done in the aggregate, though the honorable Senator from Louisiana thinks that if we were to take the whole postages and set up proper and prudent lines, the aggregate of postages on all the lines would support them. I do not think so. To my mind, the business of ocean postage does not differ in any essential respect from home postage. At home, the mails are set up, mail routes established, and everything put in operation for the benefit of correspondence, for the benefit of the business of the country, for the benefit of its commerce—if you please, its internal commerce. It is to promote that commerce. It is the agent and handmaid of that commerce. I think our ocean service should be of the same kind and regulated on the same principles. You cannot establish mail service on any line in this country unless Congress makes it a mail line. The Constitution provides that Congress shall have power to establish post offices and post roads. They must make a road a post road before the Postmaster General can put a mail on it. They do by act, from time to time, from session to session, create new post routes. Then the head of the Department advertises for proposals for carrying the mails on the routes which Congress has established. He gets his proposals, but it is not a matter of course that he sets up a line on each route. He looks at the line, the condition of the country, the prospects of the increase of business on the line, the connections which it forms, the prospects which are given to him, and then he asks himself, "are these reasonable, or are the proposals so extravagant that there is no fair expectation that the receipts will ever equal the expenses?" If the Postmaster General was to say that he would set up no mail line except where its own postages would support itself, all know how we should come out; we should not run our lines in the United States, except down about as far as we are standing. South of us, they could not run at all. Look at your returns, and you see that in the South and Southwest, and in all the newly-settled portions of the country they do not furnish postages enough to pay the expenses, and if you would set up no lines except those that sustain themselves, we should set up no new ones at all except little short cross mails in thickly-settled portions of the country.

Now, sir, let Congress carefully and prudently set up their ocean mail routes; and in setting up a line between this country and Europe, I would not declare, as the law said with regard to the Collins line, and the Sloo line, and the Harris line, that the Secretary of the Navy should make a contract with Mr. Collins, Mr. Sloo, or Mr. Harris, and should give him so much. I think it is bad policy to make legislative contracts. As long as the Congress of the United States make contracts, declare who they shall be with, and how much they shall have for them, they can never escape the generally prevailing public suspicion that there is fraud and deceit and corruption in those contracts. I do not say that there has been; I do not say that there was any such thing in 1847, when the act passed creating the Collins line, fixing the price and fixing the man; or in the act creating the Sloo line from New York and New Orleans to Aspinwall; or the Harris line on the Pacific, at a fixed price, and with a fixed man, leaving no discretion to the Secretary of the Navy, allowing him to receive no proposals from anybody else, but compelling him, in positive, imperative, direct terms, to make those contracts, and he did make them. I discard all legislation of that kind; I dislike it; and as long as that is pursued, it will always be charged, whether truthfully or falsely I do not say, that they are the result of corruption.

Mr. TOOMBS. And justly so.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not like to pass on that point, and say justly; but I am willing you should say it. I say they cannot escape that imputation. I dislike that sort of thing. There is nobody responsible. The responsibility is divided amongst the Senate and House of Representatives, and you cannot lay it at any particular man's door. I think these ocean contracts should be made precisely as mail contracts are on the land. When you have fixed the route and declared that there shall be a mail line by steamships between a point on the American and on the European coast, or anywhere else, let the Postmaster General advertise for and receive proposals. I do not say the Department should be compelled to make a contract with the lowest bidder. I do not believe such a provision should be in the bill. I think he ought to have a discretion to ascertain whether the lowest bidder is a man of straw, a man to go into the market and fix up a joint stock company, sell shares, and let the Government whistle for service; a man who will give you a kind of big fiddle to carry your mails in, instead of a steamship that will stand the waves. I think the Postmaster General should have a discretion to see that the men who offer to make contracts are responsible; that they will carry out the contract, and he should stipulate for the size and proportion and rate of the vessel.

When we have done that, we have run the parallel; we have made the two cases alike. If the object is desirable to be effected, such, in my estimation, should be the means of effecting it; and then there will be some degree of probability that you will have fairness in relation to proposals, and something like honesty in relation to the contracts that are made; and if not, we shall know at whose door the responsibility lies.

I will not detain the Senate longer with my general views on this subject; but to return to the particular amendment before the Senate, it seems to me we might just as well discard the proposition of the Committee on Finance as adopt the amendment of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. CLINGMAN. The Senator from Vermont says that my proposition will lead of course to retaliation on the side of Great Britain. She cannot retaliate against us on the principle of my amendment, if we have no subsidized lines. We say to her that your ships which get no bonus may bring letters here at the same rate of postage that our own do; but if they get a bonus, we impose a tax to equal it. I ask if that is not a fair proposition? Great Britain is a sensible country, and will she not regard this as reasonable? She has a line now running to the United States in the winter, I think to Portland—a line of four ships.

Mr. COLLAMER. They go up the St. Lawrence in the summer, and run to Portland in the winter.

Mr. CLINGMAN. So I understand. That line gets no subsidy, and we impose no tax upon it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I think it gets something.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I think not. I have inquired of the Postmaster General. It is the impression of the Department that it gets no subsidy. I have so stated again and again, and I presume that is the fact. We say to Great Britain, by my proposition: if you do not pay your lines a bonus, we impose no tax on them. Will she not say that is reasonable and fair, our purpose being to leave the matter so that all may stand on an equal footing to transport the mails across the ocean?

But the Senator from Vermont says that Vanderbilt does not run in the winter. Why? Because he has to compete with subsidized lines, and they underwork him; but strike them down, and he might run in the winter, because then the freights and passengers would be higher, and who would complain of that?—our luxurious or wealthy people, or those who ought to be wealthy, that go to Europe? I have had half a dozen letters within the last few months from people traveling in Europe, whom I happened to know, lamenting that the Collins line had gone down, and wanting it kept up. Now I am perfectly willing that it shall be kept up, but let those who are transported in it pay the cost. If raising the price of passengers would keep some of our people at home, I do not think it would be a national loss any more than it would be to raise freights a little, and stop the immense trade which some gentlemen complain of; I do not complain of it, but I am not willing to pay to get it here. If this system shall be changed, the result will perhaps be a little higher rate of freight, a little more charge for passengers, and then Mr. Vanderbilt and everybody can go into the business.

The Senator from Vermont says that you must do on sea as on land, and make a contract with somebody to carry the mails across the ocean. I do not think that follows. You may be obliged to make a contract and send a mail on land by horse or by stage coach, or by some other mode of conveyance, simply because you cannot get letters through regularly in any other way; but if there is a conveyance which runs regularly for freight and passengers, you take that and send your letters by it. Nobody would think of establishing a special line between this city and Baltimore to carry the mails. Why? Because private enterprise has made a railroad to convey passengers and freight, and it is convenient for the railroad company to carry letters. On the sea we have lines of ships that are constantly running to all the principal ports. Take New York and Liverpool, and you find that vessels are always running at regular, stated periods. They can carry the mails; they will be very glad to get them. They might take the mails for one twentieth of the letter postage, and then be better paid for them, perhaps, than for any other freight they carry. The result of the adoption of the system which I prefer might perhaps be to make the lines a day or two slower, and of course merchants and others who have been accustomed to get their letters carried in ten or eleven days, will not like to have to wait twelve or thirteen; and if one ship were to make a trip in six days, they would complain afterwards if they could not get their letters in less than eight or nine. We have gone to a great expense for a telegraph to enable our people to have instantaneous communication with Great Britain, and that is quite far enough for this Government to go to gratify the impatience of our people. If a ship had never crossed the ocean in less than eighteen days, there would be no complaint on this score. It is fair to put all the ships on the same footing, and then those that are the speediest will get the letters to carry, and let them have the profits of carrying them.

I shall not occupy the Senate any longer. I wished to say this much in response to the views of the Senator from Vermont, who, I know, has given great attention to the subject of postage. He concurs with me that we cannot compete with the subsidized lines, and that it is a great evil to us that they should exist.

Mr. COLLAMER. Put it fairly. I said individual enterprise cannot compete with them.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We agree on that point. I may not have used the term the Senator did, but I intended to convey his idea that private enterprise cannot compete with them, and it is injurious to us that our private enterprise should suffer in that way. He is for providing that certain lines shall be let to the lowest bidder, and the Government pay the sum that is necessary. If you do that, you must put our ports on an equal footing; for I am quite sure that New England and Pennsylvania and the whole country south will not be willing that New York shall have the benefit of these lines; and, if you multiply them, you will have to pay an enormous expense, and all those lines which you pay will be crippling our own private enterprise; for the Senator from Vermont will see that, if we pay half a dozen or ten lines, and they prosper, the other shipping interests engaged in carrying freights would suffer; and therefore, unless we undertake to subsidize everybody, the mischief which he and I both agree exists will go on.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let me say to the gentleman that our freight business has suffered and does suffer by these lines, and will suffer so long as great Britain keeps them up.

Mr. HUNTER. I rise merely to reply to the charge that my amendment is unjust to the Collins line. I have listened very attentively to what has been said, but I cannot perceive the injustice. The injustice which is charged depends entirely upon an assumption—petitio principii—a begging of the question. The assumption is, that we make the change for the benefit of the Government. I do not believe that anybody in the Finance Committee, who assented to the change, has any idea that we were benefiting the Government by it, unless it might be some benefit to them to give the Collins line some additional facility. If it did not injure the Government there was nobody who would not be willing to change the terminus, provided the Collins line could execute the duties more profitably in that way than any other; and provided that it did not do injustice to others. But when we come to examine it a little further, we find that it not only does injustice to others, but that it may injure the Government. It injures the Government in this way: if you allow the Collins line to go to Southampton, the same port to which the Bremen and Havre lines go, you undoubtedly injure them; and, as I believe, you will put them down and destroy them. May not the Government well say that is not only no benefit, but an injury to them? "If we did not allow you these privileges over our other two lines they could probably sustain themselves with the postages, and we should have two lines that would cost us nothing, going to different ports of the European continent: if we allow you this privilege, we lose that advantage." It is therefore a disadvantage to the Government to allow it; and all I propose by my amendment is, to put the Collins line on such terms that it shall enter into competition with the other lines fairly, if it goes to Southampton.

But the Senator from Vermont says this is an indirect method of accomplishing a different object; that is, of denying the request of the Collins line. Not at all. This is given, as I understand, not upon the application of the Government, but upon the application of Mr. Collins; and I am willing to say to him, "if you desire to go to Southampton, you may go, provided you do it on such conditions as will not destroy the other lines; as will leave them a fair chance. If you do not desire to go on these conditions, then no harm is done; no injustice is done to you." I am willing to keep up the contract, or what is alleged to be the contract—going to Liverpool, and receiving the stipend which is provided; but I am not willing to change the terminus, when, by so doing, we may destroy these other lines. What is there unjust or indirect in that? I am sure I cannot see. I would not be willing to permit him to go there with the advantages of the annual stipend paid to him out of the Treasury, and thus enter into competition upon two advantageous terms with these other lines. Unless some such amendment as this be adopted, I shall be for striking out the provision which allows the terminus to be changed, and forcing him to continue to go to Liverpool, as heretofore. In doing that, no one could charge me with injustice to the Collins line. That is all it ever contracted to do. Observe, in all this we have been assuming what I do not believe—that Collins has not forfeited his contract by his failure to perform it. I inclined to believe that he did forfeit it; but, as others were of a different opinion, and as we understood the authorities of the Government seemed to be of a different opinion, I was not disposed to undertake to decide such a question as that on an appropriation bill. I was willing, therefore, to give him what the terms of the law allowed; and I would have been willing, if it injured no other line, and no other person, and he could perform the service advantageously to himself, to allow him to go to Southampton instead of to Liverpool; but I am not willing to allow him to do it on terms which would destroy others as meritorious as himself, and which would deprive us of the advantage—and undoubtedly it will be an advantage, if they can sustain themselves from the postages—of having two lines, terminating at different points in Europe.

Mr. DAVIS. I find in the general proposition (I have not studied the details enough to justify me in speaking of them) too much consideration for the contractor, and too little for the Government. I think the Senator from Vermont has stated this question fairly. My view of what the Government should do is that our duty ceases with the establishment of the line. Then it becomes a matter of contract; and the Postmaster General is to make the best contract he can. I see no reason why, if we can get our mails carried in British vessels across the Atlantic, we should establish a line of American vessels, merely that we may compete with them in a race across the Atlantic. And the vanity of the attempt has been illustrated by its results. To have greater speed, we have built our vessels too light, and so managed them that the whole history of the Collins line is a history of wrecks and disasters to the country, and the loss of many of its best citizens. The British steamers, conducted differently, with commanders appointed by the Government, differently built, have run without accident. I do not think we should engage in such a race; but the Postmaster General should have power to appoint an inspector for every vessel with which he may make a contract; and the inspection should be minute, so as to determine the character of the vessel, including its present condition and construction, and the character of the commander of that vessel, unless the Government itself shall choose to put a commander on the vessel.

Then, having established the mail line, the question is, how shall the compensation be stated? In one of these amendments, it seems it is to be the postal receipts. I think that altogether an objectionable method, and I shall vote against that amendment for the reason that this is to be a fluctuating amount. Perhaps, in ten years, it will be the same amount you would give if you paid an annual compensation; but the company cannot bear the fluctuation. The depression of commerce, the existence of war, or some other cause, may limit the correspondence, and cut off passengers and light freight, and then a line relying on the postage receipts might not be able to run; whilst, if the Government allowed from year to year a fixed sum, which for the period of ten years would equal the postal receipts of the Government, it might keep up the line. In this way, the company would receive a sum certain, and might run at a loss for a time, making it up at a subsequent period when commerce and travel would come. I think, therefore, it is better that we should pay so much per annum, requiring a certain number of trips to be run, or so much a trip, rather than to let the line take the postage receipts, whatever they may be.

Then, again, I think it is altogether objectionable to allow the contractor to stop when he pleases. It is for Government purposes the line is established, not for the benefit of the contractor. If he may stop during the winter months, when the sea is not only rough, but when emigration terminates, and he cannot crowd his vessels like an emigrant ship, we lose all the advantage of correspondence during that period, and it was for correspondence the mail route was established. If you pay him a sum per trip, and compel him to run so many trips in the year, then you would have the benefit to the Government of a regular channel of correspondence, which, for commercial as well as for diplomatic purposes, is conceived to be necessary to many points in Europe as well as in America. I should most favor, in the establishment of our mail lines, ports on our own continent, ports on the Spanish main and the southern Pacific, where we should open up a commerce beneficial to the United States, and acquire a political power which we have allowed to be transferred to Great Britain, that Government establishing mail lines to all those points where diplomatic relations are important to her as well as to us.

I shall vote against the proposition to adopt as the basis of compensation the amount received from postage. I shall vote against the proposition to strike out what the Postmaster General has asked for, a continuous line, in order that we may maintain the line to Havre. If we do not wish to keep up the line, if we do not choose to make an appropriation to continue that line, let us drop it. If it be well to maintain it, and we choose to fix the rate at which we are willing to pay, let it be stated in dollars and cents, so as not to fluctuate with the amount of travel and the amount of commerce. The necessities of the Government are the same, perhaps increased, during those periods when travel is least and commerce most depressed.

Mr. TOOMBS. I very much regret that the debate upon this amendment has digressed into the general subject of ocean steamers, and the policy of maintaining them by Government subsidies; and the more so, because I feel compelled, by the review of my own position by the honorable Senator from Louisiana, [Mr. BENJAMIN,] to make some reply to him. That Senator has stated my position with great clearness and accuracy, except on one point. He has stated very truly that I desire to put the burden of the mails upon those who get the benefit, as near as I can put it, whereas he looks to the general benefit. The difference between my honorable friend and myself is, that I say that is the way to promote the general advantage, and he assumes the whole point between us. I say, it is not for the general advantage to make men who cannot write pay for the letters that those who write who can. I wish to put the burden where it belongs, for the general benefit; but he says the general advantage is to put the burden generally, though the benefit is particular. That is the point between us. He assumes the whole ground in controversy when he says the general advantage is to take his system. I say the general advantage is promoted by mine. Now, let us examine it for a moment.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

THURSDAY, JUNE 10, 1858.

NEW SERIES.....No. 178.

Originally, the system of postage was a Government monopoly—like salt and tobacco in all vicious, weak, corrupt Governments now. Governments took the monopoly of carrying people's letters, just as they gave to some favorite the right to sell salt, or sell tobacco, and get a revenue from it. The British Government got a revenue from it, I believe, from the earliest history of the post office arrangement. It was a portion of her regular estimates; and, when she made her reduction, it was on the argument of a very able man, who was acquainted with her postal system, that the postage would sustain itself at one penny. It did it; and it brings her two and a half million dollars now. She has had old charges on it; I believe some of the Hydes had charges on it. The post office revenue is part of the revenue of France and the continental countries; and they take it for the same reason that they take the monopolies to which I have referred. When our Government was poor, the idea of the Government seizing postage was on the same notion of revenue, and it continued to pay revenue until after the last war with Great Britain. If gentlemen will take the trouble to look into it, they will find that the receipts from the Post Office were a portion of the regular revenue that supported this Government, until after the war.

Then it was said by those who had letters to send, "if the Government takes charge of our business, do not let her profit by it." That was reasonable and just, and received pretty general acceptance among the people, and hence it was changed, and the principle was established that the Post Office Department was to be managed so that the Government should not make profit out of the business of carrying the people's correspondence. Then the Government said, "we will with prudence endeavor to enlarge the service in proportion to the revenue and to the cost, provided we shall not be charged anything for it." Within the last few years, however, we have gone away from monopoly, we have gone away from profit, we have yielded all these points, until, by lobbying, and successful boring, and on the notions of gentlemen, I think entirely erroneous, who differ with me on this point, we have come to this great issue: it is held in many portions of the United States, that this Government shall support the Post Office establishment as a great Government establishment, like the Army and the Navy. Some intelligent men, even in the Senate, and many out of it, have gone to that point.

Under our Constitution we certainly never looked to the idea of the Senator from Vermont of establishing foreign mails. In truth, it is difficult to bring it within the purview of a single clause in the Constitution. Our Constitution, as he properly quotes, says Congress shall have the power to establish post offices and post roads; but we cannot establish a post office in England, or on the high seas. We can only establish them where we have the power. This country, from the time its independence was acknowledged until 1850, never took the least control over foreign mails, except so far as to have them delivered, and put the postage on them, allowing any ship that wanted them to carry them, under proper regulations to secure them, and that was done entirely under the commercial power. When these steamers came to Congress, they came under fraudulent pretenses. I was a member of the other House at that time, and I have opposed this system from the first fatal day of its introduction to this hour. They said, "we want to increase the Navy; England is guarding us with her ships of war; and these are fast, strong, and powerful steamships; we will make them so;" and, therefore, they did not put them under the Post Office, but under the Navy Department; and in the original contract they specified that they would make steamers fit for ships of war, and that they should be accepted by the officers of the Navy.

Mr. COLLAMER. The first ocean line that was set up was under the Post Office Department. The line to Bremen was the first.

Mr. TOOMBS. Collins's contract was not under the Post Office Department.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Collins line was set up by special contract.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, by special contract with him, and that was the way with the Sloo contract and the Harris contract. They were to build ships fit for war purposes. I know when the Collins vessels were built; I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, and I remember that the men at the head of our bureau of yards and docks said they were not worth a sixpence for war purposes; that a single broadside would blow them to pieces; that they could not stand the fire of their own guns; but newspapers in the cities that were subsidized, commenced firing on the Secretary of the Navy, and he succumbed and took the ships. That was the way they were got here. Then, they were to be commanded by lieutenants in the United States Navy. That was another part of the contract. Mr. Collins came here and said: "I do not want these people on my ships; they are not good for much." I rather yielded that point, because there was much in what he said; and we agreed to let him have his own commanders. All this was done under the naval power. It was said we wanted these ships for naval purposes, and that they would be very valuable in case of war. Nobody maintains that idea now; it is given up; but it was used to get congressional contracts with particular individuals for their benefit, and not, as my honorable friend from Mississippi says, for the benefit of the Government. That has been the trouble of the whole system; it has been for the benefit of contractors, not of the Government. That has always ruled in making the contracts, and always will when Congress makes contracts. How can Congress make a contract? Here are sixty-four of us in this body; there are two hundred and thirty-six in the other House—gentlemen of different pursuits. True, there may be one or two ship-carpenters among the whole number, but the great bulk of them are fit for nothing on earth but politics—fit for no business. We have some who are very well qualified for many things, but not for other things. As for the idea that such a body can make a contract, I presume there is no human being in America, black or white, who can doubt that it is the most unfit body for such a purpose that could be collected. There is no responsibility. One half of them do not know who did it, and if they did they would not care. Nine tenths of them act from ignorance on such a matter, because they know nothing about it, and we generally have only ex parte statements from those interested. We have not time to examine the public questions connected with the various departments of the Government, and all the little contracts besides. It is impossible to do that and attend to our legislative duties. I would go back to the earlier policy of the Government, the persistent policy of the Government, against the idea of my friends from Louisiana and Mississippi. We never had a steamship afloat on the ocean to carry the mails abroad until 1850. The country had become great and prosperous, our commerce had extended beyond that of any other nation in the world, in an incredibly short space of time, without any such thing. It was not the general commercial men of the country at that time who desired it. Its effects have been disastrous to every portion of the country except the locality that gets the immediate benefit; and it has had a disastrous effect on our shipping, which has increased less within the seven years succeeding than the seven years preceding 1850. The reason of this was illustrated happily, in part, by my friend from North Carolina. From the beginning of the Government, for many years, letters came by such vessels as casually sailed. After a while packets were established, which got most of the letters, on account of their regularity—and that is one of the ideas my friend from Louisiana did not take into the account. When the first packets were set up between New York and Liverpool, they got nearly the whole of the letter-carrying. Why? It was abandoning that system of being "up for freight, ready to sail with dispatch," as they termed it; that is, whenever they got a freight. They went on the principle that we will sail with or without freight on a particular day, and all the correspondence went by those packet lines at once. The Cunarders ran once a week before 1855, when the Crimean war broke out, on account of the desire of the English to maintain their own line. They are a selfish people; and theirs is an honorable selfishness in that respect. I presume we have the same feeling on our side to benefit ours. As far as they could perfect their business arrangements to benefit their own line, they did it; and the Cunarders going once a week, they had to wait but three or four days, at most, to have their letters carried in their own vessels; and until 1855 they carried the bulk of the letters. About that time we cut down $500,000 of our subsidy to Collins.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The increased allowance was paid to him that year.

Mr. TOOMBS. Some of the Cunard steamers were withdrawn, and thereby they ran but once a fortnight. Correspondence could not wait that long, and in that way the Collins steamers got as much correspondence from Liverpool as the British steamers.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Probably I did not understand my friend's point exactly. The statement I read was of the whole European postage, not of the Collins line alone.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is very important to separate that postage and see how much of it came by British vessels, and how much by our own vessels. A number of the British vessels were taken off as transports to carry their troops and provisions to Sebastopol, and therefore Cunard could not run more than once a fortnight; and hence the letters carried by our steamers necessarily increased, and that was the reason of the increase in that year.

The British have given Cunard half as much as we gave Collins; and the argument is that if they pay a subsidy of $800,000 to enable Cunard to carry letters, we ought to give it here. I say that is not good policy. If letters cannot be carried without a subsidy, if it takes $800,000 a year to do the business, I think we had better let England do it. If it is a losing business, if it will not pay, I see no reason why we should compete with her for it. I am ready to compete in a profitable trade, and that has been the uniform policy of this country. When foreign countries have put discriminating duties on our tonnage, we put them on theirs. That has been our policy from the beginning. It is but recently that the tonnage duties were taken off in England from the foreign trade; and under the act of 1818, the President made proclamation of the fact in 1850, when my honorable friend from Vermont was a member of the Administration. If France should abolish her discriminating tonnage duties to-morrow, the present Administration would issue the same proclamation. We have counteracted the vicious systems of other countries by retaliation. That is a policy which the world has maintained. If England pays only as much as we do, there is an equality. If she pays more, we can meet it with a countervailing policy, and then the question would be whether it was wise in both countries to continue it. A countervailing policy is adopted to bring a Government, adopting a bad system, to its senses. We have now very heavy discriminating tonnage duties with Spain, because she will not abandon her discrimination. With England we have no such duties; and as to all countries that do not discriminate against us in our foreign trade, we make no discrimination against them. I am induced to the opinion that it would be better not to discriminate against them, even if they did against us. That would be my idea of true wisdom and true policy.

If one ship a week can carry the correspondence between Liverpool and this country, and it is a losing business, let England do it, and one line of Cunard steamers does the British shipping as much harm as ours; there is an interest there against it. It does our shipping harm, and it does the English shipping harm; and if we put up the Collins line to do the same thing, we pay a national subsidy to punish the shipping of England and our own too. So, because she injures us and injures herself too, we must get reparation by doubling the injury! That is the policy of gentlemen; it is nothing less. They say England pays Cunard to ruin our vessels and to injure our people's pursuits. Now you pay Collins to injure yours and hers too. That is the policy which I take it is involved in the question submitted for the consideration of the American Senate. It must result in that. How does it injure us? I observe, in looking over the papers for 1856—I speak from memory—about three eighths of the goods paying revenue were imported by steamers. Why was that? All the best freights are brought in the steamers. Gold is imported in steamers because it can afford to pay freight; silks and ribbons and linen can be carried in that way because they can stand high freight, for the reason that they are very valuable for their bulk. That is the true reason why you cannot carry cotton in steamships. You can carry sea island cotton because it is worth forty or fifty cents a pound, but you cannot carry a bulky article like wool, or wheat, or iron, in steamships. Steamers get the most valuable freights, the articles which can afford to pay most, and therefore the merchantmen's profits are continually diminishing. Sailing vessels get the heavier freights that do not need time, the bulky articles that must necessarily be carried at a low price, which is the general rule of transportation all over the world. Building up these steamers between us and England has had a tendency to destroy or to injure your great commercial marine. I oppose it on that ground.

Another thing: it concentrates the goods at whatever point you bring the steamers; and that is another objection I have. You now run all your lines of steamers from New York, except a little one from Cuba to Charleston. It cheapens freights at New York, even among themselves; it concentrates commerce there injuriously to the rest of the country. If you pay a hundred ships from every point where you have freight, to bring goods in for nothing to New York, you will effectually violate the provision of the Constitution that forbids you from discriminating in favor of one port. You do, by running steamers out of New York, cheapen freights to that particular point, and give it an advantage over every other point in the country. They understand it; and therefore I do not wonder that those who are not mindful of the great principle of right, those who consider that the supremest good is to benefit themselves at the cost of everybody else, worship this principle of monopoly. But, in this enlightened age, with the present opinions we entertain, with the progress we have made in free and enlightened ideas, especially in regard to commerce, I am amazed that gentlemen who agree with me in many of these great principles should advocate this policy, which I had hoped and trusted was extinct forever. But, sir, monopolies are hard to kill. They are not awed by defeat; they are not cowed by disaster. They seem almost to be immortal. They rise from one defeat by bringing new appliances and new power in order to succeed in their iniquitous schemes. I trust the policy you have half inaugurated, of giving no more subsidies to these people, but granting the letter postages to anybody that will bring the mails, leaving them to rely on the postages alone, will be carried out; and I am very happy that the Committee on Finance and the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads have recommended that it shall be inaugurated; and in this way we shall abandon a system injurious to the general commercial interests of the country, injurious to the navigating interests, injurious to every port in the country but the particular one which is the beneficiary of the public bounty. Leave them all in free and honest competition to pursue their own callings under the influence and effect of beneficent, wise, equal, and just laws.

Mr. SIMMONS. Mr. President, I do not intend to protract this debate, for the question pending seems to me not to involve the whole system of steamship mail service. I recollect when it was inaugurated, and I am astonished that the Senator from Georgia should talk about monopolies, when the United States have undertaken to set up a competition against a monopoly. He wants us to withdraw the competition in order to destroy monopoly! It was a British monopoly, and is to-day; and it was for that reason that the Post Office Committee, when I was on it twelve or fifteen years ago, undertook to set up a counter-system to prevent the aggrandizement of British power in everything that was American. I agree that all these new-fashioned doctrines about free trade will regulate themselves. A spendthrift heir will get through his estate very quick if you let him alone. So it will be with free-trade notions. The result will be to give trade to England; and she will take care of it while we neglect our trade. That is the way she does with the Post Office system, and we ought to desire to correct and counteract it.

I do not believe it will cost any more to carry letters by American than by English steamships. I think that, in the end, by keeping up a competition, we shall be likely to get the service cheaper. Let the Cunarders, or other British steamers, have the monopoly of the trade, and if they do not charge postage high enough to pay them well, I will never guess again. I would if I was in their place.

But I do not think the amendment suggested by the Senator from Virginia at all involves this whole question, though perhaps the amendment of the Committee on Finance covers the whole ground. The amendment of the committee proposes to keep up the Collins contract for the next two years. Why then go into an argument about the propriety of having made the contract? I understand it is decided by the law officer of the Government that the contract with the Collins line is a continuing contract; and that being so, the Committee on Finance have suggested that the Postmaster General may change the terminus on the European end of the route. That is the whole matter. Now, it is suggested by the Senator from Virginia, not as chairman of the Committee on Finance, but as an individual member of the Senate, that if they do change the terminus they must take the mails on the same condition with two other lines. My difficulty is, that this is a contract for so many trips per year, winter and summer; but if you take the proposition of the Senator from Virginia, you leave them all voluntary contracts, to carry the mail when the parties choose, and to leave it when it is not profitable. I do not wish to see our country in that condition; I think we shall lose by it. If we undertake to carry the mail in competition with the British steamers, we should carry it as regularly as they do, alternate with them, carry it for the same rate of postage they do; and I say that the probability is that the change in the terminus will not be made if the amendment of the Senator from Virginia be agreed to. I do not know whether it is true, but I believe it is, that we can get letters on the continent twenty-four or thirty-six hours sooner by making the change.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is not a word of truth in that statement. It is not twenty-four hours from Liverpool to Paris. I have traveled it myself. Those statements are made loosely by gentlemen who ought to know better.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am not to be diverted from the argument by any controversy about how long it will take to carry letters through England. If the Postmaster General does not think proper to change the terminus, under the amendment of the committee, he will not change it.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand that now the Collins line discontinues when it chooses; and the decision is that that does not affect the contract, but only makes them lose the contract price for that trip. If, on the other hand, we were to provide that it should go for the postages, the Postmaster General might contract that it should go regularly. That would not alter his ability to contract.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand that by the contract with the Collins line, there are so many dollars per trip given, whether the trip be in winter or in summer. Everybody knows that there is a disadvantage in running steamers in winter, when there is no emigration. In summer there is a large number of passengers.

Mr. HUNTER. He may, therefore, omit to run in the winter, and run only in the summer. He gets the price for every trip he runs.

Mr. SIMMONS. If you gave those steamers a certain number of thousand dollars per trip, winter and summer, would it not induce them to run the whole year? Perhaps they would not run so often in winter as in summer; and I believe the Cunarders do not run so often in winter; but the Collins line runs proportionately as much in winter as the Cunard line; and if we allow a regular sum we shall have our service kept up as regularly as the British part of the service. That is what I want. If the Senator from Virginia is fearful that changing the terminus of this line from Liverpool to Southampton will be injurious to the Southampton steamers, he may put a clause into the amendment proposed by the Committee on Finance that the Postmaster General may make this change, provided it will not do any injury to other lines of steamers. But why undertake to break up an existing contract? why undertake to put the whole service on this irregular and uncertain tenure, that they may run in winter or not, just as they please? And when they run for the postages you may be sure that when there is the least business they will do the least running. I think the English are pretty good models for us to copy from, so far as they are concerned in taking a monopoly of trade. I believe we have not made a trade with them for fifteen years in which they have not had the decided advantage of us. You cannot make a reciprocal treaty, or any other kind of treaty, with them, where they will not always have the advantage in their hands. Instead of yielding to them, I would rather double the pay. That is my notion about keeping up competition.

I am willing to have a fair competition with all the world in mail steamers or anything else, but I have no notion of perfecting that system by withdrawing our competition, and letting the British have a monopoly of the whole trade, which will be the result if we abandon this contract. I agree with the Senator from Georgia, that running their steamers has a tendency to cripple our trade, and my plan has always been so to arrange things that other people can do this business as well as New York can, and not concentrate everything in one city. People get to thinking that there are no places in the world but New York and Liverpool. If you go to New York they will tell you it is the best place to buy at and to sell at, and they will make a sane man believe it. I have been in a store in New York when they were talking with a planter, and telling him it was the best place to sell his cotton, and then they turned round to me and tried to convince me that it was the best place for me to buy at—the same store; and we both believed them perhaps, because we both dealt with them.

Mr. TOOMBS. It might be true.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know it is good logic for a storekeeper, that you may sell and buy cheaper in the same store at the same time, but it is not good logic for men of sense. It is not good logic when you apply it to steamships.

I am opposed to the amendment of the Senator from Virginia. I am willing to take any qualifications of the amendment of the Finance Committee that the Senator thinks necessary, but I believe the Postmaster General will never make this alteration unless he thinks it can be done without injury to anybody else; and if it can be done without injury to anybody else, I want to help this line. I would not try to hurt anybody, or force him into a new trade, when we could help him without hurting ourselves. This line will need all the service we can give it indirectly in that way. I hope the Senator from Virginia will withdraw his amendment. The committee have offered a good amendment, and if he wants to prevent the Postmaster General from making an improper bargain, let him qualify the amendment of the committee.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER in the chair.) The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia [Mr. HUNTER] to amend the amendment of the Finance Committee by adding to it the following proviso:

Provided, That said contractors shall, in case of such change, receive for such transportation, instead of the contract price, the amount of ocean and inland postages received by the United States.

Mr. CLINGMAN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. BROWN. Before the vote is taken, I desire to state that I have paired off with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD. I should vote for the amendment if I were at liberty to do so.

Mr. FOOT. I desire to say that I have paired off, for the time being, with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. SLIDELL.

Mr. PUGH. I have paired off with the Senator from Georgia, Mr. IVERSON, on this question.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have paired off with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. BENJAMIN.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have paired off with the Senator from Maine, Mr. HAMLIN. He would vote against, and I for, the amendment. I have been requested also to state, by the Senator from Arkansas, Mr. JOHNSON, and the Senator from Pennsylvania, Mr. CAMERON, that they have paired off, and are engaged in committee business.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 11, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Clay, Clingman, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Reid, and Yulee—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Gwin, Hale, Hammond, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—23.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The question recurred on the first amendment of the Finance Committee, which was to strike out the following clause:

"For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, $346,500; and it is hereby provided that there be paid to the Post Office Department out of said appropriation such sums as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, on such days as the Collins line may fail to take them from New York;"

and in lieu thereof insert:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, in pursuance of the contract with E. K. Collins and others, $346,500; and it is hereby provided that for such days as the said Collins and others shall fail to perform said service, the Postmaster General is authorized to contract with the owner or owners of any other steam vessel or vessels to perform said service by transporting the mails from such port in the United States to such port in Great Britain as he may select, and pay therefor a sum equal to the amount of ocean and inland postage received by the United States; and the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton.

Mr. TOOMBS called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. YULEE. I should like to move an amendment, if the Finance Committee will accept it, to provide that the line shall be changed from Liverpool "to Southampton and Bremen or Havre, as the Postmaster General may prefer."

Mr. GWIN. I hope not. The committee cannot accept it.

Mr. YULEE. I offer it.

Mr. KING. I voted against the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, as I shall vote against this, and I will vote for the proposition as it came from the Committee on Finance, understanding, as I do understand, that the policy is to be now inaugurated of terminating these allowances to ocean steamers beyond the amount of postages received by them, with the expiration of the present contract. I have always opposed these allowances; I opposed them in the other House, when the bills passed which authorized the contracts. I am willing, and I deem that it is proper and right, to permit the contracts which have been entered into to expire by their own limitation, rather than to interfere with them.

Mr. YULEE. I will withhold my amendment until a further stage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the committee.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to offer an amendment to the last sentence in the amendment now pending. I move to strike it out. It reads:

"And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton."

Mr. SEWARD. It is only another form of making the same proposition which has just been voted down.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected, and the question recurred on the amendment of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. BROWN. I should vote against the amendment if I had not paired off with the Senator from Delaware, Mr. BAYARD.

Mr. FOOT. I should vote for the amendment but for the fact that I have paired off with the Senator from Louisiana, Mr. SLIDELL.

Mr. PUGH. I have paired off with the Senator from Georgia, Mr. IVERSON, otherwise I should vote in the negative.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 28, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hammond, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Reid, and Sebastian—13.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was, in the clause, "For transportation of the mails from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Bremen, and from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Havre, $230,000," to strike out "$230,000," and insert:

"The amount of postages, ocean and inland, received by the United States in the mails, in and out, by the vessels employed in such service."

Mr. SEWARD. I have serious apprehensions that the effect of this amendment will be to hazard the policy of sustaining an ocean steam marine, and I want to have an opportunity to record my vote against it. I do not know what the temper of the Senate may be. I wish to say, however, that I am opposed to it.

Mr. HUNTER. I will explain the amendment. The proposition in the bill is to renew the two contracts to Havre and Bremen, which expired on the 1st of June. They propose to give them in one clause $230,000; and then they propose to add, "for contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000." The Postmaster General, by adding that sum for contingencies to the other, would be enabled to give them the sum which they received under the old contract which has expired. The object of the clause in the bill is to allow the Postmaster General, if he chooses, to give them as much as was given under the old contract, whilst it provides that they shall have certainly $230,000, which is what has been received heretofore from postages on these routes. The Committee on Finance, as I said before, desired to introduce a system by which they were to run for the postages alone, and, in order to accomplish that purpose, they move to strike out these words, "$230,000," and to insert, "the amount of postages, ocean and inland," and then they strike out the other item, which appropriates $120,000 for contingencies in mail service between New York and Europe. The item was designed to be used by the Postmaster General, if he desired to add to the other, that he might give them the sum they have heretofore received.

For myself, I never have voted for one of these contracts which is designed to give to lines of ocean steamers more than they earn by the postages, because I believed it was a system capable of being extended into the greatest abuses, and one which operated unequally and unjustly. I have, therefore, never voted for one of these lines, and for that reason I cannot vote for this proposition here to renew this system, so far as these two lines are concerned; and yet I will say, that if we look to the fidelity with which their contracts have been performed, they are far more deserving the consideration of Congress than the Collins line.

Mr. COLLAMER. The proposition before us is a difference of opinion between the Postmaster General, as I understand it, and the Finance Committee. The bill, as sent to us from the House of Representatives, is a manifestation of the view of the head of the Department in this respect. It is what the Postmaster General desires. The bill was made agreeable to his wish in this regard. It is not a matter of course that this is a revival of those two lines. The Bremen line was set up in the manner I have heretofore stated, and performed the services at $200,000 a year. The line to Southampton and Havre was for $150,000 a year. That made, for the two lines, $350,000 a year. The contracts have both run out—the Bremen line one year ago; and that service has been given to Vanderbilt, to run in the manner I have stated, and their steamboats lie up doing nothing. The other line has run at a loss for the postage. The Postmaster General says: "I do not know but I may be enabled to get the service upon these two lines performed for a year to come for the postage, which postage would be about $230,000 for the two; I have had a contract with Livingston & Co. to run to Havre for the postage; and they have run. Here I have had one with Mr. Vanderbilt, and he is running, but he has not run all the time. But I am not sure that I can get this service for the $230,000; I have no doubt I can get this contract done in the faithful manner it has been done heretofore for the $350,000." To enable him to try this experiment, and see whether he can get the service done for the postage; and, if not, to enable him to have it done for the old contract price, this proposition in the bill was inserted. It first provides:

"For transportation of the mails from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Bremen, and from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Havre, $230,000."

That is an amount equal to the postage, and if he can, he will get the service done for that sum; but inasmuch as it is uncertain whether he can succeed in that, he proposes to have this provision put in:

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Liverpool, $120,000."

That will make the whole sum $350,000. That does enable the head of the Department to effect the service by the postage if he can, and if not, for the old contract price. The Finance Committee propose to strike that out, and provide that he shall get it done for the postage, or not at all. My opinion is that this amendment should not be agreed to. This appropriation is only for one year.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays on the amendment, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 22, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Cameron, Clark, Clay, Clingman, Fessenden, Fitch, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Pearce, Reid, Sebastian, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Kennedy, Mason, Seward, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, and Wright—19.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out the clause:

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Liverpool, $120,000."

Mr. COLLAMER. I move to amend that amendment, by adding this proviso:

And provided, That all mail routes in the United States that do not pay postage adequate to support them shall cease.

That is what the effect of this provision is on the ocean service.

Some gentlemen have asked for an explanation about the $120,000 item, and I will endeavor to explain it. The Postmaster General asked, and the House of Representatives passed a bill to give him $230,000, which is about the amount of the postages for the Bremen and Havre lines; but inasmuch as he might not perhaps be able to get the service done for that amount of money, he proposed that they should allow him $120,000 additional for contingencies, to enable him to have it if he could not get it done for the postages. The Finance Committee have reported to strike out both the $230,000 and the $120,000, and to substitute in lieu of them a provision that the service shall be done for the inland and ocean postages on the routes. Of course, as the Postmaster General is now limited, by the amendment that has been adopted, to the postages, this $120,000 can do him no good.

Mr. MASON. Can he not use it?

Mr. COLLAMER. No. He wanted it for these two routes, but the amendment which has been adopted is, that he shall have the service performed for the postages. He cannot give any more than the postages, and of course the $120,000 will now be of no use to him.

Mr. PUGH. I think the Senator from Vermont is about half right this time, or a little more. We have already adopted an amendment to this bill by which the Collins line is allowed to run its steamers to Southampton, under a contract which contains a very large gratuity. Now, if you confine these two other lines to the amount of their postages, the effect will be that the Collins line will drive them from the ocean, and you make one monopoly of that which has already been the most scandalous monopoly that was ever before Congress. I think you ought either to go back and adopt the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, or you ought to allow these lines to Southampton and Bremen and Havre—

Mr. HUNTER. We can have another vote on that when the bill is reported to the Senate. If we are going to apply the principle of postages, we ought to do it on these lines; and when we go into the Senate, we shall have another vote on the Collins proposition.

Mr. PUGH. I am in favor of the principle of the Senator from Virginia, and if I had not paired off with the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. IVERSON,] I should have voted for this amendment; but here is the case I suggest to the Senate: the Collins line have a contract from New York to Liverpool, and you pay that line a large gratuity. Now you have authorized them to change the eastern terminus to Southampton, and so come in direct competition with these other lines. That is enough in all conscience; that is practically giving the Collins line the control of another route, putting it in their power to drive other ships off the ocean; but when you go on in addition to that, and disable the Postmaster General from giving anything beyond the $230,000 to the Bremen and Havre lines, you have practically destroyed them, and all for the benefit of the Collins line. I think it is a worse piece of legislation than the sum of money you gave in 1852.

Mr. HUNTER. Then the effect would be that we commit ourselves to renewing this contract on that principle.

Mr. MASON. I would ask my colleague or the Senator from Vermont when the contract with the Collins line expires by limitation.

Mr. COLLAMER. In two years.

Mr. MASON. I perfectly agree with the Senator from Ohio, although I would vote with my colleague, under other circumstances, to reduce this compensation to the postage. As I understand it, the Senate, by a preponderating vote, refused to adopt the amendment of my colleague, in reference to the Collins line, and have brought them, by giving them immunities, into direct competition with these two other routes by allowing them to change their terminus to Southampton; and having done that, now the proposition insisted on by my colleague is, that although these two routes are placed at a great disadvantage, we shall still further disable them by reducing them to the ocean postage while the Collins line remains on its contract with the additional immunities. It seems to me to be placing them in unfair competition, and I should be strongly disposed to extend the privilege asked by the Postmaster General, because it is but for a single year. I do not know how it can be remedied, and that, too, upon the admission of my colleague—no gentleman understands the subject better, I take it for granted—that these two other lines have always discharged their contracts faithfully, whether at a loss or gain, and we know that the Collins line has been in a state of decrepitude, and has lived only upon the largesses and bounty of the country.

Mr. HUNTER. I admit that, in my opinion, these two lines are entitled to far more consideration from the Government than the Collins line; but this is a question of principle. My colleague agrees with me that we ought to put down, if we can, gratuities to ocean steamers—the idea of maintaining an ocean postal system at the expense of the Treasury. If I vote to renew this contract on the old system, then I commit myself to restore it. The evil is done, not in refusing to restore the old system so far as these two lines are concerned, but in permitting the Collins line to go to Southampton. So far as the annual compensation is concerned, we cannot avoid that. That is said to be contract; we are obliged to give that; but we could have avoided the permission to land at Southampton instead of Liverpool, and I did my best to prevent that. I at first agreed to it; because I supposed it was merely giving an advantage to the Collins line, without injuring any one, until I was better informed; but the moment I found out, or was induced to believe, that the effect was to injure, perhaps destroy, the other lines, I did my best to retrieve the error so far as that was concerned; but I, for one, cannot commit myself to the principle of restoring the old system of supporting ocean postal lines out of the Treasury. The effect of this will be that we must return to the bill as the House sent it to us; and if we do, I, for one, cannot vote for it.

Mr. DAVIS. The chairman of the Committee on Finance is proposing a radical change at a time when I am sure we have not leisure to deliberate on it. If a new principle is to be applied to the whole system, I think we had better do it another year after due deliberation, preparation, and discussion of the subject. I have not had the subject explained to me sufficiently to understand it in all its details, and yet I can see most clearly the injury which is to be wrought on these two lines. I do not myself concur in the view that it is better to take the postage as the amount of compensation; I think we had better give these companies a fixed amount, though it should be less than the postage. We had better take the amount the postage would be in ten years as the receipt of the Government, and then fix an amount annually to be paid to the company less than that. They would then know what to rely upon. Fluctuations dependent materially on the action of our own Government should not be thrown on the contractors who carry our mail. We have it in our power, by governmental action, to increase or diminish the amount of travel and amount of correspondence, and this burden should not be thrown on the contractors, they having no control over the subject. I am perfectly willing to take what would be the average for a term of years, and fix it per annum or per trip. But I do not hold that this whole subject of steam navigation is to be treated as an invasion of the Treasury, and an outrage upon public propriety, for if the steamers are valueless for any good purpose in time of war, and I believe they are, they are nevertheless schools, and they establish workshops, where engines can be built, and steam vessels can be built, that will answer war purposes, and the sad lessons that we have learned in this Collins line, will be worth to the Government many million dollars in the future, if we should ever have to erect a great steam navy. I think there is a manifest injustice in the operation of the bill towards these lines, if you intend to keep up the ocean mail routes at all. If you intend to discontinue them, say so, but I think the notice is too short, and I prefer, therefore, to adhere to the form of the bill which the House gave; allow them to go on for this year, giving the appropriation stated by the House, and give this contingent sum which will be at the disposal of the Postmaster General; and if in another year we can perfect a system which is better than this, and mature the arrangement, let it be done on due deliberation; let us examine it, and vote upon it.

Mr. WILSON. Is it in order, at the present time, to move a reconsideration of the last vote?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is.

Mr. COLLAMER. I withdraw my proposed amendment.

Mr. WILSON. I move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate agreed to the amendment of the Committee on Finance, striking out in lines ten and eleven, "$230,000," and inserting, "the amount of postages, ocean and inland, received by the United States, in and out, by the vessels employed in such service."

Mr. SEWARD. I hope that that motion will prevail, and that the views expressed by the Senator from Mississippi will be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I agreed, in the Finance Committee, that this amendment should be reported as it now stands, and I have heard nothing which has induced me to change my opinion. I shall say but a very few words, for I do not wish to protract the debate, and I have been as quiet as most gentlemen. I cannot accede to the proposition that we are doing anything unfair towards the two lines spoken of, by refusing to make an appropriation out of the Treasury for the purpose of continuing them. They made a contract for a specific time, and all the obligation that rested on us was to perform our contract, and all the obligation on them was to perform theirs. It is conceded that the contract was performed on our part and on their part, and it went to the end of the time fixed, thus fairly performed on both sides. Now how can any gentleman say that, by refusing to make an appropriation to continue that for another year, we are dealing unfairly by them in any possible way. We made no contract for the continuance of this service beyond the period limited. We did not agree to continue it for a year or a month. They took the hazard, they took the risk when they entered into the contract, of its being ended at the time fixed. What injustice have we done to them by our action in regard to the Collins line? We conceive that we are under an obligation to the Collins line to continue their contract for two years longer, and we must pay them the money stipulated, provided they perform the service. We think it is for the interest of the United States that, instead of going to Liverpool, as they have gone heretofore, they may go to Southampton. There is a contract that remains for us to perform, money that we must pay if they perform the service, and if it is better for them and better for us, why should it not be done? But these other lines step in and say, "you are interfering with our rights." What rights have they against us? What claims have they upon us? They agreed to do a certain thing for a certain sum of money; they have done it; we have paid the money. They say this will interfere with them. What is that to us? Have we not just as good a right to run a line to Southampton as anybody else? Have we not the same right, if it is to our interest, and if we are obliged to pay our money, to direct the Collins line to go there, if it is willing to go; or are we to stay away and not allow it to do what is beneficial to us simply because a contract was once made between us and them, which contract is now at an end? Upon any grounds of fairness or obligation, one way or the other, I do not see that there is the least ground of complaint. We have the same right to send the Collins line to Southampton that any individual could have to run a line there, and certainly we could not prevent it, for he would have a right to do it. Then, upon the ground on which this claim is put, I see not the least objection in the world to this amendment.

It is said, let us continue this until we can look at it deliberately. Do we ever look at such things more deliberately than we do now? This matter is as perfectly understood by Congress as it ever will be; we know what the operation of these lines has been so far; we know what has been accomplished; we understand the difficulties; we understand all the principles. The question comes up as a very simple one; will Congress at this session change the system so far as it can change it, and say, "We will give the postages to any person who chooses to continue the line which has heretofore been running, and for which we have been paying something more or something less, as the case may be, but we will give that at any rate, if they choose to continue it under existing circumstances to Southampton or to Bremen as it has run heretofore?" The Finance Committee, I think I may say unanimously, came to the conclusion that it was best to make that experiment, that now was the time. I do not understand the absolute necessity we are under of sustaining these lines; I do not know that the country would suffer much if they ceased. So far as the business of building steamboats, and making steam-boilers and steam-engines is concerned, there is no danger in the present state of steam navigation in this country, or any other country where it is carried on, that that business will cease, simply because we refuse to sustain by money out of the Treasury a couple of lines running to Southampton or elsewhere. There is no danger on that head.

Then, the simple question returns, what does the public good require? Is there any such pressing necessity or such necessity of any kind upon us as to require that we should not only pay the postages, but pay an additional sum for sustaining these two lines when their contracts have ended, and when they have ceased to have the slightest claim on us in the world; or is there any reason why we should not make just such arrangement as is most beneficial to the country and to the service?

Now, sir, allow me to say that, although there is certainly no gentleman in the Senate for whose opinions upon all questions, and more especially upon questions of this character, I have more respect than I have for those of the honorable Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] I cannot agree with him on this occasion. I see a wide distinction between the internal domestic post office service and the post office service abroad. I believe the post office establishment is principally for the benefit of intercommunication between our own citizens here at home, to promote commerce and all the benefits of intercommunication in various ways. We are bound to provide for it, in my judgment. It is not confined, as the Senator from Georgia supposes it to be, to the mere consideration that the man who writes a letter should pay for carrying it in all cases. There is something beyond that. But I shall not go into that question. Anybody, it strikes me, can see a difference between providing for communication between our own citizens, in different parts of our own country, which should become acquainted with each other, which should be interwoven with each other in every possible way, (and the intercommunication tends to promote union and the general benefit; for the post office arrangements in the United States of necessity bring about precisely what we wish to accomplish in these particulars,) and the establishment of great lines of ocean steamers plying to foreign countries, connected with altogether different considerations from any of those on which the post office system is established—considering it to be a system, and a system of importance. There is a similarity between them in one particular; that is to say, if you establish the principle as applicable to ourselves at home, that the post office should support itself in one place, it should be made to support itself everywhere, and should be equal, so far as domestic concerns are interested; but it is a very different question when you come to contrast that domestic system with a system of interchange of communication with foreign countries, connected with trade, the building of ocean steamers for naval purposes, and everything of that kind. I have seen no reason to change my vote; I do not expect to convince anybody else, but I wish to enter my dissent to the doctrines that have been advanced.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The honorable Senator from Virginia desires, as I understand him, not to have the Government of the United States committed to any system of contracts in the carrying of the mails across the ocean.

Mr. HUNTER. I did not say so. I said contracts by which they were supported out of the Treasury of the United States, and were not to be self-sustaining.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The time for arranging this system, it seems to me, will be when the contract with the Collins line shall have expired—which will be in about a year and a half or two years hence. Then the whole system of our ocean service can be arranged upon a proper basis. So long as we give this bonus to the Collins line, and it is a fixed sum to be paid out of the Treasury, and give them the privilege, also, of terminating their route at Southampton, it seems to me we should be doing injustice to any competing lines across the ocean if we were to confine them altogether to the uncertain sum which might be produced in the mean time by the postages that may be received for the carrying of the letters upon the vessels employed in these lines. I do not understand that this proposition, contained in the bill as it comes from the House of Representatives, is a proposition that we are to employ a particular individual, or a particular line; but that it is open to free competition; perfectly open for the Post Office Department to ask, if you please, for sealed proposals to carry the mails on these routes, just as you would upon the land. It is not, therefore, a monopoly any more than the carrying of the mail upon the land is a monopoly. It is to be done by contract, it is true—a contract to be entered into between the carrier and the Post Office Department. It is utterly impossible to have the mails carried in any other way than by contract; and, in order to save ourselves from monopoly, and to introduce free competition, I agree with the Senators who have said that the last thing in the world Congress should do would be to undertake to direct the Post Office Department to make a contract with a particular individual; for that gives to him a monopoly which cannot be justified; and in voting for giving this sum to the Collins line, I do it only because we are under a contract to do so, binding, in good faith, upon the Government.

Mr. PUGH. But, let me suggest to the Senator, you are under no contract with Mr. Collins to run his ships to Southampton. You are giving him a new privilege, in addition to all the rest.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. We are authorizing the Postmaster General, if he shall think it best for the interests of the Government, to allow Mr. Collins to terminate the route at Southampton. There will be uncertainty in relation to the amount of postages to be received; there will also, I apprehend, be this difficulty produced, if this line be confined to the postages: there will at once arise a competition between this line and the other lines across the ocean—a competition to see who will get the mails and carry the letters; and there may be difficulties in ascertaining the amount, difficulties in relation to the contracts; and we may bring around Congress a very large outside influence, that would be interested in increasing the rates of postage, in order to enlarge the amount of compensation which might be received by the various lines. For myself, I agree with the Senator from Mississippi in opinion, that it is better for us, in whatever contract we make, to fix a given sum. We may base that sum upon the average amount of postages that have been received; but the sum should be fixed from year to year, and sealed proposals should be received, and the contracts let out to the lowest bidder. I hope the Senate will reconsider this amendment; and, as it only continues this service for a single year, I do not believe it will amount to any such commitment in favor of the old system as will prevent the Senate overhauling the whole subject when we shall have got through with the monopoly which is held by Collins under his contract.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider; and they were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Georgia, Mr. IVERSON, and myself paired off on the Collins line; and though this is not the same subject, it is a similar one, and I decline to vote.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Foster, Hale, Kennedy, Mason, Seward, Stuart, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Clay, Clingman, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Mallory, Reid, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, and Yulee—19.

So the motion to reconsider prevailed.

Mr. MASON. I wish to say a single word explanatory of the vote I gave to reconsider the former vote on this amendment. I understand that the Collins line, having two years of its contract unexpired, and with very large bounties, has, by a vote of the Senate to-day, been brought into necessary competition, by being allowed most favorably to change its European terminus; with the Bremen and Havre lines. I understand, further, that the contracts of both these lines expired some twelve months ago, and the Bremen line refused to continue to carry the mail for the postages, but the Havre line continued to discharge the service for the postages. The discontinued Bremen line was taken up, after a fashion, by Mr. Vanderbilt, of New York, who ran for the postages when it was convenient for him to do so, and discontinued it when it was inconvenient; that is to say, as I am informed by the Senator from Vermont, he discontinued it in the winter, and carried the mails only in the summer, when there was travel.

Although I shall vote for the proposition as it comes from the Post Office Department, I do not at all understand that I am committed to any principle of establishing steam lines, as a subsidy upon the Treasury. I am against that principle. I am prepared either to discontinue the ocean carriage on the part of the Government altogether, or to have the mail carried on the ocean for the postage; but I think notwithstanding that, when we have in our service these two lines, both of them receiving less rates than are paid to the Collins line, and the Havre line, especially, receiving a less rate than was paid to her associate the Bremen line, and when we have, by a vote of the Senate to-day, as I understand it, brought one of these contractors, the Havre line, that has discharged the service faithfully, into competition with one which enjoys the patronage of the Government, I am entirely at liberty to sustain the other line, at least for one year, without any departure from the principles which I am prepared to adhere to when the proper time comes for the adjustment of this matter. I shall cheerfully vote to sustain the proposition coming from the Department.

Mr. TOOMBS. I may not understand this matter, and I should like to be informed by somebody who does understand it; but it appears to me that this is one of the most extraordinary propositions upon which I have ever been called upon to vote. It seems that persons are willing to carry these mails for the legitimate returns, the postages. It is proposed, not to allow them to do so, but to saddle the Treasury with an expense of $230,000 a year, and that, too, after we have authorized another company, to which we pay $387,000 a year, to carry every particle of mail matter between here and Southampton. We have authorized the terminus of the Collins line to be changed, so that it may take the whole mail to Southampton; and then we propose to give another company $230,000 for carrying the mail there. That is the way the question stands now—the precise and naked question. The result, in my judgment, will be that Mr. Collins need not even turn a wheel. It is known to the Senate officially, that persons will carry mails for the postages; and yet we say we will give Mr. Collins $387,000 a year to carry them. What is to prevent Mr. Collins allowing the man who can carry them for the postages to do so, and pocket the difference? I suppose this contract will amount to a douceur of half a million to Mr. Collins without the least difficulty. It must be worth that in the open market. He is to carry the mails to a place where you can get them carried for nothing, for I call it nothing where you only allow the postages; but you propose to pay him $387,000 to do the very service that you can get done for nothing; and how easy it will be for him to turn it over to those who will do it for nothing. Who supposes that he will not sell it? Who would not sell it? Why should he not sell it? It is simply giving him a bonus of half a million dollars, without doing a particle of public service.

Mr. COLLAMER. I perceive that I have not been so fortunate as to be entirely understood by the Senator from Georgia. In the first place, I deny that letting Mr. Collins go to Southampton is necessarily any interference at all with the Bremen and Havre lines. It may be, or it may not be; and whether it will be or not, can be determined by the Postmaster General, on the proper examination of the question. He can ascertain from the people concerned in the Bremen and Havre lines whether they regard this as an interference or not.

Mr. TOOMBS. Suppose the contractors on those lines say it is not, and they withdraw: Collins then has the contract, and what is to prevent him from making an arrangement with them? May there not be collusion?

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not mean to neglect the gentleman's argument, at all; I shall attend to it before I sit down, but I wish first to attend to some misapprehensions independent of that point. I go now on the ground that both lines will run. The gentleman seems to suppose that both lines will not run. That will not follow, at all. Mr. Collins's contract is to do the service twice a month, in ships of a certain size and magnitude. These other people have no such vessels. They were not required to have them by their original contract. They cannot fulfill his contract. There can, therefore, be no such collusion as the Senator supposes. I am going upon the ground that Mr. Collins will, as a matter of course, in order to get the amount of pay you give him, do the service.

Mr. HUNTER. Why cannot they fulfill it? If Collins omits half the trips, the decision is that he does not forfeit his contract, but only forfeits his pay for those trips.

Mr. COLLAMER. He forfeits the whole pay for every trip he omits to make.

Mr. HUNTER. Why cannot they fulfill his contract?

Mr. COLLAMER. He must fulfill it with his ships twice a month, or forfeit the pay.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not understand that any particular ships are required.

Mr. COLLAMER. Yes, sir. By his contract ships of a certain magnitude are required.

Mr. HUNTER. Why cannot they fulfill his contract if they have ships of that magnitude?

Mr. COLLAMER. For the very simple reason that they have not any such ships.

Mr. KING. They can take Collins's ships.

Mr. COLLAMER. If they take his ships they may get the money if they perform the service for him. If he is to go to Southampton, very well. If he is to go to Liverpool, he has to run there; and they perform an entirely different service. The question is, will it interfere with these other two lines to allow him to go to Southampton? If it will interfere with them, the Postmaster General will not agree to let Collins go there, because the provision is that he cannot go there without the consent of the Postmaster General; and of course, if it would interfere with the other lines, the Postmaster General would never agree to let him go there. But, besides that, it is very questionable whether there will be any interference at all. Mr. Collins will run twice a month; they run but twice a month; the Havre line once a month, and the Bremen line once a month, each stopping at Southampton. That makes their trips two weeks apart. If Mr. Collins comes in with his ships, filling up the two weeks when they do not run, making a weekly line from New York by the Collins ships and the ships of these other two lines to Southampton and the continent, the question will be, will that hurt these other lines? They may say, "when we run only once in a week we cannot command the trade and passengers of the continent; but if we can get Mr. Collins to run in the intermediate weeks, and make with us a weekly line, such as there is to Liverpool, the probability is that then we can command the passengers both from America to the continent, and from the continent to America almost entirely, and not have them go by way of Liverpool at all. We never shall be able to do that unless we get Mr. Collins to fill up the intermediate weeks when we do not run; and if he will fill up those weeks, he, together with us, will have a better line, and we shall make more than we can ever make by ourselves."

I merely present this view of the case for the purpose of showing that it does not follow as a matter of course that allowing Mr. Collins to run his ships to Southampton will injure the lines now running there. It may, or it may not. That is a matter for them to judge of. But if it does, I again repeat, the Postmaster General will never agree to let him run there. The bill as it stands amended provides that the Postmaster General may allow him to go to Southampton. To assume that the Postmaster General will have him go there to the injury of those other people, is to beg the whole question, and to beg an improbability, too. It is not at all probable that he would agree to any such thing. There is no danger of his doing it. Unless the lines that are running there for the postages believe that it will injure them, he may allow it to be done; but if they think it will benefit them, he will then probably agree with Mr. Collins, that he may as well run there, and that it will be better for himself and better for the community, making a weekly line between us, England, and the continent, which will run in good competition against the British line to Liverpool.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Vermont is probably conversant with the facts in reference to the size of Mr. Collins's ships. I know that the ships were built larger than was at first supposed; and that was made a merit when the extra compensation was asked for, that the ships were made larger than the contract required. Can he now tell us what sized ships the contract called for?

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know.

Mr. TOOMBS. Only two thousand tons.

Mr. COLLAMER. My impression is that they were built larger than the contract required. The Bremen and Havre lines, however, were not required to be two thousand tons, and they never had any such ships.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I simply wish to ask the Senate, on the statement and argument made now by the Senator from Vermont, if it is not perfectly apparent that the whole foundation of the reason for the reconsideration of this vote is done away with? It was reconsidered on the ground that the provision we have made for the Collins line would hurt these other lines. Now, the Senator from Vermont argues that it will benefit them.

Mr. COLLAMER. No.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Well, that it may benefit them. As a matter of fact, I understand there was not the slightest objection to it on the part of those men.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know that there was.

Mr. YULEE. I will say, in response to the question of my colleague, that the contract called for ships of three thousand tons.

Mr. TOOMBS. The contract was for two thousand.

Mr. YULEE. I have it in my hand.

Mr. TOOMBS. So have I. I hold in my hand the contract itself, and it reads two thousand.

Mr. YULEE. I have it in my hand, and it provides for three thousand.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have it here, in the Senate Documents for 1851-2. "United States mail contract, New York and Liverpool. This agreement, made in the city of Washington," &c. It provides for "five steamships of not less than two thousand tons' measurement, and of one thousand horse power each, to be built of great speed, and sufficiently strong for war purposes."

Mr. YULEE. What contract is that?

Mr. TOOMBS. The contract with E. K. Collins.

Mr. YULEE. I have before me the contract with E. K. Collins.

Mr. TOOMBS. You have the supplemental contract.

Mr. YULEE. No, sir; it is the original contract; and it provides:

"For the materials, dimensions, and more full specifications for the hull of said ships and their steam machinery, respectively, reference is made to the annexed schedules, marked A and B, which belong to and form part of this agreement."

Then schedule A provides:

"Intended size of said steamships, about three thousand tons, being three hundred feet between perpendiculars," &c.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator's contract and mine are the same; but he does not state it with accuracy. The contract binds them, and not the schedule; in the schedule he says he intends to make the ships three thousand tons; but by the contract he is only bound to make them two thousand. That is the difference.

Mr. HUNTER. What is the date?

Mr. YULEE. This contract is dated November 1, 1847, and is the contract which was made under the law.

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe that the statute required them to be at least two thousand tons.

Mr. YULEE. I can explain the difference. In the proposition Mr. Collins made to the Post Office Department before the act of Congress, he suggested two thousand tons. That was in his proposal, and that probably was recited in the act of Congress.

Mr. PUGH. There is no recital in the act of Congress; but reference is made to his proposition.

Mr. SEWARD. I have too much interest in expediting the business of the Senate to occupy the floor long. I wish to say simply, that I see no necessary connection between this question and the question which went before it in regard to the Collins line. Here is a proposition of the Government, which has been accepted by the House of Representatives, in regard to the transportation of the mails from New York, via Southampton or Cowes, to Bremen, and from New York, via Southampton or Cowes, to Havre—two lines which have been in existence the last eight years, and for which the House of Representatives proposes that we shall pay $230,000; and that proposition to pay $230,000 the Committee on Finance propose to amend, by substituting for the sum of $230,000 the postages.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You should take the succeeding sum with it—the two together making $350,000.

Mr. SEWARD. I correct myself at the request of the honorable Senator from Maine. I will state the proposition, then, in this way: the Postmaster General and House of Representatives propose to pay to these two lines, which have for the last eight or ten years carried these mails, the sum of $230,000 for carrying the mails on the same routes, the same number of times, with a fund reserved for contingencies, at the discretion of the Postmaster General, of $120,000 more for that purpose. Now the Committee on Finance propose to substitute for that proposition, which is one that will sustain these two lines and secure this service, another one which we do not know will effect that purpose. That other proposition is to give the amount of postage, foreign and inland, received by the United States in and out by the vessels employed in this service. If I understand it, the first sum of $230,000 is substantially an estimate of the amount of postages which will be received; and what the committee propose is, instead of fixing that amount of $230,000, to let the parties take the postages, which it is estimated will be equivalent to it. There is then no material difference in the propositions, so far as the Government is concerned. Any difference there can be to them is practically immaterial unless it affects some principle; but in point of amount it can be nothing. To the contractor, however, who has steam lines to maintain, with less credit and less capital than the Government of the United States at his command, it is one thing whether he is sure that he will have $230,000, or whether it is only estimated by the Government that he will have $230,000, although the estimate is expected to be nearly right.

Then you substitute an amendment which makes no material difference in point of economy to the Government whatever, but which may lose you the service, in the place of a sum which will secure it, and will probably not differ from the amount you propose to give. I am sure I am disposed to meet the case fairly. This is the whole matter; unless it is necessary to advert again to the proposition which provides $120,000 for contingencies; but that is not involved in the question before the Senate. The question before the Senate is, whether they will substitute "the postages, foreign and inland, received by the United States in the mails in and out by the vessels employed in such service," for the sum of $230,000, which are substantial equivalents? After that, it will be time enough to consider whether the contingencies shall be allowed. To mix the two questions together, and then go back and embarrass them with the proposition in regard to Mr. Collins, is quite unnecessary. I have said there was nothing involved in this except a principle. I admit that there is a principle contended for by the Committee on Finance, and that is, that the service shall hereafter be remunerative. I only repeat, with the Senator from Vermont and the Senator from Mississippi, that, when the Collins contract falls in, then will be a good time to revise and consider the whole subject, and to adopt such a system, if it shall be found expedient.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator from Vermont did not, in my judgment, attend to the case to which I called his attention, at all. The only ground on which they pretend to stand in the assumption that they are not giving Mr. Collins three quarters of a million for nothing, is that the other lines have not the same sort of ships that he has. The Senator from Vermont, when asked on what authority he makes that statement, gives none. He does not know a word about it, and the statement he made was inaccurate. The Senator from Florida, also, is under a mistake. Collins, by his contract, was to build ships not less than two thousand tons' burden. It is true, in the specifications he said he would build them about three thousand tons, but he is not bound by the schedule. He is only bound by the act of Congress, and his proposals, and the contract. They require ships of two thousand tons; and the reason these specifications were made was itself fraudulent, because they well knew that they would never build such a ship in the world, and they never intended to do so. What they wanted was a legislative contract; the rest was perfectly easy. It was reported to us by those who pretend to be competent officers in the naval service of the United States, that the Collins ships were not built according to contract. He came here and said, "here are my specifications; I have all the iron bolts they call for; the specifications and contract show what I was to do, and I have built my ships according to them." Although it was proven that they were not sufficient for war purposes, he said they were built according to contract, according to the specifications. Those specifications, with which the law had nothing to do, were put in by the contractors, and they got a Secretary of the Navy, (Mr. Mason,) who knew as little about ships as I do, to accept them.

The Senator from Vermont says these other contractors have not as good ships as the Collins ships. Everybody knows that that is not so. I know personally that the statement is not correct. The Vanderbilt is a larger ship and a stronger ship than any of the Collins line, except the last one that he built. The Secretary of the Navy or the Postmaster General cannot designate the ships with which he shall carry the mails; but if he offers them a ship that is as good as the contract requires they are bound to take it. What will be the test of the contract? A ship may be offered; it may not be as good as one as the Atlantic or Arctic, but it may be as good as the contract calls for, and therefore they must send the mails by it. I am trying to protect the Government against collusion, not against conflict. I do not know but that these parties have colluded now. I have not the least doubt that all these people understand one another. I am struggling against collusion. If they have colluded, why should Vanderbilt run to Southampton for the postage when Collins can get $387,000 for running to the same place? Why may not Collins, then, sell his ships, sit down in New York, and say to Vanderbilt, "I will give you $230,000 and pocket $157,000 a year." That is the plain, naked case. The Senator from Vermont says the Postmaster General will protect us. It is my duty, in the first place, to prevent collusion, and prevent the country from being plundered; to protect it by law as well as I can. I have noticed that there never has been a head of a Department strong enough to resist steamship contracts. I have noticed them here with your Whig party and your Democratic party for the last thirteen years, and I have never seen any head of a Department strong enough to resist these influences. I do not know how it has happened. They were all very honest men, as far as I know. I never heard the least dishonesty charged on any of them, and I am willing to say they were honest men; but there has never been a head of the Navy Department or of the Post Office Department who has been able to resist these influences; steamship contractors have been allowed to vary their contracts to suit themselves. Thirteen years' experience has taught me that whenever you allow the Post Office or the Navy Department to do anything which is for the benefit of contractors, you may consider that thing as done. I could point to more than a dozen variations of contracts where authority has been given to those Departments—marked cases.

I recollect that when it was demonstrated, as it was said by my friend from Florida [Mr. MALLOY] the other day, that the dry-docks you constructed were great failures and worth nothing, you paid about two million dollars for building one in California, because it was referred to the discretion of the Secretary of the Navy. I do not believe in trusting to the heads of these Departments to protect us. Take the very case of these steamships. A board of your naval officers said that they were not built according to contract; that they could not stand the fire of their own batteries; that they would come to pieces under the fire of one gun, and yet they were accepted by the Navy Department. The report of your officers came before me officially when I was a member of the Committee of Ways and Means of the other House, showing these facts. Mr. Collins has been able to get from the Departments whatever he wanted, and it seems to me he has made Congress do whatever he asked them to do besides. A million dollars a year is a power that will be felt. For ten years it amounts to ten millions of money, and I know it is felt, I know it perverts legislation. I have seen its influence; I have seen the public Treasury plundered by it. Why then should we leave anything to discretion which we can control by law? When the bill gets into the Senate, if this vote be reconsidered, I shall endeavor to limit it so that the contract shall not be assigned, but shall be carried out by Mr. Collins, and I have no doubt he would not give his tavern bill here for your provision if you pass it in that way.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Committee on Finance, to strike out "$230,000," and insert "the amount of postages, ocean and inland, received by the United States on the mails in and out by the vessels employed in such service."

Mr. TOOMBS called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator from Iowa, Mr. HARLAN, and myself have paired off.

Mr. POLK. I have paired off with the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. SIMMONS.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have paired off with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. DIXON.

The question being taken, resulted—yeas 18, nays 19; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Brown, Clay, Clingman, Douglas, Fessenden, Hamlin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Reid, Sebastian, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Yulee—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Doolittle, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Jones, Kennedy, Mason, Seward, Stuart, Wilson, and Wright—19.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. TOOMBS. It seems we are doing very important business here with only thirty-seven Senators. I move that the Senate adjourn. I think it is shameful to attempt to carry on public business with more than one third of our number absent.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall not adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays on the adjournment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GREEN. Although I paired off, it was on a specific question. It was on the bill before the Senate, and I claim the right to vote on the adjournment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 16, nays 24; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bigler, Broderick, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Green, Hammond, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pugh, and Toombs—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bright, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Polk, Reid, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—24.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

The next amendment of the Committee on Finance was to strike out the following clause:

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on that proposition.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. An explanation is asked of the amendment. I will state how I understand it. The bill as it came from the House of Representatives, appropriated for the transportation of mails from New York by these two lines, $230,000, which, it was thought by the Department, might be, or might not be, sufficient to secure the mail service by these lines. The Department recommended, and the House put into the bill a provision for contingencies of mail service, $120,000.

Mr. YULEE. I do not feel much solicitude either way in respect to this amendment, or that upon which we voted just now, for, at last, it is all at the discretion of the Postmaster General, and he may or may not use it; but I rise simply for the purpose of protesting against what seems to be an impression in the Senate, that the Postmaster General is bound by the amendment which has just been passed upon, and by this to employ the same lines now in service. By no means at all. The appropriation of $230,000 was asked for, as he specifically states in his letter, as being the probable amount of income from postages, and the $120,000 was asked for as a sum which he might use or might not use at his pleasure, on this route or upon any other route, in giving effect to the plan of service at the cost of postages. Now, although the action of the Senate may be an intimation that upon the route to Havre and Bremen it would be desirable to establish a line, it does not at all commit him to employ the same persons who are now employed, or to put out any service at all, if he does not think it is advisable. That, I think, is the view which the Postmaster General will take of the matter.

Mr. TOOMBS. I suppose that is the case with the $230,000. The Post Office Department is $5,000,000 in arrears; the Treasury is bankrupt; we have agreed to $35,000,000 of loans at this session; and, in such a condition of things, with a broken-down contractor getting $387,000 a year now, we give $230,000 at the pleasure of the Department to facilitate European intercourse; that is what it is.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator misunderstands me. I was not advocating it. I say I am indifferent about it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know.

Mr. YULEE. But I do not want the Post Office Department to be understood as committed to putting this service in operation.

Mr. TOOMBS. It was only to the measure that I was objecting. I simply wanted the Senate to understand, and I desire it put on the record, that I am unwilling, in the present condition of the country, to put $350,000 in anybody's hands in this way. I believe I have as much confidence in the Postmaster General as in any other officer; but I say whatever can be regulated by law ought not to be left to discretion. When I am called upon to appropriate public money, unless it is a case in which I cannot regulate it by law, I will leave no discretion.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire to suggest another thing: as this item stands, it is a contingency for the European mail service. It is not applicable to this particular line merely; and to vote it is simply putting $120,000 into the hands of the Postmaster General to use as he pleases. He may apply it to this line or not, just as he likes.

Mr. KING. I take it, in reference to that suggestion, that we should not shut our eyes to the fact that the simple object for which the clause is put in here is to enable the Postmaster General to pay an additional sum for this particular service. That is the only reason why it is in the bill at all.

Mr. YULEE. No; the Postmaster General did not ask for it with that view.

Mr. KING. I do not care what he asked for; I say the object of putting it there was to make up $350,000 to the Bremen and Havre line, and the reason of putting in $120,000 here is to make up the balance the postage does not pay. He has not asked the money for any other purpose, and does not want it for any other purpose, and there is no use of talking about its being for any other purpose.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is no reply to what I say. That is talk about the object; but as it stands in the bill, the clause is disconnected with any object; it is for contingencies of the mail service to Europe, and I say the Postmaster General may use it for pretty much anything he pleases.

Mr. SEWARD. It is for mail service between New York and Europe.

Mr. KING. If what the Senator from Maine says is so, the Postmaster General ought not to have the money.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I say he ought not to have it.

Mr. KING. I think that is a very good reason why this appropriation should not be made. Our committees should not draw our bills so that they have no specific or definite purpose; but we should know the purpose for which we appropriate money.

Mr. POLK. I have paired off with the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. SIMMONS. Otherwise, I should vote "ay" on this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Cameron, Clark, Clay, Clingman, Fessenden, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Mallory, Reid, Sebastian, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Davis, Doolittle, Douglas, Jones, Mason, Pugh, Seward, and Wright—9.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. I believe that is the last of the amendments of the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.)

Yes, sir.

Mr. YULEE. I now offer this amendment, which was read before to the Senate:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports by steamship; allowing and paying therefor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if by an American vessel, the sea and United States inland postage, and if by foreign vessel, the sea postage only, on the mails so conveyed: Provided, That the preference shall always be given to an American over a foreign steamship, when departing from the same port for the same destination within three days of each other.

I do not know that I can succeed in making myself heard, but I have a very few words to say in reference to this amendment. I apprehend there can be no objection to it from any quarter. It does not propose to disturb any existing contracts. The Collins contract stands upon its original terms, with such modifications as Congress may make. The routes to Havre and Bremer Haven, via Southampton, will stand as indicated by the amendment of the Senate. The purpose of this amendment is to enable the Postmaster General to make an experiment with a line which will, if successful, relieve Congress from applications for special post lines so far as correspondence with Europe is concerned, and will relieve the Treasury of the necessity of sustaining them.

The passage of this amendment is the more necessary in consequence of the determination of the Senate, in which I have in a great degree concurred, to recognize the continuing existence of the Collins contract up to its termination, and to permit the Postmaster General to continue the service, if he chooses, on the routes to Southampton by the other lines. This is necessary in order to prevent a monopoly—a monopoly both as to place, and as to parties; as thus: as matters stand now, if you do not give the authority to the Postmaster General to make other contracts for postages, he is without authority of law, and can make no other contracts than the existing one with Collins, and the contracts to Havre and to Bremer Haven, by way of Southampton. If, then, Portland, or Boston, or Philadelphia, or Baltimore, or Norfolk, or New Orleans, or any other port of the United States, comes forward to the Post Office Department, and proposes to make up a line to Europe, taking the postages for its pay, he cannot make the contract with them, because he has no authority of law to make such a contract. He could not originate a contract, and the law does not authorize him to take from the Treasury the postages collected, and therefore he cannot make a contract with any other port in the United States, except New York. Thus every other port must give up all possible hope of competition, or rivalry with New York, until Congress may otherwise provide by further legislation.

But it will not only be a monopoly as to place, it will be a monopoly as to parties; because, as the existing authority is limited to a contract for one year, and no parties will build steamers to take a contract for one year, because it will require a year to provide steamers for such service as that to Europe, the Postmaster General is limited to the parties now owning steamers, who are in a condition to carry on the service. This legislation, if it stands as it does, creates a monopoly as to place, and a monopoly as to party, which it is utterly out of the power of the Post Office Department to overcome.

In this view, this amendment would be proper; but in the general view, which induced the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to present it, it seems to me eminently desirable that it should be adopted. All the calculations made at the Department, show a result, from the European correspondence, of $1,473,000—about a million and a half. If, as the Postmaster General thinks, he can establish a line of good steamers, alternating weekly with the Cunarders, he can secure to the Treasury of this country one half those postages, which will be nearly eight hundred thousand dollars, and then he will have a sum equal to that which the Cunarders now receive, and which will give fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars to the voyage—a sufficient amount to maintain a good line of steamers. If, then, with the ability to make this experiment, he should be able to create a good service, when the Collins contract expires, two years hence, you will be relieved of the necessity of making special legislative provision for any other line. If we propose to make the experiment, it is necessary that it should be done at once; because, if advertised now, it cannot go into operation under a year, and it would require another year to test the experiment.

If it is proposed to try, before the Collins contract expires, in 1860, whether we can substitute a better system, now is the time when we must do it. If we defer it to another year, it will be too late. If it shall not be successful; if, in the two years during which we give the opportunity to the Postmaster General to make the experiment, it shall result in a failure, then, when the Collins contract expires, we shall be able to consider what, if any, other course is proper to be pursued in aid of this service. Certainly no harm can follow, no person would be interfered with. Mr. Collins and his line will receive just as much as through the experiment were not making; and the lines proposed to be provided for in the clause just passed, upon coming under this system, can, as they have done in the last year, be perhaps the objects of the experiment. They can try whether they cannot do it, and if they cannot do it, there are other parties who can come in. There are many lines running without compensation, and if you enable the Postmaster General to use fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars per voyage, as he can, if he establishes a good line, you enable him to say to Norfolk, "Come forward with your line; you may have the fifteen or sixteen thousand dollars; I will give you the postages." Letters can concentrate there as well as at New York. He can say so to Portland, to Boston, and to other ports; and thus you will have the opportunity, within the next two years, of testing, on fair terms to all parts of the country and to all parties, the experiment of opening to the rivalry of all the commercial towns of the country and of all those who are engaged in steam navigation, the establishment of mail lines; you will dispense the Government aid and favor equally to all classes, and to all capital disposed to engage itself in this enterprise. I think there is no aspect in which any party advocating any interest which has manifested itself in this body can object to the experiment proposed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. HUNTER. I like the principle which the Senator from Florida proposes to adopt; but it seems to me this amendment will accomplish a result he would not desire himself. There is a part of this amendment I would be willing to vote for so as to allow the Postmaster General to make contracts for carrying the mails for a limited term of years, from any ports except those for which he now has contracts; but this goes further, and allows weekly service from New York to any port of England.

Mr. YULEE. It is not limited to New York.

Mr. HUNTER. It is not limited to New York; but I say that port ought to be excepted. It already has a line receiving an annual stipend, and the consequence might be, according to this plan, that you would have a line running from New York for the postages, and you would have the Collins line running under an annual stipend. Both could not be maintained, and Collins would be certain to get his annual stipend.

Mr. YULEE. The provision carries its antidote with it in this respect; no line will be willing to take the service for the postages, unless it is so arranged, and the circumstances are such as to insure them a reasonable income. If, therefore, the interference of the Collins line would be such as to diminish the income of another line, they will not take the contract.

Mr. HUNTER. Suppose there was a secret understanding with Collins, of which the Department knew nothing. Suppose one line take the service for the postages, and Collins assigns his contract, and they thus have the postages and the annual compensation besides.

Mr. YULEE. Then, at all events, the experiment will have gone successfully into operation.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I suggest to the honorable Senator from Florida that he add an amendment to his proposition, that the actual running of the lines commence after the termination of the Collins monopoly, and, in the mean time, all this advertising can go on and preparation be made, and then there will be no interference between the two.

Mr. YULEE. The objection to that is, that the Collins line is under contract only for twenty trips a year, twice a month during eight months in the year, and only once a month during the remaining four months. Now, in order to make this experiment successful, we must, if possible, engage in the service a line of weekly steamers, part of which will be the Collins steamers. There is no desire to interfere with them; but the additional steamers will be so arranged as to make an alternate trip with the Cunarders weekly, and thus divide with foreign Governments the income from the ocean postage. I have no objection to the alteration suggested by the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDING OFFICER put the question on the amendment, and declared that the "noes" prevailed by the sound; but Several SENATORS called for a division.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think this vote is very characteristic. It seems to be the policy of the Senate to-day, that these mails shall not support themselves. It seems to be the favorite policy of the Senate to take money out of the public Treasury for this service, and not to restrict it to the postages, and, therefore, I think they are perfectly consistent in voting down the proposition that it shall be self-sustaining. I think we have only to go one step further, and make ocean postage free! I am very much in favor of the movement of the Senator from Florida; because if you will give bonuses to Collins, I do not want to prevent the Postmaster General from making contracts with anybody else. The amendment only allows him to make contracts with somebody else, who will carry the mails for the postages. It proposes to let the Postmaster General provide for carrying the mail from some other place than New York, and by some other person than E. K. Collins, and to give nothing in the world for doing it but what the carriers earn; that is, the postage on the letters. I cannot see any objection to that; but it seems the Senator from Virginia does; I am amazed at him. Does he not wish to have the Department support itself? Does he wish to restrict this service to Collins, and to New York?

Mr. HUNTER. Either the Senator from Georgia or I misunderstand this amendment. It is a fair proposition to carry the mails for the postages, and to that extent it is good; but it does more. It allows a weekly service to be carried from New York to England for the postages, and besides that pays Collins for carrying the mail.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think our friend from Florida understands it better. There is no idea of Mr. Collins carrying it from Liverpool. Nobody means that. He will run to Southampton.

Mr. HUNTER. All he would have to do would be to assign his contract to the postage contractor. The postage contractor would go, and then, for the weekly service, he would get both the postages and this annual sum.

Mr. YULEE. I have no objection to the modification the Senator from Virginia wants. Will this satisfy him?

Provided, That no ship shall be engaged during the continuance of the contract with Collins & Co., which follows the same route within the same week.

Will that do?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, that will do.

Mr. YULEE. The object is to secure a weekly service. There is no desire to run a steamer on the same week with Collins, and it is not likely we can get one on the same week.

Mr. HUNTER. Strike out the words "within the same week."

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I ask the Senator from Florida, does not that amendment give one man the postages, while we already give Collins the pay?

Mr. YULEE. I am agreeing to a proviso that he shall not run a steamer within a week on the same route with Collins.

Mr. HUNTER. Leave that out about the week.

Mr. YULEE. Then the difficulty would be that we could not get any other steamer to run to Southampton at all, and the country be reduced to twenty trips a year to Southampton; and we must run the others to some other port.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. If the amendment is adopted, it seems to me Collins is subsidized; while another line gets the postages. Is not that true, if they run on different days and different routes?

Mr. YULEE. No. He will get the postages accumulating during the week. There will be on board Collins's ship, to reimburse us for our outlay in subsidy, the postages accumulating in a week; because this proviso would prevent another steamer departing within a week of the same time.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. That is a collateral partnership with Collins. I do not understand it.

Mr. IVERSON. I propose this as a substitute for the last amendment, which meets the approbation of the Senator from Virginia:

Provided, That the above provisions shall not apply to any line between New York and such foreign ports where contracts now exist, nor until the expiration of such contracts.

Mr. HUNTER. I will vote for the amendment if that be put in.

Mr. YULEE. I have no objection to that if I understand it correctly. I accept it.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to hear the amendment of the Senator from Florida read, as now modified.

The amendment, as modified, was read.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no doubt that the proposition, as now modified, will be perfectly harmless; at the same time it will be perfectly futile. You are attempting to mingle two systems. You chose, in the year 1847, to inaugurate a system of subsidies connected with the idea of war steamers. Whether that was wise or unwise is now immaterial. The Government adopted that system. I found that an existing system when I came into the Senate; I found contracts in existence under it which have not yet terminated. Until those contracts terminate, any attempt to mingle another system of carrying mails by means of paying postage, is only an additional charge upon the Government just to the extent to which you start any new line, without any probable prospect of any beneficial result to the commerce of the country. You cannot alter, by means of your mail system, the course of commerce. You cannot enable such a costly system as steamships to be run from one port to another, merely by giving them the postage. If there is not the transit of goods and passengers, you may hold out the idea that they shall take the postage from that port, but it will be a vain attempt to carry on an intercourse by means of steam unless you have commerce and passengers to sustain the line. If, as this modification provides, you exclude the idea of running from the same port to which your subsidies by contract now exist, it is merely harmless. If you were to permit the competition to take place between the same ports, or in the same general direction between the same countries, then you would only be paying so much more, because the postage you would obtain by the line to which you give the subsidy, would pass into the hands of the other line to a limited extent, and to that extent the Government would be the loser. That would be the only operation of this proposition.

Mr. YULEE. If the Senator—

Mr. BAYARD. Allow me to go on; the honorable Senator can afterwards explain, as he sees fit. I think I understand the subject I am talking about. The two systems are incongruous, and the attempt is now on this bill to introduce a general system, which is incompatible with the existence of the contract system which you chose to inaugurate in 1847 by paying subsidies of a certain sum, as the British Government do. What will be the effect? When you abandon the contract system entirely, and it expires, whether you can maintain any postal system at all or whether it is better to abandon it altogether, and let the British Government control it, will be a question for the intelligence of Congress when the time comes. My own belief is, that you had better not attempt to meddle with the subject until your existing system has expired—until your contracts are at an end; because you may attach as many of these amendments as you please, and you cannot raise lines of steamships under them. Lines of steamships are costly compared to sailing vessels. They cannot be maintained unless they have a large amount of passengers and of light freight, in addition to any postage they may get, and you cannot force them to any port in this country except where the current of passengers runs, whether it is New York or any other port of the country. Where the course of commerce is, there, and there alone, will you be able to maintain a line of steamships. The same argument does not apply to ordinary lines of sailing ships; they may exist anywhere.

My objection is that you are attempting to interpolate another system while you have an existing policy not yet expired under your present contracts, and that it is unwise to mingle the two systems together. I am perfectly willing to try the experiment, though I have doubts about the result, when your present contracts expire. Then, if you choose, throw open the whole postal system to what is called competition, that is, allow lines to start from any port of the United States and receive no more nor no less than the ocean postage, (for that is the true principle,) not the inland postage. If they can sustain themselves, it will be a great gain, I admit. My doubts are whether the effect of that line of policy, when you inaugurate it, will not be that you will throw the entire postal communication between Europe and America into the hands of Great Britain, and throw it as an adjunct which will enable her to command all the passengers and light freights between Europe and the United States. That is my fear; but I am willing to try the system on the principle of free trade when the present contracts shall expire.

Mr. YULEE. The amendment as it stands does not attempt to force the service to any port or from any port, but it places all on equality, and if the incidental support of commerce is sufficient at any point, with the aid which may be derived from the postages, to sustain a line, they will be able to sustain it. I think it is possible that from Portland or from Boston we may be able to make something of this system and to establish a line.

But the Senator from Delaware proposes that we shall wait until the Collins contract has expired. Then what intermediate provision have you? The Collins contract provides only for twenty trips in the year, while the English company is running fifty-two trips a year. The object of this amendment is to enable the Department to provide for the additional number of thirty-two trips, in order to be able to alternate with the British Government, and thus to obtain half of the income from postages.

We cannot wait until 1860 if we design to make this contract at all, because then it will be too late. Unless you inaugurate it now, and put the experiment under way, it is impossible that you can carry it out. You must expect, when the existing contract expires, in 1860, to find the service either falling to the ground, or yourself under compulsion to make another contract to continue it, because you cannot advertise and procure the building of suitable steamers within less than a year, and it will require at least a year to ascertain whether the system can be sustained upon the plan proposed here. If, therefore, it is designed to put the Government in a condition to substitute this for the other system on the expiration of the contract in 1860, it is necessary that we make the necessary legislation now; and if you wait until then, we may as well abandon the idea.

Mr. BAYARD. As I consider it entirely futile, I do not think it worth an argument. As to the question whether you can alternate lines with the Cunarders, founded on the amount of postage received from the letters carried in the steam vessels connected with the line, it is to my mind idle to talk about it. Those vessels receive a subsidy from the British Government of some $900,000 a year, and you cannot expect—the system is too costly—to run against them or in alternation with them if you only allow the mere postage on the letters your vessels carry at intervals between the departure of the Cunard steamers.

This idea is further rendered more futile by the very restriction of the amendment; that is, that they shall not start from the ports where you now have an alternating line on a subsidy—the Collins line, as it is called. It is absolutely impossible to suppose that a line of steamships is going to start for the purpose of receiving the postages. It could not begin to pay. You cannot suppose that if there are not passengers and freight to sustain a line, you can, by holding out the idea of the small amount of postage they are to get in intervals of half a week, start a line of any kind, or try any experiment. The experiment you have got to try is this: when you have abandoned your contracts, if you think it better to do so—and I have no objection, I think it is worth a trial—abandon entirely governmental interference or the purpose of carrying the mails across the ocean when your contracts have expired. You inaugurated the system in 1847; it will expire in 1860. Then, if you choose, you may adopt the old plan on which you acted towards sailing vessels, of taking no care about the postal service across the ocean, and simply securing your land postages, leaving to the effects of chance, accident, or the competition of Great Britain, the control of that service. If you think that is consistent with the general commercial interests of the country, very well; I have no objection. I think it is the preferable system, if it does not injure us otherwise; but I am satisfied that you cannot try that system fairly while you have the contract system in existence. It would be idle, therefore, to pass this amendment as it stands, with the modification. If you put in the modification, you are only paying at your own expense, because you are starting lines of your own in opposition to your existing line, to which you are paying, by contract, a sum certain; and I do not think that is wise policy.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think nothing can be more just and fair to the whole country, unless you want to make this a particular monopoly to certain men and certain places, than the proposition of the Senator from Florida. There is nothing in the objection of the Senator from Virginia. The proposition is, that the Postmaster General may make contracts with any ship to carry the mails from any point in the United States to any foreign country if it will agree to do so for the postages. Before the present system was adopted unhappily in 1847, which has been one of nothing but fraud, that was the case throughout the United States. Every ship that sailed carried letters, under certain regulations. Now, when the United States employ Collins, does anybody suppose that people are going to keep back their letters for a week to go in with the Collins line? Is it possible that grown-up men, looking at the condition of the country, can suppose that a letter would be held over a week in order that it might go in a Government ship, when it could go in a Cunarder or by a private steamer at once? I believe there is a weekly mail by the Cunard steamers; and if you start a line out of the same port the postage would go to both; so that it is idle to say it is competition with Collins. If you do not start on the same day or the same week there is no competition of that kind.

The case put by the Senator from Florida is a very sound one. Collins is compelled to make but twenty trips a year—two trips a month for eight months in the year, and one trip monthly for the other four. If you make no provision for any more service, it is an encouragement to the Cunarders. I have no objection to the Cunarders. I would as soon have my letters carried in British as in American bottoms, and I would prefer that they should carry them if they did it cheaper. That is the true system of the country. You will never make a country great or rich by taking money out of the pockets of the individual classes to give it to special interests. If the British ships will carry our letters cheaper, the result will be to make American citizens richer, and the country richer. You will never make the country rich by plundering its citizens for the benefit of E. K. Collins, or other particular contractors.

It is very remarkable that we should pass such a measure as the Senate have agreed to for the benefit of Mr. Collins. It is now declared that he is not obliged to turn a single paddle for the rest of the term of his contract. If he chooses to make a trip, you pay him. If he chooses to lay up in the docks, as he has in New York for a year past, you do not pay him. That is the sacred contract that the Senate want to alter beneficially to him. You propose to alter it for his benefit, for nobody else's. If you want Mr. Collins to comply with his contract, rather than give him this benefit, why not fine him more than the cost of a trip if he fails to perform it? Why not deduct from the money he earns a pro rata amount for the trips he omits to make? You will not do that, but you will leave the Government service simply at the will of the contractor; you will leave E. K. Collins to determine whether we shall have any American mails from New York to Liverpool. Your whole Government, it seems, cannot compel him to carry the mails; and, according to the idea of the Senator from Delaware, you must not do it. You have given Collins a right to carry the mail, and if he chooses to do so you must pay him; but if not, you are not to let anybody else carry it! I do not believe he has carried the mail for a year past. I ask the chairman of the Post Office Committee, when did he carry the last one?

Mr. YULEE. I think, five or six months since.

Mr. TOOMBS. And then not in the ships he contracted to carry it in. It appears now that he made a contract to carry the mails when he pleased, and to get paid at the rate of $387,000 a year; but if he will not carry them, according to the Senator from Delaware and the Senator from Virginia, the Postmaster General is not to allow anybody else to do it.

Mr. HUNTER. I did not say the Postmaster General could not get anybody else to carry the mails.

Mr. TOOMBS. You said he should not make a contract.

Mr. HUNTER. I did not. My objection to the amendment of the Senator from Florida, as it was first offered, was, that he could get the benefit of the postages and of his annual stipend both; that he would have nothing to do but assign his contract to the men who might undertake to carry the mails for the postage.

Mr. TOOMBS. So far as that is concerned, I am with the Senator, to prevent collusion. When we get into the Senate, I intend to make an effort to insert a provision insisting that Mr. Collins shall carry out his contract. I have not much expectation of succeeding in it; but I wish to make a record of these things. I have no idea that Mr. Collins will ever turn a wheel to Southampton. Why should he? He can make $250,000 without doing it, by this very contract. You have a man now who agrees to do the service for the postages, which, it is said, amount to $230,000. Why cannot Collins pay $230,000 out of his contract-price, and pocket the $157,000 difference?

The only protection that the Senator from Vermont pretends that we have, is, that he has to run a particular kind of ships. The fact is, that the contract requires only ships of two thousand tons. The Senator from Vermont imagines that nobody else has got ships of two thousand tons. The Vanderbilt is three thousand five hundred tons, and a better vessel than the Collins ships any day. If Collins assigns this service to other people, and they present as good a ship as his contract calls for, the Department will be bound to accept it. Mr. Vanderbilt has got as good ships as Collins. The Senator from Vermont is wholly mistaken when he says there are no ships as large as those of Collins's. The Vanderbilt is larger than any of them.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know but that the Vanderbilt would answer the contract of Collins.

Mr. TOOMBS. No doubt. It is stronger, swifter, and larger. All that the Collins contract requires is a ship fit for a mail steamer, of two thousand tons' burden. The war requisition is abandoned. It was abandoned when the Collins ships were accepted. They were accepted in the teeth of a report from the proper officers that they could not be made war steamers.

I think that if Congress had not given these mail contracts there would not be a steamship line running from New York to Europe, but they would have been running from the southern ports, where the freights are, and where ships would have run from if there had been no steam navigation. There is three times as much freight to be carried to Europe from New Orleans as there is from New York, and yet you give great subsidies to concentrate business in New York. Savannah could better afford to sustain a line than New York, if you left all places to stand on their own business. The country adjacent to Savannah exports more than the country around New York. The result of this system is to cheapen freights from New York by Government subsidies. Of course a man can afford to carry a barrel of flour cheaper in his ship if you pay him $800,000 a year. You give great jobs under the pretense of carrying your mails, and the effect is to strike down the industry of the people of this country, and particularly the industry of the people of my section. Let us alone; we do not ask you for bounties or subsidies. We do not ask you to give us the public Treasury; but let the commerce of the country alone, let it go in its natural channel. Your attempts to divert it are an injustice which ought not to be submitted to by the free people of this country.

Mr. BAYARD. The honorable Senator from Georgia was in Congress at the time this system was inaugurated. He says it was founded in fraud. It may be so. I can only state my information, founded on what I learned after I came here. As far as I was able to see or investigate it subsequently, I was not able to trace, nor did I hear any allegation of, fraud. It seemed to me the policy was a doubtful one; but the Government had chosen to adopt it, under the idea of connecting the principle of steamers fitted out for war purposes, in time of war, with the postal service, in time of peace. That was the state of things at the time I became a member of the Senate. That the individuals in New York who had engaged in this service under a contract with the Government—how made, or in what mode made, I know nothing—had produced steamships which surpassed any others that had been hitherto known on the ocean, there could be no doubt, in point of speed and accommodation of the general public. They performed their duties, as far as I knew, with regularity. I was disposed to sustain a line which I thought connected itself, in some respects, with the pride of the country, as against an English line, which was subsidized by the Government of Great Britain. I admit that the whole of that system has, in my judgement, failed; I am willing to see it expire, and to see inaugurated a new system; but as long as the policy then adopted, with its contract, exists, I hold that you cannot inaugurate any new system.

The honorable Senator from Georgia may choose to diverge from the particular amendment before you, and go back to the question connected with the origination of the Collins line. I have nothing to do with that here. You have chosen by your amendment—I knew nothing about it—to say that the Collins contract is still a subsisting contract, and you have made an appropriation for it in the bill from the House, without any amendment. You have recognized its subsisting existence. If it is in existence you are bound to abide by it. What I mean to say is, that while that contract is an existing contract, and you are bound to comply with it, you would be paying money out of your Treasury to establish another line between the same ports, or on the same general route of communication. Whether it takes more or less, is immaterial; you are paying out of your own pocket, whether the line is to Southampton or not, when you agree to pay the postages. The same postages, to a greater or less extent, that would be paid to this new line, would be on letters that would be carried under your previous contract. Then of course it is an additional payment to that extent, because you would get the benefit of those postages, the Government only paying what your contract price was to the anterior line. Therefore, the two systems are incongruous in themselves; one is incompatible with the other.

But my objection to the amendment as modified, which prevents any competition between the lines established by yourself from the same ports, and extends it only to other portions of the country, is that it will be perfectly futile. The honorable gentleman from Georgia, may suppose that steam lines will go where freight goes. I do not think so. That is regulated more by the character of the freight. I have no doubt about the immense prosperity of New Orleans; I have no doubt that New Orleans has a greater amount of what is called bulky freight, by far, than New York; I have no doubt that a great part of the cotton of this country is shipped from New Orleans, but steamships are not going to carry cotton. Steamships are sustained by what is called the light freight, and passengers who come and will come to New York, which imports two thirds of the importations of this country. You cannot avoid that by any species of regulation you make; and if you abandoned the whole ocean postal service to-morrow, you would find that your steam lines, according to the course of commerce, while New York stands, will center in New York, for the purpose of the transportation of passengers and light freights. I have no doubt all the other ports of the country will enjoy equal advantages, as far as their natural position will give them. I am not disposed to interfere with them. All I contend for is, that while your contract system exists, whether the policy was false when inaugurated or not, is immaterial; while you are obliged to pay the money, it would be an unwise and foolish policy to attempt to set up a counter system which you cannot carry into effect without derogation to yourself, if you allow it between the same ports, and which would be perfectly futile for the purpose of steam navigation if attempted to be conducted between other ports.

Mr. BIGLER. I have listened to this debate during all the afternoon with a great deal of interest, and with an anxious desire to understand exactly the object in view. Now, sir, as I understand all the propositions together, they are very simple; and I think the difficulty suggested by the Senator from Delaware is very readily met. In the first place, we have a specific appropriation to meet the contract of Mr. Collins, provided he performs his contract, which he never has performed, and which I believe he never will perform. Then we have an additional provision that if Mr. Collins fails to perform his contract to make his twenty trips, the Postmaster General may give the entire postages, sea and inland, in order to get the services performed which Mr. Collins may fail to perform. Then we have a specific appropriation to the Bremen line of $230,000. What next? Why, we have the amendment of the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads: and what is that, and what is its purpose? It is simply this: that the Postmaster General may give the postages to any parties offering to carry the mail on the weeks which the Collins line is not required to make the trip, or give the postages for the additional service. Collins is to perform twenty trips at $19,000 a trip; and I regret the existence of this contract. It is in the way of the establishment of a proper system. I cannot see any difficulty with regard to the amendment of the Senator from Florida authorizing the Postmaster General to give the postages for additional service. It ought to be provided that these trips should not be made in the same weeks; for that would be providing for too large an amount of service. I think that is the view which the Postmaster General takes of this subject; and in that way he could secure the largest and the cheapest service. What difficulty is there in providing that the trips shall be on a different week from that provided by the specific contract? That will meet the difficulty which seems to be presented here; provide that the contract so given out for the postages shall not be on the same week in which the Collins line is required to perform service; because, in the event of Collins's failures, you have already made provision that the postages shall be given.

Now, I want to go a little further on this subject as to the general proposition. I like this idea presented by the Senator from Florida, of making this system self-sustaining; and, so far as our trans-Atlantic service is concerned, at least from our principal port, New York, I am inclined to believe it will succeed. I think we can get all the service which the interests and convenience of our country require, for the sea and inland postages; but I am inclined to the opinion that that would be the beginning and end of the success of this policy. I do not suppose that the postages from any other port to a different point in Europe—for instance, from New Orleans to Bordeaux—would answer. Certainly this system would not answer the purpose of establishing a line of steamers from any of our Atlantic cities to the South American Republics, or to Brazil. I am for this proposition as it stands; but I wish to reserve to myself the right to determine hereafter whether it may not be wise that other considerations, political and commercial, should be mingled with the convenience of mail service; that the Government should go further to encourage and sustain the establishment of mail lines.

I agree mainly with the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] as to the difference between this trans-Atlantic mail service and that which belongs to our own country. I do not think the same principles apply; it is a very different thing when you afford mail facilities to the inhabitants of the United States found throughout our Territories and sparsely populated States. There is an obligation, a high obligation, and a pressing necessity, a valuable interest. We ought to extend to those people facilities of intelligence; we ought to recognize them; we ought to encourage them. But, sir, as for our intercourse between this country and others, from one great city to another, intercourse commercial, we may expect the reward of that service to take care of itself. I think it mainly will do so; but as we are bound by these contracts, as for the present we cannot get clear of the obligation with Mr. Collins, I should prefer the adoption of the amendment of the Senator from Florida as the initiation of a system which I hope we shall be able to practice successfully hereafter; and, with the amendment which he is preparing, I shall vote for its adoption.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. I have but a word or two to say. I am against the initiation of this system, and against any further progress in this matter. We have had the Collins line of steamers, and it is said that now we cannot get clear of them. The whole matter ought to have been left to competition. We have paid subsidies to the Collins steamers, and what benefit has resulted to us from them? As the Senator from Georgia said, they were to be convertible into war steamers; but that was a failure. It is pretty similar to that trans-Atlantic telegraph, that I believe nobody, this session, has said anything about. That, I am very much in hopes, has gone by the board. Now you want to put on correlatively—cumulatively, as lawyers say—another experiment, and another system. I want them all to go out. Let there be fair competition; let your letters go by whatever ships will carry them. Give neither this line, nor any other line, a subsidy; and do not bind up the Postmaster General to make experiments; and, as the Senator from Maine has said, let us attend to our own inland postage here in this country; do not be making experiments between this line and that line and the other line, at the rate of a few hundred thousand dollars apiece. If you can do no better with the money, use it in extending mail facilities to Utah, the outer regions of Missouri, and the lost regions all over the United States. As to inaugurating a new system of experiments in ocean steamers, I have no idea of doing it. We have tried it. It is a failure as to the vessels—a failure as to the service. Now, if we start another one it may be a failure; and I am opposed to it. I want a rasa tabula—the whole thing wiped out, and a new beginning. I will not vote for this amendment, because I want no more experiments of this sort.

I have great confidence in Mr. Aaron V. Brown, my old friend, the Postmaster General; but I do not think he has studied the matter of steamship speed on the ocean. He is a clever, nice old gentleman, from Tennessee; but get him to trading with New York and Southampton sharpers, and I think he would make a bad job of it. [Laughter.] Let the Collins line die; let them all go out. While we are paying them, I would not give others the postages, inland and ocean. We want those postages to give to the Post Office Department here. That is an internal concern, and let it be, if it can, a self-sustaining machine. Hold on to that. Send your mail across to California and Utah; send it anywhere; but this speculation and experimenting with steamers will involve us in trouble and expense, as, from the beginning to the end, it has interminably done and ever will do. The whole amount of it is, that it is a job by somebody to cheat Uncle Sam, and it results in nothing else.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator from Virginia has prepared a proviso with which I am satisfied, and which I think will be generally satisfactory:

Provided, That no contracts shall be made under the provisions of this act for the same service on the same week for which E. K. Collins and others have contracted, during the continuance of that engagement.

I offer that in lieu of the former proviso. I modify my original amendment by the addition of this proviso.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask whether there can be any conflict between this and the Bremen line?

Mr. YULEE. There is no contract with the Bremen line. They contracted during the last vacation for only one year, which has expired, or is about expiring.

Mr. KING. The arrangement, I understand, is to provide, if possible, for a weekly mail, and no more. That, I think, is very well, if we can get it; and that is the object of putting in the provision as to the weeks of sailing, so that there shall not be more than one for the week. The three contracts we now have, provide for only two trips in a month; and this will enable the Department to obtain fifty-two a year—one a week.

Mr. SIMMONS. It speaks of the "same service." Suppose the steamer is going to Bremen or Southampton: I suppose you would call that the same service.

Mr. HUNTER. The same service must be between the same termini.

Mr. SIMMONS. I understand the Collins line may run to Southampton.

Mr. HUNTER. Then this would only apply to a line from New York to Southampton, where ever the Collins line ran.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Collins line goes to Liverpool you may not send a steamer out the same week to Liverpool.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not think that is right. The amendment was agreed to; as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, by steamship, allowing and paying therefor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if by an American vessel, the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign vessel, the sea postage only, on the mails so conveyed: Provided, That the preference shall always be given to an American over a foreign steamship when departing from the same port for the same destination within three days of each other.

And be it further provided, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to provide for and maintain, if practicable, at a cost not to exceed, in any instance, the sea and United States inland postage on the mails conveyed, a weekly mail to and from Europe by United States mail packets, to alternate at regular intervals with the British mail packets plying between New York and Liverpool, and Boston and Liverpool, the preference to be given to such line or lines of American steamships, suitable in all respects for the service, as shall offer the best permanent contract: Provided, That no contract shall be made under the provisions of this act for the same service on the same week for which E. K. Collins and others have contracted, during the continuance of that engagement.

Mr. PUGH. I want to ask the Senator from Florida, if I understand his amendment, just adopted, that the American lines, which he proposes, are to run from New York and Boston to Liverpool?

Mr. YULEE. Those words are only descriptive of the Cunarders, with which the alternation is to be made.

Mr. PUGH. I simply wanted that understood.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I now offer, with a modification, at the suggestion of the Senator from Florida, the amendment I referred to this morning:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 30th day of June, 1860, a discriminating rate of postage of one hundred per centum additional, may, in the discretion of the Postmaster General, be exacted upon all letters and other mail matter, conveyed from foreign countries to the United States, by vessels sailing under foreign flags, which shall receive a governmental bonus as mail carriers.

Sec. — And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, required to abrogate any existing postal convention, with a foreign Government, the stipulations of which are calculated to prevent the execution of the preceding provisions.

I will only say that this does not interfere with any American contracts. It takes effect only after they have all expired. There is but one line in the world that it will interfere with, and that is a line supported by the British Government, and thereby getting an unfair advantage against our own ships. My section of the country has no interest in it because it is not engaged in this business; but the commercial portion of the Union is concerned. My interest is merely that of a friend of the American marine. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. YULEE. I will simply suggest to the Senator whether he had not better reserve this issue for a future time. Let us see how the new system which we are inaugurating, or endeavoring to inaugurate, will work, and then consider whether it will be necessary to intervene for its protection. I am afraid that a provision like this would be looked upon as a defiance to retaliatory legislation. I think we had better let the matter go along smoothly, and see hereafter whether it will be necessary to adopt a different course than that which is now being pursued of entire harmony in the action of the two Governments in respect to the management of their postal affairs.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hear these suggestions with great pleasure, but our existing system will expire in less than two years. By making this movement now, there will be ample time to make an arrangement. We shall be able to effect an arrangement, I have no doubt, if we begin at this time, just as we did with the Denmark Sound dues, and just as we abolished the Tripoli tributes. Somebody must make a movement in this direction. If it is likely to work badly, there is ample time to consider it. This is only a mode of forcing on the British Government and our own some adjustment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I wish to appeal to the Senator from North Carolina to withdraw his amendment for the present. It is perfectly evident, at least to my own mind, that the proposition is so novel that it is impossible for me to give that consideration to it which would enable me to vote understandingly on it. Notice is now given of what he means to do, and at some future time it can be acted upon understandingly. At present, I must vote against it.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I offered it about three weeks ago, and had it referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. It has been noticed in a good many of the papers; talked about, I know, in the New York Herald, the South, and other presses; and I may say it does not vary much from the proposition I moved three times, in 1852, 1853, and 1854, in the House of Representatives, and which was voted down, because they said the period was far ahead when the contracts would expire. If Senators do not choose to vote for it, they have a right to vote against it. I hope we shall have a vote.

Mr. GREEN. I desire to ask the Senator from North Carolina one question; and that is, whether his proposition does not conflict with the postal treaty between the United States and England?

Mr. CLINGMAN. Not at all; because that treaty provides that on one year's notice it may be terminated; and this amendment instructs the Postmaster General to give the notice. It is two years from this time until it takes effect. It expressly instructs him, in the second clause, to give the notice.

Mr. SIMMONS. I shall vote against this proposition, because I think the previous votes and the observations of the Senator from North Carolina contemplate an entire abandonment on the part of the United States of any participation of this mail service.

Mr. CLINGMAN. By subsidies.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not know what a subsidy is, but I suppose it is a contract with a mail steamship company. Then, after these two years expire, we shall have no steamships of our own. This business will be entirely in the hands of the British; and, at that time, he proposes to double the rates of postage. That is the practical effect of his proposition.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Only on the subsidized lines.

Mr. SIMMONS. They would like to have it on the subsidized lines, because it would inure to their benefit.

Mr. CLINGMAN. We shall have our lines under this other amendment.

Mr. SIMMONS. You will have no lines under any contract, and you cannot get any without a contract, in my opinion.

Mr. TOOMBS. The proposition of the Senator from North Carolina is entirely misunderstood by the Senator from Rhode Island. Our object is to get back where we were before we commenced this system. We are told, as the last lingering argument why we should put this charge on the public Treasury, against seventy years' practice of the Government, that England does so. The honorable Senator from North Carolina tells us—and I have no doubt it is true—that they begin to see in England the Cunarders have been an unprofitable investment; and I noticed in a late London paper that the next largest line in the British service—the one to Rio—was about to go into liquidation. Government cannot keep them up; it is impossible to do so. The greater subvention you give them, if the Senator from Rhode Island prefers that term, the more certainly you get into the hands of jobbers, and not business men; and that is the whole difficulty. You may give $350,000 to Mr. Collins, and Vanderbilt will run him off the seas if you give him the postages; and that is what he offers to do. You give $900,000 a year to carry the mails to California; and Vanderbilt compels the contractors to give him $56,000 a month to keep quiet. That is the effect of your subventions. This very day, under your Sloo and Harris contracts, you pay about nine hundred thousand dollars a year; and Vanderbilt, by his superior skill and energy, compelled them, for a long time, to disgorge $40,000 a month, and now $56,000 a month. The effect of your subventions is to give the service to a worthless set of speculators. They pay lobby-men, they pay agencies, they go to law, because everybody is to have something; and I know this Sloo contract has been in chancery in New York for years. The result of the system is, that here comes a man, in his own right a man, as old Vanderbilt seems to be—I never saw him, but his operations have excited my admiration—and he runs right at them, and says, “disgorge this plunder.” He is the kingfish that is robbing these small plunderers that come about the Capitol. He does not come here for that purpose; but he says, “fork over $56,000 a month of this money to me, that I may lie in port with my ships;” and they do it. Thus your subventions do no good. I have no doubt that England will be ready to abandon them for the same reason that she abandoned discrimination in tonnage. Why did she release her vessels from tonnage duties in 1850, if the theory of the Senator from Rhode Island is right?

Mr. SIMMONS. I have not made any theory. Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir. You say she wants to put double postage on our letters, and let hers go free. On the same principle, she would want to put four times the tonnage duty on our ships which she would on her own; and yet the fact is that she has taken off her discrimination against you. Our act of 1818 was founded on the principle that we would take off discrimination against those nations which did not discriminate against us. England, Sweden, and Denmark have done it; and France now is willing to do it as to steamers, but not as to sailing vessels, because she does not consider that equality. We have more steam vessels than she has; and she is starting in the race of steam—which undoubtedly will become the great carrier of the world—and she wants to put herself on an equality with us, and take off her tonnage duties. I know that to be true from most authentic sources.

Now, we propose to say to England, “If you will give a subvention which will deprive our people of the opportunity of carrying letters for the legitimate postage, we will discriminate against you.” That is what my friend from North Carolina proposes, and it is not only legitimate, but it is in accordance with a principle which is now on your statute-book, which has stood there from the foundation of the Government, and has been practiced by all nations wherever commerce has existed. If you give the postages, and she gives a subvention, you cannot run on an equality, but if you tax her mails to the extent of the subvention, you break them down, or bring us on an equality, and that is the object of the Senator from North Carolina, and it is a sound object. I do not believe it will be necessary, for I have no doubt that the British Government will not run their steamers into our ports against a discriminating duty. I think they will be willing to run the race fairly; but if not, it is fair to put our own people on an equality in this commerce in letters, by countervailing duties, if necessary. If England has a fleet of a hundred ships to carry merchandise from Liverpool to New York, and gives them a subvention of £100,000, I would discriminate against her. This system of discrimination by one independent nation against another, has been practiced since the world began, and the object is to bring back another nation to the practice of justice and equality in dealings between them. To be sure, it is retaliation, but the effect of it is to show a coequal nation that it had better abandon its unjust policy, and come back to the rule of justice. That is all the amendment of the Senator from North Carolina does.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I must confess that I am not prepared to advocate the initiation of any such policy as this. Let us reflect on it for a moment. It is novel to me. It strikes my mind very unfavorably at the first blush. It is a doubtful question whether lines of steamships can be run as packets, and carry mails between this and the other continent, without subsidies. That question is still untested by experience now. The Government of Great Britain thinks, wisely or unwisely, that it cannot maintain lines of mail steamers without giving a subsidy, or subvention, or contract—the name is nothing—without giving a certain annual sum of money—a fixed sum to the vessels that carry the mails. This Government, up to the present time, has been imitating this policy of Great Britain. Many gentlemen in the Senate think this imitation is injudicious; that the policy of our Government ought to be changed; and because, forsooth, we have changed our ideas on the subject, the matter still being empirical, the proposition is not simply to try a separate policy for ourselves, but to enter into a competition of prohibitive duties with Great Britain, in order to force her to abandon a policy that she deems wise in relation to her own matters. The history of the world tells us no truth, or it tells us this: that any attempt of this kind at interference with the domestic arrangements of a foreign nation must inevitably recoil upon those who attempt the discrimination. You cannot succeed in it. All the rules of political economy point out to you the elements of failure in such a project. If you put these discriminating duties on vessels coming from Great Britain because they have subsidies or subventions, of two things one: either the subsidies will be continued on the English lines despite the great discrimination, because it will be for the interest of Great Britain to keep up its lines notwithstanding your attempt; or if Great Britain by your legislation is induced to retaliating measures, your own steamers will have the same discriminating duties placed upon them when they go abroad.

No man pretends here that the mails are to be carried for nothing. I called the attention of the Senator from North Carolina this morning to what appeared to me to be a mere difference of words. He calls it a subsidy to a steamer when her pay is certain, but it is not a subsidy when she gets full pay, if the amount which she does receive is somewhat uncertain and dependent upon the contingencies of commerce! Now, sir, let us suppose for a moment that upon the average rate, one of these lines of steamers will gather up five or six hundred thousand dollars' worth of postage per annum. Great Britain, in order to establish a line of steamers, deems it essential to contract with the owners of that line, and say in advance, “if you will establish a line we will secure to you about six hundred thousand dollars per annum, and we will take the postages ourselves.” The proposition now, here, is to say to our lines, “you may take the postages; but we will not guaranty you how much they shall be; we will leave them to you, and you shall be subject to all the contingencies of commerce.” If that suits us, well and good; but the proposition of the Senator from North Carolina is, now, to force Great Britain to our way of thinking by discriminating duties. Why, sir, it is plain that such an effort must fail. We cannot succeed in it. I do not see what is to be attained by it.

If by this series of mutual retaliatory duties you finally make it impossible to run mail steamers between the United States and Great Britain, what will be the natural result? That they will be run between Great Britain and her colonies in the North; her lines will stop at Halifax; she will not bring her mails to your ports, but will leave you to have lines of mails steamers on your coast between New York and Halifax, or between Boston and Halifax; or if that be not the result on this side, then the terminus on the other side will be changed, and the lines of steamers will run from Havre here, instead of from Liverpool here; and after all, what will you gain? You will have a series of angry recriminations with Great Britain; you will injure your commerce; you will inflict loss on your own merchants; you will enter on a career to which I see no issue but an ignoble retracing of your steps back to the spot where you are now. Let us do the best we can with our lines, and let Great Britain, to use a vulgar expression, hoe her own row in her own way. Let us cultivate our field and let her cultivate hers, and let us not interfere with her mode of cultivating her own fields. If it pleases her to give large subsidies to her own lines, it is a matter in which we have no right to interfere.

I differ altogether with the ideas of the honorable Senator from North Carolina. Take his own illustration of this morning: if we had a system of free trade between the United States and Great Britain, and it pleased Great Britain, for the purpose of encouraging the manufacture of iron, to give a bounty to her manufacturers of ten dollars per ton, would that be any reason for us to levy a duty on iron on this side of the water, if contrary to the general policy of the country? If so, then we are in a state of vassalage to Great Britain, far exceeding that which existed prior to our Revolution; we are bound to make our legislation at home accord with her legislation abroad. Each nation adopts its own course; each nation protects its own industry in its own way; and so long as we are not interfered with, I hold it to be bad policy, subversive of the true principles of Government, for us to undertake, by legislation here, to interfere with the legislation of Great Britain at home.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I merely rise to suggest to the Senator from Louisiana, that I think he misunderstands my illustration. I say it would be good policy to tax the iron of England in the case I put. I do not think there is a Senator here, except the gentleman from Louisiana, who would not say that if Great Britain chose to give bounties on iron, and brought it here, and were underselling our workmen, we might very reasonably impose a tariff on that, with a view of deriving a revenue into our own Treasury and protecting our own industry, for we should merely get the money that was paid by our Government. I think that is perfectly fair.

I did not rise to make any argument on the question. I think the Senator's ideas of this system of retaliation are wholly imaginary. We pay on letters by our lines twenty-five times—yes fifty times as much as on any other sort of freight, and letters will always be carried. We pay, I do not know how many dollars a pound now on letters carried from this country. Of course they can be carried. It is a mere question how they will be carried, and at what speed. I think with the Senator from Georgia; and if it had not been that I did not wish to weary the Senate, I would have read to-day some statements from some of the leading journals and men in England, to show that they are getting tired of this system, that there is a great outcry against it, because a majority of their lines, most of those engaged in trade, get no subsidy, and are complaining of these enormous ones to the others; but I will not weary the Senate; I presume gentlemen understand the subject.

Mr. SIMMONS. I thought the Senator from North Carolina said this morning that the Cunard contract lasted until 1862.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Until 1862, with the provision that at that time the British Government may terminate it on twelve months' notice; and another provision that at any time after 1850 and the amended contract in 1852, the company may terminate it on twelve months' notice on their paying the British Government $20,000, and compel the British Government to take their ships at a valuation. The company can stop it in twelve months from this time if they choose, and if my proposition were to pass, it would be a question for them to determine whether they would terminate the service at the end of two years or not. The British Government is compelled to take the vessels at a valuation, on the company giving notice of their desire to do so.

Mr. SIMMONS. The difficulty with me, with out any knowledge of what may be the determination of the mail steamship company of England two years in advance, is that at the heel of the session you are attempting to inaugurate a new policy. I do not want to bandy words with the Senator from Georgia about this matter. I think he and I agree pretty generally on this subject. I am not advocating any new contracts of this sort. We have one that lasts two years, the English Government has one that lasts four; and I do not think it wise to interfere with either of them, two years in advance, with the proposition now made, without time to investigate it, or to see what its probable effects will be.

Mr. TOOMBS. This bill interferes with it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It does not interfere with the Collins contract.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, it make an alteration of it.

Mr. SIMMONS. It allows the Postmaster

General to make one with the assent of the parties; and I do not know that that is a great interference, both sides agreeing.

Mr. TOOMBS. Both sides agreeing!

Mr. SIMMONS. It is an alteration, if both choose to make it; and if it is a benefit to both of them, I want to know who will be hurt? But here is the inauguration of a new policy. The Senator from North Carolina three or four times, as an illustration of what he calls a subsidy, talks about our getting rid of the Sound dues, and wants to know if we did not inaugurate a new system there. I am ashamed of the method by which we got rid of them. We made a point on them, and then paid tribute. That is the way we got out of the Sound dues; and I am afraid it will turn out so with this postal arrangement. At any rate, when we undertake to make a system, I should like to have a little more than a night to make it in, and take it deliberately, and see if any better system can be devised, as this certainly has gone along thus far. Now, in regard to this double postage, I should like to know if that is a good way? if it is according to the present notions of the age to tax your own people double in order to bring somebody else to your terms?

Mr. CLINGMAN. The gentleman will see, though, that if we are running other lines, as will be done under the proposition of the Senator from Florida, those lines will get the letters. That is the advantage in it. No man will send a letter by a line on which the postage is double, when he can send it for single postage.

Mr. SIMMONS. If the Senator had done much business he would know that if he had any mercantile transactions with England he could not lose a mail. People must send their letters; they will send them by the British steamers, and then be taxed double, under the Senator's scheme.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is the very reason I have given against the Treasury of the United States paying for the letters of gentlemen. You make those who do not write pay the expense of what is of so much importance to the writers that they cannot wait a mail.

Mr. SIMMONS. I do not suppose that in the original making of this contract, the Congress of the United States had any idea of taxing the Treasury for the benefit of individuals.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir, they had.

Mr. SIMMONS. That was the argument when we reduced the postage to five cents. Why do you not let the mail contractors have the postage between here and Baltimore, and set up a team in opposition to the general mail arrangements of this country? I think the worst policy in the world for the small ports in this country is to let the mail steamers take what postage they can get, inland and ocean. There is but one port can undertake that competition, and that is New York. I should like to know if every steamer that sails from New York would not have a double stipend over any other port in the country. It would carry three fourths of all the letters certainly. I do not mean to go into this question, but here we are, at the heel of the session, and there is no possibility of this taking effect until two years, and why shall we undertake to investigate a question so delicate and difficult as this in the evening, two years before it has got to take place? Next winter would be time enough, I think.

Mr. SEWARD. I cannot but think that the whole effect of this proposition will be to double the rates of ocean postage between this country and Great Britain. After two years the proposition is that we shall raise the postage on letters brought by British carriers double, and in return the British Government will double the rates of postage on letters we carry to them; and then we shall have double the present tax upon knowledge, and upon the commerce of business and affection. That is all; and when we have done that, I suppose we shall somehow or other contrive how to get back again and bring it down to the cheap rates of postage; and my opinion is that the lower the rates of postage the greater advantage to this country as well as to Europe, especially to this country. However, this is a crude idea. We have yet two years to consider the matter, and it is well we have it before us in time for the country to consider it, in time for statesmen and publicists, both in this country and in Europe, to consider it. When brought up then, I shall be prepared to give an intelligent vote. I am not prepared now, and if required to vote, I shall vote against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 11, nays 31; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bright, Brown, Clingman, Fitzpatrick, Green, Houston, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Sidel, and Toombs—11.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hamlin, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Pearce, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—31.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. PUGH. I move to strike out the following clause:

"For transportation of the mails from Panama to California and Oregon, and back, $328,350;"

And in lieu of it, to insert:

For transportation of the mails from Panama to California and Oregon, and back, until the expiration of the present contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in October next, $85,000; and the Postmaster General is hereby directed to contract with Albert G. Sloss for the transportation of the mails after that period, from New Orleans to San Francisco, by the Tehuantepec route, at a compensation not exceeding the income from postages on the mail matter so transported, and to modify the contract made with the said Albert G. Sloss, under the fourth section of the act entitled "An act providing for the building and equipment of four naval steamships," approved March 3, 1847, on such terms as may be practicable, in conformity with the alteration of the service and the distance.

In offering this amendment, my object is to see whether there is any period of time at which we can come to what Senators declare to be the principle they intend to adopt in future. Here is a contract about to expire within a few months from this time, and yet the bill, as it now stands, proceeds sub silentio upon the idea of a continuance of that contract. At the same time, the route by way of Tehuantepec is the only route that is protected by treaty; it is the only route that is secured. You have an absolute power, under the Gadsden treaty, to intervene for the protection of that route. You have sought it in vain from the Governments of Nicaragua and New Granada in regard to the other isthmus routes. The treaties which have been negotiated with them have not been ratified, so far as we know. You are prevented from any efficient control of those routes by the miserable Clayton-Bulwer contrivance that continues in force.

Now, shall we proceed to carry the mail further than it is necessary to be carried, through a route over which you can extend no protection, for the simple purpose of continuing these subsidies, or subventions of which Senators have spoken? There are two or three of these contracts, first from New York and New Orleans to Chagres; then across the isthmus to Panama; then the contract of the Pacific Mail Company from Panama to San Francisco. The contract for carrying the mail from New York and New Orleans to Chagres I understand expires next year. The contract for carrying the mail from Panama to San Francisco expires in October next. If that contract on the Pacific be not continued, you have it in your power to compel the contractor on this side to reduce the distance which he carries the mail, and to reduce the amount of subsidy; and you are paying an enormous sum—whatever they choose to ask—to the Panama railroad.

On the other hand, by the treaty negotiated in 1854, the Mexican Government agreed with you for the protection of a given route, and authorized you to interfere by your own force to protect it whenever she failed to protect it. You have tried to get that same privilege from Nicaragua and New Granada during the past twelve months. Two treaties were signed, called the Cass-Herran and Cass-Yrissari treaties; but instead of ratifying them, and having them sent back to us for action, they have been doctored and tampered with and withheld, and the time of Congress and the time of the country frittered away, and they are not back now at the end of the session, and what for? Is it to keep open the confusion, and compel you to carry your mails to California and Oregon by way of the Isthmus of Panama?

I propose to cut it off, if the Senate will come to the question; I propose to pay these gentlemen to the end of their contract; and then I propose to say to the parties named in the grant ratified by your treaty, or to whoever else may have the legal title, "if you will carry this mail for the income of the postages to San Francisco, you shall have the contract." I cut off the subsidy; and it follows at once—and that is the effect of the last clause of my amendment—that the assignees of the Sloss line, or Sloss himself, having the contract to carry the mail from New York and New Orleans to Chagres, will be compelled to modify his contract, and to reduce the amount you pay him as compensation, because he will then carry the mail to Tehuantepec instead of Chagres. Thus, it will result in an absolute saving to the Government; it will inaugurate the system of which Senators have spoken, of substituting the income from postages instead of subsidy; and it will not only dispense with the subsidy on the Pacific coast, but it will reduce the subsidy, for a year or more, on the Atlantic contract. That, at all events, is the purpose I hope to accomplish.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. PUGH. As I cannot get that, I move to amend the section, by inserting the first sentence of the proposition; and on that I ask the yeas and nays. What I propose now is to insert:

For the transportation of the mails from Panama to California and Oregon, and back, until the expiration of the present contract of the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, in October next, $85,000.

Mr. SEWARD. Is that a distinct proposition?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEWARD. Does it strike out anything in the bill?

Mr. PUGH. Those three lines which I before moved to strike out. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. It appears to me that this amendment provides just this: for carrying the mails from Panama to California and Oregon, and back, until October next. It sustains the existing arrangement until that time; and, after that, leaves us without any provision for carrying any mails, or for paying for them, and makes no substitute, but just strikes out of existence that very important communication between the Atlantic and Pacific coast.

Mr. PUGH. I will state the object of offering the amendment in its present form. Here is a contract about to expire. I wish to test the sentiments of the Senate upon the question whether this contract shall be continued by general words of legislation, or whether it shall be ended. If the Senate carry the amendment, then I shall myself draw up, if no other Senator does, a proposition for continuing the service during the rest of the fiscal year; but I wish to test the question whether this mail contract shall cease or be renewed; and I wish to strip it of any other question as to other parties. It is a simple proposition whether that contract, on the day of its expiration, shall cease, or be renewed.

Mr. SEWARD. It seems to me that the amendment, as presented by the honorable Senator, does not propose any such test whatever. It only proposes that until October next we shall pay for the service, and, of course, that we shall have it; but after that, we shall not have any service at all, because we pay nothing at all.

Mr. PUGH. We shall have another clause put in.

Mr. SEWARD. That is another affair.

Mr. WILSON. It appears to me that this is purely a domestic matter, not a foreign one; and I agree with the Senator from Ohio, that we ought to provide for fulfilling the contract, and we ought then to see if we cannot get this mail carried cheaper. But why strike out this provision? Why not put his amendment in the form of paying this amount of money until October, and then make a new contract, for a less sum if we can? Cannot the Senator put it in that form?

Mr. PUGH. I will explain to the Senator from Massachusetts why I did not do so. My judgment was, that it was better for the United States to abandon that route, which I thought was exposed to a great many troubles, and I was under the apprehension that the first amendment I offered had been rejected by the Senate, because they disliked the other branch as an alternative, some for one reason, some for another; and I do not wish to cumber the first proposition by any argument arising out of the last. If the Senate decide that the contract with the Pacific Mail Steamship Company shall not be renewed in terms, that we shall pay up to the expiration of the contract, and then make a new arrangement, it is open to every Senator to suggest his proposition, either to advertise for proposals on this route or buy another.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I desire to ask whether, under the law as it now exists, the Postmaster General will not be authorized to renew the contract on the Pacific coast if this amendment be not adopted? Is there any law which authorizes him to renew the contract which now exists for carrying the mail on the Pacific coast?

Mr. PUGH. It cannot be otherwise. Here is a gross sum appropriated for the whole year for carrying the mail, and nobody carries it on that route but these parties, at present. They carry it continuously up to the 1st of October, but after that time they have no contract. You give nobody else a chance.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think there is a law authorizing the Postmaster General to act on this subject. The chairman of the Post Office Committee ought to know how that is. I would suggest to the Senator from Ohio that he can get rid of the difficulties by authorizing the Postmaster General to contract for carrying the mail from any point on the Pacific coast that suits him. Let him take the Tehuantepec, or the Nicaragua, or the Honduras, or the Panama route, if he will; give him full range. One thing is very clear; the existing contract for this service expires in October, and it is just as clear as that the sun shines that the service can be done for half the money. Why are you going to continue it for a year longer?

Mr. COLLAMER. Will the gentleman indulge me for a moment? He knows what my views are about advertising for proposals on these routes; but I will merely suggest that the Sloo contract for the line which goes down to Chagres does not run out until next year, and the provision in the bill will bring them both out together.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is only $270,000 in that contract.

Mr. COLLAMER. I desire both these routes to be advertised at the same time.

Mr. TOOMBS. That ought to be done, and I am astonished that the proper Department has not brought it to our notice. These contracts were made before the discovery of gold in California, at very high rates. There was competition on these lines until it was actually bought off, and, as I remarked before, these contractors pay $56,000 a month of your subvention to keep off opposition. If they can afford to do that, I think you can get your mail carried cheaper. When the contract expires, you can get the service done for half the money you pay these people. Mr. Vanderbilt, I recollect, years ago proposed to run the Nicaragua routes for a great deal less money; and I received a letter, the other day, saying that the service would be taken for $250,000 on one side and $300,000 on the other. What I want the Government to do, is to supply mails to California on the best terms, in order to secure good service for the least money. I do not wish to do away with carrying the mails; it is our duty to carry them as long as we keep up the system; but I want them to be carried by those who will do the service cheapest and best. Everybody knows that it can be done for half the money we pay now. Why, then, should we continue thus to waste the public money?

The objection is that the contract on this side has been construed to last for a year longer than the contract on the other. That never had any foundation, in fact; but by adroit legislation, such as we get into bills on nights like this, when we make steam contracts here and nobody knows anything about them. Let me give a brief history of the transactions, to show how that scheme was worked. First, the service from here to Panama, and from Panama to California, was monthly. Then a provision was slipped in some bill making the service semi-monthly on this side. The contractors on the other side came here and told us that the mails were lying in Panama for two weeks; that they were exposed there, and that they ought to be taken to their destination. That argument prevailed, and you agreed to pay for carrying the mails twice a month from Panama to California. We were told, what is the use of having a mail lying in Panama a fortnight? Seeing that there were other routes which were probably cheaper, I, in connection with other gentlemen, insisted that the extra service should be terminated whenever Congress pleased, but by some contrivance, notwithstanding you intended the two lines to meet, your legislation has been construed to continue the line on this side one year longer than the line on the other side, although it was originally one contract to California, made at the same time. The result is, that the parties on the other side now say, "continue our contract for one year; if you do not the other contractors will deliver the mail at Chagres, and you cannot get it carried to California." The object is to get money out of the public Treasury to continue these contracts. One of them, I know, can be terminated at pleasure; for I myself drew up an amendment to that effect, many years ago, in the other House, and it was inserted in the law. I would fulfill the contract to the letter, and give California the full benefit of the mail service. I would throw it open and give it to those who will pass the mail service from some good port on this side to San Francisco in the quickest time, with the greatest speed, and at the least price. That is what I have always advocated. I care nothing about the conflicts in regard to the different routes; I do not know who has got them, nor do I care. This is, however, a matter of great consequence whether you shall continue to pay a subsidy of $900,000 for this purpose, so that they can afford to give a man $600,000 a year not to run. This is a way of managing the public business that is absolutely discreditable to us to suffer it to continue one hour.

Mr. COLLAMER. I agree entirely with gentleman, in the propriety of having this mail service provided for; but to my mind, the difficulty is this: it has been construed (whether there was good foundation for that construction or not, is not now material) that the mail service on this side, under the Sloo contract, lasts a year longer than the contract on the other side, which is the Harris contract. Now, the proposition in the bill is to pay for a year to come. That will bring the two contracts both out. The Harris contract on the Pacific is out in October, and the bill will bring them both out together. What I desire is that this bill should pass, and that a provision should be made just in the manner the Senator from Georgia suggests, and it ought to be made in this bill. It seems to me that the Postmaster General should advertise for proposals for carrying the mail, if you please, from the Atlantic side to California and Oregon; and I think we can get better proposals for carrying it by putting out the whole route from here on both sides together, to begin together, than we can by undertaking to advertise one part one year, and another next year. This is a service that requires a large investment of capital, whether by the same persons who have it now invested, or by Mr. Vanderbilt, or anybody else who does the work. If they can know the whole extent of the route upon both sides, they can calculate as to the amount of capital required altogether, and I think we can get better terms and better proposals than we can by advertising for parts of the route. Therefore, it is my wish that this clause in the bill should pass as it is, paying for this transportation for a year, and then in the same bill provide that within the year the Postmaster General shall receive proposals and make a contract to perform the service, from the Atlantic coast to the Pacific, for a proper number of years, five or ten, or whatever number may be considered proper. I desire no more contracts made by act of Congress with A or B, for a particular sum fixed in the law, but let the Postmaster General advertise for proposals as in regard to other service. I think we can get better terms by advertising for this whole service at the same time. I think, therefore, this appropriation had better stand.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Vermont did not understand the reason why, in the latter branch of my first amendment, I inserted the name of Mr. Sloo. I did that because he was the party whose contract was embraced by our treaty stipulation, and either he, or parties claiming under him in some form or shape, are the only parties, I suppose, that would be entitled to carry the mail across that route. Whatever their rights may be as between themselves, I do not undertake to say, for I do not know. I asked for some information on the subject from the executive department, in answer to specific questions almost two weeks ago, and I have never been honored with any answer.

Mr. COLLAMER. This is the same name, and I take it is the same man who had this contract originally.

Mr. PUGH. It has passed to trustees long since.

Mr. COLLAMER. He has trustees acting in relation to his contract now, from here to Chagres, but they are all the while having law-suits about it, pretty much as the honorable Senator from Georgia said. It has been in chancery within my knowledge for a pretty long while. So, too, there has been a constant quarrel about the condition of his interest in that supposed treaty with Nicaragua. How little or how much his interest is I do not know. He claims it, and claims that he has been wronged. How the true merits of that matter are, I do not know, and I do not care. What I want is that this appropriation shall be made as it is, but that we shall not let this bill pass until some provision is made for putting out proposals for the service in the best and cheapest way.

Mr. HUNTER. We were aware, in the Finance Committee, that the contract on the Pacific terminated in October; but as was said by the Senator from Massachusetts, we thought this was domestic service; it was for carrying the mails from one port in our own country to another, and we are willing to extend it for six months in order that we might get time to arrange the whole system so that the two contracts might expire together. With myself, there was another motive. By that time we can ascertain whether the Tehuantepec route be practicable, and if it be, we can then arrange our system of mail communication with California upon much better and much more advantageous terms; and in order to ascertain that, it is necessary to let some contract run for six months. If we break up the contract in October, I suppose the result will be that the Department will then be required to advertise for a contract for a term of years; and if so, that contract will be made before we know whether the other route will be available.

Taking all things into consideration, it seemed to me best that we should have this contract go on six months longer; and if we add the provision suggested by the Senator from Vermont, that the Postmaster General shall go on and advertise for contracts on both sides during the year, I think it is probable this is the best mode in which the matter can be arranged. If, however, the Senator from Ohio could show that after six months we could get another contract for six months cheaper than this, I would go for his amendment, but not otherwise. Under the circumstances, it seems to me the best thing we can do is to let this contract run until the expiration of the fiscal year, and in the mean time make provision for the other; for if it should turn out that the Tehuantepec route is practicable, we certainly can make a cheaper and much better mail communication in that direction, than on the old line.

Mr. GWIN. If the policy of conveying the mails to the Pacific coast is to be continued, there ought to be three routes instead of one. At present but one route is open for transportation. The transit route by Nicaragua has been closed for some years, caused by the revolutions in that country, and the contest of speculators for the route. It is not yet known whether there can be a transit route established across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec with suitable ports for steamships, on the Atlantic and Pacific. The only reason that induces me to acquiesce in carrying the mails by Panama longer than next October, is because we have no other isthmus route that is open and fit to transmit mails and passengers. I hope in a few months the Nicaragua route will be open, and the experiment will be made, whether Tehuantepec can be made a transit route; and then I am in favor of having the mails carried on each route, and that the contracts should be given to the lowest bidders. I am utterly opposed to the renewal of either of the present contracts, on this or the other side of the Isthmus of Panama. I want competition on those routes, with a separate and distinct contract on each, to break up the monopoly that now exists, and which is so odious to my constituents. I have no doubt that contracts can be made to carry the mails on the three isthmus routes, semi-monthly, for the same amount we are now paying for the transportation of the mails by Panama, if free competition is invited, and the contracts given to the lowest bidder, and I will never agree to any other mode of making contracts.

I hope, and believe, that all the routes will be open within a few months, and that by the next session we can authorize the mails to be carried on each, under contracts to the lowest bidders; and for that reason I shall not oppose the present appropriation.

Mr. BRODERICK. If the Senator from Ohio insists on his amendment, I hope he will make some provision by which the Postmaster General can enter into a new contract in October next; for if the present contract expires, I suppose we shall be without any mail facilities until Congress meets again. I am myself in favor of giving this service to the lowest bidder.

Mr. PUGH. I will state that the reason why I did not propose it was, that I saw, of course, such a proposition must be made, if this amendment carried, and it would be better for Senators variously to present their propositions, and let the Senate adopt whatever one it preferred. If we do not cover up the period after adopting my amendment, if it be adopted, no doubt we shall have to go back and reconsider it.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then I should like the Senator to give me some security that it would pass the other House. I do not wish, by my vote, to prevent any mail communication between the Atlantic States and California. I am free to say that I am willing to give this service to the lowest bidder, and I believe that the Government is now paying an exorbitant price for carrying this mail; but I do not want to place myself in a false position by voting to destroy a contract without making some provision for a new one. If the Senator will make any provision, so that the Postmaster General can enter into a new contract in October next, I shall have no objection to his amendment; but I want some security beforehand in this respect.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I wish to say a word. It appears to me that this matter is in a nutshell. The mail is to be carried to San Francisco. By the contract, as it now stands, it must go to Panama until the 1st of October, next year. The mail on the other side connects with the mail on this side, under existing contracts. The contract for that purpose expires on the 1st of October next. It would be a very good plan, then, to stop the present contract on the other side on the 1st of October next, and put it out to a new contractor for a brief time; but, as the Senator from Virginia has well observed, by the time we meet here again next winter, the experiment, whether or not a mail can be carried across the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, will have been solved, and then we shall know whether we want to continue the line of communication by Panama to San Francisco at the present enormous rates, or whether we shall confine the California mail to the Tehuantepec Isthmus at half the present rates. All this is matter dependent entirely on the success of carrying the mails by Tehuantepec.

Under these circumstances, it seems to me obvious that it will not do to jeopard the present communication with San Francisco. If you put up the service on the other side now at auction, nobody will bid for it for one year. If you offer it for more than a year you bind yourself to keep it there, when at the end of the year you may want to move it. For that reason it is obviously our better policy to let matters stand as they are for twelve months. In the mean time Congress meets again, and we shall ascertain how things stand. I think, therefore, we had better let the bill remain as it is in this respect, and make the provision the Senator from Vermont alludes to next winter. We shall then have the whole subject before us, with a certainty of what we are about. If you advertise the contract on the other side for a single year from October next you will get no bidders. Advertise it for a term of years and you bind yourself to keep the mails just there, whether it suits you or not. You had better let it alone for twelve months.

Mr. PUGH. I will withdraw the amendment if there be no objection, if the Senator from Vermont will offer the proposition he has suggested, so that we can have full information at the next session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART.) If there be no objection, the Senator may withdraw his amendment. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. COLLAMER. After the suggestions in relation to the Tehuantepec route, I do not see any reason why we may not safely let the matter rest as it is, until the next session, and then make our provision for offering proposals.

Several Senators. That is better.

Mr. YULEE. That was the view of the Post Office Committee. We discussed the propriety of moving an amendment to this bill directing an advertisement such as has been suggested by the Senator from Vermont; but the conclusion of the committee was that it would be better to reserve it until the next session.

Mr. KING. I desire to offer an amendment: And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any steamship or other contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than four years.

Mr. YULEE. I hope the Senator will not press that amendment; or, at all events, will extend the time to six years. The difficulty about carrying out on the ocean the practice of the Government upon land, of making mail contracts for four years—is, that the establishment of lines of steamers, such as are necessary for transatlantic service, requires an investment of capital which may not be invited by a contract for four years. I think it is better that this point should be left to the discretion of the Department. What matters it if the contract is made for one hundred years, if it be on the condition that they shall charge no more than we receive from postages? The longer the better; but the great point is to establish in the public mind a conviction, an assurance of certainty and regularity. To obtain certainty and regularity is the great point. Whenever we do that, we shall have our full share of postages. It is because the Cunard line has been regular and reliable, and our lines have not been, that it has taken the main bulk of the mail matter and we have not. For four years I do not think the Post Office Department will be able successfully to establish a line. They will certainly for ten years; for six years they may and probably will; but for four years I think they cannot. I hope, if the Senator insists on any amendment, he will make it six years; but I would prefer to leave it to the discretion of the Department.

Mr. KING. I offered the amendment because of the provision which was adopted by the Senate, to which the Senator from Florida has alluded. I assented to it with the intention of offering a proposition limiting the term of the contracts. The provision we have adopted in relation to oceanic contracts between us and European ports is unlimited. I think contracts of ten or twenty years, or for unlimited periods, ought not to be made. The contracts now existing with steamships, which have produced so much trouble to us, were made by Congress for a period of ten years. In my opinion contracts upon the sea can be made as well in the ordinary way by advertisement, as contracts over our roads, where railroads are required to carry the mails, in which a vastly larger expenditure of money is required, than in the establishment of a steamship line. The steam marine of the country is increasing, and we shall soon have the benefit of competition. My opinion is that we should certainly have a limitation, and I have named four years as the time which I think is the best period. That is the ordinary period of our mail contracts. I think we should have stated periods for competition.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended. The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the amendments which have been made by the Senate acting as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PUGH. Let us have a separate vote on the Collins amendment.

Mr. TOOMBS. I want a separate vote on all these amendments. There was a very thin Senate—but four over a quorum on some of them. I think some of the amendments are so bad that we had better have another chance on all of them.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question will be taken separately on the amendments.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator refers to the amendments of the Committee on Finance.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the first amendment reported from the Committee on Finance, and which was adopted in Committee of the Whole, to strike out the following clause:

“For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, $346,500; and it is hereby provided that there be paid to the Post Office Department, out of said appropriation, such sums as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, on such days as the Collins line may fail to take them from New York;”

and in lieu of it to insert:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, in pursuance of the contract with E. K. Collins and others, $346,500: And it is hereby provided, That for such days as the said Collins and others shall fail to perform said service, the Postmaster General is authorized to contract with the owner or owners of any other steam vessel or vessels to perform said service, by transporting the mails from such port in the United States to such port in Great Britain as he may select, and pay therefor a sum equal to the amount of ocean and inland postages received by the United States. And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton.

Mr. HUNTER. I would suggest to the Senator from Georgia, that it would be better to move to strike out from that amendment the last three lines:

“And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton.”

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to strike out that clause; and if that fails, I should prefer the House original bill in that respect to the Senate amendment. I see no reason, if we are going to give this advantage to Mr. Collins, as we are going to alter the contract, why we should not put in something on our side. Why not take money enough for his failures out of his contract price to supply the mail when he will not carry it? and the House bill is that much better than the amendment, unless these three lines be stricken out. I ask the yeas and nays on my motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. If it be desirable, as seems to be professed by many, that we should secure a weekly line (as I know the Department desires) of our own to Europe, it can be secured by having Mr. Collins's line end at Southampton; that is, go from here to Southampton twice a month, filling up the weeks when the Bremen and Havre lines do not run. By that means we can get a weekly line of our own from here to Europe. If Mr. Collins, or those people who own his line, can receive for going to Southampton what they now get for going to Liverpool, twice a month, they will run there; and, by having those other lines run twice a month for the postages you secure a weekly communication. If the provision be stricken out allowing Mr. Collins to go to Southampton, we never can have a weekly line.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think from the ideas and allusions of the Senator from Vermont, that these people do not want a weekly line at all.

Mr. COLLAMER. I spoke of what I understood the Department wants, what it desires to effect.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Department has not recommended this amendment, that I know of. If a weekly line is desirable, and we can get it for the postages, we can get rid of the difference between $387,000 and the postages. As Mr. Collins has not complied with his contract, we leave him to carry the mail to Liverpool, if he chooses, and pay him the $387,000; and if he does not do it, if we can carry it once a month for the postages, we may, according to the gentleman's idea, carry it every week.

Mr. COLLAMER. No; I say if Mr. Collins can have his line to Southampton for what he gets for running to Liverpool, nearly four hundred thousand dollars, he may make a weekly line, taking his contract price for two trips a month, and the postages for the other two. He may afford to do that.

Mr. TOOMBS. We have got a good contractor, as we are informed by the Department, to go to Southampton for the postages. Mr. Collins has not turned a paddle in six months, although he could get his $387,000 if he had. Now, why do you want to throw money into his hands to enable him to drive off the others? Is he the contractor you want? You say he is not obliged to perform his contract; he is not compelled to run a trip at all; only, if he does not run, you do not pay; and it is a question for Mr. Collins to decide whether you have a mail to Europe or not, according to the decision made on his contract. I say let the lines to Havre and Bremen and Southampton alone; let them get the postages; but if you allow Collins to go there, I have no doubt the object of Mr. Collins is to sell out to them, probably for an annuity of $200,000 a year; for they can better afford to take $187,000 than run for the postages.

Mr. PUGH. If I understand the Senator from Vermont, what is proposed to be done now is worse than anything that has been done before. We made a contract with Mr. Collins to carry the mail from New York to Liverpool for a certain sum of money. Now, he does not want to carry it; he gave us notice of that. My impression is, that you yourself, sir, (Mr. STUART in the chair,) presented his petition to the Senate a year ago, giving us notice that he would not perform the contract. He renounced it as completely as any man ever renounced a contract, and he could not recover upon it against an individual in any court of justice. There was never as complete a renunciation of a contract by any man; and what then? His ships, we are told by the papers, have been sold by the sheriff. He not only does not turn any paddle, but he has no paddle to turn. If the truth is told in the papers, he has been sold out under the hammer. If it is collusion, if it has been done with the intention to force Congress to give him more money, he ought not to be tolerated at all. If it is in earnest, if he has become insolvent under the contract, why do we fool ourselves any more by legislating upon the footing of the Collins contract?

In my judgment, the contract ought to be ignored from the beginning to the end of it. It is forfeited; it is renounced; it is abandoned. But, now, what is the idea? It is said to be a bad contract from New York to Liverpool at this enormous sum of money; and it is proposed to let Mr. Collins, or somebody who buys Mr. Collins out, run the line to Southampton for the same money and for the postages together; and he will thus get more than he had before. That is only doing what we gave notice two years ago we would not do; and that is, increase the subsidy. We gave him notice two years ago that we would stop the increased subsidy. We sat up until long past this hour in the night to decide it, and we voted on it again and again, and we thought we were rid of it; but now it comes up in another shape.

It is my opinion that the whole of it is a contrivance to revive the Collins subsidy in another shape. I do not see any necessity for this weekly line to Southampton. We have lived without it; and I do not understand, if Mr. Collins cannot carry the mails to Liverpool for this money, how he is going to take them to Southampton, unless he is going to interfere with somebody else, or sell out to somebody else. I thought he was going to interfere; the Senator from Georgia says he is going to sell out; I do not know which it is: either is objectionable. I do not believe in his contract at all; and I do not intend to vote to appropriate any money for his contract. I believe it is forfeited; and I believe the Post Office Department ought not to have recognized him as a contractor, but forfeited his contract. Let him go to the Court of Claims; they will give him a judgment, if he can come within gunshot of a case, and we can then discuss it; but as for this proposition to let him change the termination of his journey from Liverpool to Southampton, it will accomplish one of two things: he will either drive off an honest contractor, or he will sell out. This is to be done to benefit a contractor who has never kept his contract; who, if the truth is now told, cannot keep his contract; whose ships have been sold; who has circulated written notices that he would not perform it longer, or revive it at all.

It seems to me that Congress ought to have some sense of self-respect. These things are always brought up at the heel of the session. We never get hold of them at any other time. We can never get a chance at them at any other time, and I suppose it will be now as before; you will let him run on another year, and at the end of next year we shall be told that it is the heel of the session again. As I had not an opportunity of voting before, I want this opportunity to record my vote against any further recognition of the Collins contract in any shape or form.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope we shall get a vote on this contested question. There are some Senators who have spent very little part of the day here; but of those who spent any part of the day in the Senate, I think there is no one who does not understand this particular point. I am satisfied about it myself. I believe it to be so great an outrage that, though I have never been in the habit of voting against appropriation bills, I shall certainly vote against this one if the proposition be put on. But, without going into the merits of the proposition, regarding it as an outrage on common sense and fair play, I feel bound to vote against it. I hope we shall get the question, and have the privilege of voting.

The question being taken on Mr. TOOMBS's motion to strike out, by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 27; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bigler, Clingman, Douglas, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, and Toombs—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Iverson, Kennedy, King, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—27.

So the motion was not agreed to; and the question recurred on concurring in the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PUGH called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

Mr. TOOMBS. According to the construction of the contract of Mr. Collins, which this amendment alters or may alter, in aid and favor of him, he is not compelled to carry this mail at all; and if he does not carry it there is no penalty whatever. Every other mail contractor, if he fails to carry the mail, is subject to a penalty. I move to strike out so much of this amendment as allows that, and to provide that if Collins fails to carry out his contract, the Postmaster General may employ another person to do it, and take the price out of Collins's money. Now, according to the amendment of the Finance Committee, those who may do the service in the place of Collins will receive only the postage. I should like to know why that distinction was made? I should like my friend from Virginia to tell me why, when Mr. Collins carries the mail, you are to pay him $19,000 a month, and if he does not do it, whoever does it is to get only the postage?

Mr. HUNTER. It is obvious, because it has been decided that if he does not comply with his contract he only loses the money for the trip he omits to make, and he gets the money for every trip he performs. Then how could you take it out of his money? We had to provide in some way for filling up the vacuum.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is wholly mistaken. The amendment is for altering the contract; and I say when you are altering the contract and giving the contractor a beneficial advantage, you ought to do something to benefit the Government at the same time. That is all I ask. You say by this amendment that the Postmaster General, if he pleases, may allow Collins to run to Southampton. That is an alteration of the contract. If we are to alter the contract, I wish to provide that whoever carries the mails when Collins fails to do it, shall be paid out of his money. I propose, therefore, to amend the amendment by striking out the words "and pay therefor a sum equal to the amount of ocean and inland postages received by the United States."

Mr. COLLAMER. The Senator wishes to take the House bill on that point. The House bill is right in that respect.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think so; but I cannot get the House bill.

Mr. PUGH. Vote down this amendment and then the clause in the House bill stands.

Mr. TOOMBS. But a majority of the Senate is in favor of making this alteration for the benefit of Collins; and when you are doing that, I want to put some limitation on it so that we may get some benefit from the contract.

Mr. COLLAMER. Perhaps the Senator's object can be accomplished by taking the amendment, as it has been adopted in Committee of the Whole, and inserting after the first clause making the appropriation, this proviso:

Provided, That there be paid to the Post Office Department, out of such appropriation, such sum as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool and back, on such days as Collins shall fail to take them.

That is substantially the provision of the House bill. We agree to pay Mr. Collins so much, whether he goes to Liverpool or Southampton. Now, let us provide that in case he fails to take the mails, the same amount which he would receive for carrying them shall be appropriated to the Post Office Department, to enable them to pay for hiring substitutes—that is, to take his money and pay it to those who rendered the service.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Does not the Senator see that the result of that will be that Collins will only have to have ready a very inferior style of vessels which will carry the mail? He will not carry it; but he will have other vessels to take the place of his vessels, and get the full price. That, I presume, was what the Finance Committee wanted to guard against by providing that when the Postmaster General had to replace a Collins steamer by some other steamer, that other steamer which replaced the Collins steamer should not have full pay, but should only have the postages; so as to prevent Collins from acting in concert with somebody else, and putting on inferior steamers and getting full pay.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is nothing in the objection of the Senator from Louisiana, unless he supposes that Postmaster General Brown would collude with Collins, go in collusion with him. If he is in we are gone anyhow under your contract. If he joins these people, you cannot protect the Treasury against them. If you give him authority to get a substitute, I presume he will get one. I do not think we ought to legislate on the ground that he is in collusion with Collins. I do not suppose he is.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am perfectly willing to put in the provision of the House bill, in this respect, if gentlemen think it will confine Collins closer; but in my opinion the Committee on Finance have been more rigid than the House bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. If the amendment be adopted now as it is, if Mr. Collins does not go they cannot hire others for the mere postages.

Mr. TOOMBS. To accommodate gentlemen, I will modify my amendment. I move to strike out of the amendment of the Committee on Finance, the words, "and pay therefor a sum equal to the amount of ocean and inland postages received by the United States," and insert in their place, "and that the cost thereof be deducted from any amount which may be due to E. K. Collins & Company."

Mr. SEWARD. I see no objection to that.

Mr. KING. He does not get any pay, if he fails to perform the trip. His pay is higher than the postages.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to my friend from Georgia that perhaps he is not accomplishing his own object by this amendment. According to the House provision, with the interpretation which is given at the Department to the contract, Collins is obliged to get pay for all the service he performs, all the trips he makes. Well, the difference between what is paid to him for the trips he makes and this entire appropriation the Department can, if it chooses, give to some one else. The amendment of the committee was designed to confine that pay to the postages, and not let full pay be given to some one else. It was designed to introduce the postage principle, as far as it was possible to do so.

Mr. TOOMBS. But I want it deducted from the amount due Mr. Collins from the amount he earns afterwards.

Mr. HUNTER. It will not be so interpreted at the Department.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator knows more about departmental construction than I do. I know it will be construed most favorably to contractors.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not say that; but I mean to say that I presume, from the interpretation which has already been given to the contract, that it will be only taken out of the money which is given during the year—that portion which Collins did not earn.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will accept any good suggestion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Perhaps the amendment had better be read as modified, to see what construction it would properly bear. The amendment is to strike out the words "and pay therefor a sum equal to the amount of ocean and inland postages received by the United States," and insert:

And that the cost thereof be deducted from any amount which may be due, or which may become due, to E. K. Collins & Company for services actually performed.

Mr. HUNTER. That will do.

Mr. SEWARD. I have no objection to that. The amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the first amendment made as in Committee of the Whole, with the amendment to it which has just been agreed to.

Mr. TOOMBS. I prefer the House provision to the Senate amendment, as amended.

Mr. POLK. I wish to ask the Senator from Georgia if I understood the drift of his amendment, which has just been carried? It puts the Senate's amendment on the same footing, substantially, as the original section as it came from the House.

Mr. TOOMBS. It does, with the exception of the last clause. I am against that.

Mr. POLK. That is the Southampton clause.

Mr. SEWARD. The question is now upon adopting the amendment recommended by the Committee on Finance, as amended by the honorable Senator from Georgia. If we accept the amendment as thus amended, then Mr. Collins will not have the privilege of stopping at Southampton, if the Postmaster General shall not think it consistent with the public interest; and inasmuch as the Senate has voted, by 19 to 27, that this provision ought to be granted, those who were of that opinion I hope will not vote against this amendment, which leaves the provision they desire to secure. It does not otherwise differ from the House bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered, and taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bright, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Pearce, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bigler, Brown, Clingman, Colamer, Douglas, Fitch, Green, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—23.

So the amendment was concurred in.

The words inserted are:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, in pursuance of the contract with E. K. Collins and others, $346,500. And it is hereby provided, That, for such days as the said Collins and others shall fail to perform said service, the Postmaster General is authorized to contract with the owner or owners of any other steam vessel or vessels to perform said service, by transporting the mails from such port in the United States, to such port in Great Britain as he may select, and that the cost thereof be deducted from any amount which may be due, or may become due, to E. K. Collins & Company for services actually performed. And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton.

The next amendment made as in Committee of the Whole was, to strike out:

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It was only the amendments of the Committee on Finance on which separate votes were required. The others were agreed to without much objection.

Mr. STUART. None of them have been agreed to in the Senate yet.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I ask that the question be taken generally.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have finished the amendments reported by the Committee on Finance. Shall the others be voted on together? ["All together!"] The Chair will put the vote on the remaining amendments together.

The amendments were concurred in.

Mr. KING. I now renew the amendment which I offered in committee, making the term five years instead of four, as the limitation of the contract:

And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any steamship or other contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than five years.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. I ask for a division on that vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The vote was emphatic, and the Chair announced it.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not think the question was understood.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair can only state that the question was distinctly put, and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to reconsider the vote, though I shall vote the same way as before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to Senators that the amendment was distinctly read and the Chair took the question slowly. It is not the fault of the officers of the Senate if the question is not understood.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. GREEN. I paired off, an hour since, with the Senator from New Hampshire, Mr. CLARK, who was unwell, and desired to go home.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Dixon, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Iverson, Kennedy, Pearce, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Cameron, Clingman, Green, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—21.

So the bill was passed.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bill and joint resolution from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles and referred as indicated below:

A bill (No. 319) for the relief of Benjamin Sayre—to the Committee on Claims; and

A joint resolution (No. 9) authorizing the Postmaster General to revise and adjust the accounts of Harris & Morgan on principles of justice and equity—to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

WILLIAM S. BRADFORD.

The bill (H. R. No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that that bill may be put on its passage immediately; and if the Senate will indulge me for a quarter of a minute—it will not take more, I can state the case. The bill was prepared by General Quitman, of Mississippi, for the relief of William S. Bradford. I have known him for twenty-five years. He enlisted in the Army about twenty-five years ago. He was in the Army for over twenty years. At one of the battles in Mexico, he received a bullet wound through the left lung, and was promoted to a lieutenantcy for his gallantry. He was a sergeant, and was promoted to a lieutenantcy. He afterwards resigned his commission on account of ill health. Subsequently recovering, he enlisted again in the ranks; and while a private, was stricken down, and is now sick with consumption, and will not live a year.

Mr. HUNTER. We can pass it in the morning hour to-morrow.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is it the pleasure of the Senate that the bill shall be read for information?

Several SENATORS. Let it be read.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope not. I object to it.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that it be referred to the Committee on Pensions.

It was so referred.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the fourth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, eleventh, twelfth, and thirteenth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; it agrees to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate with an amendment, in which it requests the concurrence of the Senate; and it disagrees to the first, second, third, fifth, and tenth amendments of the Senate to the said bill.

TIMOTHY L. O'KEEFFEE.

Mr. POLK. I wish to occupy the attention of the Senate for a moment with a privileged question. I move a reconsideration of the vote of the Senate indefinitely postponing the House bill for the relief of Timothy L. O'Keefee. I will state to the Senate that I make the application under these circumstances. The bill was indefinitely postponed on Friday, but was reported to the House of Representatives, from which it came, as having been passed by the Senate by some mistake.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. STUART in the chair.) The Chair will say to the Senator that the whole difficulty is corrected by a resolution which was passed this morning.

Mr. POLK. What I wish—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that the bill has gone to the House of Representatives with a correct report.

Mr. POLK. Now I desire to move a reconsideration, under the circumstances, because the bill did not come back until after the error was corrected in the House, the bill having originated there, and passed there. I wish to submit a motion for reconsideration.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Chair understand that the Senator desires to reconsider the bill as it finally passed the Senate to-day on the correct report?

Mr. POLK. I do not so understand.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The whole difficulty that existed was corrected this morning by resolutions between the two Houses, the enrolled bill being brought back and canceled, and a correct report of the Senate's action being made to the House of Representatives.

Mr. GREEN. What is the correct report that was made?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the bill was indefinitely postponed.

Mr. POLK. If the report is that it was indefinitely postponed to-day, whence that action takes date, then I have nothing to do but to enter a motion to reconsider that action.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think I understand the Senator, and he has no right to reconsider it under the rules of the Senate at all. A mistake of the Clerk in reporting our action does not affect our rules. The Senator stated that this bill was indefinitely postponed, in fact, last Friday. Then more than the time allowed for reconsideration has passed. I do not see how the Clerk's having sent a wrong report can affect the rules of the Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If the Senator desires to have his motion entered, the question of the right to make it may be reserved and decided at a subsequent time. I think there will be no objection to that.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is a question now whether there is a right to enter the motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If objected to, the Chair thinks it is too late to make it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object to it.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to take up the Indian deficiency bill, which was laid aside by common consent this morning, to enable the Senator from Arkansas to prepare an amendment.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 555) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858.

Mr. HUNTER. This bill is out of committee, and in the Senate; but it is still open to amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope not.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill is in the Senate, and is now ready to be read the third time, if no amendment be offered.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. The bill was passed over informally by general consent, to enable me to offer an amendment, which escaped by inadvertence. I send it to the Chair:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby, authorized to appoint a commissioner or commissioners, not exceeding three, with authority to proceed to New Mexico and investigate the alleged claims for Indian depredations upon citizens of New Mexico, under such regulations as he may prescribe, and report the same to Congress.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope this will not be done. I hope we shall not appoint a commission now to go and examine into these claims.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. This is a proposition which has, I must confess, been brought unsuccessfully some two or three times before the Senate, and my convictions are equally as strong of the propriety of it now as heretofore. It has always encountered the opposition of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator from Arkansas give way for a motion to adjourn? ["Oh, no."]

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I will say to the Senator from New York that I am bound by an understanding with the Senator from Virginia, who was kind enough to lay this bill aside for me, to try to have it disposed of to-day. I was speaking of the necessity of this case. We have nothing now to do with the origin of the claims. It is sufficient to say that these claims are now upon us, and they amount, according to the report of the Secretary of the Interior, already to $500,000, most of them based on very slight evidence. This is a precautionary measure, advised by the Secretary of the Interior, and urgently pressed by him now, for the purpose of protecting the Government against these claims when they become stale, and when the evidence on the part of the Government will have been lost, or rather the opportunity of collecting it together will have gone by.

Under a resolution of Congress, at the last session, the Commissioner of Indian Affairs was authorized to investigate and classify these claims; and, according to a report which I have on my table, the claims, as already filed in the Indian office, amount to something over half a million dollars. But a small amount of them, to be sure, are reported as good. The others, however, do not die, but will be coming in upon us; and I think, myself, it is proper to send out a commission of persons, not connected by ties of interest or of any other character with the people of the country, who will investigate the matter, and have authority to bring witnesses before them, and ascertain which of these claims are well founded and which are not.

The amendment does not propose to involve the country in a new expenditure, but anticipates the dangers of the future and provides against the accumulation of these claims while there is yet time to do so. This is the necessity which has led me to the conviction that this provision is absolutely necessary. It involves the appointment of one or two commissioners at some expense, and I know, therefore, is unpalatable to the Senate; but that does not change my convictions as to the necessity of it. I have therefore felt bound, in justice to the convictions of the Secretary, and the urgent importunities of the Delegate, to present it to the Senate for their consideration. I shall not argue it at length. I have merely stated the facts.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the question will be taken. Let us decide it.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I have another amendment:

And be it further enacted, That in executing process in the Indian country, the marshal be authorized to employ a posse comitatus, not exceeding three persons, in any of the States respectively, to assist in executing process by arresting and bringing in prisoners from the Indian country; and to allow them three dollars per diem in lieu of all expenses and services.

The existing law authorizes the marshal to employ guards after an arrest has been made. The weakness of the law consists in this, that he is not authorized to employ guards in making an arrest—a species of security more necessary before than after an arrest is made. It is the invariable experience of the marshal in the Indian country west of Arkansas that it is impossible to get Indians as a posse to assist in arresting one another, and the consequence is, that writs are often evaded, and the boldest and most defiant criminals go unarrested because of the want of assistants in the country to arrest them.

The marshal represents—and I have no doubt truly—that, to make the process effectual, they must have the right to summon one, two, or three assistants, in the States, to aid him in making an arrest. The difficulty in guarding afterwards is but a small matter, compared with the necessity of having assistants to make the arrest. Many of the worst offenders there have gone unarrested, because of the want of the assistance of white men in the Indian country. It is very rare that you can get Indians to assist in making arrests of one another. I would have attempted to put this on another bill; but as it pertains to the Indian bill, and is to carry out the intercourse laws, it ought to pass here.

Mr. HUNTER. No doubt it is very good legislation, but it only makes weary work for the conference committees. The other House rejects everything of this sort. In the miscellaneous bill they have swept out everything that looked like legislation.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have an amendment to offer which is very important to the security of the frontier of Texas:

And be it further enacted, That the superintendent and agents within the superintendency of Texas shall be hereafter appointed in the same manner as other superintendents and agents are appointed and confirmed; and that the Wichita agency is hereby attached to the superintendency of Texas.

I do not intend to make any statement unless it becomes necessary. In the first place, our agencies heretofore have been temporary in their character, or, rather, special agencies. They have not the same character and position throughout the country, and the same influence, as if they were appointed, like other agents, by nomination to, and confirmation by, the Senate. The Wichita agency is now within the limits of that portion of country ceded by the Choctaws and Chickasaws for the purpose of a reservation, lying between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degrees of west longitude. They are contiguous to, and immediately upon, the borders of Texas. They are bordered on the east and north by the Chickasaw and Choctaw nations of Indians. The superintendency to which they have heretofore been attached is at Fort Smith, entirely disconnected from these Indians. They have not had an agent residing amongst them. They are two hundred and fifty miles from the superintendency in Arkansas, with an Indian territory intervening between the superintendency; and though of different tribes, they are only about one hundred and thirty miles from the Texas superintendency. They have intercourse with our Indians, are intermarried with them, and they have no connection with the civilized tribes within the limits of the Indian country attached to the Arkansas superintendency.

For that reason it is thought best that they should be connected with our superintendency. It will, to be sure, increase the trouble of the superintendent, but it will add no perquisites to him, and will not be profitable; the effect will only be to enable him to exercise a control over those tribes which annoy us very much, and extend his influence and the influence of the Indians on the reservation to them, and be of great aid in preserving peace. There is no other object than this in the application that is made.

For the information of the Senate, I will say that my late colleague, General Rusk, applied to the Indian department; and, after the adjournment of the last Congress, he obtained an order from the Secretary of the Interior to attach these Indians to the Texas superintendency, and bring them within the control of the superintendent of the Texas Indians.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will ask the Senator if he is particular in this statement; if what he now says he knows of his own knowledge to be true? Does he know that any such order ever did exist; and if so, why is it not still in force?

Mr. HOUSTON. General Rusk did not tell me so that I recollect. It occurs to me it was mentioned; but whether he did or not, I know not. I heard it asserted and I never heard it contradicted, and I presume the Secretary of the Interior will not gainsay aught that I have said. Previous to my leaving here, General Rusk, who remained ten days after the close of the session, assured me that it would be done, and must be done, or our frontiers would be broken up; and I took it for granted, from these facts, that it was done, hearing that it was.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator, I am sure, knows that I would not unnecessarily interrupt him in his statement; but I have a personal knowledge in regard to what he states. I went to see General Rusk when this matter was commenced at the beginning. In conversation with General Rusk, I explained to him that this region was a portion of the country which pertained to the southern superintendency. Upon explaining the facts to him, though he, previous to that time, intended to recommend some man from his own State to the Wichita agency, he yielded that matter, and I had a man appointed, and there was no further difficulty; the agency was kept within the southern superintendency, and I have never heard of any period when it was not so. I know that I had that conversation with General Rusk himself. He said, on the statement which I made of the fact that it was within the country which belonged to the southern superintendency, that he had no more to say in regard to the matter. I know of no more generous and unselfish man than he was, and this passage took place just before we parted at the close of the last session.

Mr. HOUSTON. I see it will take a greater time to explain this matter and bring it to the fair understanding of the Senate than I am disposed to occupy at this late hour. It is nine o'clock, and I would prefer that we should adjourn until to-morrow morning.

Mr. POLK. I move that the Senate adjourn. I will state to the Senate that I have learned privately, from the Senator who has offered the amendment, that he is very much exhausted. He has been here all day long, and eaten nothing since he ate his breakfast.

Mr. HUNTER. We are all exhausted; but we ought to finish this bill.

Mr. POLK. We are not all as far advanced in life as the honorable Senator from Texas.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope we shall not adjourn, though I am opposed to the amendment.

Mr. HUNTER called for the yeas and nays on the motion, and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 21, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Douglas, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Polk, Reid, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Sliedell, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, Wright, and Yates—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Dixon, Fitch, Foot, Green, Gwin, Hamlin, Hammond, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Pugh, Sebastian, Thomson of New Jersey, and Toombs—15.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

WEDNESDAY, June 9, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m. Prayer by Rev. J. L. ELLIOTT.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

MEMORIAL OF JUDGE WATROUS.

The SPEAKER. The Chair asks leave to present the memorial of Judge John C. Watrous, of Texas, in reference to his impeachment. If there be no objection, it will be laid upon the table, and printed.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not suppose that that communication can be received by the House and ordered to be printed in this irregular way.

Mr. CRAIG, of North Carolina. I suppose it can be. This is exactly following out the precedent in the case of Judge Peck. After the committee had ordered the impeachment of Judge Peck, he was heard by memorial, just as Judge Watrous now asks to be heard.

Mr. CHAPMAN. That was a very different case. Judge Peck was not heard before the committee; but, in this instance, the Committee on the Judiciary examined witnesses in behalf of Judge Watrous, as well as witnesses in behalf of the memorialists. He was fully heard there, and he now asks to have his memorial submitted to the House. The cases of Judge Peck and Judge Watrous are not parallel.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the communication of Judge Watrous accompanying the memorial.

The Clerk read the communication, as follows:

WASHINGTON, June 8, 1858.

SIR: I beg of you the favor to lay before the House, in my behalf, the accompanying memorial.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, your obedient servant,
JOHN C. WATROUS.
Hon. JAMES L. ORR, Speaker House of Representatives.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I will ask, what evils can result to the country from hearing Judge Watrous in this mode? It is in accordance with the precedent in the case of Judge Peck; and it is but fair to the accused that, before he is put upon his trial, he should be heard at the bar. It may be true that this matter was investigated before the Committee on the Judiciary; but it is not true that Judge Watrous was allowed to summon what witnesses he pleased. Many witnesses whom he desired to call were excluded by the committee, and were not permitted to be heard.

The SPEAKER. If there is any objection to the memorial, it cannot be presented.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to its coming in in this shape.

The SPEAKER. That is sufficient. The Chair has no right to present anything that any other member could not present.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to say, before I object, that this memorial has been laid upon our desks; but I have not had time to read it.

Mr. GROW. Would a motion to receive the memorial be in order?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will withdraw my objection to the reception of the memorial. I do not know what is in it.

Mr. DEAN. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. DEAN. Then I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. I withdraw my objection.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object, sir.

Mr. GROW. Would it be in order to move that the memorial be received and printed?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The Chair withdraws the memorial.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Cannot the memorial be presented under the rules, like any other memorial?

The SPEAKER. It could; but it would have to be referred to a committee, and could not be printed.

REGISTERS OF VESSELS.

Mr. DIMMICK. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the chairman of the Committee on Commerce may be permitted to report back Senate bill (No. 127) to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register or enrollment and license, to be issued in the name of the president or secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel," approved March 3, 1825, with a view of putting it on its passage.

I will merely remark that I have been here for six long months, in attendance on the sessions of the House. I have made no speeches on Kansas or upon any other subject. I have not consumed a single moment of the time of the House; and I now ask the indulgence of the House to allow this bill to pass. It is very important to the interests of northern Pennsylvania, and to a large interest in the city of New York. The bill asks no appropriation of money from the Treasury, and has been favorably reported on by the Committees on Commerce of the House and the Senate.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. Will this bill give rise to debate?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. It cannot give rise to debate.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia. I would remark that I think the first business the House ought to attend to would be to dispose of the resolution of the Senate extending the session until Monday. It is due to the Senate, as well as due to ourselves, that we should act upon that resolution, and dispose of it one way or the other.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The law which this bill proposes to repeal is as follows:

"Before granting a register for any steamboat or vessel, so owned by any incorporated company, the president or secretary thereof shall swear or affirm, that to the best of his knowledge and belief, no part of such steamboat or vessel has been, or is then, owned by any foreigner or foreigners."

That provision has been found to be very injurious to the commercial interests of the country.

Mr. DEAN. I object to the bill.

Mr. DIMMICK. I move to suspend the rules. The question was taken; and the rules were suspended.

The bill was then reported to the House, was ordered to a third reading, was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

CODIFICATION OF THE REVENUE LAWS.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask that House bill No. 487, being the revenue code bill, be made the special order for the first Wednesday of next session, and from day to day thereafter until disposed of. I think that is the wisest course to pursue.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not want any special orders made for the next session, and I therefore object.

Mr. PETTIT. I move that the rules be suspended.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thought that there was business fixed for this day which would come up as first in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the gentleman's motion will take precedence.

Mr. MILLSON. I would suggest that this is a voluminous bill, and ought to be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. It is impossible to consider this bill as it deserves in the House. It should be first made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I accept that as a modification of my motion.

Mr. GROW. I move that it be made the special order for the second Wednesday of the next session, so that we may have full time to consider it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I accept that modification, and make my motion that the bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order for the second Wednesday of the next session.

The rules were suspended; and the motion was received and agreed to.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BENJAMIN SAYRE.

Mr. PETTIT. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of House bill (No. 319) for the relief of Benjamin Sayre, and that it be put upon its passage.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Let us hear what it is.

The bill was read. It directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Benjamin Sayre, of Wabash county, Indiana, the sum of $2,043, in full of his claim for work and labor under his contract with the United States, bearing date December 8, 1832, in section sixty-seven of the Cumberland road, in Indiana, in the division east of Indianapolis.

Mr. PETTIT. That bill has been favorably reported on twice by the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CURRY. Let the report be read.

A MEMBER. I object.

Mr. CURRY. If the report be not read, I shall object to the bill being taken up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. PETTIT. Objection being made, I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Does the gentleman object to the reading of the report?

The SPEAKER. It is eight pages in length.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is it understood then, that we are to pass upon this bill without knowing what it is. If that be the policy, I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If these motions to suspend are to go on, let a time for that purpose be fixed so as to give all a chance, and then let us go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—yeas 99, nays 20.

So the rules were suspended; and the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. PETTIT. I do not propose to object to the reading of the report if it is desired, though it is very lengthy. The first report on this case was made by the Committee of Claims, when the senior member from Ohio [Mr. GIMBRES] was its chairman; and I presume his statement of the matter would be more convenient to the House than the reading of the elaborate report. My purpose is to call the previous question upon the passage of the bill, not interposing any obstacle, however, to the reading of the report. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. PETTIT. I move the previous question upon its passage.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As there has been no report, in this case, read, and as it is evident I cannot get the yeas and nays upon its passage, I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. PETTIT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

HARRIS AND MORGAN.

Mr. KELLY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of the joint resolution (H. R. No. 9) for the relief of Harris & Morgan. This is the same bill in reference to which I submitted a similar motion yesterday. The bill does not make any appropriation of money, but merely requires the settlement of an account upon principles of equity and justice.

The joint resolution, which was read for information, authorizes and directs the Postmaster General to revise and adjust the fines and deductions imposed upon Harris & Morgan, late contractors on route No. 7851, from New Orleans to Indianola, via Galveston, Texas, and to settle the same upon principles of justice and equity; provided, that the said fines and deductions shall not be reduced below the pro rata pay of the contract.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to say to gentlemen of the House, that unless they quit this business of moving to suspend the rules, it will be impossible to get through with the public business.

It appears from the report, which was read, that the petitioners became contractors with the Post Office Department, on route No. 7851, from New Orleans to Indianola, via Galveston, under a transfer from W. C. Lacy, on the 15th of September, 1854, the contract to take effect from the 1st July, 1854. The service required under said contract was three trips per week between the terminal points of said route, No. 7851. It further appears from the facts in the case, that the said contractors were unable to, and did not, perform but two trips per week, instead of three, as stipulated in their contract. For this failure, under the administration of the late Postmaster General, fines and forfeitures were imposed upon the contractors to the extent of twice, twice and a half, and thrice, the amount of the pay of the trip so omitted to be performed, and their account was made up and adjusted accordingly.

Against the imposition of these heavy penalties and fines the petitioners pray relief; and the committee are of opinion that the Postmaster General should be authorized to revise and adjust their account, and settle the same upon principles of equity and justice. The opinion thus expressed by the committee is strengthened by a communication from the present Postmaster General, addressed to the Hon. JOHN KELLY, and laid before them, under date of January 15, 1858, in which he says: "The fines and deductions imposed for the omitted service on this route from the 1st July, 1856, to 31st March, 1857, and during my administration of the Department, have not exceeded the pro rata pay of the contract."

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I object to that bill.

Mr. KELLY moved to suspend the rules, to enable him to introduce the motion.

The rules were suspended, (two thirds having voted in favor thereof.)

Mr. KELLY demanded the previous question on the engrossment of the joint resolution.

Mr. REAGAN. Before the previous question is seconded, it seems to me that there are facts connected with that matter which ought to be understood by this House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from New York withdraw the call for the previous question?

Mr. KELLY. I do not see the necessity of withdrawing the demand.

Mr. REAGAN. These gentlemen have had a contract at a large rate of pay; they have had the monopoly upon that route; and have made the State of Texas great sufferers for their own convenience and profit.

Mr. KELLY. I insist upon the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. I think we should not adopt that joint resolution without some consideration and reflection.

Mr. KELLY. I object to debate.

Mr. REAGAN. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. BRYAN. My colleague does not understand this resolution. It simply gives authority to the Postmaster General to revise and adjust their accounts upon terms of equity and justice.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. I object to this resolution, because action upon such cases ought to be uniform, in reference to all contractors.

The SPEAKER. Debate is out of order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. KELLY moved the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask the gentleman from New York to allow me to say a word in reference to this resolution. There is no wrong in it. These contractors failed to perform their contract, and the Post Office Department, instead of fining them in proportion to their failure, fined them three times that amount. The resolution provides that the Postmaster General shall revise and adjust their accounts upon principles of equity.

Mr. GROW. Is this debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not, unless the gentleman from New York withdraws the demand for the previous question.

Mr. KELLY. I do not withdraw it.

Mr. ENGLISH. The resolution is all right.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

Mr. REAGAN. I ask the yeas and nays upon the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. REAGAN. I would like the House to allow me to say something upon the resolution before the question is taken.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was then taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 123, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atrair, Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Branton, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clay, John Cochrane, Cockrell, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, English, Eastis, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert

B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Kellogg, Kelly, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Maclay, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Mort, Murray, Niblack, Nichols, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Potter, Pottle, Ready, Ricaud, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Searing, Aaron Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, Spinner, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Tappan, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Augustus R. Wright—123.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Atkins, Bishop, Bockock, Buffinton, Burlingame, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Dawes, Edmundson, Gartrell, Goode, Gregg, Hopkins, Houston, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Letcher, McQueen, Mattheson, Moore, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Pettit, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Ruffin, Savage, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Stanton, and Thompson—45.

So the resolution was passed.

Pending the call of the roll, the following discussion took place:

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to know, before I change my vote and vote in the affirmative for the purpose of moving to reconsider, whether a motion to reconsider is debatable?

The SPEAKER. It would be.

Mr. ENGLISH. I desire to know whether the gentleman from New York, under the practice of the House, would not be entitled to the floor?

Mr. REAGAN. I hope that this practice of choking off gentlemen will be put a stop to. We ought to have some light upon this subject.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York will be entitled to the floor by courtesy and usage, if he seeks it.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object to everything out of order.

Mr. REAGAN. I suppose debate is out of order, and I would not ask the Speaker to take any unusual course in the matter. I will therefore let my name stand in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thought it proper to give the gentleman that intimation, in order that his vote might not appear improperly upon the record. The gentleman from New York will be entitled to the floor by courtesy.

Mr. QUITMAN. I would like to know the extent of the Chair's decision. Does the Chair decide that the gentleman who introduced a bill is entitled to the floor to move to reconsider, though some other gentlemen may take the floor before him?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not carry the decision to the extent the gentleman has supposed. If the gentleman rises first and obtains the floor, he is clearly entitled to it under the rules of the House. Where two or more gentlemen rise about the same time, the usage is to give the floor to the gentleman who has the custody of the particular matter. If he does not rise to seek the floor, the floor will be given to any other gentleman.

The result was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. KELLY moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Before that motion is put, however, I state to the House that I wish to make a special order similar to that made yesterday in reference to giving precedence to the Senate amendments to the naval bill. The Committee of Ways and Means have this morning considered the Senate amendments to that bill, and I wish to report those amendments, with the action of the Committee of Ways and Means thereon, and have them referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and make them the special order, so that they may take precedence of the loan bill.

I wish also to suggest to the House that I desire to submit a motion that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union shall take a recess to-day from four to six o'clock. The object is that we may have a longer evening session, and to enable the Committee of Ways and Means to meet at four o'clock to pass upon Senate amendments to the Army bill. By doing that, the committee will be able to report at six o'clock upon the Army bill, in which case the Army bill and the Navy bill can both be considered to-day.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to make a suggestion to the gentleman from Pennsylvania. If the Committee of Ways and Means desire to retire between four and six o'clock, for the purpose of considering the amendments to the Army bill, their object may be accomplished by getting leave of the House to sit during the session of the House—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That consent has already been given.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. And the balance of the committee can transact some business not connected with the Army bill while you are considering those amendments.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I did not put that as the only ground of my motion. My object is to get the appropriation bills through with all convenient expedition.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a point of order. I wish to know whether the question is debatable. If the gentleman wants to make a motion I am willing to hear it, but I am not willing to hear a statement. I object to all debate.

ADJOURNMENT OF CONGRESS.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give way that the Senate resolution for extending the session, may be taken up and considered, so that we may know precisely what we are about.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to put the Army and Navy bills through to-day.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. If the gentleman will not give way for that purpose, I will insist upon calling up a question of privilege, and the gentleman can take the responsibility.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I take the responsibility of moving that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Before that motion be put, I rise to call up a question of privilege relating to the organization of the House. I claim the right to present it as a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the motion to suspend the rules must be disposed of, even before a privileged question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I shall not appeal from the decision of the Chair, but according to my understanding the gentleman's motion is a privileged motion, but not a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. It is a privileged motion, which must be disposed of.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Will the gentleman from Illinois tell me the object he has in view?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. My first object is to determine whether the House will abide by its decision, and adjourn to-morrow, or whether it will concur in the Senate amendment to adjourn next Monday. In the event of the House not passing from the position it now occupies, then I propose to call up the question of privilege relating to the Maryland contested-election case.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Do I understand that if the House agree to extend the session then he will call up this election case?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. No, sir; directly the reverse. I am willing, then, that the gentleman may proceed with his business.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I only wish to see whether we cannot get through this business to-day.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I am anxious that this Maryland election case shall be disposed of this session. If the session is to terminate to-morrow, I will call it up to-day; but if the session is to be extended, I will not.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I yield the floor, with the understanding that I do not lose it.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object to all conditions.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania must take his chance to get the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I now call up the Senate resolution.

The resolution was read, as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 8, 1858.

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the resolution directing the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives to declare their respective bodies adjourned sine die on Thursday, the 10th of June, at twelve o'clock, m., be, and the same is hereby rescinded; and that the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives declare their respective Houses adjourned sine die on Monday, the 14th of June, at twelve o'clock, m.

Mr. MAYNARD. How does that resolution come before the House?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent to take it from the Speaker's table.

Mr. MAYNARD. I object to it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—ayes 128, noes 40.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the resolution was taken from the Speaker's table.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. MILLSON. I hope the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question until I can make a single suggestion to him.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will hear the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. MILLSON. The Senate propose to extend the time of the session till the 14th.

Mr. EDIE. I object to debate, unless the previous question is withdrawn.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I withdrew it only to listen to the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The SPEAKER. That is objected to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I renew the call for the previous question.

Mr. MILLSON. I hope the House will vote down the previous question, and amend the resolution. We are in a peculiar position to know when we ought to adjourn, and the Senate is not in that position.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SAVAGE called for the yeas and nays on the passage of the resolution; and for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken; and on division there were—ayes 125, noes 35.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed, without amendment, a bill of the House (No. 647) to change the time of holding the spring term of the district court of the United States for the western district of the State of Texas.

Also, that the Senate had passed the bill of the House (No. 243) making appropriations for the service of the Army, for the year ending June 30, 1859, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate insist on their amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the bill of the House (No. 200) making appropriations for certain civil expenses of the Government for the year ending June 30, 1859, disagree to the amendments of the House to other amendments of the Senate, ask a conference upon the said disagreeing votes, and have appointed Mr. HUNTER, Mr. FESSENDEN, and Mr. BIGLER, as managers at the said conference on the part of the Senate.

Also, that the Senate have adopted a resolution directing the return of the following enrolled bills, and requesting that the Speaker of this House may be authorized to cancel his signature upon the same, and that the engrossed bills of the same titles may be returned to the Senate, to enable them to correct their report thereon to the House of Representatives:

An act (H. R. No. 267) for the relief of Timothy O'Keefe; and

An act (H. R. No. 356) for the relief of Roswell Minard, father of Theodore Minard, deceased.

ARMY AND NAVY APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to refer the Senate amendments to the Army bill to the Committee of Ways and Means, and have them ordered to be printed.

No objection being made, the report was received, and the Senate amendments ordered to be printed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I also move that the House insist on its disagreeing vote on the miscellaneous bill, and agree to a committee of conference.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to a committee of conference. I think the Senate have usurped legislative power enough this session.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. PIKE, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (S. No. 127) to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register or enrollment, and license to be issued in the name of the president or secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel," approved March 3, 1825.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE WATROUS.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask the House to receive the memorial of Judge Watrous, presented this morning; that it be printed, and that the whole case be postponed till twelve o'clock on Friday.

Mr. STANTON. I object.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the message from the Senate relative to its disagreeing votes on bill No. 200, with a view that I may move that the House insist on its disagreeing votes to the amendments of the Senate, and that a committee of conference be granted.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules.

The motion was agreed to, and the rules were suspended.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move that the House insist on its disagreeing vote to the civil appropriation bill, and consent to the request of the Senate to grant a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. PHELPS of Missouri, HOWARD, and PHILLIPS, were appointed managers of the said committee of conference on the part of the House.

RESOLUTION FOR RECESS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House (or the Committee of the Whole, if the House shall be in committee at the time) will this day take a recess from four, p. m., to six, p. m.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I should like to know what time will be saved by taking a recess from four to six p. m. We had better sit till seven, and then adjourn.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It will save us four hours at least.

Mr. LETCHER. The members of the Committee of Ways and Means are kept here the whole day, while other gentlemen retire, take their dinner, smoke their cigars, and then return.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would say to the gentleman that I have not done so. I have been here every day.

Mr. LETCHER. I speak of the members generally.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object to the resolution.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and there were—ayes 135, noes 21.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the resolution was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report from the Committee on Ways and Means on the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill, and to have them referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed. I also move that they be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, till they are disposed of, and that general debate upon them shall close in ten minutes after their consideration is taken up.

Mr. SAVAGE. Is there any necessity for making this a special order? Has it not a precedence over other bills, without the order of the House?

The SPEAKER. As the Chair understands the condition of business in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, the loan bill has precedence over it.

IMPEACHMENT OF JUDGE WATROUS.

Mr. READY. I desire to make a motion to dispose of the case against Judge Watrous for the present session. The case was set down for consideration for this day. I am satisfied that at this late period of the session it is impossible to give the case that deliberate and thorough investigation which its importance demands, so that the House may be able to do justice to the public, and to the individual especially interested.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call for the regular order of business.

The motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the special order, being the amendments of the Senate to the

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means was read.

Mr. BOCK. I observe, from the report which has just been read, that a particular amendment to this bill, made by the Senate, has not been approved by the Committee of Ways and Means. I wish, in the ten minutes allowed me, to ask the House to disagree with the Committee of Ways and Means in their recommendation, and to concur in that amendment of the Senate, with an amendment which I propose to offer. The committee will perhaps anticipate at once that the amendment to which I allude is that which authorizes the construction of six small sloops-of-war. A few days ago, when this bill was first before the committee, a few minutes were allowed me to make some remarks in relation to this subject. I had only twenty minutes then, and could not go at length into it; and I have only ten minutes now, and I shall, therefore, be far less able to do full justice to it now than I was then. Still, I wish to suggest some considerations to the committee, which, in my opinion, ought to induce them to adopt my proposition.

I stated to the House before, that the Secretary of the Navy, in his annual report, recommended the construction of ten small sloops-of-war. I gave an outline of the arguments in favor of the construction of these vessels. In consequence of the improvements which have been made in the mode of propelling vessels and in the construction of guns, small steamers have thus been rendered comparatively far more efficient than they formerly were. The steamers provided for in the amendment of the Senate, and the number of which I propose to increase to ten, would carry about ten of the largest of Dahlgren's guns. As I stated to the committee on a former occasion, these small vessels may send as large a ball, and send it as far, and send it with as much force, as the larger vessels; and then even one of the large balls or shells from one of these small vessels, striking a vessel of the largest class, might either sink or disable it. The small vessel has the advantage of the larger one, in exposing a smaller mark to the aim of the antagonist.

The next proposition that I submitted on the former occasion, and to which I desire to recall the attention of the committee, was that these vessels are advisable in an economical point of view. What does it cost now to keep in commission one of your large steam frigates? Over two hundred and fifty thousand dollars a year; and those frigates carry forty guns. Now, according to the data furnished by the Navy Department, one of these small sloops, carrying ten or twelve guns, could be kept in commission for from forty-five to fifty thousand dollars a year. I ask if three of these vessels, carrying ten guns each, or thirty guns in all, would not be far more efficient than one large steam frigate? If they would, then the three small vessels would cost only $150,000 a year, while one large frigate would cost $250,000 a year.

The Secretary of the Navy has suggested that one of these vessels might be advantageously employed in every squadron. I think so too; and by thus employing them, one large vessel might be dispensed with in every squadron, and therefore economy would be promoted. I shall not elaborate that idea. We have six squadrons, and if one of these vessels is to be employed in each squadron, we must have, in the first place, six for the different squadrons; then one will be required for China, and one for special service on the coast of Washington Territory—making eight in all; and we ought to have at least two or three on hand to take the place of those which may become inefficient or damaged. I say, therefore, that if we go into the matter at all, we ought to have at least ten of these small sloops-of-war.

I referred before, and have barely time to refer again, to the fact that the vessels which we now have in use draw so much water that they can enter few, if any, of our ports south of Norfolk.

The exports from New Orleans alone amount to about one hundred million dollars a year. This portion of our commerce is comparatively unprotected by our Navy. We wish vessels which can enter these ports. But I cannot elaborate, for want of time.

I shall propose, at the proper time, to increase the number of these vessels by striking out "five" and inserting "ten," and I hope that my friends will sustain me in it. I take the liberty to say that I shall not alter the amount that the Senate has placed in this bill to be appropriated for this purpose. Why? Because, I believe that these vessels, which the Secretary of the Navy estimates, can be built for $2,300,000. If the whole ten can be built for $2,300,000, $1,200,000 is sufficient for this year. I believe that these vessels can be built for a much smaller sum, and I will briefly state my reasons for so believing. This estimate of the Secretary of the Navy was made some time ago. Since then prices have diminished. The estimate was made when there was no pressure in the money market, and when business had not felt the embarrassment to which it has been since subjected. I have a case in point to show that the suggestions I make are not theoretical, and intended for this case only. The Secretary of the Treasury has recently caused to be constructed a fine steamer for the revenue service of something like seven hundred tons, and drawing six and a half feet of water. It is very nearly as large as the sloops I propose to have constructed. That vessel was built and launched for $150,000. It is a most efficient one. Then, I say, if a vessel of seven or eight hundred tons, and drawing six and a half feet of water, can be built for $150,000, such a vessel as I propose, drawing a few feet more, will not cost more than $200,000. The Secretary of the Navy estimates that they will cost $230,000. At $200,000 they would cost $2,000,000; and $1,200,000 is sufficient to appropriate at present.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. BOCK. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has an hour, and I ask him to permit me to have a portion of his time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to occupy my hour with an explanation of the amendments. I will yield to the gentleman ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. MORGAN. I object to farming out the floor.

Mr. BOCK. My friend from Pennsylvania would yield to the gentleman ten or fifteen minutes of his time, if he wanted it.

Mr. MORGAN. I insist on my objection.

ENROLLED BILL.

The committee informally rose, and the Speaker resumed the chair.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 647) to change the time of holding the spring term of the district court of the United States for the western district of the State of Texas; when the Speaker signed the same.

ROSWELL MINARD.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following message from the Senate:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 9, 1858.

Whereas, it appears by the Journal of the Senate that House bill (No. 356) for the relief of Roswell Minard, father of Theodore Minard, deceased, passed the Senate on the 4th day of June instant with an amendment; and whereas, said bill was by mistake erroneously reported to the House on the same day, as having passed the Senate without amendment, and has been enrolled and signed by the Presiding Officers of both Houses of Congress, and the said enrollment is void, the same never having been passed by both Houses of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized to cancel his signature upon said enrolled bill, and that the same be returned to the House; and that the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to authorize the Speaker of the House of Representatives to cancel his signature upon said enrolled bill, and return to the Senate the engrossed bill, to enable the Senate to correct its report to the House of Representatives.

Attest: ASBURY DICKINS, Secretary.

Mr. RUSSELL. What is the amendment of the Senate?

The SPEAKER. The Senate moved to strike out the second section. If the request of the Senate be agreed to, the question will come before the House when the bill is returned from the Senate with the amendment. If there be no objection, the order will be made in accordance with the message from the Senate, and the signature of the Speaker will be canceled.

There was no objection, and it was ordered accordingly.

T. L. O'KEEFFEE.

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES, June 9, 1858.

Whereas, it appears by the Journal of the Senate that House bill (No. 267) for the relief of Timothy L. O'Keeffe, was indefinitely postponed by the Senate on the 4th day of June instant; and whereas, said bill was by mistake erroneously reported to the House as having passed the Senate, and has been enrolled and signed by the Presiding Officers of both Houses of Congress, and the said enrollment of said bill is void, the same never having been passed by both Houses of Congress: Therefore,

Resolved, That the President of the Senate be, and hereby is, authorized to cancel his signature upon said enrolled bill, and that the same be returned to the House of Representatives; and that the House of Representatives be respectfully requested to authorize the Speaker of the House of Representatives to cancel his signature upon said enrolled bill, and to return to the Senate the engrossed bill, to enable the Senate to correct its report to the House of Representatives.

Attest: ASBURY DICKINS, Secretary.

The SPEAKER. The order in this respect will be complied with, by the permission of the House, and the Chair will cancel his signature, and return the engrossed bill.

The committee then resumed its session.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The naval appropriation bill has been returned to the House from the Senate with fourteen amendments. Some of them are regarded by the Committee of Ways and Means as good amendments, and a number of them as of rather doubtful propriety. Some of them, besides, are of such a character that the Committee of Ways and Means cannot know what they are intended to mean; and if they were adopted, the Treasury Department would find it difficult to give them a construction. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in seven out of fourteen of the amendments. I propose to occupy only such portion of my hour as may be necessary to explain the character of these amendments.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I would suggest to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that in all probability we would expedite business if we took the course to-day that was pursued yesterday—that is, to allow the amendments to be read, and to give a short debate and consideration to each.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not desire to occupy my hour now. I prefer, for the expedition of business, to parcel it out in explaining the amendments as they arise. If I have the unanimous consent of the committee, I will have the amendments read, and make short explanations of them. [Cries of "Agreed!"]

The reading of the amendments of the Senate was then commenced.

First amendment:

That, hereafter, medical officers and engineers of the Navy shall be entitled to the pay of their several grades from the date of their appointments or commissions therein, respectively.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The total amount appropriated by the amendments made by the Senate we figure up at $1,202,750. That refers to the whole fourteen amendments, but it is proper to say that $500,000 of this is for the five sloops-of-war. In seven of these amendments the Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence.

As to the amendment just reported, the Committee of Ways and Means have not been able to ascertain its precise meaning, unless it be intended to antedate the pay of these officers; and the supposition is that the Treasury Department has refused to allow them their pay from the date of their commission. The proposition now is, that their pay shall take effect from the date of their commission, instead of from the time at which it is now fixed to take effect. For this reason the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment. It may be a meritorious one, but we do not know its meaning.

Mr. BOCK. I ask the attention of the committee to the explanation which I shall make in reply to the remarks of the gentleman; and I think the committee will deem the amendment a just and proper one. We have had before the Committee on Naval Affairs many individual applications, which came under this class, and we have reported favorably on each one of them. The case which this amendment is intended to apply to is this: we have in the Navy assistant surgeons, passed assistant surgeons, and surgeons. An assistant surgeon must be in the Navy a certain length of time before he can apply to be examined in order to become a passed assistant surgeon. When he becomes a passed assistant surgeon, he is entitled to higher pay. It is the same case with regard to the engineers. There are three classes of engineers under the chief engineer. There are the first assistant engineers, the second assistant engineers, and the third assistant engineers. A man is required to serve a certain number of years in each grade before he is examined to pass to a higher grade. I believe an assistant surgeon must serve three years before he can become a passed assistant surgeon. Suppose that, just before the expiration of these three years, an assistant surgeon or engineer is ordered off to Africa, or to the Mediterranean, or to some other foreign station: then he cannot present himself before the board and undergo an examination. He remains abroad some length of time, returns to this country, and, as soon as he is able, presents himself before the board, passes his examination, and is promoted to a higher grade. It is the practice now, sustained by law, to date back the commission to the time when he was entitled to be examined if he had been allowed to remain in the country. This provision of law is intended to make the pay commence from the time of the commission; and I say he is justly entitled to it. If he is ordered off, that is the act of the Government. He cannot disobey it. He is in the public service. Another man, not in the service, but who is staying in Washington, or in Philadelphia, or New York, goes before the board, is examined, passes, and gets higher pay than this man, who is sent off by command of the Government, and who cannot undergo his examination on that account. Is this just? Ought not the pay to go back and to commence with the new commission? If he is entitled to the commission, ought he not to be entitled to the pay which accompanies that commission?

Mr. STANTON. I move to amend, by striking out the ninth and tenth lines.

Mr. Chairman, the committee had as well settle now the question as to whether they will recognize independent foreign legislation in appropriation bills or not. This question about the pay of medical officers and engineers is a matter of general legislation. It is an amendment which, under the rules of the House, the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs could not have offered in Committee of the Whole. Now, either the House should change its rules, so as to enable it to go into general legislation on appropriation bills, and originate propositions of this sort, or else it should reject all such propositions coming from the Senate. This inequality ought not to be submitted to. With the brief sessions of Congress that are now held, and the brief time allowed for the passage of general laws, all the important business of the country will be thrown into the appropriation bills, if the House will recognize it as proper for the Senate to indulge in it.

How stands this case? Here is a proposition to change the pay of the medical officers and engineers of the Navy. It has been to no standing committee of the House. No standing committee has inquired into the necessity of it, or reported upon it. We have no information from the Departments in reference to the necessity of it. And so it is with all the general legislation that we have to act upon, in the shape of amendments of the Senate to appropriation bills.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Ohio that he must confine his remarks to his amendment. The tenor of his speech is in conformity with the recommendation of the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the gentleman will have the unanimous consent of the committee to proceed, for I fully concur in his remarks.

Mr. STANTON. I have about said all that I desire to say. I find that there are half a dozen amendments of the same sort, proposing general legislation on a variety of subjects. It seems to me that if the House intends to maintain its own position, its own dignity, and its own privileges, it ought to disagree to these amendments and adhere to its position to the bitter end.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I am surprised at the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio. I am surprised that he should advocate that doctrine now, when, only yesterday, he palpably disregarded it. Sir, the gentleman yesterday sanctioned and approved, by his vote, the publication of a large job for which there was no authority of law; and what is more, sir, he deliberately advocated a proposition to give that job to particular individuals.

Mr. CURTIS. I rise to a question of order. I submit that it is not in order to discuss to-day a proposition which was decided yesterday.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Of course not, sir; of course not.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state that the remarks of the gentleman from Virginia are not strictly in order; but as the gentleman from Ohio made a speech which was not in order, and as these remarks are in reply to that speech, the Chair will entertain them for this time only.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] undoubtedly takes the ground that he might, perhaps, be willing to maintain; because what he might support one day, it would not perhaps be agreeable to support another. And that is precisely the case with the gentleman from Ohio. It was very convenient for him to give to particular individuals a fat job, "not to exceed $350,000," yesterday, but to-day it is very improper to fix the salaries or the allowances that these officers are to receive. You may give large sums out of the Treasury for the purpose of redeeming from insolvency particular individuals, but you cannot treat those in a liberal spirit who are engaged in the service of the country. That is about the whole of it.

The Senate amendment was non-concurred in.

Second and third amendments:

In line one hundred and twenty-two, insert the words "and the new purchase," and in lines one hundred and twenty-five and one hundred and twenty-six, strike out "§ 269, § 16," and insert in lieu thereof "§ 320, § 16," so that the paragraph will read:

For boiler-house and setting boilers, water-pipes, drains, quay-wall, sewer extended to quay-wall, boiler to dredger, timber-basin, repairs of oakum-shop, filling ponds in yard and the new purchase, dredging channel and scows, piling site for marine barracks, machinery for machine-shop, boiler shop, saw-mill, foundry, smithery, and brass foundry, and repairs of all kinds, § 320, § 16; and the amount heretofore appropriated for coal-house may be applied to the completion of the store-house.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. These amendments are to provide for filling up what is called the new purchase at the Brooklyn navy-yard. The item was included in the estimates of the Secretary of the Navy. It was omitted by the Committee of Ways and Means, because of information which afterwards turned out to be erroneous; but it was subsequently offered here and voted down by the House. The amendments appropriate $50,000 for filling up that ground, and it seems to be needed. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in these amendments.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I am opposed to these amendments upon this ground: the House has once, by a deliberate vote by yeas and nays, rejected the proposition to fill up this new purchase. And then, I suppose, it was carried to the Senate, and put into the bill in order to give us another chance to reconsider our position.

Now, it seems to me that when the Treasury is bankrupt, it is a bad time to appropriate $50,000 to fill up ground, which, in the opinion of many gentlemen acquainted with the Brooklyn navy-yard, is totally unnecessary. I believe, myself, that it will add nothing at all to the usefulness of the navy-yard. The business there has been carried on successfully for many years without this purchase. The purchase itself was one of doubtful propriety, and the filling up of it is totally unnecessary according to the information I have upon the subject. But it is sufficient for me to know that the House has once deliberately rejected the proposition by a vote on the yeas and nays, and I think it ought not to have been sent here again by the Senate.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I move to increase the appropriation one dollar. It is true that this proposition was rejected by the House, but I think it was rejected under a misapprehension of the facts. I can assure the committee that this appropriation is necessary to protect what has already been done in preparing the ground for the marine barracks, and the work of filling up can be done now for one half what it will cost next year if it should be postponed.

Since this matter was up last week, another important consideration has presented itself to me. I have received letters from Brooklyn, stating that the health officers will report this land as a nuisance unless the Government does something to relieve the neighborhood, as the miasma arising from it already affects the health of the neighborhood. I hope, therefore, on the ground not only of necessity and economy, but of humanity, that gentlemen upon the opposite side of the House will not persist in their opposition to the amendment. I now withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GROW. I move to strike out "three" and insert "two." I desire only to say, that while the Government is retrenching its expenditures everywhere it can be done, and refusing to complete public buildings, for which only two or three thousand dollars are required, it seems to me that this is one of those expenditures which can be curtailed without injury to the public service.

There is another reason why I am opposed to this amendment. The House has once rejected this proposition by yeas and nays, and I would vote against any amendment sent here by the Senate after the House had once deliberately rejected it. I think it is due to ourselves that we should do so. They load down our appropriation bills by their amendments, to an amount equal to if not exceeding the amount sent to them from this House. In fact, almost every amendment that is voted down here is sent back to us to be acted upon again. They put provisions in the appropriation bills which cannot be entertained as amendments to the appropriation bills in this House. I would not tolerate the Senate in throwing back in our faces for us to vote on again, measures which we had already once rejected. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. If it be the pleasure of the committee, the question will be taken on the two amendments together.

There was no objection.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered, and Messrs. JEWETT, and TAYLOR of New York, were appointed.

The committee divided; and Mr. TAYLOR of New York, reported—ayes 65, noes 62.

Mr. JEWETT, one of the tellers, demanded a recount.

The committee was again divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 35, noes 85.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Insert:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to purchase tools and furnish the machine-shop and foundry at the Norfolk navy-yard, § 20,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, this seems to be a proper amendment, and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in it; and for this reason: it is to furnish tools for a machine-shop, finished since Congress has been in session. We authorized the building of a machine-shop at the Norfolk navy-yard, and it has only been completed since the original bill was reported to the House. It is to furnish that shop, which is now wanted to be used in the construction of one of the sloops-of-war. Unless these tools are furnished, that work cannot go on. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of the Navy be read.

The Clerk read, as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, May 27, 1858.

Sir: To enable the Department to fit the machine-shop and foundry at the Norfolk navy-yard to construct the engines, boilers, &c., for the new steam-sloop building there, an addition to the estimates submitted, of $20,000 for the next fiscal year, will be necessary. I have to request and urge, therefore, that that sum may be added to the estimates for that year for that purpose.

I am, very respectfully, &c., ISAAC TOUCEY.

Hon. S. R. MALLORY, Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs, United States Senate.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I hope that the Committee of the Whole House will not agree to that amendment, and for this reason: when Congress determined to build a mint at New Orleans, the city council came forward and donated for that purpose a square of land worth $500,000. When the Government agreed to build a custom-house at New Orleans, the city council donated for that purpose a square of ground worth $1,000,000. Now, we are told that there is money enough in the Treasury to appropriate $750,000 for carrying on this Capitol, but that there is not enough to appropriate $350,000 to carry on that custom-house. They refuse to carry out the contract to be made by the Government with the city when they donated that square of ground. Under those circumstances, there being no money for the purpose of carrying out the legitimate objects of the Government, it seems to me it is bad faith to pass an appropriation to pay this expense. If one stops, they all ought to stop.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I only wish the remark of my distinguished friend from Louisiana might be heard in New Orleans.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I will make it heard.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This building is already finished, and paid for by the Government, and they now want tools to make it useful.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania if he did not yesterday vote against furnishing hospitals and custom-houses?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I did.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Yes, sir.

Mr. MILLSON. I move to increase the sum $1,000. Really, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether or not to receive in earnest the objections of the gentleman from Louisiana, and the interjectional suggestion of the gentleman from Illinois, in reference to the votes of this House upon appropriations for the New Orleans custom-house and for western marine hospitals. If they wish to establish it as a proper principle of legislation that an appropriation necessary in itself should be refused, because of what may be deemed an improper course of the House upon other appropriations, I beg leave to make my protest against it; and I say, for myself, I never will be governed by any such principle, as I never have been. I say, and I say it proudly, I never voted in my life against any measure because its friends or supporters may have opposed what I felt an interest in. And I say now, if there is any gentleman in this House who will vote twenty times against bills that I may favor, I would not the less willingly vote for a proposition which he might offer, if I believed it proper in itself. I am surprised that gentlemen should invite Congress to adopt so unworthy a principle of legislation.

And now, one word only as to the amendment of the Senate. A foundry and machine-shop has been building at the Norfolk navy-yard for the last two or three years. It has involved great expense, having cost a hundred thousand dollars or more. It has been completed within the last two or three months. It now only remains to fit up that building with the necessary implements and machinery, in order to make it useful. The Secretary of the Navy has directed one of the new steam-sloops and the engine and boilers to be constructed at that yard; and he now asks Congress to give him $20,000 for the purpose of purchasing the necessary machinery for doing the work; and gentlemen object upon the ground that the House refused to make appropriations for custom-houses here and marine hospitals there.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. It occurs to me that the same proposition has been before the House before, and that it has been placed upon a previous bill.

Mr. MILLSON. No, sir.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to correct the gentleman. I do not suppose that he intends to do me injustice. My remarks do not justify the impression that I would vote against this amendment because gentlemen had voted against my proposition in reference to the New Orleans custom-house. I say that the argument is a good one, that if there is no money to complete the custom-house, at New Orleans, where the ground was given to the Government, certainly we should not appropriate money for machinery.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. The committee will readily see the bearing of that amendment, and I wish to call the attention of the committee to the action of the Committee of Ways and Means, which, I understand, has recommended this amendment, as contrasted with the action of that committee to the amendments in regard to the custom-houses and marine hospitals, upon which we passed yesterday. I have no complaints to make of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. MILLSON,] in reference to his votes here, for I say frankly that I think no gentleman is governed in his action by a higher sense of duty, than that gentleman. But I wish to present this matter to the committee as it is. Yesterday, we voted in the House against making appropriations to complete these custom-houses and marine hospitals, and furnishing them, in order to fit them for the use of the Government.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would intimate to the gentleman from Illinois that the subject of the discussion yesterday is not open upon this amendment; and it is the wish of the Chair to confine this discussion strictly in order. The pending amendment is to increase the amount $1,000.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Well, sir, I take the ground that we should not increase the amount $1,000, and that we should not increase it at all; because, as the gentleman from Louisiana well said, if you have not money enough in the Treasury to complete custom-houses and marine hospitals, and to furnish them, you certainly have not money enough to carry out this amendment. How does the question present itself to us in all these amendments?

The proposition now under consideration, I should be in favor of upon general principles—upon the same principles that have governed me in all my votes upon these questions. In Norfolk there is a foundry built, and the Secretary wants a small amount of money to furnish it with tools in order to make it useful to the Government. That is fair, reasonable, and proper, in regard to this foundry; but I want the same in regard to custom-houses, and marine hospitals, which are finished or nearly finished, and want furnishing. You have custom-houses all over the country, each of which requires a small amount of money to complete it entirely, but when the question comes before the House, we, here, in our capacity as Representatives, setting up for statesmen, deliberately say that we will not vote money to finish these buildings which have been undertaken, and for which we have made contracts. Though these buildings require but small amounts in each case to finish them in order to enable them to be used, and thus save large sums in rents; though contracts are to be violated, and the Government held to large damages; though the buildings will receive more damage by remaining in an unfinished state, than the whole amount proposed to be appropriated, yet this House has deliberately said it will not appropriate one dollar to complete them. Sir, I am opposed to this policy.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MILLSON. I will withdraw my amendment, and for the purpose of making another remark, I move to amend by increasing the sum $2,000.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Virginia, that the question in relation to the custom-houses is not before the committee now, and it is the intention of the Chair to confine the debate strictly to the subject before the committee.

Mr. MILLSON. I will remain within the rules of order as I think I understand them. Is it not perfectly apparent that the principles on which this amendment is opposed, are such as I have characterized already? Have gentlemen yet urged one solitary objection to the appropriation of the money asked for by the Government? I ask my friend from Illinois himself, if he can deliberately suppose that he will stand justified to his own conscience in opposing a necessary expenditure for such reasons as those he has alleged. Now, Mr. Chairman, this appropriation is not one in which I alone should feel an interest. It probably will not be expended among my constituents, or in my district, for I take it for granted that this machinery will be purchased somewhere at the North, or it may be at the Northwest.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I raise the question of order that the gentleman must confine his remarks to the question. We traveled all over the subject of custom-houses yesterday, and if we have got to go over it again to-day, I want to be heard, as I voted against these custom-houses.

Mr. MILLSON. I am not discussing the question of custom-houses.

Mr. LOVEJOY. The gentleman is not confining his remarks to the question before the committee.

Mr. MILLSON. I rose for the purpose of replying to the inquiry of the gentleman from Kentucky as to whether this proposition was not made once before in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union? I tell the gentleman it was; but there was no division, and no deliberate judgment of the House upon it; and I admit that the failure of the proposition then submitted by me was perhaps proper, and in accordance with the rules which ought to govern the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I then asked this appropriation on my own responsibility, stating that I did so in the absence of any estimate or demand from the Department; but stating, at the same time, that I was well assured the Department was about to make the demand. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means suggested that if the Department wanted to make an application it could be made to the Senate in time; and the House, acting on that suggestion, did not agree to the amendment; but, as I was sure would be done, the Secretary of the Navy did send an estimate to the Senate, and asked for the appropriation as a necessary means of accomplishing the work which he had ordered to be commenced at the Norfolk navy-yard.

Mr. SAVAGE. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, that we ought to concur in any of these amendments, and particularly not in the one now advocated by the gentleman from Virginia. We have already authorized the Government to borrow $20,000,000, and there is a proposition now pending to borrow $15,000,000 more. I find, by the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, that there was a balance in the Treasury, on the 30th of June, 1857, of $46,852,855. That $46,000,000 is gone; the $20,000,000 is gone; and the $15,000,000 more will go, and still we go on making new appropriations, notwithstanding the cry of economy.

Mr. KEITT. What about the old soldiers?

Mr. SAVAGE. I say I will not vote a dollar for these purposes till justice is done to the old soldiers. I find these very same interests that are pressing these extravagant appropriations upon the country treading down the rights of the old soldier. Gentlemen stand up here and ask for $100,000, and $500,000, and sometimes $1,000,000, to be poured into the lap of a great city for the purpose of enriching their constituents; and yet they are the first to trample down the rights of the old soldier. I thank the gentleman for the word.

Another report of the Secretary of the Treasury shows, that but a short time since, the nice little sum of $688,000 was paid simply for the privilege of paying the debts of the Government, that it might be now borrowing money. And yet these very same individuals or authorities tread down, with the most ruthless and rapid pace, the right of old soldiers which the gentleman from South Carolina has thrown in my teeth. I ask the members from the interior districts with what kind of grace they can go home, and show that by their votes they have cast millions into the laps of great cities, and yet could not get an appropriation of a million and a half per annum for a most meritorious class of men?

The question being on Mr. MILLSON's amendment,

Mr. MILLSON withdrew it.

Mr. CLEMENS. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation to $22,500. Mr. Chairman, the very argument urged against this amendment by the gentleman from Tennessee and the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. SAVAGE and Mr. WASHBURN,] ought to commend it to the good favor of this House. I find that each of the gentlemen has had an ax to grind; and because the legislative grindstone could not be accommodated to what was thought proper, each raises himself up here in armed opposition against an appropriation which commends itself to the national heart of the country. Because, forsooth, $6,500,000 for the benefit of old soldiers who have been in the receipt of the bounty of the Government since the war of 1812, has not been granted at this session, the gentleman from Tennessee erects his porcupine quills; and because, forsooth, an appropriation for the custom-house at Galena, in Illinois, was not made yesterday, the gentleman from Illinois puts out all the claws of a lobster in opposition to the pending project.

Now, what is the fact in relation to it? We find the Navy to be in a disabled condition. We find our ships on the high seas insulted and searched; defiance thrown in the teeth of masters of vessels—merchantsmen belonging not to the North or the South, but representing the national commerce of this majestic Confederacy. When it is proposed to vote a paltry appropriation of twenty-two or twenty-three thousand dollars for the purpose of supplying tools at one of the chief naval depots of the country to repair your vessels of war, gentlemen rise up and exhibit local feeling and oppose a commendable national appropriation because, forsooth, (hinc illa lacryma,) they have been disappointed in their local projects. Now, I ask the gentleman from Tennessee, who, I know, is a fair-minded and patriotic man, if he can stand up here and justify himself to his own conscience for acting upon a principle like that? So far as appropriations are concerned, I am disposed to be as narrow-minded as any gentleman in this House, and to scrutinize the details of these appropriation bills as closely and conscientiously as any gentleman here; but when an appropriation, even in the present exhausted condition of the Treasury, comes commended to me by such strong national considerations as does this one, I can waive all matters of economy and all little scruples, and contribute my mite, however small it may be, to maintain the national honor and promote the fame and renown of the country.

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Chairman, it is not often that I address the House, and I am sorry that anything I have said to-day has so aroused the gentleman from Virginia. I suppose the reason why the gentleman has raised his porcupine quills, to use his own language, is because this is a Virginia ax, and I have interfered a little with the grinding of it. I will now endeavor to answer the gentleman's English. As to his Latin, I do not know a great deal of it, and so I will let that pass. I am not responsible for the argument which I made in allusion to the old soldiers. It was thrust upon me by a remark of the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. KEITT.] But that is not the reason why I have voted against these appropriations, and voted against them steadily, since I have been a member of this House; although I am not one of those who vote against and object to everything. I think a liberal system of appropriations is proper and right; and what they accuse me of in pressing the old soldiers' bill is, that I wish to empty the Treasury. But, sir, notwithstanding the hard times, and the pressure on the money market, I see no abatement of this eternal outgoing of the public money; and it has been the same ever since I have been here, and the same arguments have been made in favor of these appropriations for the same cities and the same parts of the country. A large portion of the appropriations of this Government have gone for the benefit of the large cities, while the interior of the country has received the benefit of hardly a dollar. Now, it requires no argument to prove that if all the revenue is collected in one part of the country, and expended in another, that portion of the country in which it is collected will grow poor and powerless, while that portion where it is spent will grow rich and mighty. I say, sir, that there is as much of injustice and wrong in the distribution of our revenue as there is in its collection, and I protest against this system by which useless and extraordinary and extravagant appropriations are made for the benefit of the cities, while not a dollar is applied for the benefit of those I represent, and I expect to make this argument and press it upon the House, with, I hope, increasing force, as long as I remain here.

Mr. CLEMENS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I move to amend the amendment, by reducing the amount to $19,000.

Mr. Chairman, I would advise the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] if he has not read the old fable in the spelling-book, of the farmer and the lawyer, the bull and the ox, to get it and read it. Virginia wants something now, and it is exceedingly national. The national heart is touched, says the gentleman. I would like to ask you, sir, and to ask this House, if there is anything more national in its character than that reverence which we should bear to the soldiers who have covered our country with glory, and have preserved our institutions? That is the ax which my friend from Tennessee [Mr. SAVAGE] is charged with desiring to have ground. But the gentleman says that other members have had appropriations for marine hospitals which have failed, and hence their opposition to this amendment. I ask you, sir, because you have a heart and have intelligence, if there is any single proposition that addresses itself more strongly to the feeling and intelligence of citizens of this great and glorious country, than one for the protection of the sick and disabled seamen of our country. The marine hospital at New Orleans, which has attracted the attention of some gentlemen here, is not for the people of Louisiana; it is for the people of the whole country, of the North, the Northeast, the Northwest, who go there in their vessels to trade; and when they come there and are taken sick, some place must be provided—it is the duty of the nation to provide a place for her children who are poor and diseased, and in the service of the country, where they can be received and cared for. Is not that national? Does not it strike you, sir, as a national object? And is not the custom-house national—the custom-house at the port where the largest exports of the nation are made, and the third, if not the second importing port in the country? The gentleman from Virginia would tell us that the custom-house is not national; but the provision for these tools to be put in a shop down here at Portsmouth, in Virginia, to tinker up the vessels that may be brought there is national. It is national because it is in Virginia, and it cannot be put upon any other ground.

Mr. MILLSON. I regret to find that what I designed as a little good-humored correction of the spirit manifested by the gentleman from Louisiana has not had the desired effect. If the gentleman supposes that there is such a general or universal prejudice against Virginia—

Mr. DAVIDSON. No, sir; allow me to correct you.

Mr. MILLSON. Not just now. If he supposes that there is a general antipathy felt in this House to the people of the State of Virginia, I can tell him, for his satisfaction, that I doubt if there is a man, woman, or child in the State of Virginia who knows of the application of the Government for the expenditure of this trifling sum of money.

Mr. DAVIDSON. My remark was only applicable to the gentleman's colleague.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not believe that there is a human being in the State of Virginia who has ever heard of the application of the Government for this small sum of money, to be expended in the purchase of necessary machinery in one of its own public establishments; and if the gentleman says that he referred to my colleague from the Wheeling district, I will tell him that perhaps there is not a gentleman from Virginia upon this floor who has less sympathy, I mean locally, with that part of the State I represent, than that colleague; for we come from opposite points, and I presume that there is less connection or communication between these two parts of the State than any other.

Why was this dock-yard established at Norfolk? Was it simply because the people of Virginia desired it? Was it not because your own interests demanded it? Why are your naval ships built there? Why are they sent to sea? Is it for the protection alone of the people of Virginia, and of their commerce? The gentleman ought to know that it is for the common benefit of the whole country that your naval establishments are kept up. Why, then, does the gentleman seek to create the impression that this is an appropriation in which the people of Virginia are alone interested? It is a demand made of the Government for its own purposes. You—the people of the United States—own a large amount of property at that part of the State; and it is necessary that this property should be so used as to make it effective for the public service.

Mr. DAVIDSON withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on the Senate amendment.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 73, noes 48.

Mr. SAVAGE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BLAIR and MILLSON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 79, noes 46.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

For the completion of the coal depot at Key West, Florida, $20,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. In 1853, $25,000 was appropriated to complete this coal depot, and it requires $20,000 more to complete it now. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

That the Secretaries of the Treasury and Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to ascertain, in such way as they may deem best, the actual value of the ten acres of land heretofore belonging to the naval hospital estate at Chelsea, Massachusetts, and ceded by the sixth section of "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service of the Government," approved the 3d March, 1855, for the purposes of a marine hospital for the district of Boston and Charlestown. And the Secretary of the Treasury shall pay the so ascertained value of the said ten acres, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to the credit of the naval hospital fund, out of which the original purchase of the property so ceded was made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in this amendment. There is no dispute about the facts of this case. The sum arising from a deduction of twenty cents per month from the pay of mariners, to create a naval hospital fund, was invested as early as 1811, in the purchase of these ten acres of land. That ten acres of land, by an act of the Government, was devoted to another purpose, namely, a site for a marine hospital. This amendment provides merely for a transfer from the marine hospital fund to the naval hospital fund, as the Government had taken the property belonging to the naval hospital fund and devoted it to marine hospital purposes. The amendment does not appropriate one dollar from the Treasury, but simply makes a transfer from one fund to another.

Mr. BRANCH. I understand the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means to say that this makes no appropriation. If so, I would like to ask him what business it has in an appropriation bill?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I can only say to the gentleman that that is a very hard question for me to answer. The Senate put it there, and they claim the right, under the Constitution, to amend our bills. I have already said that I concur in the views of the gentlemen from Ohio and North Carolina [Messrs. SHERMAN and BRANCH] in reference to putting a stop to this mode of legislation. But the Committee of Ways and Means decided that it would be a usurpation upon their part to do so, and more especially until they could have some assurance beforehand, from the House, that they would be sustained in that course.

Mr. BRANCH. I cast no censure upon the Committee of Ways and Means. They have done their duty and done it faithfully, I have no doubt. Perhaps the circumstances were not such as would justify them in refusing to recommend an amendment simply because it was new legislation. But, sir, it is within the province of this House, it is within the power of this House, to put a stop to this erroneous system of legislation.

Mr. WINSLOW. Will the gentleman allow me to say a word? This would be an improper measure upon which to apply the doctrine of my colleague, because this very act of injustice, which the amendment seeks to remedy, was accomplished in this very way, by putting an amendment upon an appropriation bill. This naval hospital fund is one created by a tax imposed upon seamen. The Government has not contributed one cent to it. This subject has been before the Committee on Naval Affairs, and they reported a bill which is now upon the Speaker's table, reported from that committee, which is identical with this amendment. We only now ask that you shall give to these men the measure of justice which ought to be dealt out to them in the very way and mode by which they were deprived of their property.

Mr. BRANCH. That makes the case worse than it appeared before, because a rule of this House says that you shall not attach to a bill pending before the committee another bill pending before the committee. That, then, is a violation of a second rule.

Now, I wish to say that, for one, I intend to vote to strike out from our appropriation bills every proposition which the Senate makes for attaching to them objects of independent legislation which have no business to be attached to them. Now, sir, if we reject these bills because the Senate attach to them improper appropriations, we have the whole summer before us to start new bills, and to put them into a shape which shall be satisfactory to this House. We are prohibited by our rules from moving an amendment to an appropriation bill, which the chairman shall deem to be new legislation. We have all seen, time after time, attempts made in this House to ingraft upon appropriation bills measures of reform—propositions for abolishing or changing laws which the House did not consider good laws; and we have as frequently seen them ruled out of order. We are thus prohibited from cutting off abuses; but when our bills go over to the Senate, they are loaded down, and sent back to us bearing upon them almost innumerable provisions for increasing abuses. We are thus prohibited from reforming anything, while the same prohibition does not prevent the Senate from increasing abuses which already exist.

Mr. WINSLOW obtained the floor.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman will give way for a moment, I will have an official communication, in reference to this matter, read.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. There is no question about the correctness of this proposition as an independent proposition, and therefore I see no use in having a document read.

Mr. BRANCH. I do not assail the amendment upon its merits. I have no doubt that it will pass.

The letter was read, and is as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT,
BUREAU OF MEDICINE AND SURGERY, April 7, 1858.
SIR: In reply to your communication of the 5th instant, inquiring from what source the "necessary funds were collected for the original purchase of the United States hospital lands at Chelsea, and if any means were resorted to except the tax called the hospital tax, deducted from the monthly pay of officers, seamen, and marines." I have the honor to say that the original purchase money was derived exclusively from the hospital fund.

It may be pertinent to the inquiry to state that, as early as March 2, 1799, Congress passed an act directing the Secretary of the Navy to deduct twenty cents per month, after the 1st day of September ensuing, from the pay of the officers, seamen, and marines, of the Navy of the United States, and to pay the same quarter annually to the Secretary of the Treasury, to be applied to the temporary relief and maintenance of the sick and disabled seamen in hospitals or other proper institutions; and when the fund shall be sufficient, to purchase grounds, &c.

In February, 1811, Congress established a board of commissioners, & by name and style, commissioners of Navy hospitals, consisting of the Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Treasury, and Secretary of War, who were empowered to take charge of the funds collected under the act of March 2, 1799, and were required "to procure, at suitable places, proper sites for Navy hospitals."

In pursuance of this enactment, Smith Thompson, then Secretary of the Navy, purchased the estate at Chelsea, Massachusetts, on the 11th August, 1823, and directed the agent, William L. Rogers, then a purser in the Navy, to have the deed of conveyance made out in the names of the Secretary of the Navy, Secretary of the Treasury, and Secretary of War, "for the time being commissioners of naval hospitals and trustees of the Navy hospital fund."

On the 16th of October following, Constant Freeman, then Fourth Auditor of the Treasury Department, notified Mr. Rogers that the purchase money had been remitted and debited to the Navy hospital fund.

It would thus appear that the hospital fund, accruing from a tax upon the pay of the Navy, was the only means resorted to for the acquisition of the property, the best portion of which has been alienated for objects not contemplated by the statutes authorizing this deduction from the pay of the Navy.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

W. WHELAN.

Hon. WARREN WINSLOW,
House of Representatives, Washington.

Mr. STANTON. I propose to say a word or two in regard to this question; and to enable me to do so, I move to amend by striking out the first four lines.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. How will the Senate amendment then read?

The CHAIRMAN. It will not make very good sense.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I insist upon it that the gentleman has no right to propose an amendment which leaves no sense in the Senate amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. STANTON. Then I withdraw my amendment, and move to strike out all after the word "Charlestown," in the one hundred and eighty-second line; so that the Senate amendment will read:

That the Secretaries of the Treasury and the Navy be, and they are hereby, authorized and required to ascertain, in such way as they may deem best, the actual value of the ten acres of land heretofore belonging to the naval hospital estate at Chelsea, Massachusetts, and ceded by the sixth section of "An act making appropriations for the civil and diplomatic service of the Government," approved the 3d of March, 1855, for the purposes of a marine hospital for the district of Boston and Charlestown.

I desire simply to say, that, as I understand the proposition, taken as a separate, independent proposition, it would be entirely unobjectionable. I do not understand that any gentleman would vote against it as an independent proposition in a separate bill. If gentlemen will turn to the amendments, they will find that almost the entire amendments of the Senate, after this, are made up of matters of independent legislation. Now, my suggestion is, that the vote on this amendment shall be regarded as a test vote as to whether this House will tolerate independent legislation in appropriation bills; so that, if this fails, the residue of the amendments, being matters of independent legislation, will be regarded as rejected by the committee.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Virginia made an argument, half an hour ago, to which I do not propose to reply. I do not propose to spend the time of the House in vindicating my own consistency, for, after all, that is a thing about which the House does not care.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will agree to test it on something else, because this amendment is not to change any law, but merely to shift an appropriation that is in the Treasury from one purpose to another. The gentleman can raise his point on the next amendment, and take his test vote on it.

Mr. STANTON. The only difference is, that this is much the better case to test it. It is unobjectionable in itself, and is only objectionable on the ground that it is independent legislation. I want to take the question on a proposition that is otherwise unobjectionable, for the purpose of ascertaining the sense of the committee; and I hope the committee will insist on it to the bitter end.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think that if the committee understood this matter it would not hesitate a moment in concurring with the Senate in this amendment, nor do I think it liable to the objection which the gentleman urges. In the first place, this fund is raised from the officers, seamen, and marines of the Navy, by a tax of twenty cents a month levied upon them, which has gone to swell up the naval hospital fund. It is the only fund to which the Government has not heretofore contributed a single dollar. The hard earnings of these men are invested in this land at Chelsea. Some one came here and procured to be voted away ten acres of land belonging to these poor seamen. The measure was passed on the last day of the session of the Thirty-Second Congress, inadvertently, without consideration, and without the knowledge or approbation of the Naval Committee; and they ask you now merely to do—what? To restore to them the land which you gave away without authority. You were the trustees for them, and you gave away the lands of your c'estui que trust, without the slightest consideration.

So much as to the merits of the proposition as to which all the gentlemen who have addressed the committee agree with me. Now, in regard to the question of order. The amendment is perfectly in order. We have in the House rules of order preventing independent legislation on appropriation bills. They have no such rule of order in the Senate, and they have a right, as a co-ordinate and coequal branch of the Legislature, to put just such amendments on the bills which you send to them as they think proper. When these amendments come here they are addressed to your discretion; you can pass upon them and reject them; but you cannot bring your rules of order to bear upon the other branch of Congress. But, even if you were to apply the very stringent rule advocated by the gentleman from Ohio, this amendment is not liable to the objection. The amendment has reference to money in the Treasury raised by taxes upon seamen, with which this property was purchased. You have gone there, taken off what belonged to them, and given it away to another. They merely ask you to restore to them what you took away from them; to pass to the credit of this fund the value of the property you abstracted from it. Will you decline?

Mr. STANTON. With the consent of the committee let this amendment be agreed to; and let us go to the eighth amendment, which is a proposition to publish a naval code.

Mr. BOCOCK. The gentleman has a particular object in view. He has his eye on other things, and I have my eye on him.

Mr. STANTON. I have not, sir.

Mr. BOCOCK. The gentleman has been moving in these sloops-of-war all through these proceedings.

Mr. STANTON. The gentleman is mistaken. It is not the ships I am talking about; but the naval code.

Mr. BOCOCK. But you want to commit the committee in advance.

Mr. STANTON. Oh! no.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I propose to strike out the words "in such a way as they may deem best."

I do not propose, Mr. Chairman, to detain the committee even five minutes in the discussion of this amendment. It is, I believe, conceded that the fund which originally purchased these ten acres came from a certain body of beneficiaries, that they have been deprived as well of the fund, as of its resulting use, and consequent trust—the land. It is as simple, therefore, as a proposition can be made simple. It is that they who have been deprived of a fund, and of the use of a fund, shall have that fund or its use restored to them by those who have deprived them of it.

Now, in respect to this amendment, as a part of a series of amendments, it is sufficiently clear that this class of amendments is in order—abundantly in order. It proceeds from a competent body. If we have reference only to the comity existing between the two Houses we shall be obliged to accept and to treat with respect the amendments of the Senate, and we cannot and should not strike out an amendment made in order in the Senate, although it would have been rejected here as out of order, if originating here; and certainly should not an amendment be rejected if, as in this case, it had direct application to a subject, which, though greatly different from the subject of the bill before us, nevertheless is a subject of common and general interest to the country, involving as well the commercial and agricultural interests of the country, as its honor and its dignity at home and abroad. I trust, therefore, that we shall proceed regularly through with these Senate amendments. I now withdraw my amendment.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

To enable the Secretary of the Navy to pay the salary of Professor James P. Espy, $2,000, the payment to be made in the same manner, and under the like control, as former appropriations for meteorological observations: Provided, That the employment of a meteorologist, under the contract of the Secretary of the Navy, shall cease on and after the 30th day of June, 1859.

The amendment was concurred in.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

Here the committee rose informally; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, a message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the bill of the House making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1859, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the bill and amendments be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means, and ordered to be printed.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

The committee then resumed its session.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

Eighth amendment:

Provided, That the provisions of the seventh section of the naval appropriation bill approved March 3, 1857, directing the Secretary of the Navy to have prepared, and to report to Congress at this session for its approval, a code of regulations for the government of the Navy, &c., be extended to the next session of Congress.

Mr. STANTON. That amendment is not of much consequence, and I will ask for tellers upon it, with a view of settling the question whether we will legislate in general appropriation bills.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to explain the amendment. Congress provided that the Secretary of the Navy should have a code prepared, and that he should report it at the opening of this session of Congress. They have not been able to complete the code, and this amendment provides that they may have until the next session of Congress to report it.

Mr. STANTON. The amendment contains no appropriation, and has no business in an appropriation bill. It is a harmless thing, and, I dare say, a useless thing; and, therefore, I ask tellers, in order that we may determine once for all if we mean to legislate in appropriation bills.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 42.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

That the Superintendent of Public Printing be, and he is hereby, directed to transfer to the bureau of ordnance and hydrography the plates from which the illustrations and charts of the late Japan expedition were printed.

The amendment was concurred in.

Tenth amendment:

Insert:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st day of July, 1856, the clerks, messengers, and watchmen at the navy-yard and marine barracks at Washington shall be entitled to receive the compensation authorized by the acts of April 22, 1854, and August 5, 1854, for the payment of which such sum as may be necessary be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Eleventh amendment:

Insert:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful to enlist boys for service in the United States marine corps, with the consent of their parents or guardians, not being under eleven nor over seventeen years of age, to serve until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years; the boys so enlisted to receive the same pay, rations, clothing, &c., now received by boys enlisted in said corps under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The committee is aware that there is a provision of law for enlisting boys into the naval service. This is intended to apply to the marine corps the same system. The committee recommend a non-concurrence in the amendment because there was no limitation to the number, and no purpose specified for their use.

Mr. PHELPS. I concur in the amendment. I learn that the object of this provision of the Senate is this: we have been in the habit of enlisting boys with the consent of their parents, and employing them in the marine corps for the purpose of becoming a part of the marine band. The law which authorizes the enlistment for the naval and the marine service, only authorizes enlistments for four years, so that after these lads had been instructed as musicians and composed a part of the marine band, they were discharged instead of serving until they were twenty-one. They receive the same pay as marines and are on duty as musicians. I think that the amendment ought to be concurred in.

Mr. BRANCH. I move to insert after "marine corps" the words, "and in the United States Army."

Mr. Chairman, I should like to be informed of some reason why this amendment should be concurred in. I take it for granted that those who have put this provision into an appropriation bill, have looked into the subject and found it right and proper to employ youths of eleven and twelve years in the marine corps. I do not know what reason makes their employment proper in the marine corps that will not make their employment proper in the Army. We might as well give authority for their employment in the one as in the other. I presume that the other members of the committee know as little about this as I do. We have little opportunity to know whether it is desirable to enlist boys in the marine corps. It was long a matter of discussion whether boys should be employed in the Navy, and it was only after years of effort that the measure was enacted into law. We are now, on an appropriation bill under the five-minute rule and with no full opportunity of examination, called upon to apply that same provision to another branch of the public service. If we have authority in the one case, I think that we have as much to give it in the other. The information in the one case is as much as it is in the other, and we had as well throw open the door. I think, however, that it all had better be stricken out; and if such a provision be recommended by the naval authorities, let it be made in a separate bill, where we can vote independently on it, without being compelled to pass it on the penalty of losing one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. The only alteration made in the existing law is this: boys may now be enlisted in the marine corps with the consent of their parents, but they are discharged after four years' service. They are paid as marines and are on duty upon the marine band. This provides that they shall be enlisted, with the consent of their parents, until they are twenty-one.

Mr. RUSSELL. Why is it put in an appropriation bill?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. That is my objection to it. The House has already settled that point, however, by incorporating other provisions of general legislation into these appropriation bills; one was made a test, and it was voted in. These boys perform duty as musicians. Now, when they are educated, and fully able to act as musicians, they are discharged. This extends their service until they are twenty-one.

Mr. BRANCH. My objection to this, if I had no other, is, that it is not germane to an appropriation bill. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move, pro forma, to strike out "seventeen," and to insert in lieu thereof "eighteen." I do this for the purpose of saying a word on this subject, and furnishing some information which I think it desirable the House should possess, before voting on the Senate amendment. The law which enables apprentices to be enlisted for the naval service is that of 1837. It provides that it shall be lawful to enlist boys for the Navy, with the consent of their parents or guardians, not being under thirteen nor over eighteen years of age, and to serve until they shall arrive at the age of twenty-one years. It has been decided by competent judicial authority that this law does not provide for the enlistment of marines, and this amendment of the Senate is to provide for that omission. The question is simply this, (and it can as well be understood in two minutes as in two years:) is it important to allow apprentices to be injected into the marine corps, as it is important and beneficial to inject them into our naval service?

The reason for introducing an apprentice system in the Navy, is this: in our naval and commercial marine, the ratio of American sailors, in the aggregate to foreign sailors, is as two in every one hundred; and in the marine corps the proportion is thought to be about the same; and in order to recruit the service and to inject a sufficient degree of American spirit in the marine corps as is being infused into the naval service, it is requisite and essential that this provision should be adopted. It is also a great measure for the depletion of the low and degraded population of our cities. There are thousands of boys, who, if opportunity were furnished, would enter the marine corps, and eventually become ornaments to the corps, as they now are ornaments to the naval service.

This comprehends the whole circle of information necessary to vote upon this amendment, and I hope it will be concurred in.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If this amendment is adopted in the language in which it is written, these boys will get no pay at all. It has evidently been copied from an old bill, without making the change requisite to make it perfect. It provides for the enlistment of boys into the marine service—a thing not before provided for by law—and then it goes on to say that the boys "shall receive the same pay and rations now received by boys enlisted in said corps, under the authority of the Secretary of the Navy." I merely wanted to call the attention of the committee to this fact, so that while this matter is in the hands of the committee it may be put into such a shape as will make it effectual.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

The Senate amendment was then concurred in.

Twelfth amendment:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That to defray the expenses and compensation of a commissioner to the Republic of Paraguay, (should it be deemed proper by the President to appoint one,) in execution of the joint resolution of the present session "for the adjustment of difficulties with the Republic of Paraguay," $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary: Provided, That the compensation hereby allowed shall not exceed the rate of $7,500 per annum for the time employed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Upon this amendment I have very little to say. I ask the Clerk to read the resolution referred to in the amendment.

The resolution was read; and is as follows:

"That for the purpose of adjusting the differences between the United States and the Republic of Paraguay in connection with the attack on the United States steamer Water Witch, and with other matters referred to in the annual message of the President, he be, and is hereby, authorized to adopt such measures and use such force as, in his judgment, may be necessary and advisable in the event of a refusal of just satisfaction by the Government of Paraguay."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This amendment is to carry out that resolution.

The amendment was concurred in.

Thirteenth amendment:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That all the steamships of the Navy of the United States now building, or hereafter to be built, shall be named by the Secretary of the Navy, under the direction of the President of the United States, according to the following rule, namely: all those of forty guns or more shall be considered of the first class, and shall be called after the States of the Union; those of twenty guns, and under forty, shall be considered as of the second class, and be called after the rivers and principal towns or cities; and all those of less than twenty guns shall be the third class, and named by the Secretary of the Navy, as the President may direct, care being taken that no two vessels in the Navy shall bear the same name.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This is a repetition of an old act, which was applied to sailing vessels, made applicable to the steam marine. It will cost nothing, and the committee recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourteenth amendment:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy cause to be constructed, as speedily as may be consistent with the public interests, five steam screw sloops-of-war, with full steam power, whose greatest draught of water shall not exceed fourteen feet, which ships shall combine the heaviest armament and greatest speed compatible with their character and tonnage; and one side-wheel war steamer, whose greatest draught shall not exceed eight feet, armed and provided for service in the China seas; and that there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, the sum of $1,200,000 out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. HATCH. I want to offer an amendment to that.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This is the last amendment to the House bill; and it provides for five steam screw sloops-of-war of fourteen feet draught, and one side-wheel steamer of eight feet draught, for service in the Chinese seas.

The committee recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. BOCOCK. I move to strike out "five" and to insert "ten."

I was stating this morning, when I was cut off by the expiration of my time, that the proposition I now bring forward was recommended by the Secretary of the Navy in the beginning of the session. I stated that ten of these small steamers were needed in our Navy for a peace establishment. I intended to say further, that, in view of the present condition of our foreign relations, not with reference to a war, but for the purpose of preventing war, we ought to have our peace establishment full and complete. Weakness invites aggression; strength repels and prevents aggression. If it is known that you may be attacked with impunity, attacks will come. Gentlemen well know that. If it is known that you are ready to repel assaults, nations will be slow to make them. Nations, in this respect, are like individuals.

I was stating this morning that I recommended this as a measure of economy; and I stated, furthermore, that I did not intend to recommend any change in the amount of money appropriated. I believe this sum is enough to carry on these ten small sloops during this year, and until we can obtain more.

I wish to suggest this to the members of the committee: our navy-yards—that feature of our naval system which causes so much expense to the Government—have their complement of men now full. They have their usual appropriations made to them. What are these laborers doing in the navy-yards? They are engaged in making repairs, many of which will be needless, provided this proposition passes. Take the workmen from those repairs, and put them on the construction of these new, well-equipped and well-provided steamers; and to that extent you do not increase the expenses of the Government, and you do good to the country.

Mr. QUITMAN. I wish to know whether the amendment provides that some of them shall be of lighter draught?

Mr. BOCOCK. I wish to have all of them of lighter draught. The distinguished Senator from Florida, who is as well acquainted with naval affairs as any man in the country, insisted on allowing these vessels a draught of fourteen feet. I disagree with him, in my humble way, in regard to this matter. I think the draught of twelve feet amply sufficient. But I wish to say to the gentleman from Mississippi that, if the provision passes as it now is in regard to the draught of water, it will not require all to be of fourteen feet draught. That is fixed as the maximum merely. Some may be of fourteen feet draught, some of twelve, some of ten, some of eight, and as low as possible to have them built, so as to be effective and well-armed ships.

A gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. Grow] said the other day that he saw no need of adding to the Navy, and that the Navy was as strong now, in proportion, as it was in 1816. I was sorry to hear the gentleman make such a statement in the face of the House and of the country. We have now no more Navy than we had in 1816. It is not increased at all. Our coast-line to be defended has increased about two-fold, and our tonnage has swelled five-fold. We then had but one third of the tonnage of Great Britain. Now we have more tonnage than Great Britain herself. With all our Pacific coast, with new lines of commerce opened up, with all those requirements for a Navy, we have now no larger Navy than we had in 1816. We have now only forty-two effective ships in our Navy. Great Britain has five or six hundred. She has more than ten times the number that we have. Then, I say, while all these demands are upon our Navy, will gentlemen sit here still and stolid, and see the Navy sunk? I ask, how long is this thing to go on? I tell gentlemen that we must build new ships as long as metal rusts and wood decays. The vessels you have in your Navy will decay. They will get out of order. The fashions of them pass away, and you have to build others to take their places. This is no war measure. It is to put our Navy on a footing of respectability. It is a measure of economy, and I hope the American Congress will come up and vote it through with a strong and decided vote.

Mr. HATCH. I propose to amend by providing for four additional mail steamers for service on the northwestern lakes.

The CHAIRMAN. There is an amendment to an amendment pending, and this, being an amendment in the third degree, is not in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Cannot the amendment offered by the gentleman from Virginia be amended?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it cannot.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then suppose there are those here who want twenty ships instead of ten?

The CHAIRMAN. Vote this down, and they can put in twenty.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. But I would rather have ten than five, and this is forcing me to vote against my wish.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I give notice that I intend to offer an amendment providing for an additional number, of lighter draught.

Mr. MILLSON. The practice has been very varied in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on this very point, and I should like the decision of the present occupant of the chair upon it. I know it is sometimes held that the Senate amendments are to be regarded as amendments. It has, however, been held more frequently, I believe, that the Senate amendments are to be regarded as the text. I submit the question of order, and wish to have it decided by the Chair, one way or another.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Page 123 of the Manual, I think, disposes of that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that the original text is the House bill. It went to the Senate, and has been amended. It came back in the nature of a motion to amend. The gentleman from Virginia proposes to amend that amendment. That amendment is in the second degree, and the Chair holds that no further amendment is in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then, if we adopt the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, the amendment thus amended is open to amendment? I presume that is the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be then open to amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then, there is no difficulty about the question. The proposition is to strike out and insert. I call for a division of the question, which will be to strike out.

The CHAIRMAN. Under the rules of the House, it is not divisible; but if the motion to strike out and insert fails, another motion can be made to strike out and insert something else.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I oppose the amendment because it is evidently an attempt to deprive the lakes and rivers of their share of the war. If you will give us our share of it, we will take it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suggest to my colleague that he should move to strike out merely, so that we can move to insert afterwards. I fear, if we put in ten, we shall not be able to put in twenty afterwards.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I give notice that I have an amendment which I intend to offer for the construction of ten more vessels of lighter draught.

Tellers were ordered on Mr. BOCK's amendment; and Messrs. AVERY and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 43.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HATCH. I offer the following amendment:

In line ten, after the words "China seas," insert the following:

And four additional war steamers for service on the northwestern lakes, as to size within the limitation of the treaty between the United States and Great Britain.

Mr. SICKLES. I suggest to my friend and colleague that he offer his amendment as an additional provision, and not to incorporate it in the other amendment, so that each may stand by itself.

Mr. HATCH. Mr. Chairman, it is quite immaterial to me whether the amendment is incorporated or voted on separately for the purpose I have in view. I have no desire to occupy the time of the committee in discussing this amendment. I have heard many war speeches in this House.

I shall not stop to inquire whether we are going to have any war or not. If war is impending and necessary to defend our national honor, the brave men of the West and of the northern frontier, as in 1812, will be ready, and my own frontier constituency will not be particular about the cause of war, if an opportunity is again presented to avenge traditional wrongs against their old enemy. We want no more Anglo-American protectorates on this continent. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, that bungling piece of American diplomacy, must be abrogated. We must maintain the Monroe doctrine of "non-interference" from all the world with any of the institutions or soil of this continent. Cuba will be ours, as were Louisiana and Florida, when the allied Powers forced upon us the issue for self-preservation. England must surrender Roatan, and turn her protruding bloodshot eye from Cuba. But, sir, my object was not to discuss these war questions, but mainly to maintain the equal and constitutional rights of the West in all that relates to their internal commerce, their military and naval protection; and so long as I occupy a seat upon this floor, and it is asked that the fortifications on the Atlantic coast shall be increased, so long shall I ask, as one of the Representatives of the lake States, that the fortifications upon their coast shall be repaired and put in order, and that the naval force, which the treaty between the two countries allows us upon these lakes, shall be put in active service. If they want sloop-of-war and Dahlgren guns on the Atlantic coast, and even in the China seas, we want them on the lake coast, and I hope they will be voted. We ask in the Northwest that our harbors may be repaired and improved, and our channels cleared for the movement of naval forces to and from our inland seas. If you do this, we will dispense, for the present, with your gun-boats; for we have a lake marine that is abundantly able to take care of the common defense. If you do not improve our harbors and open our national channels, then the least that this Government can do, is to give equal naval protection to the inland coast that it does to the Atlantic coast. We have an inland coast equal in national importance, as it is in extent, to the seacoast. The trade and commerce of the lakes supply over half of the revenue of this Government. We, who bear so heavily the burden of Government—are we, sir, to share in none of the blessings of Government?

If there is to be an increase of our Navy, why should not some war vessels be got ready for the protection of our immense lake regions? The French war of 1750, the war of the American Revolution in 1776, the war of 1812, were all fought on these inland seas, and in the bordering country. Who can say that the theater of our future wars is to be changed?

Every man knows, Mr. Chairman, that the most illustrious naval victories in this country were achieved upon our northern lakes. Every man knows that peace was secured by those victories on the northern lakes.

The great battle of New Orleans occurred after the fact of peace was already fixed by these naval victories.

I do not want to detain the committee with any great array of facts. Intelligent men know how vast is our inland commerce. We ought to have some consideration at the hand of this Government, and the postponement of our equal rights will only add to our claims, and increase our political and numerical supremacy in the West to enforce them.

Mr. KEITT. Mr. Chairman, the public mind is inflamed by British aggressions upon our flag and commerce in the Gulf of Mexico; and the popular heart is answering back to excited appeals to the resentment and pride of the country. In the present inflammable state of the political atmosphere, the smallest indiscretion may lead to an embittered and disastrous war. I know very well that oftentimes popular legislative bodies are scarcely more removed from the heats of mere irritation and excitement than unorganized masses of men, rocked by impulse and unchecked by responsibilities. This liability, this proneness to excitation, this sympathy with popular ardor, I have seen but recently, both in this House and in the Senate. Sir, if it do not lead to disastrous results, I shall not regret it; for I would rather see too much zeal than too little zeal. The safety of a nation is the great concern of its legislators; and the safety of a nation lies in its honor. Self-respect is the foundation of the civic virtues in an individual or a people; and it can only be preserved by preserving untouched the honor of the one or the other. To maintain the honor and preserve the safety of the country I cheerfully voted, this morning, for the ten sloop-of-war. I will vote now, or hereafter, whatever may be needed for this purpose.

But, sir, I see no necessity for a resort to immediate hostilities. It is true that international law has been violated, and our rights invaded, by the recent outrages upon our flag and our vessels, committed by British cruisers in the waters of the Gulf; but a sufficient acknowledgment and reparation for these offensive acts may be made by Great Britain; at least, it is due to her, to ourselves, to the peace and civilization of the world, that we should give her the opportunity to make such acknowledgment and reparation. Sir, a war now between Great Britain and the United States will be interecine; it will involve the peace, the progress, and the civilization of the world, in its tremendous consequences; it will, for ages to come, eclipse free institutions on the continent of Europe. Shall we invite or invoke such a conflict, without all the forms and ceremonies and solemnities which should inaugurate it? Never, sir, with my consent.

But I never will consent to submit to the right of search or visitation of our vessels in time of peace. This right must be relinquished by Great Britain, or rather its exercise must be relinquished, or war with her is inevitable. The distinction between the right of search and visitation is purely fanciful. The latter is the graft of modern diplomacy upon the effete body of the former. Visitation can only be carried out by the means and in the manner which constitute search. The difference between them is utterly unsubstantial, and is only one of the tricks of a cunning diplomacy. I maintain that the right of search or visitation is a purely belligerent right. As such, only, is it claimed by all the writers on public law. Grotius, Bernstoff, Bynkershoek, Merlin, all claim it merely as one of the rights of war. No writer on international law, no judicial decision, puts it upon any other ground. In any other aspect it has always been resisted by the most civilized and powerful nations of modern Europe. France has resisted it from the time of Queen Elizabeth. Grotius, in the third book and first chapter of his Regule Generales ex Jure Naturæ, says:

"Upon the peace of Vervais, made with the Spaniards, whilst Queen Elizabeth of England persisted in the war, the French were requested by the English to allow their vessels going to Spain to be visited, for fear, perchance, munitions of war might be concealed in them; but not even this would they permit, saying that it might be perverted into a pretext for spoiliations, and for the interruption of commerce."

Great Britain, too, has denied and resisted this right. She forbade the Netherlands, flagrante bello, visiting her vessels. Her very treaty stipulations deny and repudiate this right. In the fifth article of the treaty between Great Britain and Portugal, July 28, 1817, provision is made for the prevention of illicit traffic, by authorizing the navies of each, under instructions, to visit suspected merchant vessels; but it is limited by the fourth article, which declares—

"That no Portuguese merchantman or slave ship, on any pretense whatever, shall be detained, which shall be found anywhere near the land, or on the high seas, south of the equator, unless after a chase commenced north of the equator."

Great Britain, in this treaty with a weak and feeble dependent—for Portugal was such—admits that the right of search or visitation is a conventional, not a natural right.

The waters of Portugal are sacred; the jurisdiction of Portugal is supreme; and yet our waters are dishonored by her war ships, and our jurisdiction is insulted by her officers. From our own waters the Stryx went forth in chase after our ships, and in indifference to our flag. For these we must have acknowledgment and reparation. But, I repeat it, these can be obtained through negotiations; at least, the resources of negotiation should be exhausted before we resort to the arbitrament of battle. Sir, grave and delicate foreign questions are now pressing upon us; and a wise and sagacious diplomacy is needed. We cannot hazard the peace of the world, and our progress, by incautious and dangerous counsels. The improvidence on the part of the Secretary of State may have had much to do in driving us into our present critical and alarming complication with Great Britain. His suggestion that Great Britain could more effectually prevent the slave trade by blockading the coast of Cuba might accord with the ambition of Great Britain, but not with the interests and policy of the United States. When Great Britain blockades the coast of Cuba, she will sound the trump of war with us; for she cannot make such a blockade without, in its prosecution, involving herself in such invasions of our jurisdiction, such infringements of our neutral rights, and such interruptions of our commerce, as will never be submitted to. The British flag cannot be long in the Gulf without American eagles gathering there. This, however, is in the future. For the present, negotiations can extricate us. The President of the United States is ripe in experience, consummate in diplomacy, and sensitive to the honor of the country; and to his hands I will confidently commit the adjustment of our present difficulties with Great Britain.

But, sir, though I see no reasonable danger of war now, I do not see so much brightness in the future. A war with Great Britain is, I fear, inevitable. We are her great commercial rival, and this rivalry is breeding heats and contentions and heartburnings. The scepter is passing from her, and our outstretched hands are ready to clutch it. Will she part from it without a struggle? When her maritime ascendancy is gone, what is she? A third-rate Power. Will she willingly sink down into this lowly estate? Already our tonnage equals hers; and the products of our labor and skill meet her in every market. The homogeneous action of the labor, skill, enterprise, genius, power, products, energy, of every portion of the Union, and these made tributary to our foreign commerce by restrictive laws and extravagant bounties, have already made us the commercial rival of Great Britain, and soon will make us her master. Besides, the "tread of our pioneers is heard in the western forests," and cities are springing up to mark and illustrate their trackway. The tramp of our marching columns is even now ringing over the wastes of South America, and the strong hand of our people will soon seize the very seat of tropical power and tropical wealth. We are every day increasing our resources, widening our area, extending our boundaries, and enlarging the volume of our power. If we are now the favored and prosperous rivals of Great Britain, when we have carried our institutions to the furthest South, when we have unbound the zones of the tropics, and have given form and vitality to the wealth and power which have for ages been sleeping there, can we be other than her master? Will she submit to our ascendancy? To build up her maritime superiority, Great Britain has squandered more millions than there are figures in arithmetic to calculate; to hold the scepter of the seas, she has shed blood enough for her navies to ride in; to rear up her magnificent hierarchy, political and commercial, she has consigned generations of her people to wretchedness. Will she now give up all of these, and give them up without a struggle? I know full well that eight millions of her people depend upon cotton for their daily bread, and I know that these are bonds strong and powerful to hold her to peace; but I know, too, that to carry out her stern policy in Ireland, she threw away untold treasure, and sent one million of her Irish citizens to the grave. From every hill and every valley of that doomed and fated land came ringing upon her the appealing shrieks of her starved and dying people; and yet she pressed on to the consummation of her stern policy, through the tears and blood and ashes of Ireland. Will she shrink from a conflict with us, when her naval power and commercial superiority are at stake? No; though she rush upon her fate, and go down in the shock, she will still encounter it.

Thus, sir, I would prepare for the future. If it does not come in threat and storm, so much the better; if thus it does come, we are forearmed. But I would avoid war now. A war with Great Britain, at this time, would shake our whole industrial system, paralyze our industrial energies, consolidate the Government, and fasten upon it iniquitous legislation. We are growing faster than any people on earth. Trending to us are the destinies and the power of the world. We have only to preserve a "masterly inactivity." "Entangling alliances" we must avoid; and where they exist, we must disentangle ourselves from them. The treaty of Washington must be ended, for it only involves us in difficulties and decimates our Navy. The Clayton-Bulwer treaty, too, must be ended, for it would bind our feet while standing in the very porch of the temple of tropical wealth and power. Through peace we shall daily grow stronger; and by keeping aloof from "entangling alliances" we may avoid collision with foreign Powers. Great Britain, France, and Russia, are grimly watching each other. There will be a trial of strength between them for the empire of the East. The Slavonic race is moving on to the Mediterranean. Inheriting the skill of the Greek, and the diplomacy of the Byzantine age, with the nerve of the Asiatic, strengthened, hardened, and consolidated by the frosts of northern Europe, this race is destined to play a magnificent part in the drama which shall settle the fate of the world. In the involvement of these events peace is our policy. It may be in our reach to preserve it in the future; let us not recklessly endanger it now. Our rights I will maintain; our honor I will defend; but we may do both now without blood. Of the Gulf of Mexico I would say, as the Romans said of the Mediterranean, mare nostrum, and no hostile vessel should invade its waters, and cast upon our coast its baleful shadows. The present exigency may be wisely used to throw off "entangling alliances," and obtain supremacy for us in the Gulf of Mexico.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I hope the vote will be taken on this the last Senate amendment before we take a recess.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I move to strike out all after the word "specified."

Mr. Chairman, to my apprehension the most preposterous of all preposterous things is, that in order to keep the peace you must go armed to the teeth. It is an absurdity, applied either to an individual or to a nation. It is well known that all civilized nations prohibit, by legal penalties, the carrying of arms upon the person. These propositions are to carry us back to the old feudal times, when every baron built his castle and surrounded himself with moat, drawbridge, and portcullis, and armed his retainers to keep off his neighbors. I protest against the whole idea. It is preposterous, unchristian, and tends towards barbarism. Besides that, it is utterly useless. These few gun-boats—what will they do? Absolutely nothing. It will be a perfect failure, nothing else. They are no means of defense, but merely a means of depleting the Treasury. And you must have your gun-boats bristling all over the Pacific coast, the whole Atlantic coast, the whole lake coast, the whole Mississippi and Ohio banks. Do you propose to do that? No, sir; you do not. As a means of defense, therefore, it is utterly inadequate; and, as I understand it, is an old scheme which will be an utter abortion. In Mr. Jefferson's day they had to hitch up mules and haul these boats up, and put sheds over them to preserve them; and when you wanted them they were utterly useless; and so these will be.

Mr. GARNETT. I protest against the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. Lovejoy,] because he says that my colleague's amendment is a war measure. It cannot be so considered; for, in the first place, the number of ships proposed to be built would be preposterously small for an English war; and secondly, they could not be built in time for any war that could arise out of the present difficulties. My colleague expressly declared that he made the proposition without regard to those difficulties. For my part, I concur with the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Kerr,] that there will be no war. The war agitation has been food for stockjobbers and demagogues, and can be of no service to anybody else.

I do not, however, agree with the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. Kerr] in thinking that war will ultimately, in some future day, grow out of our controversy about the right of search. I think that, like many other debated questions in our past history, it will be finally settled in our favor. Sir, we have the strongest of all allies on our side. Time and Providence are with us. Not only are we in the right, but, compared with other nations, we grow daily stronger. England begins to see that the interests of the two branches of the Anglo-Saxon race are not antagonistic. Distinguished from all other nations by a common language, a literature, a history, and ideas in common, we have a joint work to accomplish, a joint destiny to fulfill. England will leave us to fill the western hemisphere, as she has the eastern, with the deeds and the glories of the race. Nor can I agree that the growth of our commerce must be the decline of hers. Both may flourish together. God's universe is wide enough for both; and there is ample work, moral and material, to employ the powers and energies of all the generations of the twin nations. Between them there should be no hostile rivalry—only a generous emulation.

The present question is, therefore, narrowed down to this: does our Navy need vessels of this class? and does the condition of the Treasury make it expedient to undertake them at this session? The semi-official tabular statement, presented a few days since by the gentleman from North Carolina, [Mr. Winslow,] proves that the Navy is much larger than it was in 1816; in fact, this is sufficiently proved by the naval expenditures, which have increased from $4,000,000, in 1816, to over fourteen million dollars last year. But I am inclined to think that the Navy needs vessels of the particular class now proposed; and at another time I would vote for them; but the empty Treasury admonishes us to economy, and to postpone anything not absolutely necessary, until the times are better. Large expenditures now may bring about an increase of the tariff—a result that would probably be agreeable to some gentlemen. Let us then postpone this matter to another session.

Mr. LOVEJOY, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to further amend the Senate amendment, by inserting after the word "seas," in the tenth line, the words:

And ten screw gun-boats, with full steam power, whose greatest draught shall not exceed ten feet, armed and provided, for service in the waters adjacent to this continent.

Mr. MASON. I hope the gentleman will insert the word "iron" before the word "screw."

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I accept the gentleman's suggestion. Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to perceive an inclination to convert into a theme for ridicule the Senate amendment, and to afflict with derision the amendments proposed in this committee. The subject is of too great dignity of character, of too alarming a degree of importance to warrant such an inclination or to justify it. The attempt just made on the other side of the House, is but little creditable to either its taste or patriotism, and must inevitably recoil upon those engaged in the effort. Should war threaten, when peace is desired, would honorable gentlemen be sustained in an inconsiderate depreciation of the danger, or be suffered to deride every measure suggested for the continuance of peace? In my judgment, sir, the proposition put forth by this amendment, is directed solely to the maintenance of the peace of the country not only, but to the conservatism of the national dignity and honor both at home and abroad, upon sea and upon land. It is emphatically a peace measure. War has made no approach to our borders. The horizon is unclouded, the skies above us are clear, all is peace; and yet, in such a peace, when the note of industry rises over the land, and is borne upon the sea, when its harmony beguiles labor of its afflictions, and inspires the toiling tillers of a soil where during such a peace, sir, is it that an arrogant Power liberates the insolence of her menials upon our ocean commerce, and hounds our merchant ships through strait and gulf, and over all the waters that wash this boasted land of the free. And these aggressions are committed upon the plea of an English right to visitation and search—a right, sir, never admitted—long ago resisted, even to battle, and upon which America is justly committed to no further word of negotiation. Sir, consider, for a moment, the daily swelling catalogue of the wrongs wrought upon our commerce, and upon our country. At Hayti, our consul is insulted and imprisoned. In San Domingo, the miserable factions contend upon everything, only to unite in the pursuit of American vessels. Scores of merchantmen are invaded by the hostile foot of an English cruiser's captain in the port of Sagua la Grande. The fleets of our commerce which cover our southern waters, are in full flight through the straits of Florida, over the Gulf of Mexico; and still pursued by the avenging Styx and the blundering Buzzard, they crowd the Yucatan channel, and like a bevy of frightened birds escape into the Caribbean sea. A few short years since saw the fluvial liberties of the Argentine Confederation oppressed in the bales of the American merchant, and American honor violated in the invasion by Paraguay of the Water Witch. We double the Cape, and Chile is busy with the capture of an American vessel, and with an affront offered to our minister. At Panama, extraordinary vigilance is necessary for the protection of our commerce, while whole cargoes are forcibly unloaded from American bottoms at Tampico, and devoted to the warlike purposes of the petty military chieftains who distract and oppress that afflicted country.

"The mower whets his scythe,
And the milk-maid singeth blithe;"

It is not simply redress, sir, that should be sought; it is protection that is required. On the coast of Africa, our vessels are greater in number than those of any other country; on the coast of Brazil, they equal those of any other country. In the Gulf, they exceed those of all other countries; and they cover with their sails the broad expanse of the Pacific. It is, sir, to protect this extended commerce that these war-steamer are required. Naturally apprehensive, and easily intimidated, as are the impulses of traffic, they require the assurance of the national arm; they can freely expand only behind the banner of an efficient Navy. Nor are these impulses meanly to be attributed to the greed of gain, or to the sordid ambition of material accumulation. Sir, they move those messengers which speed over the earth burdened with the enterprise and the products of American industry. From them are derived the tall admiral, the deeply-loaded argosy, the imperial steamer, that float in every roadstead and distribute through the whole world the beneficence of American commerce, and the proud reputation of the American Republic. The influence of our institutions proceeds in the channels of commerce; and he who would most readily quench their light had best close those channels and shackle that commerce. And yet, gentlemen are found who hesitate at commercial protection, and sneer at every proposition by which it may be accomplished; who laugh to scorn the advice of senatorial wisdom, and deride all effort by the Representatives of the people to pronounce upon—

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to this amendment; for, if it is proposed as a war measure, it is certainly inadequate, and, as a peace measure, I regard it as unnecessary. I am opposed to all these efforts to create a war fever until we have official information, through the proper channels of this Government, that the flag of our country has been insulted, or the rights of American citizens violated. When the President of the United States shall inform us that this is the case, by any nation upon the face of the earth, and that that nation refuses reparation, then it will be time for Congress to take action in vindication of the honor of the country and the integrity of its flag. Then let us, if the circumstances justify it, declare war; and not leave that power to the discretion of any man, to be exercised at his whim or caprice. Till that time, why attempt to fan a war fever by pandering to the baser passions of human nature, in order to create political capital for the benefit of any individual or party? Whenever an injury shall be done to American citizens by any nation, and that nation refuses reparation, I trust this House will be prompt in its action, and that the Republic will teach the world, as it has on three occasions in its history, that the rights of American citizens are not to be violated with impunity. As to the troubles which have occurred in the Gulf, I have no idea that the British Government will take a different position from that which she took in 1841, in the communication of Aberdeen to Secretary Everett. If she shall disavow the action of her officers in the Gulf, and make reparation for whatever injury has been done, that is all we should ask.

Is it not proper that this Government, before taking precipitate action, should know whether the officers who are charged with committing these injuries have been acting under the orders of their Government, and what the injuries are that they have committed, and whether such injuries are justified or repudiated by the British Government? Since the slave trade was declared piracy by this and other civilized nations, the flag of our country has been in some cases used by interested parties to protect the traffic. Difficulties have occurred heretofore in cases of suspected vessels, in order to ascertain whether the vessel was what its flag indicated. The English Government, while claiming the right to ascertain the nationality of a vessel suspected of being engaged in that trade, does not claim, as I understand the case, the right to search or detain an American vessel. Aberdeen, in his dispatch to Mr. Everett, dated 20th December, 1841, (vol. 8, Sen. Ex. Doc. first session Twenty-Ninth Congress,) says:

"The sole purpose of the British cruisers is to ascertain whether the vessels they meet with are really American or not. The right asserted has, in truth, no resemblance to the right of search either in principle or in practice. It is simply a right to satisfy the party who has a legitimate interest in knowing the truth, that the vessel actually is what her colors announce. This right we concede as freely as we exercise. The British cruisers are not instructed to detain American vessels under any circumstances whatever; on the contrary, they are ordered to abstain from all interference with them, be they slavers or otherwise."

"It is undoubtedly true that this right may be abused, like every other which is delegated to many and different hands. It is possible that it may be exercised wantonly and vexatiously; and should this be the case, it would not only call for remonstrance, but would justify resentment. This, however, is in the highest degree improbable; and if, in spite of the utmost caution, an error should be committed, and any American vessel should suffer loss and injury, it would be followed by prompt and ample reparation."

"The undersigned begs to repeat, that, with American vessels, whatever be their destination, British cruisers have no pretensions in any manner to interfere."

In this dispatch Aberdeen says, that though vessels may be engaged in the slave trade, England does not propose to interfere with them if they be actually American vessels, or have American papers. Now, if that doctrine is held by the British Government to-day—and I know of no official renunciation of it—and any injury has been done to American vessels in the Gulf of Mexico, reparation will be made by Great Britain. And, until we know what that Government will do in reference to these cases, it becomes us, as patriots, looking to the honor and welfare of the country, and as philanthropists, acting for the common good of the race, not to stimulate a war feeling by pandering to the baser passions of human nature.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The amendment of Mr. JOHN COCHRANE was agreed to.

Mr. SAYAGE. I offer the following amendment:

Also, ten steam frigates, with full steam power, to be constructed by order of the Navy Department; and that the sum necessary for their construction be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; and that the President be requested to give notice of the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty: Provided, That this appropriation be not used until such notice be given.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Is that amendment in order? The latter part of it, in relation to the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, is legislation.

Mr. SAYAGE. I offer that amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Does the Chair rule that that amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. It is germane to the amendment of the Senate, which we are considering; and the Chair thinks it is in order.

The hour of four o'clock having now arrived, the committee took a recess until six o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The committee reassembled at six o'clock, and resumed the consideration of the Navy appropriation bill.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAYAGE.]

Mr. BOCKOCK. Has the Chair decided that amendment to be in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair held the question under consideration. The Chair is of opinion that a portion of the amendment is in order, and that a portion of it is not in order. The Chair thinks that that portion of it which requests the President to give notice of the abrogation of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty is not in order.

Mr. SAYAGE. But the proviso that the appropriation shall not be used until the notice of the abrogation of that treaty shall be given, I suppose is in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would hold the amendment to be in order if the gentleman were to modify it by leaving out that portion of it which requests the President to give the notice, but retaining the proviso.

Mr. SAYAGE. I modify it in that way.

The amendment, as modified, was then read, as follows:

Also, ten steam frigates with full steam power, to be constructed by the order of the Navy Department, and that the sum necessary for their construction be paid out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated: Provided, That this appropriation shall not be used until notice is given to the British Government of the termination of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty.

Mr. SAYAGE. Mr. Chairman, on the 23d of July, 1850, I made a speech against the ratification of the Clayton-Bulwer treaty, to prevent my silence from being construed as approbation, not being then of the opinion that my voice would be heard. I fear that my present opinion will meet with a similar fate. I held then and still hold that the treaty is fraudulent and infamous and that no man ought to be continued in the humblest office in the gift of the American people who has expressly or impliedly approved it. I then took issue with the President's message, and alleged that the United States, from her position, interest, and power, ought to be the sole possessor, patron, and protector of the transit route through Nicaragua, that in our hands it would be a bond of peace upon the nations, and that any joint possession would be an apple of eternal discord. I alleged that the American jackass was inclined to an association with the British lion, and like his illustrious predecessor mentioned by Æsop, he would reap nothing but contempt and ruin for his folly.

I regretted the language of the treaty and the message, and asserted that in all future time they would stand across the line of our advancement, with more than the power of five hundred thousand armed warriors. I predicted the commercial struggle that is now upon us, and advised the immediate abrogation of the treaty.

Every act of the English Government in connection with the treaty has been fraudulent and injurious to the rights of the United States. The treaty contained a stipulation against the increase of American power upon this continent without a corresponding increase of English power; and while we honest people have kept the bond in good faith, and have checked our advances, and called our gallant citizens by hard names for attempting to extend our dominions, England has marched steadily forward, seizing and occupying point after point upon the land, until now she searches and overhauls our ships upon a sea where our power ought to control and govern everything. But for this treaty, the power of this nation would have been without a rival in the Gulf of Mexico and in Central America. England procured the treaty to retard our progress, while she fraudulently trampled it under foot, and accelerated her own. It has been suffered to exist for years, to our injury and disgrace; yet no Administration has dared to denounce the false bond and the practice of English statesmen under it.

My amendment offers ten steam frigates to be built as the President may order, on condition that notice be given to the English Government that the treaty is abolished, and for myself I shall be ready to vote a hundred ships whenever such notice shall be given. It cannot be denied that there is, and has been, for the last ten or fifteen years, a fierce contest between the commercial and political interests of the United States and of England in regard to Cuba, Mexico, and the Central American States. It is a contest in which one or the other party must lose, and cannot continue much longer without involving both nations. If England is wise she will make an end of the matter, by yielding to the natural course of things. For myself, I am willing to proclaim and maintain the doctrine, that in regard to the land and ocean immediately south of us we will have no rivals; that no European Power shall directly or indirectly control the destiny of the territory or any of the people bordering on the Gulf of Mexico; and that all changes must be by our consent and for our interest.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SAVAGE. If it be desired I will withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to submit a remark or two.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I would ask the gentleman from Tennessee whether there is any provision in the Clayton-Bulwer treaty for its abrogation?

Mr. SAVAGE. There is an express provision, and it is the only piece of wisdom in that unfortunate document.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I do not remember any such provision.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to say that nobody, not even the gentleman himself, can entertain a more decided repugnance to the Clayton-Bulwer treaty than I do. It is undoubtedly a check upon American progress, and it is moreover conducive to foreign alliances utterly at variance to my political teachings. But I would suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that he cannot effect anything by his amendment. It would imply that the Executive is so deeply anxious to obtain these ten sloops, as, in order to get them, he will give notice to terminate the Clayton-Bulwer treaty. I think that it places the Executive in an obnoxious light; and if it be not withdrawn, I hope that it will be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. SAVAGE. Not for the reasons given by the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. For any reason?

Mr. SAVAGE. Not now.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I offer the following amendment:

Strike from the pending Senate amendment these words: "And that there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, the sum of $1,200,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated."

And in lieu thereof insert the following:

And the President of the United States is hereby authorized and directed to borrow the sum of $1,900,000, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per cent. per annum, payable half yearly, and redeemable at the pleasure of the Government; which said sum shall be expended in the construction of the vessels hereinafter ordered, and which shall be constructed under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Is that amendment in order? Is it not new legislation?

Mr. LETCHER. You have put in a distinct provision for these vessels, and this amendment provides the means to pay for them.

Mr. HOWARD. It is not only germane, but necessary.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of the opinion that it is quite as much in order to provide the money as to appropriate it for the ships. The Chair holds the amendment to be in order.

Mr. LETCHER. My object in offering this amendment is not to embarrass what I see is a foregone conclusion upon the part of the whole committee. It is perfectly manifest, by the votes which have already been taken, that there is a fixed and settled purpose to build a larger number of vessels than was provided for in the Senate amendment. How many the committee may conclude to order I do not know; but the purpose of my amendment is to furnish, at the same time, the means necessary, not to complete these vessels, but to give them a start, or, at least, as many as the committee may conclude to order. The amount provided for in the Senate amendment was $1,200,000, when there were but six vessels contemplated, including the one for the Chinese waters. That sum, I suppose, would be hardly sufficient for their construction alone. The feeling of the House is such that I imagine they will order at least double the number contemplated by the Senate, and which will require at least double the sum of money specified in the Senate amendment. That there may be no objection on that score, I have brought the sum within the narrowest limits with which it seems to me it is possible to meet the feeling of the House upon the subject of improving the Navy. I have endeavored, heretofore, to ingraft this provision upon appropriation bills, and I think it fair and right that it should be ingrafted upon each and every bill, that, when appropriations of money are made, you should at the same time provide means for meeting them.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I rise to oppose the measure of my colleague; and, in the beginning, let me say, with all respect for the opinion of the chairman, it does strike me as a new proposition that a loan should be in order upon an appropriation bill. This, sir, is a bill to appropriate money, not to borrow it. It is not a loan bill. We have a loan bill to come up for consideration in a few days, and, if this money must be borrowed, the proper time will be when we ascertain how much we want; the proper time will be when that loan bill comes up. I have usually found my colleague a straightforward man, advancing directly to the attack and striking his antagonist fairly in front; but now he comes and strikes my project in the back. That is the effect of his action, whether intended or not.

Mr. LETCHER. If the gentleman will inquire of my colleagues of the Committee of Ways and Means, in reference to our meeting this morning, he will satisfy himself whether or not I intended to embarrass his scheme.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I was speaking of the effect of my colleague's proposition. He may be correct in saying he did not wish to embarrass it, but I say that I do not see any occasion for incorporating such a provision into this bill. My colleague seems to think that we are bound to abide by the calculations of the Senate. I have as much respect for the Senate as other members upon this floor, but I am not willing to commit my faith implicitly to the conclusions to which that body may arrive. I do not believe that $1,200,000 will be required for the work upon six vessels this year. I stated this morning, that I thought that for all the vessels $1,200,000 would be not only enough, but more than would be expended this year, and till we should have an opportunity to make another appropriation. Before that time, trade may revive, business assume a better aspect, and money come into the Treasury without borrowing it. Times may change, and perhaps it will not be necessary to make the loan my colleague proposes. A proposition has been made to borrow $15,000,000. We might, if necessary, amend that bill, and borrow more, but I do not imagine it will be necessary. I have seen no calculation to show that $15,000,000, no more and no less, is necessary to carry on the operations of the Government, independent of this measure, until next winter. On the contrary, I have sought information, at sources where I thought information could best be obtained, and I state to the House, that if business shall revive, as there is a probability, and if importations from other countries shall increase, as our exports give reason to believe, we will receive money to build these vessels, without borrowing another cent, and $15,000,000 will be sufficient for Government purposes, including what I propose to appropriate for this purpose.

The question being on Mr. LETCHER's amendment to the amendment,

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and UNDERWOOD were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 54.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. I offer the following amendment to the amendment:

Strike out all after the enacting clause of the section, and insert as follows:

That the Secretary of the Navy cause to be constructed as speedily as may be consistent with the public interests, ten steam screw sloops of war, with full steam power, whose greatest draught of water shall not exceed fourteen feet, which ships shall combine the heaviest armament and greatest speed compatible with their character and tonnage; and one side-wheel war steamer, whose greatest draught shall not exceed eight feet, armed and provided for service in the China seas; and that there be, and is hereby, approprinted, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, the sum of $1,200,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. As the Chair understands the gentleman's amendment, it is the same as the original amendment of the Senate.

Mr. MILLSON. No, sir. It provides for ten sloops instead of five.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair understands the amendment to be to strike out the whole of the amendments that have been agreed to.

Mr. MILLSON. The whole of the Senate amendment as amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that that is not in order.

Mr. MILLSON. Why not? It has always been held that you cannot strike out any single proposition that has been voted on by the House as an amendment; but you can strike it out in connection with other parts of the matter proposed to be amended.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the amendment to be this: to strike out the matter that has been agreed to, and to insert that which has been read.

Mr. MILLSON. It is always competent to strike out matter that has been agreed to, provided the motion is to strike it out in connection with other matters that have not been voted in by the House.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no matter that has not been voted in by the House.

Mr. MILLSON. Yes, sir; there is the Senate amendment. I move to strike out all, from the enacting words of the section.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair entertains the amendment.

Mr. MILLSON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to enable the committee, if they wish it, to approach a final vote on this question. The committee will perceive that, as I move to strike out the whole Senate amendment, and as, under the decision of the Chair, to-day, it is not in order to move to amend my amendment to the amendment of the Senate, this being an amendment in the second degree, there can be no other vote on this question if this amendment to the amendment shall be adopted; it becomes a finality.

I wish to reach the point that my colleague [Mr. Bockock] aimed at this morning, to increase the number of new vessels from five to ten. I know that the committee have agreed, at different times, to increase the number to twenty-six; but I must believe that those amendments were adopted by the committee with reference to the ultimate defeat of the proposition, and not with the expectation of carrying it. Certainly the Senate could never be persuaded to agree to this amendment as it now stands. We know that it was with much difficulty that the Senate was induced to agree to the building of five new vessels; they rejected the proposition to build ten; and to send them a proposition to build twenty-six, is only to court defeat; while we may reasonably hope that we may induce them to concur in an amendment for the building of ten; not for the purpose of preparing the country for war; for I neither expect a war, nor do I desire to inflame the public apprehensions upon this subject, as some seem willing to do. I believe that these steamships are now necessary as a part of our peace establishment; and I am not moved, in the slightest degree, by the dangers which gentlemen fancy to exist with reference to contemplated difficulties with other Powers.

Mr. BLAIR. The amendment of the gentleman from Virginia is to strike out the Senate amendment. Before the vote is taken, I move to perfect the Senate amendment by inserting the following:

Also ten war steamers, to be used on the Ohio, Mississippi, Missouri, and Arkansas rivers, and that said steamers be so constructed as to be used as snag-boats until the war breaks out. [Great laughter.]

Mr. MAYNARD. Put in the Tennessee river, and I will vote for that.

Mr. BLAIR. I modify my amendment so as to include the Tennessee river.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Missouri state at what part of the Senate amendment he proposes to insert his amendment?

Mr. BLAIR. Immediately after the amendment of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE.] It was the speech of the gentleman from New York that alarmed me about the fate of New Orleans and our Mississippi river towns. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Does the gentleman refer to me?

Mr. BLAIR. Yes, sir.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I will inform him that there is no place in my speech where a snag-boat would find a place. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. BLAIR. That is very much the case with all the gentlemen from the sea-board. There is no place in their consciences where you can get a snag-boat in. They vote for nothing but sea-going vessels.

Mr. Chairman, I believe the whole object of increasing our Navy is for the protection and preservation of our commerce. Now, we have about as much commerce on the Mississippi and its tributaries as the entire foreign commerce of this nation, and it deserves the protection of the Government quite as much as the foreign commerce does. I conceive that the war steamers provided for in my amendment will effectually protect it in war and in peace, and I desire to see the amendment adopted.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. If an amendment is in order, I will move to add the Mississippi river north of the Iowa line.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope we shall take the vote at once on the amendment of the gentleman from Missouri, and then on the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, and dispose of this whole question. I think we are trifling with the public interests and wasting time upon this bill.

Mr. BLAIR's amendment was rejected—ayes 57, noes 63.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I believe that the amendment I propose is now in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is.

The amendment was reported as follows:

Provided, That none of the vessels contemplated by this section shall be of more than twelve hundred tons burden.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, I was gratified this morning to hear the amendment of my friend from Virginia [Mr. BOGOCCK] to the amendment of the Senate authorizing the construction of ten new sloops-of-war. I was gratified at it, sir; because we needed those ships, not for war, as has been argued in this House, but for peace, and for the preservation of our commerce. I thought that the arguments of my friend from Virginia, [Mr. BOGOCCK], this morning, were absolutely conclusive. But, sir, I was very much astonished when I found gentlemen in different parts of the House, and especially in that part of the House over against us, were willing, and sought to construe this peaceful measure, which was intended as a peaceful measure on this side of the House, into a war measure. I confess that I was not so much surprised at the remarks made by the gentleman from Illinois, [Mr. LOVEJOY], on the other side, who wished to construe it into a war measure. Everything with him this winter has been war! war! and especially when there was anything of a negro in it.

I was not so much surprised, either, at the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. GROW], who wished us to wait until the enemy had landed upon our shores, until the Goth was in the Capitol, until the President should have sent us a message that he had made a lodgment there, before any preparations were made, either for peace or war. That did not surprise me. I was not surprised at either of the gentlemen; but I confess that I felt some degree of surprise when I saw a friend of mine from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT], and fortunately, at the time, on the other side of the House, rising in his place and almost, at it appeared, in concert with them, denouncing this measure for building ten sloops as a war scheme, and using language, sir, which, I am sure, he did not intend to apply to gentlemen upon this floor who have expressed their opinion, that the time for war had almost come. He said that the scheme to build these ten ships was food for speculators and demagogues. Those, I believe, were the words which my honorable young friend used. Sir, so far as I have been concerned in any expressions in reference to the recent outrages of Great Britain in the Gulf, there has been no demagogism on my part. There has been no disposition on my part in that way. There has been no scheme of speculation.

Mr. COVODE. I object to the amendment of the gentleman from Kentucky, which limits the war steamers to twelve hundred tons burden each, because I consider they are to be used, if used at all, against those of the enemy of twenty-five hundred or three thousand tons burden. Although I voted for these ten steamers to-day, and voted for the four for the lakes, I was not influenced to do so because I had the remotest idea that there is any probability of a war, but because our naval force is inefficient, and will be so long as we rely upon our sail vessels. I voted for them that we might have a more efficient Navy.

Mr. Chairman, I stated some days ago that we were far behind the English in the strength of our naval force. I have been at some pains to look at the comparative naval power of the several nations of the world, and here are the facts I have collected: England had, at the close of the Crimean war, about five hundred war steamers. She had two years ago ninety-one lines of ocean mail steamers running direct from England to foreign ports, employing about four hundred steamers; and she had twenty-five lines running between foreign ports in connection with them, employing one hundred and five steamers; making five hundred and five ocean mail steamers which receive large sums direct from the Government as an inducement for their several companies to establish and run them. These are all subject to the orders of the Government whenever the exigencies of war render it necessary for her to use them, either as war steamers or as transport vessels. Thus it will be seen that she has a war force at her command of about one thousand steamers, besides nearly the same number of mercantile steamers, making a grand total of nearly two thousand ocean steamers. Sir, she has taken already a large share of our carrying trade, and nearly the whole of the most valuable portion of it. There are now forty-four English, five Belgian, five French, and four Hamburg steamers running in the American trade, while there are but eight American—fifty-eight to eight. No wonder that seventy hundredths of our commerce was, last year, in the hands of foreigners; and they will soon have a monopoly of it if we go on much longer in the blundering way we have been going, under Democratic rule, for five years past.

France, though not a first class commercial Power, has gone far ahead of us in building ocean steamers. She has one hundred and thirty war steamers in the Mediterranean, Levant, Black, North, and Baltic seas.

Austria, not a commercial nation at all, has one hundred and ten steamers on the same seas; and Russia has over one hundred, and is constantly increasing her steam power.

The United States have only twenty, eight of which only carry from one to six guns; some of them not fit to be sent outside of a harbor.

We have a few line-of-battle ships, old sailing vessels; but of what use would they be to cope with modern war steamers? Besides, it will be found, I presume, upon their being surveyed, as they have been ordered to be, that it will cost more to repair them than they will be worth when repaired. I am, therefore, in favor, Mr. Chairman, of building steamers, so that we may be able to meet our enemies, when we have any, on a footing of equality, and not compel our brave officers and men to fight at large odds. Just as well might we continue to arm our soldiers with the old-fashioned musket, and expect them to whip an equal number, armed with Minnie rifles, and improved breech-loading arms.

Mr. Chairman, advocating the building of war steamers, I do not wish to be understood as countenancing the idea that we are at all in danger of having a war with England at this time, or at any other time near at hand; but for the sake of having a Navy that can render efficient protection to our commerce in distant seas, and command the respect of those nations which respect only those that exhibit ample ability to protect their own flag, and all who are entitled to protection under it.

Sir, England is governed by wise and sagacious statesmen, and no people in the world know better than the English upon which side their "bread is buttered." She and her people are too wise and sagacious to run into a war upon her best customer, unless absolutely compelled to do so. Does she not know that the dominant party have been fixing our tariff for her special benefit ever since they repealed the Whig tariff of 1842? Does she not know that under our present tariff laws, foreign nations have almost a monopoly of manufacturing the goods our people wear and use, and that she comes in for the lion's share? It would be the height of folly in her to make war upon us, or to give us cause to make war upon her, so long as the party in power rendered her such inestimable services at the expense of our own manufacturers, laborers, and merchants. Why, sir, it would be killing the goose that laid for her owner a golden egg daily. No, no, sir; we need have no apprehensions of a war, nor need we "prepare the hearts of the people for war." The only war we are to have is a continuance of the war we have had since 1846, upon American industry and home manufactures. That is a cruel, unnatural, relentless war; it kills by starving, and its victims are powerless.

Sir, the Democratic party may well afford to sound the trumpet of war in these Halls. It calls no one to battle, and alarms none but old women and nervous invalids. We have, in years gone by, heard the daily cry in the Senate from a venerable, a very venerable, old Senator, that "war was inevitable;" and one might suppose it to be so now; but it is not. The free trade which England enjoys with us, the monopoly, or what amounts almost to a monopoly, which she now possesses of transporting our cotton to her own shores, of manufacturing it for us, and then of transporting the goods made of it back to us, she appreciates too highly to throw them away thoughtlessly. And, again, she knows well the importance to her of having the privilege of putting her own instead of home valuations on the goods she sends us; by which means she evades the payment of a large portion of the duties that ought to be paid, and drives American importers out of business in our own cities.

England knows well that a five years' war, or non-intercourse with us, would build up our manufacturers on a solid foundation, and thus take from them their most profitable market, and their largest, for many years to come. Our weak point is California; and, until we get a railroad across the country, it would not only be very expensive to protect our Pacific coasts, but with our small Navy it would be absolutely impossible, against any powerful nation; but so long as we dig gold for England, so long as we are simply their miners, and all we get goes directly into her lap; we taking finery and gewgaws, and goods which we ought to manufacture for ourselves, in payment for this gold; so long as the labor of her women and children can pay for the productions of our mines; why should she desire to disturb the present state of things, so profitable to her?

No, Mr. Chairman, you need not alarm yourself or the country about a war with England. Instead of that it would be well for us to turn our attention to the state of our finances, our general trade, and manufactures, and see if anything can be done to benefit the country.

This Administration found some twenty millions in the Treasury; it has been in power a little more than a year, and what is the condition of the Treasury now? Bankrupt. And, although we have been digging gold at the rate of more than four and a half millions a month, yet the Government has been obliged to resort to what the party used to call "the rag-money currency," to the issuance of Treasury notes, formerly classically denominated "Treasury shinplasters." What a beautiful state of things! What statesmanship it proves the President and his Administration to possess! What wisdom, sagacity, patriotism! And yet, bankrupt as the Government is, it obstinately pursues a policy calculated not only to impoverish it still more, and compel the Secretary of the Treasury to heap debt upon debt, by borrowing, but it is also calculated to depress American enterprise, cripple American industry, destroy American manufactures, and to reduce to the lowest price American produce. Such folly and madness would astonish us if we were not accustomed to and familiar with it.

Mr. Chairman, I have a word to say on the

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JUNE 11, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 180.

war policy of the present Administration. It has displayed the same wisdom and foresight in regard to this as in regard to its financial policy. For some reason or another, a war upon Utah was deemed expedient. It was necessary to chastise the Mormons for Brigham Young's insolent and insane ravings. The war was commenced; the Army, at an immense expense of suffering, was marched thousands of miles through the wilderness; millions of dollars had been expended in recruiting and provisioning it for the campaign; and when, after months of toil in crossing mountains, forcing its way through valleys obstructed by snow, and in struggles with an inhospitable climate, it had at length arrived within striking distance of the enemy, peace commissioners were dispatched in haste to overtake and stop its advance, and to negotiate with the Mormons for peace.

It has been usual, especially in modern times, to exhaust diplomacy before resorting to arms. But this old, time-honored, wise, and Christian policy, was reversed by our Democratic President. He declares war first, and treats afterwards. He mustered his battalions; marched them at an immense expense of money and suffering into the enemy's country; and when they had arrived, and every mail from the West promised tidings of the commencement of hostilities, the President bethought himself that it was time to check the advance of the Army, and send commissioners to treat with the enemy. Would it not have been wiser and more conformable to the usages of civilized nations, to have sent commissioners to inquire into and report upon the Mormon outrages, before sending an army into their country? By doing so, he would have saved millions to the Treasury, which the policy of his party has rendered almost bankrupt. But though the Treasury and the country might have profited by pursuing this course, the Kansas iniquity might not have been so easily or safely accomplished, had it not been for the war. The contracts and appointments incident to this Mormon war were strong levers to force refractory partisans back into the ranks of the party from which they had been frightened by the Kansas enormity. Epaullets for sons or nephews, fat contracts for brothers or other relations, are wonderfully potent in inducing those who have faltered for a moment, to return to the standards from which they have deserted. Scruples of conscience are appeased; alarmed and startled honor is satisfied; and the partisan goes back to his ranks, bending under the patronage purchased by subserviency, and the ignominy due to his desertion of principle.

I am not prepared to say that any one, here or elsewhere, has been influenced by such considerations. But it would be nothing new in the history of human nature, to find out hereafter, that appointments to office and contracts for supplies had more or less to do in the consummation of the Kansas swindle. But whatever may be the opinions entertained respecting the wisdom of the President's war policy, its novelty will be universally conceded. Hitherto nations have sent ambassadors to treat, in order to prevent war; but our President has made war in order to have an opportunity to send ambassadors to treat; and I have no doubt that it will soon be the boast of the Democratic party that the President has been signally successful in his management of the Mormon war, and especially in the restoration of peace, which it appears had never been disturbed, except by the boisterous declaration of over-ardent demagogues.

But this is not the only ground of boast in which the party may rightfully indulge. Less than two years since the then Administration was almost at its wits' end to discover means to deplete the national Treasury. Debts due a long time hence were bought up at large premiums, in order to prevent the accumulation of an undue and injurious amount of money in the Treasury. And notwithstanding all his efforts, Mr. Guthrie left the Treasury a little more than fifteen months ago with a surplus on hand of the amount I have before stated. Mr. Cobb took his place, and straightway what Mr. Guthrie had labored for in vain was achieved, and more than achieved. Under the management of Mr. Buchanan's Secretary of the Treasury, the inconvenient surplus was soon disposed of.

The first step in Mr. Cobb's financial policy was to get rid of the surplus left on hand by his predecessor. In this he succeeded. He not only emptied the Treasury, but things have been so managed by him and his party friends that he has not been able again to fill it, but was compelled, as the House knows, and the country knows, to resort to an issue of Treasury notes. Here, too, we have had a sample of the wisdom and consistency of the Administration; and, after the denunciation, so loud and so often repeated, of "bank rags," have a recommendation to issue Treasury notes. Why not ask for a loan? Simply because it was supposed the people might be beguiled into believing that an issue of Treasury notes was not a public debt. He began first by asking for $5,000,000; then for $10,000,000; and finally, for $15,000,000; and we now know that $40,000,000 will hardly carry the Treasury through until the next meeting of Congress.

Where has the money gone? What great improvements have been made? How much of this vast outlay has been applied to pay the thousands and millions of dollars due to claimants, whose claims are indisputably just? What account can the Administration render to the country of a stewardship so discharged? A year ago the whole country was rejoicing in a constantly increasing prosperity. Commerce, agriculture, and manufactures, were all flourishing. The Treasury was full to overflowing. But now all is changed. Almost every branch of American industry is prostrate or paralyzed. Hundreds, who a year ago were profitably employed, are now idle, and their families suffering. And all this is chargeable to Democratic policy, which breaks down our own manufactures, by denying them the incidental protection that a sufficient revenue duty would afford; and upon all this the Administration and the Democratic party look with stoical indifference—their only care and anxiety being to keep their party together, and distribute among themselves the spoils of office. For the country and its prosperity they care nothing; for their party, everything.

Mr. CLAY withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. I offer the following amendment:

And that the Secretary of the Navy also be directed to take immediate measures to have an engine placed in the ship Franklin, now on the stocks at the Kittery yard, and to have said ship launched as soon as practicable.

Mr. Chairman, that ship, I have been informed by the constructor within a few weeks, will spoil if she is not put into the water. She is one of the finest ships in our Navy; one of the finest we ever had; one of the most beautiful models and the best built. She will have to be stripped; and it will cost more for repairs than it would to put her into the water. I see no possible objection why, while we are providing for the construction of so many new steamers we should not provide for the safety of one of the best steamers in the Navy by putting it into the water. I do not do this because I have the slightest fear that we shall want the ships for any war purposes. I believe a great part of the talk upon this question is, to say the least of it, imprudent, if not worse.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to know if the position of that ship is not the very best one to preserve her?

Mr. MORSE, of Maine. No, sir. Any man who knows anything about vessels knows that they keep better in salt water than they do upon the stocks. If we ever want to use the vessel, it ought to be launched.

I merely wish to say further, that if the House had not amended the Senate amendment, which I was in favor of, I should not have embarrassed it by this amendment. I believe a few small steamers are necessary; but I believe we are running the thing into the ground.

Mr. GARNETT. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Maine, and I shall proceed to answer the remarks of the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. CLAY:] and as my friend's chief objection to my remarks this morning seemed to be the place I was standing in when I made them, I hope I shall be more fortunate in receiving his approval now.

Mr. CLAY. That was not at all the objection.

Mr. GARNETT. The gentleman from Kentucky could not be more surprised at anything I said than I was at his proposition to confer nearly all the war-making power of the Government upon the Executive branch, coming from my friend from Kentucky, especially when I remembered the illustrious associations that attach to his name.

Mr. Chairman, the gentleman complains that I this morning said that this project for increasing the Navy was food for demagogues and stock-jobbers. My friend will find, when he sees the report, that he has entirely misquoted me. I applied no such remarks to the proposition of my colleague. I said that this agitation for war was food for demagogues and stock-jobbers—that I conceived it could benefit nobody else. I said it in all kindness to the gentleman, and to every gentleman upon this floor. But I appeal to gentlemen if they have not heard, from a place which it is not in order to mention here, and whether they have not seen, from a portion of the newspaper press, an attempt made by one party to outbid the other by pandering to what they supposed to be the popular passion for war, and to hurry this country into a contest the most momentous which has occurred in modern times. I believe a war with England would be a great calamity. I will go as far as any man to defend the honor of our flag and the rights of our country; but brave nations, like brave men, do not hurry blindly into war. They use all honorable means of producing peace before resorting to the dread arbitrament of force. Conscious strength is dignified, calm, and cool. Such a war as some gentlemen talk of so lightly, would probably go far to revolutionize our system of Government. It would endanger the cause of free government, and put back the progress of civilization—for civilization itself is involved in the fate of the Anglo-Saxon race, and depends on the peace and alliance of the free nations which represent it.

The question was taken on Mr. MORSE's amendment; and it was agreed to.

The question recurring on Mr. MILLSON's amendment,

Mr. MILLSON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 84, noes 68.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the amendment as amended.

Mr. CLAY. I desire now to offer an amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. No further amendment is in order.

Mr. STANTON. Did I understand the Chair to say that no further amendment is in order?

The CHAIRMAN. To the Senate amendment there is no further amendment in order.

Mr. STANTON. I cannot understand the reason why.

The CHAIRMAN. Because the motion of the gentleman from Virginia was to strike out the whole of it, and the Chair permitted the original to be perfected before that motion was put.

Mr. STANTON. The point I make is this: that, without disturbing what the House has inserted, we may insert additional matter.

The CHAIRMAN. The first question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. STANTON. Yes; if there is no amendment offered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to know if it is not now in order to move to amend, by way of an addition, to the amendment just adopted?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is of opinion that it is not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Will it not be in order after the question is taken on the pending proposition?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will decide that when the question is submitted. There is nothing in order now but to take the question on the amendment as amended.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—yeas 89, noes 40.

So the amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. BOCOCK. I want to ask the unanimous consent of the committee to substitute "twelve" for "eight" in the matter of the draught of the steamer for China. My friend from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] has been there, and thinks that twelve is better than eight.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not know what gentlemen mean by objecting; but I know that an eight-foot draught is unsafe to go to sea with at all. Put it not to exceed twelve feet, and do not make your steamer a failure.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee do now rise, and report the amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the Senate amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and had instructed him to report the same back with a recommendation that some be concurred in, some non-concurred in, and one concurred in with an amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question on the amendments.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with reference to the amendments of the Senate, numbered from one to thirteen, was concurred in.

The fourteenth and last amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy cause to be constructed, as speedily as may be consistent with the public interests, five steam screw sloops-of-war, with full steam power, whose greatest draught of water shall not exceed fourteen feet, which ships shall combine the heaviest armament and greatest speed compatible with their character and tonnage; and one side-wheel war steamer, whose greatest draught shall not exceed eight feet, armed and provided for service in the China seas; and that there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, the sum of $1,200,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The SPEAKER stated that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union reported an amendment to this amendment, the effect of which was to strike out "five" and insert "ten," so as to increase the number of steam sloops to ten.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 86, nays 85; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Barksdale, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Bryan, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Cox, Burton, Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edie, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gillis, Gilmer, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert H. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, McKibbin, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Milson, Edward Joy Morris, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ricand, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, Underwood, White, Whiteley, Wood, Woodson, and Wortendyke—86.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, John S. Phelps, Pike, Potter, Powell, Purviance, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—85.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. CURRY stated that Mr. MOORE was still confined to his room by illness.

Mr. NICHOLS stated that his colleague, Mr. VALLANDIGHAM, had been called home on business, and had paired off with him on all party questions; and, as this appeared to have assumed that complexion, he declined to vote.

Mr. KELLOGG stated that Mr. FARNSWORTH was absent on account of ill health.

The question recurred on agreeing to the amendment of the Senate as amended.

Mr. BLISS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 89, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Arnold, Barksdale, Bocoek, Bonham, Bowie, Branch, Bryan, Caskie, Cavanaugh, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Comins, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, McKibbin, McQueen, Miles, Milson, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Scott, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, Underwood, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, and Wortendyke—89.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Burlingame, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hatch, Hoard, Horton, Howard, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matton, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Palmer, Parker, John S. Phelps, Pike, Potter, Powell, Purviance, Ricand, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippe, Wade, Waldron, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—88.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to reconsider the votes which have been taken upon these amendments, and to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. MORGAN. I demand the yeas and nays on that motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will withdraw the motion; and ask the unanimous consent of the House to permit me to report from the Committee of Ways and Means the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill.

WILLIAM S. BRADFORD.

Mr. QUITMAN. I appeal to the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow me to ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar be discharged from the further consideration of House bill (No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford, with a view of putting it upon its passage. The bill has been reported from the Committee on Military Affairs; and if we pass it to-night, it may yet pass the Senate. It is for the relief of a man who has been in service eighteen years, and who is entirely crippled. His physicians advise him to go to a more southern climate; and it is necessary that he should do so to restore his health. He is now pensioned as a sergeant; and the committee only propose to give him the pension of his highest rank in the service—a brevet second lieutenant.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Does the gentleman propose to call the previous question?

Mr. QUITMAN. I do, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Then I do not object.

The bill was read. It enacts that from and after the passage of this act, the pension now paid to William S. Bradford be increased from the present amount received by him to twenty-five dollars per month.

Mr. QUITMAN. This man, William S. Bradford, served in the Army for nearly eighteen years. He was enlisted in 1834, and from that period up to the time of his final discharge, he served out many terms of enlistment with honor and credit. Amongst his papers are recommendations from almost every field officer under whom he served. They prove him to have been a remarkably good soldier. He frequently filled the posts of sergeant and quartermaster's sergeant. Serving during the Mexican war in the seventh infantry, he was a participant in almost every conflict, and, as the man who planted the first American colors on the heights of Cerro Gordo, he was favorably mentioned in the reports of the officers. At the close of the war he received a commission as brevet second lieutenant. He was a modest man, and soon afterwards gave it up. He did not care, perhaps, to leave his old associates in arms. He enlisted at Baltimore for the rifle regiment. It was while acting in the capacity of quartermaster's sergeant at Columbia barracks, in Oregon, that, from great exposure in the performance of his duty, he contracted that painful disease (chronic rheumatism) which totally incapacitated him for active service and caused his honorable discharge from the Army. The committee believed that, under all the circumstances, he was entitled to the higher rate of pension.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was read the third time, and passed.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill: which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order the next time the House resolved itself into committee.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that general debate in the Committee of the Whole on these amendments terminate in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Bocoek in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated that the amendments of the Senate to the Army bill were before the committee, and that debate was limited to five minutes.

Mr. CLAY. Mr. Chairman, when concluding the few remarks I made a short time ago, when upon the floor in committee, the inexorable hammer of the Chairman stopped me at a point which would leave me in a rather disagreeable position.

The question now before the committee is a question of war, and I desire to conclude the remarks I was then making. I was concluding, in reference to the British outrages upon our flag, that I had no purpose of speculation or demagogism. I have understood that my honorable friend from Virginia, [Mr. GARNETT,] as I felt sure was the case, did not intend to apply these epithets to me. They were applied, as I understood him, to war agitation. Sir, why the gentleman applied such remarks to war agitation in this House I cannot imagine, for I have not known the subject-matter yet to be agitated here.

But my honorable friend has said that I have proposed to give to the President the entire war-making power. I have made no such proposition to this House. Any proposition in reference to these British outrages which I may have been willing to make, was objected to in the first instance by my friend himself, and afterwards it has been smothered. Whispers and shadows around the House brought more terror than could "the substance of ten thousand men, armed in proof."

My honorable friend referred to my antecedents. He was surprised at the course I had taken in reference to these war outrages. Sir, the gentleman forgot. I would refer him to his antecedents, and to mine. I would refer him to the best days of old Virginia. I would refer him, sir, to the war of 1812, when, upon less cause than that which we have had before us recently, without as strong cause as forty-one American vessels seized and searched upon our own shores, and the American flag dragged through the waters of the Gulf, the whole Union, with one spirit, rose up in arms. And, sir, my immediate ancestor, to whom I presume the gentleman alluded, used language which was responded to over this whole country, "that if England wanted to know her own subjects, let her give them ear-marks; that the American flag which floated at the mast-head of the American ship was the only credential of American seamen."

I think, sir, that the time has come when agitation on this subject should commence in this House. If the resolution which I tried so often to get in, had been introduced and referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, and that committee had failed to report, I would have proposed something on my own responsibility for the action of this House, and for agitation, if you will.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate has now closed. Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendments to this bill are forty-nine in number.

Mr. QUITMAN. Have they been printed?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. They have not. They were ordered to be printed, but the Printer could not get them ready in time. I have taken full notes of them all, and will explain them as they are read. In some cases, five and six and eight and ten of the amendments relate to the same subject. Ten relate to arsenals, and fifteen to fortifications, and votes can be taken on those relating to the same subject together. I propose to explain the amendments as we pass along. I hope we shall act upon all of them to-night in committee, so that we may pass upon them in the House the first thing in the morning.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I understood that the House this morning, with a view to the understanding of this very bill, ordered the amendments to be printed. Of course it was an order designed to be executed for the benefit of the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is true as the gentleman says; but two thirds of the House have just made these amendments the special order in this committee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The question now is, whether we ought to proceed with the consideration of these amendments without having them printed and before us? I think we ought not; that we ought to have some time for the examination of these great questions. I therefore move that the committee rise, my object being to move an adjournment until to-morrow at as early an hour as the House chooses.

The motion was not agreed to.

The Clerk then read the Senate amendments in their order, and they were severally acted upon as indicated below.

First amendment:

On page 2, at the end of line twenty-one, insert: Provided, That the superintendent of the Military Academy, while serving as such by appointment of the President, shall have the local rank and the pay and allowances of a colonel of engineers; that the commandant of the corps of cadets at the Military Academy, while serving as such by appointment of the President, shall have the local rank, the pay and allowances of a lieutenant colonel of engineers, and besides his other duties, shall be charged with the duty of instructor in the tactics of the three arms at said academy; and that the senior assistant instructor in each of the arms of service, namely, the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, shall severally receive the pay and allowances of the assistant professor of mathematics.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This first amendment of the Senate proposes to increase the rank and pay of officers of the Military Academy at West Point. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Second amendment:

Page 8, line one, after the word "in," insert, "the manufacture of cannon, cannon powder, and test of," so as to make the clause read:

Including experiments in the manufacture of cannon, cannon powder, and test of arms and ammunition, &c.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

For the purchase of breech-loading carbines of the best model, to be selected and approved by a board of ordnance officers, $45,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask that the fourth amendment may be read and acted upon at the same time, as they relate to similar matters.

Fourth amendment:

For the alteration of old arms, so as to make them breech-loading arms, upon a model to be selected and approved by a board of ordnance officers, $25,000: Provided, Any portion of said sum, not exceeding $5,000, may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in applying to the old or new arms the recent improvement of Captain J. N. Ward in the mode of applying Maynard's primer.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The subject of these amendments was discussed at some length in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, when the bill was first under consideration, upon the amendment offered by the gentleman at the head of the Committee on Military Affairs, [Mr. QUITMAN.] That amendment was adopted by the House, but the Senate have stricken it out, and adopted another in its place. It will be remembered that the House appropriated $100,000 for the alteration of old arms, in addition to what was appropriated for the manufacture of new arms. The Committee of Ways and Means think the Senate provision not so good as the one adopted by the House, and therefore they recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. LOVEJOY. I simply wish to ask whether the Senate amendment reduces the amount from $100,000 to $25,000?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendment, as adopted by the House, provided that only so much of the sum as was necessary should be used. We are not obliged to use the whole.

Mr. QUITMAN. I merely wish to say that the Committee on Military Affairs reported in favor of that proposition because they believed that it was more economical to put the old arms in as good condition as the new, than it was to purchase new arms.

Mr. CURTIS. I ask the honorable chairman of the committee if he is not mistaken in saying that it was reported from the Committee on Military Affairs?

Mr. QUITMAN. Perhaps I may be.

Mr. CURTIS. I think the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs is mistaken in saying our committee recommended this change. I am myself opposed to the attempt to change old arms. I think the honorable chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will recollect that I attempted to oppose the proposition when he first presented it to the House.

Mr. QUITMAN. I may perhaps not be technically correct, but I am practically so. This came before the Committee on Military Affairs at the request of the Secretary of War, and it was considered, though not formally. I understood the committee, however, to approve of the proposition, and to authorize me to represent to the House the approval of the Committee on Military Affairs. The letter from the Secretary was laid before the House. It was my impression, then, that it was a regular report from that committee, but I think, on reflection, it was not; but it was passed on informally. I understood it to be the sense of the committee, that it was in favor of the proposition of the Secretary of War. As I am limited to five minutes, I cannot explain the whole matter, or give my views on it in full, and therefore I leave it to the committee.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I think it is indispensable to an intelligent action on this important bill, seeing the difficulties in which we are likely to be involved, that these amendments shall be printed. I therefore hope the committee will now rise. We will have the amendments printed and on our table in the morning; and they can be taken up just as early as the chairman desires.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It will take all day to-morrow to print them.

The question was taken on Mr. UNDERWOOD's motion, and it was not agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to inquire of the gentleman from Mississippi if he has changed his opinion in regard to it? Did I understand him correctly?

Mr. QUITMAN. No, sir.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. He approves the action of the House on the former occasion?

Mr. QUITMAN. I entirely approve of the action of the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The House is familiar with its own action. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence with the Senate in its amendment.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation $50,000. I wish to say that this matter of changing the muskets ought to be well considered by the House, no matter whether there was or was not a formal investigation of it by the Committee on Military Affairs; and I am very confident it never was decided in our committee. Other members of that committee, as well as the chairman, will recollect that there was some consultation about it, and that when the matter was presented here I tried to interpose my objection, for reasons which I deem important. This proposition involves a change of the tactics of one of our great arms of the military service, the infantry. These tactics have been drawn up with great care in the matter of consolidating the men, and especially in reference to the loading of muskets at the muzzle, and all the changings of position in loading are so arranged as to preclude accidental injuries. If you adopt breech-loading muskets you have got to change the whole system of manual exercise, and it may be necessary to open the ranks. It is a question whether it would be safe to use that kind of arm in those solid ranks, as our infantry are taught to stand. There is no doubt that this kind of arm is convenient for men on horseback, and for hunters or skirmishers; but whether it would suit the infantry is the problem which I think ought to be fully tested before we embark in this business of changing the gun. It should be left to a board of officers to consider and determine upon it. The only report made on the subject by officers of the Army, was made in 1857, by the board of which Major Bell, I believe, was president, and that was an adverse report.

Now, I should be in favor of adopting that kind of arm if it was proved to be successful; but I say it has not been well considered—either in the Army, in the Military Committee, or in the House; and therefore I think the House ought to concur with the Senate in reducing the appropriation from $100,000 to $70,000; part for the purpose of changing, and testing such a change, and part for another purpose. I am willing to see the experiment made; I am willing to have four or five thousand dollars expended in experiments, to ascertain whether breech-loading muskets would be safe to be used in the infantry, the right arm of the military service. I hope, therefore, that the amendment will be concurred in, because it involves us in less difficulty, expense, and hazard. We might go on, and expend $100,000 in changing these old arms, and find it to be all wrong; I hope, therefore, the plan will not be hastily adopted, as it was before, but that the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in, because it provides for a smaller expenditure, and will not involve us in such risks to the infantry service as this hasty change seems to initiate.

Mr. SANDIDGE. It is not unusual for Congress to appropriate money, sometimes in large sums, to test practically the improvements in arms. We are expending about three hundred thousand dollars every year in the manufacture and purchase of arms; and we have now on hand nearly five hundred thousand old muskets and rifles, for which the Secretary of War, if he brought them into market, would not get more than $2 50 apiece.

Now, I happen to know that during the last three months experiments have been made at the arsenal in this city to test the practicability of altering these old, worthless arms into breech-loading guns, so as to make them equal to the best arms of the country, which cost from twenty to forty dollars apiece. This change can be made at a cost of about three dollars apiece; and the question is whether we should appropriate money to make these alterations, or put the Government to ten times the cost in buying new arms.

If gentlemen think it the more economical plan to spend three or four hundred thousand dollars a year to buy new guns, when, for a small fraction of that sum, you can make the old guns equal to new ones, then the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa is the best that the House can adopt. The Senate, as I understand this amendment, propose to appropriate $75,000 in lieu of the $100,000 voted by the House, and $40,000 of that sum is to be expended in the purchase of new guns, when, in the section immediately preceding this, $400,000 is appropriated for that very purpose, and for the manufacture of arms. There is only a difference of $25,000 between the amendment of the Senate and the amendment of the House.

Mr. CURTIS. I desire to correct the gentleman in reference to one point. He seems to suppose that the Government has been buying breech-loading muskets; but we never have bought any, nor has there been any proposition to buy any. We are using breech-loading carbines; but this is a new proposition; and I say it has not received sufficient consideration.

Mr. GARNETT. I move that the committee do now rise. We are a long way ahead of the Senate, and I see no reason why we should sit here till midnight.

Mr. SICKLES demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. MARSHALL of Kentucky, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 50, noes 73.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. CURTIS, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment to the amendment.

The question was taken on the Senate amendment; and it was non-concurred in—ayes forty-six, noes not counted.

Mr. ATKINS moved that the committee rise. Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS and LOVEJOY were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 46, noes 84.

So the committee refused to rise.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I suggest that the amendments, from five to fifteen inclusive, be read, and the vote taken on them together.

The amendments were read, as follows:

Page 8, strike out lines thirteen, fourteen, and fifteen, and insert as follows:

For the Allegheny arsenal, $35,100.
For Fort Monroe arsenal, $29,900.
For Kennebec arsenal, $11,600; $2,000 of which may be used in bringing gas upon the arsenal grounds, and with leave to extend gas-pipes through the grounds by the gas company.
For St. Louis arsenal, $31,000.
For Washington arsenal, $9,379.
For an additional timber and carriage storehouse at the North Carolina arsenal, $25,000.
For Watervliet arsenal, $30,000.
For repairs and preservation of the public buildings, fences, drains, culverts, &c., at all the smaller arsenals, $20,000.
For continuing the construction of the arsenal in California, $100,000.
For contingencies of arsenals, $10,000.
For repairing the arsenal and two eighteen-pound gun-carriages, at Stonington, Connecticut, $750.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. All except the last item will be found in the book of estimates, as given to the Secretary of War. They are given there just as they are given here in detail. We lumped them and took the gross amount. They have added one item of $750 for the repair of an old arsenal in Stonington, Connecticut.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to taking the vote on them altogether?

There was no objection.

Mr. HOUSTON. Are the amounts the same in the two provisions?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. They are, excepting the addition of $750 for the old arsenal in Stonington.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I think the amendment of the Senate is an improvement upon the House provision; for it specifies for what the money shall be expended.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The same specifications are in the estimates.

Mr. HOUSTON. But the estimates are not a part of the law. As the House provision stands, the whole of the appropriation may be used for two or three works. The Senate amendment is specific, and I think that we ought to adopt it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have certainly followed in the footsteps of my predecessor.

Mr. HOUSTON. If there is any such precedent set by me, it is a bad precedent; and I am sorry to see that my friend only follows bad precedents.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. The amendment only increases the appropriation $750 for an old arsenal; and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendments of the Senate were concurred in—ayes seventy-one, noes not counted.

Sixteenth amendment:

Page 8, line twenty four, insert:

To enable the Secretary of War to examine and report upon suitable sites for an armory and foundry on the west and on the Pacific coast, $10,000.

Mr. CLEMENS. On the west of what?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I should like to understand that amendment better than I do. We have not the benefit of printed amendments before us. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. CLEMENS] put a question as to the points of compass. I should like to hear that question answered.

Mr. CLEMENS. I suppose it would be a sufficient reason for voting against that amendment that it is not expressed in good English, and nobody can understand it.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Seventeenth amendment.

Page 9, in line three, insert the following:

To enable the Secretary of War to compensate F. W. Lander for services performed, and expenses incurred by him in making reconnoissances for a railroad from Puget Sound via the South Pass, to the Mississippi river, in 1854-55, $4,750, or so much thereof as the said Secretary may consider reasonable and proper in consideration of said services and expenses.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. LEITER. I wish to inquire of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether the Department has not recommended that this money should be appropriated?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. From information we have, there is no doubt that the work was performed; but it was performed, as we understand, by the Territorial Legislature of Washington.

Mr. STANTON. That case was presented to the Committee on Military Affairs. We examined it, and made an adverse report upon it.

Several MEMBERS. That is enough.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Eighteenth amendment:

At the end of the bill add the following paragraphs and sections:

For payment of volunteers operating in Florida during the year 1857, $385,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This is to pay for the volunteers called out by the Governor of Florida in 1855 and 1856. The matter was presented to the Committee of Ways and Means when the original bill was before them; but we found that there seemed to be great difficulty in making out the rolls, and the records were not so complete and clear as the Committee of Ways and Means thought they ought to be, especially coming in outside the regular estimates. The Senate, however, have inserted in this bill the amount of $385,000 for paying these volunteers; but since the Senate passed this amendment I have received a communication from the Secretary of War, who states that, instead of $385,000, he must have $585,000.

The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. QUITMAN. It seems almost impossible to get along intelligently without having the Senate amendments printed and before us; and as they will be printed on to-morrow, I therefore move that the committee rise.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to say to the gentleman from Mississippi, that these amendments cannot be printed till the day after to-morrow.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will say to my friend from Mississippi, that the next fifteen amendments all relate to one subject. They are all for fortifications, and there will be no difficulty in understanding them.

Mr. QUITMAN. Very well. I withdraw my motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask that all the amendments relating to fortifications may be read over, and the vote taken upon them in gross

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I object. The vote might as well be taken upon each as it is read over.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I would suggest that the amendments be read over, and then if the gentleman desires a separate vote on any particular one, let it be taken; and let us dispose of the others en masse, and not consume time by considering each separately.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in all these amendments.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I will withdraw my objection.

The amendments were reported, as follows:

For continuing the construction of the following works of defense:

Fort Knox, at the narrows of the Penobscot river, Maine, $50,000.

Fort Montgomery, outlet of Lake Champlain, New York, $50,000.

Fort at Hog Island Ledge, in Portland harbor, Maine, $50,000.

Fort Richmond, Staten Island, New York, $100,000.

Fort Wood, New York harbor, $20,000.

Fort Delaware, Delaware river, Delaware, $100,000.

Fort Carroll, Soller's Point flats, Baltimore harbor, Maryland, $100,000.

Fort Cathoun, Hampton Roads, Virginia, $75,000.

Fort Sumpter, Charleston harbor, South Carolina, $25,000.

Fort Clinch, entrance to Cumberland Sound, Florida, $75,000.

Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, $100,000.

Fort Jefferson, Garden Key, Tortugas, Florida, $200,000.

Fort Pickens, Pensacola, Florida, (construction and repairs), $50,000.

Fort Point, San Francisco, California, $150,000.

Fort Gaines, Dauphin Island, entrance to Mobile bay, Alabama, $50,000.

Fort St. Philip, Mississippi river, Louisiana, (extension and repairs), $10,000.

For contingent expenses of fortifications, preservation of sites, protection of titles, and repairs of sudden damage, $30,000.

For construction of permanent platforms for modern cannon of large caliber, in existing fortifications of important harbors, $50,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. They amount to about one million two hundred and eighty thousand dollars.

Mr. WHITELEY. I move to amend by adding $100,000 to the first amendment, for the purpose of enabling me to submit a few remarks. I do not wish to detain the committee but a moment, but I wish to call their attention to one fact. This amendment of the Senate does not equal, by nearly three quarters of a million dollars, a similar amendment which I offered in committee some few days ago. That amendment was scaled in the Senate. I do not wish to repeat a single word that I stated upon that occasion, but I wish to call the attention of the committee to the fact, that while they refused one week ago to give $2,000,000 to the fortifications of the country, they have since given to the city of Washington $2,500,000. Now, I ask the committee, while they appropriate $2,500,000 for the city of Washington, will they refuse to give $1,250,000 to the fortifications of the country?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I would inquire of the gentleman from Delaware, whether he opposed those appropriations for the city of Washington?

Mr. WHITELEY. I supported them. I am willing to give liberal appropriations for the Capitol, the water works, the Treasury, Post Office, and Patent Office buildings, and a hundred thousand miscellaneous appropriations for the city of Washington. But while I am willing to do that, I am also willing to give to the fortifications of this country the pitiful sum of $1,500,000. We have given to this Capitol $750,000; to the water works $800,000; to the Treasury extension $300,000; to the Post Office extension $100,000; to the Patent Office $50,000; and to miscellaneous purposes about another hundred thousand dollars, amounting, in all, to nearly two and a half millions. Here outside influences were brought to bear, and we could make those liberal appropriations; but for the defensive works of the country from Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, we can hardly get half that sum. You have to-day given a large appropriation to the Navy; and not only that, but you have given to a book concern in this city $240,000 for a job, which I say here, upon my responsibility, this Government will not get through with under a half, if not a million, of dollars. And when you have done that, you will not give your forts, now one half or one quarter finished, and useless in their present condition, one cent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. An appropriation bill was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means to provide for the preservation of some of the present fortifications of the United States, and an amendment was offered to add $2,000,000 to that bill. It failed. The gentleman now finds fault with the action of the House, because the House has voted money to complete the Capitol, to finish the water works, and to complete the erection of two or three other buildings in this city; and yet the gentleman, in answer to an inquiry that I made, acknowledges that he sustained all those appropriations, thus justifying the action of the House, and the action of the Committee of Ways and Means which reported those bills. But because to complete the forts upon the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and upon the Gulf, does not receive the approval of that committee, the gentleman from Delaware charges that the members of that committee are actuated by parsimonious feelings, and an unwillingness to place the country in a state of defense. Is the gentleman willing to borrow money at this time to complete the fortifications upon our sea-coast?

Mr. WHITELEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. He is desirous immediately of placing the country in a state of defense, and gentlemen have pointed to the fact that outrages have been committed on our commerce, and they use that as an argument why we should appropriate a large sum of money for the completion of our fortifications. But what defense do they afford? They only defend those who are placed within their walls from cannon shot, and, to the extent of the range of the guns, those who may be without the walls. If forces are to be landed upon the coast, would they be landed within the range of the guns upon those fortifications? or would they seek some other place, going entirely around those fortifications? That was the case when our troops took Vera Cruz. The main attack upon that fortress was from the land, and not the sea.

Mr. PALMER. I ask the gentleman by what channel the British invaded this country in 1814? I ask him whether Fort Montgomery, the second on this list, does not command the outlet of Lake Champlain, by which England then invaded us, and by which she will invade us again, if we abandon the construction of this fort?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. But does the gentleman forget the facility we now have of transporting troops to any given point in the country? Does he forget that we now have railroads open to the extent of twenty thousand miles, and that at twenty-four hours' notice we could concentrate on any part of the Atlantic sea-board ten thousand men, in addition to those living in the vicinity? As to the very point the gentleman indicates, I ask him if we could not concentrate there, within twenty-four hours, a large body of troops summoned from different portions of the country?

Mr. PALMER. And in less than twelve hours Great Britain could send there a fleet of twenty gun-boats and an army of twenty thousand men, and overrun the borders of Lake Champlain, unless this fort be put in a proper state of defense. She has done it before, and would do it again.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. That fort will never defend you. When Great Britain seeks to invade us, it will not be there.

Mr. WHITELEY. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to amend by increasing the appropriation $100,000. I have listened to-day, Mr. Chairman, with a great deal of pleasure to the effusion of patriotism shown by gentlemen on this floor, relative to the proposition to increase our Navy. Now, while I am willing, as heretofore, to vote for every one of these appropriations, I wish to call the attention of the committee to the condition of Fort Point on the bay of San Francisco. Gentlemen may talk very well on this floor about fifty thousand troops being called into the field as soon as the first blast of the war bugle is heard; but I ask how is it to be with California, separated thousands and thousands of miles from the other States of the Confederacy, and having its only intercourse with them by a semi-monthly mail, by the Isthmus of Panama? If the war now impending should take place, in what condition would my State be placed? The first thing that would be done by the enemy would be to capture the California steamers; because every officer in command of a British vessel would be anxious to secure the prize-money—consisting of millions, which we are semi-monthly sending you from our State—that he would derive from such a capture.

Now, if you give us this $150,000 to continue the works at Fort Point, which guards the entrance to the mouth of the harbor of San Francisco, we can defend ourselves and defy the combined and united fleet of England. But strike down that appropriation and leave the fort uncompleted, and we are at the mercy of the most powerful maritime nation of the globe. This appropriation should be separate and distinct from the rest, although I will cheerfully vote for them all, in order to place all sections of our Union in a proper state of defense. Here, in the Atlantic States, you have your means of defense; you have your ships in the harbors, and can concentrate them at a given point to do battle with the naval forces of a foreign Power; but there is a portion of the Confederacy which is undefended and unable to defend itself from the British Pacific squadron. I do not look upon this as a war measure, for even in the time of peace we should be prepared for war; and justice demands that this appropriation should be made. You will not give us a Pacific railroad. The route across Salt Lake is already stopped up by war with the Mormons. You have an overland route, it is true, between Texas and San Diego; but let any gentleman make the calculation and tell me honestly and candidly if you could transport troops by that route in sufficient time to protect us. True, in California, we could raise in time of war fifty thousand as gallant men as ever shouldered musket or trod in shoe leather; but, unless you give us an appropriation by which we can have the means and material necessary to defend that flag which you all honor as much as I do, I tell you you will see the painful and humiliating spectacle of the country being placed in the condition of having one portion of it captured, in the possession and at the mercy of a foreign foe.

Mr. LETCHER. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that we have a new definition of "patriotism" now-a-days. It consists in spending money. The gentleman from California insists upon it, that unless we display our patriotism in that way, California will be ruined. Now, sir, I take the occasion to say that no nation has ever exhibited more of this sort of "patriotism" to a portion of her people than this Government has shown to California, from the time she was admitted as a State into the Union. We have appropriated much more largely to her than to any other State for fortifications and for various other purposes, within the limited time that she has been a member of the Confederacy of States. But the gentleman says now we must go on, that we must continue to make appropriations in answer to her demands. He says that if war breaks out, California is in an exposed condition. Why, have we not heard all day that there is to be no war? Has not that been the cry from the time the debate commenced this morning up to the present moment; that the increase of the Navy was for the protection of commerce; that no war was to grow out of the difficulties between this country and England; that all was settled, and that if war was to come, we would be required to construct a much larger number of vessels? And now, when these fortifications come up we are told that we must build them for the purpose of being prepared for that very war which nobody believes is coming!

Mr. CLAY. I would like to ask the gentleman from Virginia who it was that asserted on this floor to-day that there was no danger of war?

Mr. LETCHER. I think that several did. I know that several asserted that the proposed increase of the Navy was a matter for the protection of commerce. I think the chairman of the Committee on Naval Affairs took that ground. I think various other gentlemen took that ground, over and over again; and I think my friend from Kentucky does not suppose that there is quite as much danger now as there was a short time ago.

Mr. CLAY. I beg the gentleman's pardon.

Mr. LETCHER. Then you think there is?

Mr. CLAY. Yes, sir.

Mr. LETCHER. I am afraid, Mr. Chairman, that I shall begin to get alarmed myself.

Mr. CLAY. And if the gentleman will allow me, I will tell him why.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us hear.

Mr. CLAY. Because I saw in the papers this afternoon accounts of forty-one vessels that have been visited and searched, almost in our own waters.

Mr. LETCHER. I think I saw that last night in the Herald; so that my friend from Kentucky is twenty-four hours behind time with his information.

Mr. CLAY. I do not read the Herald.

Mr. LETCHER. Then let me advise you to take an enterprising newspaper, that you may be posted. [Laughter.]

The question was taken on Mr. Scott's amendment to the amendment; and it was not agreed to.

The question recurring on the Senate amendment, the chairman ordered tellers; and Messrs. ARNOLD and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-nine, noes not counted.

So the Senate amendment was not concurred in.

Mr. STANTON. I do not believe that the state of business requires that we should sit here twenty hours out of the twenty-four; and I move that the committee do now rise.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and FLORENCE were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 81.

So the committee refused to rise.

Thirty-eighth amendment:

For the payment of claims favorably reported upon by the board of Army officers, appointed under the sixth section of the act approved August 31, 1852, in their final report to Congress dated April 19, 1855, $7,372 53½.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment. It appears to be for an unsettled balance—

[Loud cries of "Question!" and "Vote!"]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will talk for half an hour if I hear that noise again.

[Renewed and vehement cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I will remark that I would not say one word, but I find that when I say nothing about an amendment, it leads to half an hour's debate, and then the committee consume another half hour in trying to rise. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Thirty-ninth amendment:

For the construction of bridges and the improvement of the crossings of streams on the road from Fort Smith, in Arkansas, to Albuquerque, in New Mexico, $50,000; and that $100,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in completing connected sections of the road extending from Albuquerque, in the Territory of New Mexico, westward on the route of the Colorado river, and on or near the thirty-fifth parallel of north latitude.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amount of the appropriation for this wagon road is $150,000. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is an important amendment, and one which ought to be considered; and we are not in a condition to consider it to-night. I therefore move that the committee rise.

The committee refused to rise.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I desire to say something in relation to the amendment. To be in order I move, pro forma, to increase the appropriation $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Military Affairs of this House, during the present session, reported a bill proposing to appropriate $100,000 to make a military road from Albuquerque to the Colorado river. The Secretary of War recommends it as a military road. It is for the purpose of having a line of communication from the valley of the Rio Grande, in the center of New Mexico, to the Colorado, in the direction of Fort Tejon, one of the forts near the junction of the Sierra Nevada with the coast range of mountains in southern California.

But it is not designed merely as a military road. The great line of overland travel from the States in the valley of the Mississippi to the State of California has usually been through Utah Territory; but in consequence of the disturbances there this season, that line has been broken. Even if peace be restored, there will still be a bitterness of feeling on the part of the Mormons; and it may be expected that small bands of emigrants will be assaulted, and liable to be cut off. Outrages of that character have heretofore been perpetrated upon overland emigrants. It is designed, therefore, that this shall be, not only a military road, but a road for emigrants.

At the last session of Congress an appropriation of $50,000 was made to aid in constructing a road from Fort Defiance to the Colorado river. The Secretary of War assigned Lieutenant Beale to superintend the construction of the road. The necessity of procuring supplies and means for transportation left but a small amount to be applied to the actual construction of the road. The means of transportation and a portion of the supplies are now on hand, ready to be used if this appropriation shall be made. Lieutenant Beale explored the route from Albuquerque to the Colorado river, and made a report at this session of Congress, in which he recommends that this additional appropriation shall be made. The distance from Albuquerque to the Colorado river is but five hundred and sixty-one miles, and passing through a country well supplied with wood, water, and grass. I ask that the letter of the Secretary of War be read.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. MAYNARD. I move to increase the appropriation one dollar; and I do it for the purpose of hearing that letter. I ask that it be read as my speech.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, May 22, 1858.

SIR: In reply to your note received this day, I beg leave to remark that the road from Albuquerque to the Colorado river, of which you speak, is, in my judgment, one of very great importance. It constitutes a central line of communication between the Mississippi valley and the Pacific ocean, which, for many purposes, will compare favorably with any other, and in some particulars is superior. It will be a great thoroughfare for emigration; presenting, as it does, the straightest road of any yet discovered across the great basin lying between the Sierra Madre and the Sierra Nevada, along which there is no scarcity of water or grass.

In a military point of view it is probably of more importance still; for by its construction and the settlement which it will superinduce upon its whole length, it will present a line of defense, after a while, which will divide completely the nomad tribes of Indians which inhabit the Utah Territory and the regions north of this road, from the country lying in the Territory of Arizona.

It will be scarcely possible, when the road from El Paso to Fort Yuma is completed, and properly guarded, that the region of country lying between the road now spoken of and that line of travel could be subject to any very serious depredation from the Indian tribes, either residing in it or those north of the road which you are proposing to construct.

Fifty thousand dollars have been expended upon this line, advantageously, as I think; and the facts connected with the report which Mr. Beale made—heretofore transmitted to Congress—concerning this road, demonstrate, in my opinion, that a wise economy would warrant the appropriation of $100,000 towards the completion of an enterprise so auspiciously begun.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

HON. M. A. OTERO, House of Representatives.

Mr. QUITMAN. I wish to call attention to the fact, that nowhere, it seems, does the Secretary of War recommend this as a military necessity. He only thinks that it would be a great convenience. I mention this with due deference to the judgment of the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. CLARK, of Missouri. He does state that it is more needed for military purposes than for any other.

Mr. MAYNARD withdrew his amendment.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The money is wanted for the continuation of a road already begun as a military road, by an appropriation of last Congress.

Mr. STEVENS, of Washington. I move to amend by adding:

And for completing the wagon road from the Great Falls of the Missouri, in the Territory of Nebraska, to intersect the wagon road leading from Walla Walla to Puget Sound, authorized by the act approved February 6, 1855, §200,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Is that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules it out of order.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. If I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair, can I debate the appeal?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. Is it in order to call for the reasons of the decision of the Chair?

The CHAIRMAN. A proposition is before the committee to appropriate money for one road. The gentleman moves to amend by making an appropriation for another road. The Chair holds that it is not in order, because it is not relevant to the proposition.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I desire to suggest that this afternoon, when the naval bill was under consideration, there was a proposition to construct a number of vessels of war. An amendment was proposed to construct another number, and it was held to be in order. On the same principle I supposed that this proposition for another thoroughfare to the Pacific was in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not responsible for the decision of another chairman; it is enough to be responsible for his own.

Mr. SCOTT. I move to amend the Senate amendment by increasing the amount $150,000. It is always disagreeable to me to consume the time of the House, and I never do it unless it be in conformity to a sense of duty. I represent a State which I know has varied interests, and I am sure the committee will bear me out in saying that I do not intrude upon them except when her interests are concerned. I wish to make a few remarks in regard to the question now pending. The gentleman from Mississippi says that the Secretary of War does not, as shown by the letter which has just been read, consider this road a military necessity. I grant it that those exact words are not used, and that it is not imperative upon Congress to pass the appropriation, but, at the same time, he considers its construction expedient. I then concede, so far as the views of the Secretary of War are concerned, relative to this road, that the construction of it would be of vast advantage to the military affairs of the country as a matter of true policy. That is the construction I place upon his language.

Now, sir, I desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that I come from a State which the gentleman from Virginia has been pleased to assail, upon the ground that she is ever asking something from the hands of the Government. Now, I desire gentlemen to understand that the reason that she does so, is that her chief product is gold itself. Let them also remember, and the gentleman from Virginia particularly, that when this whole country was stricken down by a pecuniary crisis, and we and despair were depicted upon every face upon the Atlantic coast, and the financial condition of our Union was utterly prostrated, California came to the rescue with her millions of gold, infused new life and vigor in our monetary affairs, and restored wealth and confidence to all classes of our community. I come from a State which receives a large accession from all parts of the Union—a State that is strictly a Union State, where northern and southern men are bound together in one grand bond of brotherhood. And this is an appropriation for a military road by which both sections of the Union will be benefited equally, because it is central. Your men of the North and the South wish to go across the plains to settle in that State, and you cannot now get there by the way of Salt Lake, which is blocked up on account of the Mormon war. You cannot tell when that war will be terminated; and it was properly stated by the gentleman from South Carolina, [Mr. Boyce,] in a recent speech, that there may be a guerrilla warfare carried on for years in the gulches and ravines of Utah, and no man can see or foretell when its termination will occur. But here is a route which is demonstrated by the survey of Lieutenant Beale to be all that you can desire. I ask, therefore, that the sum of $250,000 shall be appropriated to finish that road. I ask gentlemen, while you vote $1,000,000 to introduce water within the city of Washington, in the name of justice cannot you appropriate $150,000 for a connecting link between the Atlantic and the Pacific?

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Senate amendment was not agreed to

Mr. BARKSDALE. We have now been in session eleven hours, and I am satisfied, from the circumstances around us, that these amendments cannot be properly considered. I therefore move that the committee rise.

Mr. GROW. How many amendments are there still unacted on?

The CHAIRMAN. Nine.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask for tellers on my motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BARKSDALE and BILLINGHURST were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 58, noes 55.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent to introduce a joint resolution.

Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce it.

Mr. GROW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five minutes past ten o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

THURSDAY, June 10, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. R. ECKARD.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

PETITIONS AND MEMORIALS.

Mr. MALLORY presented three memorials of citizens of Tampa, Florida, praying that the military reservation and garrison grounds of Fort Brooke be granted to that city for the purpose of establishing a seminary of learning; which were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN AND REFERRED.

On motion of Mr. IVERSON, it was Ordered, That the petition and papers of John Forrester be withdrawn from the Court of Claims and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

On motion of Mr. KENNEDY, it was Ordered, That the memorial of J. P. Milton, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

WILLIAM HAZZARD WIGG.

Mr. HAMMOND asked, and by unanimous consent obtained, leave to introduce a joint resolution (S. R. No. 52) for the relief of William Hazzard Wigg; which was read twice by its title.

Mr. HAMMOND. I ask for the present consideration of the resolution, as its object is to correct an error.

By unanimous consent, the joint resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to readjust the accounts of William Hazzard Wigg stated under the authority of the act of Congress for his relief, approved March 3, 1853, and to ascertain an alleged clerical error whereby the sum of $1,560 is supposed to have been withheld, and to pay that sum according to the true intent and meaning of the act of 1853.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John H. Merrill, praying to be allowed compensation for services rendered, and expenses incurred, as sheriff under the appointment of a court established by the alcalde at San Francisco, in July, 1849, also for expenses incurred for the relief and support of sick and disabled seamen, submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of the petition of John H. Merrill, and that the same, with the accompanying papers, be referred to the Court of Claims, that the same may be investigated and the testimony in support of it may be stated.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Riggs & Co., praying the reimbursement of money advanced by them to Charles Loring, late receiver of public moneys at Benicia, California, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George T. Parry, praying that the Secretary of the Navy be authorized to purchase his patent for an instrument, the object of which is to abolish the friction attending the thrust of propellers, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Charlotte Taylor, only surviving child of the late William Scarborough, of Savannah, Georgia, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Reynell Coates, praying compensation for losses sustained and services rendered while connected with the scientific corps of the South Sea exploring expedition, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the memorial of Hiram McCullough, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 450) for the relief of Samuel A. West, George McCullough, Hiram McCullough, and James Pendergrast. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, reported a bill (S. No. 45) to suppress the unlawful collection and delivery of letters, and for other purposes; which was read, and passed to a second reading. He also stated that he would not ask for the consideration of the bill at the present session.

Mr. BIGLER, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 401) to facilitate communication between the Atlantic and Pacific States by electric telegraph, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 201) to secure a prompt construction of a line of telegraph from San Francisco to Fort Smith, and from thence to St. Louis and to Memphis, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

Mr. IVERSON, from the Committee on Claims, to whom were referred the papers relating to the claim of James A. Mott to compensation for professional services rendered to sick and wounded soldiers in the war of 1812, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Charles Kohler, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 420) for the relief of James Collier, reported it without amendment; and submitted a report, which was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of John R. Nourse, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 452) for the relief of John R. Nourse. The bill was read, and passed to a second reading; and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford, reported it without amendment.

OWNERS OF MAIL STEAMERS.

Mr. CLINGMAN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to endeavor to ascertain, and communicate to the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, the amount of stock which is, or has been, held by foreigners in ocean mail steamers covered by the flag of the United States, running between New York and Liverpool, New York and Havre, and New York and Bremen; and to designate the amount owned, or which has been owned, in either case, in any foreign country.

FORT GRATIOT RESERVATION.

On motion of Mr. STUART, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (S. No. 263) granting the right of way over, and depot grounds on, the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes.

The original bill, as introduced by Mr. CHANDLER, proposed to grant to the Port Huron and Manitowoc Railway Company the right of way and the land necessary for depot purposes in the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, if, in the opinion of the Secretary of War, the grant should not be detrimental to the public interests; with a proviso that the location and width of the right of way and the location and boundaries of the depot grounds should be determined under the direction of the Secretary of War, subject to the approval of the company; and that nothing should be taken by the act unless the railway and depot grounds should be completed and actually occupied as such within ten years; and that, if at any time after the completion, the use should be abandoned or discontinued, the grant should determine and cease.

The Committee on Military Affairs proposed an amendment, to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the right of way through, and the privilege of constructing depots and workshops on, the public lands of the United States lying in the county of St. Clair, State of Michigan, commonly called the Fort Gratiot military reservation, be, and the same is hereby, granted to any railroad company or companies which may construct a railroad or railroads from the city of Detroit, to or near the village of Port Huron, in said State: Provided, That in the opinion of the President of the United States such grant or grants be not injurious to the purposes of public defense, and that the location of said buildings on, and such road or roads as to position and width through said reservation, and the price of the land to be so occupied, being first determined by the Secretary of War, be approved by the President: And provided further, That if the price of such grant or grants be not paid within thirty days after the approval of the President, or if either of said roads shall not be completed within three years, or if, at any time after its completion, it shall be discontinued, the grant shall cease and determine as to such road: And provided further, That all the buildings to be erected upon said reservation shall be of wood: and if, at any time, it should be deemed expedient by the commanding officer of Fort Gratiot, or by any other higher military authority, to destroy such buildings by fire or otherwise, no claim shall be made against the United States for damages.

The amendment was agreed to; the bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, was read the third time, and passed.

SAN FRANCISCO POST OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair has been handed a memorial from a Mr. Henry L. Goodwin, protesting against the publication at present of a communication from the Post Office Department, touching the post office at San Francisco, which he alleges contains allegations injurious to him. The Chair will lay it before the Senate, and have it referred to the Committee on Printing, as the papers to which it relates are before that committee.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask that the memorial be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

To the Senate of the United States of America:

Your memorialist, Henry L. Goodwin, a citizen of California, respectfully represents,

That the pretended answer of the Postmaster General to the Senate resolution of inquiry, of the 13th May, touching the violations of law by the postmaster at San Francisco—(some of which were in derogation of the rights of your memorialist, as a citizen)—is evasive; that it suppresses facts material to the issue of the subject-matter of the inquiry; that it tends to deceive the Senate, whether so designed or not; that its publication would work injustice to the public generally, and to your memorialist in particular.

Therefore, your memorialist now prays that the Senate may stay the publication of the said pretended answer of the Postmaster General until a more full and true answer shall be obtained on the points propounded in the inquiry of the 13th May; or, otherwise, until the said pretended answer may be accompanied by the explanation of this memorial.

The said pretended answer virtually ignores the fact that your memorialist did make specific charges of violations of law, by the San Francisco postmaster, and that said charges were supported by unimpeached and unimpeachable evidence. It also suppresses the fact, and virtually denies that the attention of the Postmaster General had been called to the law for such cases made and provided, and that he had been called upon, in express terms, to execute the law which says: "he shall prosecute offenses against the Post Office establishment."

The said pretended answer tends to leave the impression on the mind of the Senate, that the San Francisco postmaster had already been judicially tried and acquitted on the points of the merits of the accusation; whereas, in point of fact, the files of the Post Office Department show that he has never been tried, and that the result of the preliminary examination in San Francisco, turned, not on the merits, but on the plea alleged by the postmaster there, that his proceedings, as complained of, "were in accordance with the instructions and approval of the Postmaster General."

The said pretended answer further omits to inform the Senate that there are on the files of the Department here, copies of judicial opinions rendered in San Francisco, which determined the fact that the acts charged against the postmaster there were violations of law, and "an official wrong."

The said pretended answer tends, further, to leave the impression on the mind of the Senate, that the course pursued by the present head of the Department has been in exact accordance with the view taken and pursued in the premises by his immediate predecessor; whereas, had he afforded the Senate the entire file of the Department here on the subject, instead of a garbled representation of the same, it would be instantly obvious that the late head of the Department never did approve of the acts of his subordinate at San Francisco on the merits.

In conclusion, the undersigned prays, if your honorable body order the publication of the said pretended answer to the inquiry of the 13th May, that this memorial may also be ordered to accompany the same, together with the evidence, the judicial opinions, and the correspondence on the files of the Post Office Department, and as referred to in the said pretended answer; copies of all of which can be furnished the Senate in less than twenty-four hours.

HENRY L. GOODWIN.

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 9, 1858.

Mr. BRODERICK. I move that the memorial be referred to the Committee on Printing; and before the communication of the Postmaster General is printed I ask for the consideration of another resolution of inquiry which I send to the Chair.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The memorial will go to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I wish to suggest to the Senator from California, that this matter is in a complicated shape. He has another resolution to offer, calling for information which it is alleged has not been furnished to the Senate in the communication that has already been made. Here is a report from the Postmaster General in answer to a resolution of the Senate, already transmitted, which report has been referred to the Committee on Printing. That committee have had it under consideration; they have had estimates of its cost, and are ready to report in favor of printing it; but now it seems that some conflict is likely to arise, in which there are more interests involved than the Printing Committee had any knowledge of; and that committee cannot be expected to take cognizance of these matters at all; but they belong properly to the Post Office Committee. I am, therefore, at a loss what to do. While the memorial which has been read is before us, I do not know but that appropriately, this report from the Post Office Department ought to be printed; but yet, I also know that the subject is so complicated that another resolution is proposed to be submitted, by the Senator from California, calling for further information; and he thinks that the whole ought to be printed together. In my opinion, the better course would be to refer the whole subject to the Post Office Committee, together with the resolution of the Senator making a call for additional information; which I believe ought to be granted to him; and then let the whole matter go to the Post Office Committee, and let them call for the printing if it be necessary.

Mr. BRODERICK. At an early day I introduced a resolution of inquiry on this subject. At that time I was of the opinion that the information would reach the Senate on the following day. I asked for the charges on file against the postmaster at San Francisco. The Postmaster General took very nearly a month to reply. His reply was sent in the day before yesterday, but several letters for which I called were not sent in. The resolution I have just offered calls for those letters, which are now on file in the Post Office Department. I wish the information I now call for to accompany the reply of the Postmaster General to the former resolution. I hope my resolution will be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the present posture of matters, if no motion be made, the memorial will be referred to the Committee on Printing, and the resolution of inquiry of the Senator from California will be read for information.

Mr. BIGLER. This is rather an extraordinary proceeding—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If the Senator from Pennsylvania will allow me to do so, I wish to express to him the hope that we shall not go into a discussion of the merits of this matter. There is an easy way of disposing of it, and that is to refer the whole subject to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; let this communication go to that committee without printing; then let us await the return of an answer to the additional resolution of inquiry which the Senator from California now presents.

Mr. BIGLER. That is just exactly what I am not willing to do.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have no objection to the course suggested by the Senator from Arkansas.

Mr. BIGLER. I certainly shall object to it. The Senator from California, some time since, in pursuance of what he conceived to be his duty, called upon the Postmaster General for information with reference to the conduct of the postmaster at San Francisco. The Postmaster General has replied to that resolution at length, according to his understanding of his duty. That communication has been sent here, and it has been referred to the proper committee to consider the propriety of printing it. We are informed that the committee is ready to report in favor of printing the communication from the Department, which we ought to have printed. This was a question between the Postmaster General and the postmaster at San Francisco; but a gentleman, whose name is Henry L. Goodwin, interposes by a memorial here, not in reference to some grievance of his own, specifically set forth, and asking Congress for redress, but he prays this body not to publish the reply of the Postmaster General to a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Will the Senator from Pennsylvania allow me to ask him if this communication from the Postmaster General does not contain a direct attack on Mr. Goodwin?

Mr. BIGLER. That may be so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. If so, he interferes for his own protection. A citizen is assailed, as I understand, by a letter from some person in California, communicated in these proceedings, and it would be most extraordinary if that citizen had no right to have all the papers relating to the subject.

Mr. BIGLER. It would be most extraordinary if that citizen had no opportunity of replying. He shall have that opportunity, so far as I am concerned. But he interposes to invite the Senate not to publish a report from the Department; not to print it for the use of this body. That is the point in this memorial to which I object, and I hope it will not have the influence of arresting the publication of a report which was made to us from the Department, the head of which is responsible. If it be what Mr. Goodwin says, the Department is responsible for it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania submit any motion.

Mr. BIGLER. I am perfectly willing that this memorial shall be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. To that I have no objection, but I object that it shall be interposed against the printing of the answer of the Postmaster General to a resolution of the Senate.

Mr. BRODERICK. Mr. President—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senator from California pause for a moment? The Chair stated that, if no motion was made, the memorial would go, naturally, to the Committee on Printing. Does the Senator from Pennsylvania move to refer it to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move to give it that reference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That, then, is the question.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am willing that this matter should take the course recommended by the Senator from Arkansas. This gentleman considers that the Postmaster General has attacked his character, and of course, as a citizen of the United States, he has a right to defend himself against the attack of the Postmaster General. I did not wish to open this question here this morning; but I hoped the resolution of inquiry which I introduced would be adopted, so as to get the further testimony that is now on file in the Post Office Department. This gentleman contends that the information which the Postmaster General has withheld from the Senate will satisfy the Senate that the postmaster at San Francisco has been guilty of malfeasance in office. The Postmaster General, instead of sending the information asked for in the resolution which I introduced, has sent an ex parte statement of this postmaster and his clerks, and if it is published, this citizen will be ruined. His character is attacked; he is charged with being insane. I consider him a very sane man. He has been trying to convince the people of San Francisco, and he has convinced nineteen twentieths of them, that this officer is not an honest man. I hope the Senate will not be hasty in taking action on this case. I have no objection to the course recommended by the Senator from Arkansas; and, for the purpose of stopping this debate, I hope his motion will prevail.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is on the motion to refer this memorial to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. YULEE. I doubt whether the committee ought to be troubled with this matter. It is a mere personal controversy between the memorialist, Mr. Henry L. Goodwin, and the postmaster at San Francisco, with which the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Senate have been annoyed to death this whole session, and with which the Department has been annoyed for the last year. I am perfectly sick and tired of it. There is nothing in it, and the Senate ought not to be annoyed with it. The whole thing ought to be laid on the table. The reply of the Postmaster General to the resolution which was introduced mainly to bring out the facts in this particular case, produced those facts. Let that be printed, and let there be an end of the matter, unless the Senate see that there is something further in it calling for further action on the application of this person. We ought not to be annoyed with it; and to save trouble to the Senate, perhaps, the better plan will be to refer the Postmaster General's report and this resolution to the committee, and I promise that we will make short work with it; we will give you a report to-morrow morning.

The motion to refer the memorial to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was agreed to.

Mr. BRODERICK. I now call for the consideration of my resolution of inquiry.

Mr. YULEE. That, I suppose, will take the same direction.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be requested to transmit to the Senate forthwith the evidence of alleged violations of law and malfeasance in office on the part of the postmaster at San Francisco, and also the papers accompanying the same, filed in the Post Office Department on or about April 20, 1857. Also, all correspondence with J. D. Fry, the special agent of the Post Office Department, in regard to any alleged malfeasance on the part of said postmaster; and especially a copy of a letter addressed to said Fry October 3, 1855, and the reply to the same; and also the report made by the said Fry. Also, letters in relation to the same from — Van Bokkelen, Esq., in 1856, and Messrs. More and Folger in 1857; and copies of all correspondence connected therewith. Also, letters from H. L. Goodwin in 1855, and four letters from the same person, dated March 27, June 25, July 18, and July 25, 1857. Also, letters of C. L. Weiler, dated September 1, 1855, March 21, 1856, and October 11 and 20, 1857; and that the Postmaster General inform the Senate whether there is any information on the files of the Post Office Department showing or charging that the investigation ordered to be made by J. D. Fry was an ex parte investigation.

Resolved, further, That the publication of the answer of the Postmaster General to the resolution of the Senate of May 13, be suspended until the before-described papers and information are obtained.

Mr. YULEE. I move the reference of that resolution, with the rest of the matter, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The first question is, whether there is objection to the present consideration of the resolution? The Chair hears no objection, and the resolution is before the Senate.

Mr. YULEE. I now move to refer the resolution, with the rest of the papers, to the Post Office Committee, and they will report what it is advisable for the Senate to do. The whole matter is entirely without use. The papers called for under the resolution will cost thousands of dollars to be copied and furnished and printed, and they will be of no use whatever to anybody, and can answer no purpose except to gratify the personal views of the gentleman who is pursuing this matter, and who had really better be engaged in some more profitable pursuit.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the extraordinary course recommended by the Senator from Florida will not prevail. The information I now call for can be furnished without putting the Government to one dollar's expense, if the Postmaster General will allow a clerk to copy the communications, and it will not take twenty-four hours to do so. This gentleman has been attacked, and I hope this publication will not go to the world before this gentleman shall have an opportunity to defend himself against the attack of the Postmaster General. The Senator from Florida has a very easy way of disposing of matters of this kind. He stated the other day, when I called attention to the neglect of the Department to answer my former resolution, that it would take two clerks four or five months to copy the correspondence that I called for.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator is mistaken. I said that the copying of all the papers which would require an examination to enable the report to be made, would occupy four or five months.

Mr. BRODERICK. Well, sir, it appears that the Postmaster General has seen fit to send to the Senate letters placed upon file by the postmaster at San Francisco, and his clerks, against this gentleman, Mr. Goodwin, and has sent the Senate nothing that he placed on file. Now, if any of it is to be published, I desire to have the whole evidence together. I do not want this gentleman to be regarded insane. I consider him a very sane man. As I said a few minutes ago, he has been pursuing this officer for the last year, and has convinced nineteen twentieths of the people of San Francisco that he has been guilty of malfeasance. That is their opinion. I have received letters from a large number of gentlemen of character and respectability in San Francisco, saying so, and expressing the belief that this gentleman had been treated outrageously by the Postmaster General. His business has been destroyed by this postmaster; and I hope that, in addition to that, we shall not blacken his character. I want all the information in the possession of the Post Office Department before this document is printed, or I want the responsibility to fall on those who defend this officer.

Mr. YULEE. As the Senator has characterized the report of the Postmaster General, I ask him on his honor to state whether he has read the report and the papers accompanying it?

Mr. BRODERICK. I read the first fifteen or sixteen pages of it, and I glanced over the rest of the document, and I found that the information for which this document now calls was not there. I read the first fifteen or sixteen pages, and glanced over the rest, so as to satisfy myself that there was a personal attack on this man.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The motion which the Senator from Florida has made embraces the whole matter. It is not to be expected that the Committee on Printing will take jurisdiction of all the difficulties that arise in every committee of this body, on a mere question of printing. Now, in order that this whole difficulty may be settled at once, I ask permission to return the papers from the Committee on Printing, and they will then be covered by the motion which has been made by the Senator from Florida to refer them to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope my resolution will not be referred.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question before the Senate is the motion of the Senator from Florida to refer the resolution of the Senator from California to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. If there be no objection, the Committee on Printing may be allowed to return to the table the papers from the Post Office Department.

Mr. HAMLIN. The motion now is to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. That is the motion.

Mr. YULEE. It is accompanied with a declaration on my part that the committee will report to-morrow morning as to what is proper in the premises.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think that is rather hasty evidence. The Senator is too willing. I think the rapidity with which the report is to come to us from the Post Office Committee evidences too much alacrity.

Mr. PUGH. I should like to know how this resolution came to be considered?

Mr. YULEE. I will state to the Senator from Maine on what the readiness of the committee is based. It is based on a general knowledge of the subject derived from an examination of it during the whole session; it having been under the consideration of the committee at some half a dozen meetings; and from the intention to obtain from the Department, as I can do in the course of the day, a precise knowledge of the time which will be employed in furnishing that information and the value of the information when acquired, that we may be able to inform the Senate upon the subject.

Mr. HAMLIN. Well, Mr. President, the Senator from Florida told us a few moments ago that if this information was supplied by the Department, it would cost us thousands of dollars. The Senator from California says it will take but a short time, and that he will pledge himself that it shall be at no expense to the Government.

Mr. BRODERICK. If the Postmaster General will allow the papers to be copied, I say the Government shall be put to no expense.

Mr. HAMLIN. I know nothing about this case; but there is a single point that presents itself to my mind, and it is one which will control my vote. I understand the Senator from California to say that the man who presents us his memorial this morning is a man of respectability.

Mr. BRODERICK. Yes, sir.

Mr. HAMLIN. He affirms that we have certain papers in our possession the printing of which will be injurious to him. He also affirms that there are other papers, not included in the papers before us, which, if presented, will give the whole case to the country, and thus protect him. Now, are we going, with that allegation before us, to print papers which may destroy the reputation of a man of good standing in the community? Is it just, is it right, is it proper? It does not seem to me to be so.

I do not know anything about the merits of this case. I can safely say that I do not believe the Postmaster General has sent us any statement that he designed, or that he believed for a single moment, to be in any way garbled or one sided; and still I know that the head of any Department cannot himself examine all papers; and he is obliged, to a certain extent, to depend upon others, and they may not present as full a case as would be presented, if the superintendence were under the direct head of the Department. I can very well understand that. I know the head of the Post Office Department too well to believe for a single moment that he would do anything else than what a high-minded and honorable man, as I think he is, should do; and still I can see how papers might come here from the Department which would blast the reputation of this man, as he alleges.

Now the Senator from California asks—what? I thought the Senator from Arkansas made just that suggestion which ought to have met the approbation of every Senator. What is it? Refer all these papers to the Post Office Committee, pass this resolution, let the papers which this resolution calls for go with those already before us to the Post Office Committee, and then let that committee determine what ought to be done. I would not refer this resolution to the committee and let them go behind the resolution; but let all the papers go to the committee, and then let the committee act fairly, as I have no doubt they will. I think, in justice to an American citizen, we cannot do less, and I shall be amazed if the Senate will undertake to order the printing of papers with those allegations before us, that may blast the reputation of a citizen.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have had my attention drawn somewhat to this matter, and it is so manifestly proper and right that papers should not be published under the authority of the Senate reflecting upon the character of a private citizen, when that citizen alleges that other papers in the Department from whence they came explain the transaction and remove those reflections, that I should not think there could be two opinions about it in the Senate. It is not the Postmaster General who makes these charges, as I understand; but a controversy has existed in California between Mr. Goodwin and the postmaster at San Francisco. The Postmaster General, in answering a resolution of inquiry, communicates to the Senate a letter from California to him, which reflects upon this individual, makes charges against him that would blast his reputation forever; and I can say that I have seen the gentleman, and so far from being insane he is a very intelligent man.

I wish to say another thing. This is not a controversy, as the Senator from Florida intimates, between private individuals; it affects the public, not only at San Francisco but throughout the whole country. It relates to the authority of the deputy postmasters to practice what is regarded in San Francisco, and in many other places, as an extortion upon the community. It is a public matter. The Senator from Florida says that if the resolution be referred to his committee they will ascertain from the Post Office Department whether this information is important or not. Why, sir, the Post Office Department is the party implicated.

Mr. YULEE. What I said was, that by an examination of the papers we should be able to report to the Senate whether we thought them important, whether we thought them worth the expense of employing a public officer to copy them between this and the next session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I am informed by the Senator from Connecticut, who is on the Post Office Committee, that the papers are already copied; and if that be so, they can be communicated to the Senate at once.

Mr. YULEE. Who says so?

Mr. TRUMBULL. The Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DIXON. These papers, I suppose, are the same papers which have already been before the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and have been returned to the Department. I think they are already copied, most of them.

Mr. YULEE. Copied by whom? Nobody was authorized to copy them.

Mr. DIXON. I suppose they were copied by the clerks of the Department. I believe they are the same papers we had before us in the committee this winter.

Mr. YULEE. I am satisfied the Senator is mistaken, because so far from their being able to copy them, they furnished us the originals, for they had not time to copy them. The question now is, whether we shall employ time devoted to other and more valuable purposes, to the copying of these papers, unless on examination we shall find that they are material and important, in justice to this man?

Mr. TRUMBULL. This controversy involves the construction of laws by the Department; and, in my judgment, the Department has put erroneous constructions on the post office laws. As a matter of course, if the Department be permitted to select out the papers which they will send here, they will send those which justify their own course. We want the whole of them, so as to judge of this matter.

While I am up, I will allude to another subject in connection with this inquiry. A few weeks ago, I offered a resolution calling for information from the Department as to its rules and regulations. The resolution was adopted by the Senate. It was sent to the Postmaster General; and we have had a reply to it. The Senate will bear in mind that these difficulties grow out of the regulations of the Post Office Department; and it was impossible to ascertain what the regulations were. Now, will the Senate believe—I ask the Senator from Florida and the Senator from Pennsylvania if they are prepared to sanction it—will the Senate and the country believe, that the Postmaster General has been sending out printed rules and regulations to every postmaster in the United States, which, in a communication to this body, he says are unofficial? I have in my hand the answer to the resolution to which I have alluded, in which he states:

“POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, June 3, 1858.

“Sir: In answer to the inquiries made by the Senate's resolution of the 27th ultimo, relative to the lists of post-offices, regulations, &c., published by George S. Gideon in 1855, and by John C. Rives in 1857, I have the honor to state, that in those years there having been no specific appropriation for the compilation and printing of a manual of that kind, copies of those books were purchased for the use of the Department. Neither of them is strictly official, both having been prepared and published on private account. But it being necessary to supply postmasters with new lists of post offices, and believing that the regulations annexed to the lists in those volumes were generally correct copies of the official regulations of the Department, this course was adopted as the most feasible and much the cheapest mode of securing that object. The volume of 1855 was sent, during that and the following year, to many of the Department's agents, and to several thousand postmasters; and that of 1857 to all its agents and postmasters.”

This volume of 1857 was sent to all the agents of the Department and the postmasters, with these regulations in it; and now the Department refuses to indorse them; and, in answer to my question whether they are correct copies or not, says they are unofficial, but generally correct. I have prepared another resolution, which I shall move as an amendment to the resolution of the Senator from California, inquiring of the Postmaster General by what authority he has disseminated to the postmasters and post office agents in the country printed regulations, which he now says are unofficial and without authority. He says, in the communication to which I have referred, that no appropriation was made for the purpose of publishing a correct copy. I should think it would take no more money to publish a correct copy than to purchase an incorrect copy. I have inquired in this resolution by what authority he made this purchase, where and whence he obtained the money to pay for it; and I move it as an additional resolution to the one offered by the Senator from California, and hope both will be adopted together.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will call the attention of the Senator from Illinois to the fact that the pending motion is a motion to commit.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then I withdraw my proposition until that motion is disposed of.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I know nothing in regard to the merits of this matter; in fact, all that I know on the subject is what I have learned in the course of the discussion; but I wish to suggest to the Senator from California a modification of the language of his resolution.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have modified it, in accordance with the suggestion of the Senator, by striking out the word “forthwith.”

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am satisfied.

The motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question recurs on the resolution of the Senator from California. To this resolution the Senator from Illinois moves an amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform the Senate by what authority the books referred to in his answer to the Senate's resolution of the 27th ultimo, “relative to the list of post offices, regulations,” &c., “prepared and published on private account,” and not recognized by the Department as official, have been purchased by the Post Office Department, and distributed to its agents and postmasters, the amount paid for such publications, and out of what fund; also, that he communicate to the Senate a printed copy of “the last official edition” of the regulations of the Department, together with a copy of such official regulations as have since been adopted and furnished by means of printed circulars, and which are now in use for the guide and government of postmasters in the discharge of their duties.

Mr. HUNTER. Is it in order for me to move to postpone the prior orders, and take up the appropriation bills? because it is evident this matter is going to consume the whole morning hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the morning hour will be given to morning business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the motion intimated by the Senator from Virginia would be in order.

Mr. HUNTER. I make that motion. [“Question.”] If there be no further debate on this matter, I shall not press the motion.

Mr. HAMLIN. When a question is under debate, only one of certain specified motions can be put. When this matter is out of the way, the Senator from Virginia can make his motion—not before.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Virginia was about to make a motion to postpone this subject, which is one of the specified motions under the rule, and would be in order. The question now, however, is on the amendment of the Senator from Illinois to the resolution of the Senator from California.

Mr. YULEE. I suggest whether it is in order to introduce a new subject-matter, as an amendment, and thus escape the effect of the rule which requires a day's notice before a resolution can be acted upon?

Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator from Florida objects to my resolution, I shall withdraw it; but I think, if he looks at it, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. YULEE. I do not know that I shall object to it; but I want to look at it, because it appears to me to contain an attack on the Postmaster General.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw my resolution as an amendment, and I shall offer it as a separate resolution.

Mr. BIGLER. I am anxious that the question should be disposed of, and I am anxious that the communication of the Postmaster General should be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will bring the attention of the Senate to that, as soon as the question is taken on the resolution of the Senator from California.

The resolution was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is suggested that the Committee on Printing be discharged from the further consideration of the communication of the Post Office Department, and that it be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. If there be no objection, it will be so ordered. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I now present my resolution as a separate one; and as I understand the Senator from Florida objects to its consideration, it can lie over until to-morrow, and in the mean time he can examine it.

Mr. YULEE. I wish to look at it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The resolution will lie over.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 399) for the relief of certain purchasers of lands within the Choctaw cession of 1830; and a joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) in regard to the carrying the United States mails from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, California; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

DAVID MYERLE.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am exceedingly reluctant ever to occupy the floor, as there is so much anxiety to push forward business at this stage of the session; but I feel it a duty incumbent on me on this occasion to make a motion. An individual whom I have seen here for the last twelve years, who is worn down from anxiety and watching, and has absolutely become blind, so that he can hardly grope his way about this Capitol, in vain seeking redress, still remains before you. I desire, before I leave, to make at least one effort, if possible, to obtain for him, through the voice of the Senate, relief from the grievances which he has endured; and, therefore, I move to take up Senate bill (No. 120) for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think, in fact I know, that there is not another bill on the Private Calendar which would induce me to interpose a word in favor of taking it up, at this period of the session; but this is an exception in my own mind. I have supported the movements and the wishes of the Senator who stands at the head of the Committee on Finance, in every case, from my strong convictions of the necessity of finishing the business intrusted to his charge, but I have been so much impressed, by an actual examination of the case, of the extreme justice of the claim of Mr. Myerle—and I had occasion to examine it as a member of the Committee on Claims a few years ago—and so much more impressed with the peculiar condition of the man and the necessity of doing something for his relief, (which relief I think to be demanded absolutely from the justice of the Government from my knowledge of the claim,) that I cannot help adding that I hope the Senate will take up this bill and pass it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope the Senate will not take it up. This case has been before Congress for not less than twelve or fifteen years. It has been again and again discussed in the House of Representatives, and I believe uniformly rejected. I once had occasion to examine it and I know that several times when it was discussed there, it was rejected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am very confident that the Senator is entirely mistaken. The bill has been passed by the House of Representatives several times, and has been passed by the Senate several times, and I am well informed that it never was rejected but once, and that was when it had passed the House of Representatives for a given sum and the Senate reduced that sum and sent it back, and then the House laid it on the table, because they were unwilling to take the small sum the Senate allowed.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator is greatly mistaken as to that, for I know that this matter has been distinctly contested. It is a Kentucky case with which the gentlemen from that State are familiar. I was thoroughly satisfied when it was formerly before Congress, from the arguments of those who understood it, that it ought not to be paid. I believe it has also gone to the Court of Claims, and has been rejected there. What peculiar merit a case, that has been discussed time after time, and has never been passed by Congress; that has been sent to the Court of Claims and rejected by them, should have for being taken up here to the exclusion of public business, I cannot imagine. It seems to me that if there is a single case on the Calendar that ought not to be taken up, this is the very one. It has not been neglected. It has been again and again considered. Even according to the account of the Senator from Maine, it has been controverted between the two Houses year after year. I know it has been pending for many years, but the precise disposition of it on every occasion I do not know. It has been year after year strenuously, and satisfactorily to my mind, opposed by those best acquainted with it—the gentlemen in the other House from Kentucky—who showed that there is not the least shadow of foundation in justice for the claim. The only thing that gave it any validity were some letters from a gentleman who seems to be very kind in the matter, and who was Secretary of the Navy at the time Myerle made his contract. It seems that he writes a new letter whenever one is wanted, and is strongly impressed with the justice of the claim. I allude to Mr. Paulding. I do not see why we should now take up this case which has been again and again contested, and has been rejected by the Court of Claims. If the bill had been brought before us at an earlier period of the session, it could have been looked into and examined; but that is now impossible. I think it can claim no priority in the Senate.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think the Senator is mistaken; and he thinks I am. There is, however, one point which he cannot dispute, and that is, that the claim has had no less than twelve favorable reports from committees of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. THOMPSON, of Kentucky. This is a Kentucky case, and I know all about it, and the tradition of it historically and personally. The opposition to paying David Myerle, after making his hemp experiments under a contract with Secretary Paulding, has been on account of a contest between men in Kentucky as to whom the money ought to be paid. Myerle's creditors came here and fought with him, making Congress a sort of chancery court, they trying to attach the proceeds. That Myerle had an equitable case against the Government was never disputed; but the contest was between him and his creditors as to who should have the money.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It is undoubtedly the case that there has been an opposition to the claim from Kentucky. What it arose from I do not know, and will not undertake to say; but certainly this claim has had from committees of the Senate and House of Representatives no less than twelve favorable reports. It unquestionably has been decided favorably on by the Senate several times, and by the House of Representatives several times, but has never passed both Houses at the same session.

The Senator from Georgia asks why was not the bill taken up earlier? It has never been reached upon the Calendar; and there being objection to it, it could not be taken up. I speak of it simply from the impressions made on my own mind. I knew nothing of the case until I became a member of the Committee on Claims at the last Congress. I then had occasion to examine it and examine it carefully, and I came to the conclusion that if there ever was a case which appealed strongly, forcibly, almost unanswerably, and irresistibly, to the equitable consideration of Congress, it was the claim of David Myerle. I became perfectly satisfied that he had been ruined in the service of the Government, and in a service undertaken at the express request of an officer of the Government. It is a fact, that with such a claim before Congress, thus passed upon, thus reported favorably upon, thus adopted several times by each House of Congress, but never at the same session by both Houses of Congress—and therefore never technically by Congress, or it would have become a law—he has grown old and poor and blind; and with such a case presenting itself to the consideration of Congress, I think at no time should Congress refuse to hear it and pass upon it. It is said that it has been reported upon unfavorably by the Court of Claims. I grant that the Court of Claims reported that he had no legal claim upon the Government, on the technical ground that the Secretary of the Navy, who employed him and who promised that he should be paid, had no authority from Congress to make the promise, and there was, therefore, no legal obligation on the Government; but the court accompanied that rejection of the claim on a point of law, with an express recommendation of it, on the ground of its great equity, as appealing to the equitable consideration of Congress. Under these circumstances, I think it is a claim that appeals to the justice of the country for consideration and action.

Mr. TOOMBS. The foundation of the gentleman's support of this claim I know to be erroneous. As to Myerle having been ruined by the Government, I know that the facts, as demonstrated by the evidence, show that he was totally insolvent, and executions were out against him when he started in the business; and the very hemp which he bought was never paid for. He owed the Kentucky creditors for it, and has owed them ever since. Those facts were established in the discussion in the House of Representatives.

Mr. CLAY. I do not rise to debate the merits of this question, and I will remark, with due deference to the Senators who have spoken, that I think they were all out of order in discussing the merits of the bill on the motion to take it up. I simply wish to suggest, that whether this be a good or a bad claim, a just or an unjust one, it will consume all this day in debate, if it is taken up. It is an old customer with which I am well acquainted, and it will not pass the Senate without an elaborate discussion. After the appropriation bills shall have been disposed of, I will not object to taking up this bill, and indeed I will then aid in taking it up, although I expect to vote against it; but until the appropriation bills are passed, I trust we shall not take up this bill, which will certainly defer any action on them for at least this day.

Mr. GREEN. I agree most heartily with what was said by the Senator from Maine. I differ from the Senator from Alabama in his suggestion. If the case be such an old customer as he suggests, so well understood, so well investigated, I see no necessity for any further discussion, but let the majority of the Senate express their opinion at once—let us vote. If we all know so much about it each Senator doubtless has formed his opinion. Then let us take up the bill and vote on it without saying a single word.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose that if it be taken up it will at one o'clock yield to the special order. [Certainly.]

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 120) for the relief of David Myerle was read a second time, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to David Myerle the sum of $44,400, for losses, sacrifices, and expenses incurred by him in testing and establishing the practicability and safety of the process of water-rotting hemp, under the direction of the Navy Department.

Mr. SLIDELL. Let us hear the report.

The Secretary read the following report made by Mr. MALLORY, on the 3d of February last:

The Committee on Claims, to whom was referred the case of David Myerle, reported from the Court of Claims, unanimously report:

The claim was first presented to the Senate by the memorial of the claimant at the first session of the Twenty-Eighth Congress, and has been continuously prosecuted to this time.

The nature of the claim is shown by the evidence taken before the Court of Claims, and which is briefly recited in the decision of the court as showing the nature of the arrangement made by Mr. Paulding, in 1839, as Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. Paulding states, that while he was at the head of the Navy Department the claimant called on him with reference to certain improvements he had made in the machinery for manufacturing cordage; that, perceiving the claimant to be an intelligent and enterprising man, he suggested to him that it might be advantageous to him to engage in the business of water-rotting hemp, and that the claimant stated, that although he did not believe the occupation to be dangerous to those engaged in it, yet, being then engaged in a profitable business, he was unwilling to relinquish it for one which he foresaw would be attended with almost insurmountable obstacles, and a failure in which would involve him in great pecuniary loss. The Secretary then assured the claimant that the Department would take care that he should be recompensed for any loss he might ultimately sustain in consequence of a failure of the experiment; and he states that he made this promise solely in the hope of being instrumental in conferring a great benefit on his country, and under a full conviction that if he remained in office he would redeem his pledge, without transcending his powers or violating any existing law. He says further, that the claimant, being influenced, as he believes, by these assurances, as well as by motives of patriotism, acceded to his proposition, and a contract was entered into with him for two hundred tons of American water-rotted hemp; that the claimant made no application for a contract; that the proposal came from the Secretary; that no advertisements for proposal were issued, nor was any security demanded for the fulfillment of the contract, as the whole affair was considered as an experiment, made with a view to settle a question of great national importance. Mr. Paulding says, also, that his object was to remove the prejudice against the process of water-rotting, and demonstrate the practicability of producing a domestic article equal to the first quality of Russian hemp.

The claim is based upon the grounds, first, that the hemp delivered by him at Boston, under the contracts, was improperly rejected, whereby the enterprise, which promised remuneration, was converted into the means of its ruin; and second, upon the promise of indemnity against loss made by the Secretary of the Navy.

Upon both of these grounds the Court of Claims decided against the claimant, holding that there was no legal liability which could be enforced in that court against the Government, as the act of 3d March, 1809, provides that "all purchases and contracts for supplies or services which are or may, according to law, be made by or under the direction of either the Secretary of the Treasury, the Secretary of War, or the Secretary of the Navy, shall be made either by open purchase or by previously advertising for proposals respecting the same."

The court, however, while deciding against the legal liability of the Government, thought, from the peculiar circumstances of the case, that they should lay the facts before Congress, with the remark that "the evidence tends to show that an active and enterprising man of business became embarrassed in his circumstances, and was deprived of the just and fair profits of an honest occupation by his efforts to promote a matter of national concern," and they therefore submit "the whole matter to the consideration of Congress for such action as they, under all the circumstances, shall consider just and equitable."

The committee are of opinion that it is both just and equitable, under the circumstances of the case, that the applicant should receive compensation.

In reference to the contract for and the delivery of hemp, Mr. Paulding states, in his letter of 4th January, 1853:

"In all the testimonials I have given in behalf of your claim, I was governed by no papers or representations of yours. I stated facts, and only such facts as were known to myself, and many of them notorious to the public. I stated, in the first place, that it had long been the wish of the Government to procure a supply of American water-rotted hemp for the consumption of the Navy, in order that the country might be independent of foreign nations, especially in time of war; but all efforts had been unsuccessful, principally on the score of its being universally considered in the West as an unhealthy occupation, fatal to the slaves who would be principally employed in the business."

"I stated that, in consequence of my solicitations and encouragement, you were unwillingly induced to undertake this most important business, and that, accordingly, a contract was entered into for the supply of several hundred tons of American water-rotted hemp."

"I stated that, after surmounting great obstacles, you at length succeeded so far as to deliver a large supply of American water-rotted hemp at the Boston navy-yard, which, being tested with the best Russia, proved considerably stronger, but was rejected by the inspectors on the frivolous pretext that it was not quite so clean; and I now state, that the late Commodore Nicholson, who afterwards commanded at Boston, has since assured me that corrupt means were used to induce the inspectors to come to that decision."

"I further stated, what was already sufficiently notorious, that in consequence of your success in the production of water-rotted hemp, and the proof thus afforded that it was not an unhealthy occupation, others had entered upon it, inasmuch that the naval and commercial marine of the United States are in a great measure supplied with American water-rotted hemp, and no longer dependent on foreign nations for an article so indispensable."

"All this I stated from my own knowledge, and not from your papers and representations; and, consequently, thus far, there was no deception on your part."

"With regard to your pecuniary circumstances at that time, I said nothing, because I knew nothing, and did not think it had the slightest connection with the justice of your claim. I had a great national purpose in view, and found in you a man ready to undertake its accomplishment. If you succeeded, the country would be greatly benefited; if you failed, it would be just where it was before. No advantages of money were required, and no injury to the public interest could occur from your failure, as the Department had then on hand a supply of Russian hemp for two years, which I recollect aright; at any rate, for a very considerable period."

"There was no deception here. Whether solvent or not solvent at the time you entered on the contract is of no consequence to me or the country, provided you succeeded in your undertaking; and with unfeigned respect to Congress, I do not perceive how the decision of this question can affect the justice of your claim in the slightest degree; that is a private affair between you and your creditors."

"The facts I have stated, and which are notoriously true, sufficiently prove that you were the principal instrument in conferring a great benefit on your country, whether rich or poor when you began is of little consequence to any one but yourself. It is sufficient to know that you are now poor, and that this poverty is clearly owing to the improper rejection of your hemp at Boston, which effectually arrested all future efforts, and was sufficient to ruin your affairs. Nothing is more common than for men to commence business, or enter on great undertakings, on borrowed capital, and to take the risk of success or failure. Nor, however I may disapprove of such a course, do I think justice should be denied them, because, perhaps, the loss may fall on others. If any other person or persons have a legal claim in any portion of the anticipated bounty of Congress, it seems to me it should be decided by a court of adjudication, not by Congress."

"I do not know whether you lost any money by your contract, or whether you had any to lose; but this I know, that you spent years of your life, and encountered a series of labors, obstacles, and discouragements, in prosecuting your undertaking, which deserve some remuneration, and that for the last seven or eight years you have been condemned to a purgatory of cares, anxieties, losses, and disappointments, which I would not have endured for ten times the sum you may receive from the justice or the bounty of Congress."

The damage claimed by Myerle for the rejection of his hemp, as shown by the statement in the report from the court, page 44, is $65,000, being the difference between $150,000, the contract price for five hundred tons, and the cost delivered at Boston of $85,000.

There is a good deal of other evidence in the record as to whether the hemp was or was not properly rejected; but in the view taken of the case by the court, in which the committee concurs, it is not necessary to go into the details, and it is only here referred to as one of the items which enter into consideration in the judgment to which the committee have arrived.

It is shown also by the evidence that the rejection of this hemp not only deprived the claimant of the profit which had been anticipated by the contract, but produced a overwhelming embarrassment in his pecuniary affairs. At the time he undertook this experiment, he appears to have been a man of means, extensively and prosperously engaged in the rope business. His devotion and zeal in the prosecution of the business of water-rotting hemp, under the engagement with the Secretary of the Navy, together with the rejection of his hemp, reduced him to poverty.

In a letter from Secretary Badger, dated Navy Department, May 10, 1841, addressed to Mr. Myerle, he says: "The patriotic spirit which prompted you to the great undertaking in which you are now employed, and the perseverance with which you have prosecuted it, deserve and have the commendation of the Department."

The committee find that this experiment was not only prosecuted with great zeal and perseverance, but that it was also conducted to a successful result, promotive of great advantage to the best interests of the country.

On this point there is abundance of proof; but it is not deemed essential to do more than to extract the following:

Willis Stuart, of Louisville, Kentucky, says, in his letter dated November 10, 1845: "I hope that Congress will yet do you justice, as you have certainly lost the last six or seven years in endeavoring to confer a great benefit on your country, and in which you have certainly succeeded. It is said that republics are ungrateful, and they doubtless are so in many instances; yet a distinguished statesman of our day has said: 'Truth was omnipotent and public justice certain;' and I hope that you will yet be amply rewarded for all your toils and sacrifices."

In the letter of Mr. Buchanan, dated Wheatland, September 2, 1850, he says: "When you undertook the task of instructing the hemp-growers of the West the art of water-rotting hemp in such a manner as to render it a healthy employment, and had entered into a contract with the Secretary of the Navy to furnish the Department with a quantity of the article, I felt a lively interest in your success. This induced me to watch your progress with much solicitude. I had many conversations with you on the subject. The result of your labors has been a great benefit to the country. We now have an ample supply of an article necessary for self-defense, whilst its cultivation has been, and will continue to be, a source of profit to many of our agriculturists."

Again, in a letter from the same gentleman, dated London, December 14, 1853, he writes: "I am truly sorry my recollection does not serve me in this particular, because I espoused your cause from a sincere conviction that it was just."

In the report of Secretary Mason, dated December 4, 1848, it is stated: "The supply of hemp on hand, and deliverable under contracts already existing, render it unnecessary to advertise for any additional quantity for the present year. That American hemp can be prepared in quality equal to any in the world, has been established by experiments under the most rigid tests."

These extracts, together with the statement of Mr. Paulding, heretofore quoted, are sufficient to show that the country has gained great advantage from the services of Mr. Myerle, and, as these were performed under an agreement, made bona fide with the Secretary of the Navy, it is but just, in the opinion of the committee, that some compensation should be made therefor, though it may be admitted that the law did not authorize the Secretary to bind the Government by such an agreement.

The committee have traced the history of this claim in the two Houses of Congress since its first presentation, and find that, during the Twenty-Ninth, Thirtieth, Thirty-Second, and Thirty-Third Congresses, six times have bills been reported in favor of the applicant in the Senate, and during the same period, seven times in the House of Representatives. That, in the Thirtieth and Thirty-Third Congresses, the bills passed the Senate; and that, in the Twenty-Ninth, Thirtieth, and Thirty-Second Congresses, the bills passed the House three several times.

The committee have looked to these bills as some evidence of the opinion of Congress as to the amount which should be allowed the claimant. The sum stated in the bills which passed the Senate in the Thirty-Third Congress, and the House the second session of the Thirty-Second Congress, is $30,000, with interest from 1st January, 1850. The committee does not regard this as equivalent to the damages claimed by Myerle; but, as those damages do not arise under any binding contract with the Government, they adopt the amount which those bills would give, as the nearest approximation to an equitable allowance, as the evidence of the case would seem to authorize.

The committee report a bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. SLIDELL. I called for the reading of the report, because I wished to refresh my memory as to the facts of the case. This bill gives Mr. Myerle $44,000. On a former occasion the case was before the Naval Committee of the Senate, and I then had occasion to examine it, and the impression left on my mind was that he had really no claim on the Government. The result was, however, to a certain extent, a compromise of opinion on the subject, and a bill was then reported for the relief of Mr. Myerle for $10,000. That bill was urged with great vehemence by the friends of Mr. Myerle in the Senate, and met with equally stern opposition; but it passed in that form, with considerable difficulty. It is now brought before us for $44,000. It is very evident that there is no possibility of passing the bill through Congress in the shape which it now presents. I do not know that I should urge any serious objection to it if it were in the form of the former bill giving to Mr. Myerle a compensation of $10,000, not because he has any legal claim on the Government, but in consideration of what are said to be valuable services rendered by him to the country. I move to reduce the amount to $10,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will not make a speech. I am satisfied that the amount named in the bill is not too much. It is not, in reality, anything like what Mr. Myerle ought to receive. If the Senator from Louisiana will refer to the Journal he will find that it conforms to what I said. The bill came from the House giving him $30,000, and the Senate reduced it to $10,000, and the House refused to pass it in that shape, being satisfied that it did no sort of justice. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. SLIDELL. The Senator is mistaken. That bill originated in the Senate. I now find that it was reported by the Naval Committee for $30,000, and reduced here to $10,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. It may be so.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I made that report from the Naval Committee. The bill passed the Senate at that session, but did not pass the other House.

Mr. CLAY. I am not prepared to discuss this question at this time, although it was once, I think, before the Committee on Claims, when I was a member of that committee, nearly four years ago. I have an indistinct recollection, however, of having read the report, and having read all the testimony adduced in support of the claim, and I am very positive that my conclusion upon the whole testimony was that the claim was at least of very doubtful merits. Certainly there is no legal claim—that is conceded—and I think the equity is very weak. As I understand it, this whole claim is predicated upon the fact that Mr. Myerle made great sacrifices for the sake of the Government. That is its foundation. If that assertion was disproved, I do not think there would be any equity whatever on which to stand. I think that if an investigation were made, it would be found that that assertion is unsustained by the facts. I believe that the Government has already advanced to him a full equivalent for all the expenditures he has made, and, indeed, more than that; and that so far from being ruined by this enterprise, he was ruined before he began it. I am quite sure it can be proved, that when he entered upon this undertaking on behalf of the Government, he was then a bankrupt; that so far from being worth the large sum of money set forth in the little paper which I find on my desk, he was, at that time, a bankrupt, and that fact can be established by the first testimony offered in a court of justice, and that is by executions against him returned "nulla bona." If this be true, and I have an indistinct recollection of such facts, it appears to me that we should be doing great wrong to the Government in voting him this gratuity; and hence I think that, at best, $10,000 is ample remuneration for what he has done in this enterprise. I trust the amount will be reduced to $10,000; and, if the question is not disposed of to-day, I shall feel myself committed to investigate the case, and see if I cannot produce to the Senate to-morrow some proof to sustain the assertion which I make, that he was bankrupt at the time he entered upon this enterprise.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I call for the vote. I believe the subject is perfectly well understood by the Senate. I do not think that whether he was poor or rich at the time makes any real difference as to the merits of the claim.

The amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading. It was read the third time; and on the question "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. CLAY called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not rise for the purpose of opposing this bill, but when it was formerly before the Senate—

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to suggest that if he makes a speech, the time within which we can act upon the bill will pass by.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall conclude what I have to say before the hour arrives for the special order; but I have a duty to myself, because I am to vote on the yeas and nays. I do not mean to enter into any discussion; but when the bill was formerly before the Senate I opposed it, because I thought there was no good claim against the Government. It had been many times canvassed here; and from reading all the papers, and from the conversations of the late Colonel Benton, who professed to have an intimate knowledge of the matter, I came to the conclusion that there was no ground for legal or equitable relief in this case. But the particular ground on which I opposed the bill was that the effect of recognizing the claim is to say that because one of your executive officers chooses to make a contract without the semblance of authority, Congress are to be involved in an expense arising out of it, so that you sanction it in the future as well as in this case. I do not care about the passage of this particular bill, but I cannot, with my convictions, vote for it. I do not desire to consume time.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 37, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Brown, Cameron, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Broderick, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Hamlin, Hayne, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Shidell, Toombs, and Wright—20.

So the bill was passed.

WILLIAM S. BRADFORD.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask the indulgence of the Senate to take up the bill which I desired to have considered last night, but to which objection was then made by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will agree that he will not press it if there be the least debate, I shall not object to his motion.

Mr. CHANDLER. If the bill leads to a single word of debate, I shall not press it at this time.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase his pension to twenty-five dollars per month.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

Mr. HUNTER. I call for the special order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour for the consideration of the special order has arrived, and it is now before the Senate.

Mr. BRIGHT. I wish to supersede the special order by calling up the question of privilege that is pending before this body, and I hope there will be no objection on the part of any Senator to considering it. It is the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in reference to my right to a seat in this body. I have waited very patiently, hoping that an hour would arrive when the Senate would consider that question. My friend from Virginia has insisted, from Monday morning until the present time, that I should not interfere with his appropriation bills, and I have yielded from morning to morning, until now, when I feel constrained to ask the Senate to take up and dispose of the case.

Mr. HUNTER. My friend from Indiana has forborne, at my request, to press the case, and I told him that on to-day, if he insisted on its consideration, I would not resist it. Still I suggest to him that if it would do as well, we can make it the special order for to-morrow at twelve o'clock, and get through with the appropriation bills to-day, so as to let the President have time to examine them.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senate will make this case the order of the day for to-morrow at twelve o'clock, I have no objection; but I have deferred calling it up for three or four days, and I find that other and trivial questions came in to displace it.

Mr. HUNTER. I submit a motion that we make it the special order for to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

Mr. BRIGHT. I will consent to that. I will not interfere with the business to-day, if this matter can be disposed of to-morrow.

Mr. SEWARD. I am not willing to make a special order of anything at this late stage of the session.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to the Senator that it is a question of privilege, and the whole effect of making it a special order is, to give notice that it will be called up to-morrow at twelve o'clock. The Senator cannot prevent it being called up.

Mr. SEWARD. If it is a question of privilege—

Mr. HUNTER. The only advantage of making it a special order is, to give notice that it will certainly be called up.

Mr. SEWARD. I have been waiting all day to endeavor to take up a matter of importance—

Mr. BRIGHT. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New York whether he is opposed to the consideration of this subject during the session?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir; I am not.

Mr. BRIGHT. Then I hope he will not object to making it the special order for twelve o'clock to-morrow. If so, I shall insist on its consideration to-day.

Mr. HUNTER. It must come up when called up; and unless we make it the special order for to-morrow we shall lose to-day with it.

Mr. SEWARD. You may make it a special order; you have the power to do so. All that I wish to be understood is that I do not bind myself that to-morrow I shall be cut off from bringing up other business.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to make the report of the Judiciary Committee in regard to the seats of the Senators from Indiana the special order for to-morrow, at twelve o'clock.

The motion was agreed to.

BRITISH AGGRESSIONS.

Mr. MASON. If my colleague will allow me, I desire to ask the Senate to make the resolutions that were reported from the Committee on Foreign Relations in regard to the outrages in the Gulf the special order for Saturday, at one o'clock. The Senate will remember that a melancholy event deprived us of the opportunity of considering them on Saturday last. Saturday next will be almost dies non—the day before the adjournment—and I am sure the Senate understand the propriety of passing those resolutions. I shall not debate them at all.

Mr. HUNTER. I have but a day now for the appropriation bills. After they are disposed of I shall vote with my colleague; but I wish to pass those bills to-day, and then I will vote with him to make his resolutions a special order.

Mr. MASON. I will not debate it.

Mr. HUNTER. It will be debated. Let us finish the appropriation bills to-day, and then I will go with my colleague.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair understands the Senator from Virginia [Mr. MASON] to move for the present to postpone all prior business, in order to take up the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations, with a view to make them a special order.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall not postpone the special order; but let us go on with the appropriation bills.

Mr. MASON. I did not make any motion; but I asked general consent to have the resolutions made the special order for Saturday, without displacing the present business. If that consent is not given, I shall not insist on the postponement.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is general consent given?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I object.

B. L. BOGAN.

Mr. WRIGHT. I ask the Senate to take up a resolution for the payment of B. L. Bogan, which I reported, a few days since, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate. It is a small matter, and the resolution only proposes to pay for services which have been rendered.

By unanimous consent, the following resolution was considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate pay, from the contingent fund of the Senate, the sum of $200 to B. L. Bogan, for the services of his son in the document-room of the Senate.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The special order is the unfinished business of yesterday, being the bill (H. R. No. 555) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending the 30th of June, 1858, the pending question being on the amendment of the Senator from Texas, [Mr. Houston.]

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to take up the Post Office bill first, as that is one of the large appropriation bills. I wish to pass the important appropriation bills first, so that they can be sent to the President in time for examination.

Mr. HOUSTON. I yield with great pleasure.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the pending bill will be laid aside informally, and the Post Office appropriation bill will be taken up. The Chair hears no objection.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to some and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and had agreed to the forty-first amendment of the Senate to the said bill, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States had informed the House of Representatives that he had approved and signed, on the 9th instant, the following acts:

- An act for the relief of Wyatt Griffith;
- An act granting an invalid pension to Alexander S. Bean, of Pennsylvania;
- An act granting an invalid pension to James Fugate, of Missouri;
- An act granting an invalid pension to Conrad Schroeder;
- An act for the relief of Stephen Fellows;
- An act to increase the pension of Henry E. Read, a citizen of Kentucky, and for other purposes;
- An act for the relief of certain settlers on the public lands in Wisconsin;
- An act for the relief of Elijah Close, of Tennessee;
- An act for the relief of Michael A. Davenport, of Illinois; and
- An act for the relief of Gardner & Vincent and others.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. YULEE. I have a number of amendments to offer from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. The first is to insert as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who shall receive the same compensation which is paid to each of the other Assistant Postmasters General; and the said Fourth Assistant Postmaster General is hereby authorized to send and receive letters, packages, and other matters on official business, through the mails, free of postage, subject to the same restrictions and penalties as the other Assistant Postmasters General; and that the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated for the salary of the said officer for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

Inasmuch as the Department conceives it to be very important indeed to the successful administration of its business, that this provision should be made at the present session, and inasmuch as my repeated efforts to have it acted upon as a separate bill have been disappointed, so that it is now too late to secure the passage of the necessary enactment to create the office, if such should be the pleasure of the Senate, in time to be acted upon by the House of Representatives, I have been directed by the committee to move it as an amendment to this bill. The necessity for it has been heretofore explained on one or two occasions by me. Since the subject was last before the Senate I have made inquiry with respect to the increase in the number of contracts since the organization of 1836, and I find that the number of mail contractors in 1836 was one thousand five hundred and fifty, compared with six thousand five hundred and seventy-six now; that there were in 1836 no mail agents, while there are now over two thousand mail agents with whom this bureau, if it may be so called, as it should be, is in constant correspondence. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] whose experience in the Department has enabled him to judge very well as to the propriety and necessity of this addition to its force, and whose judicious temper and mind make his opinion of value to us, will be able to say, and I hope he will do us the favor to say, whether, in his opinion, it is desirable that the wish of the Department should be gratified in the appointment of this officer. I am sure it would be agreeable to the Senate to hear from him on the subject, as I know it will be to me.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, I will, to gratify the gentleman, state my convictions on the subject, and give briefly the reasons for my opinion. I should be pleased to have the attention of the honorable Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. DAVIS,] I observed that when the subject was up before, he seemed to be disposed to think that this Assistant, being appointed by the President, was rather inconsistent with his idea of the efficiency of an Executive Department. I will say that his views on the subject very much jump with my own. As a general principle, I think an Executive Department should have an executive head, and it should not have much, if any, checks about it, except its own responsibility. While a man is at the head of an Executive Department I think he should do his duty himself, do it with efficiency and decision, and feel responsible for it at all times. When we come from Executive Departments into the Senate, it is another affair. Here we are peers, and have to furnish our proportion of light, and get along with our peers as we can. At the head of a Department, it is a different matter; and the Senator from Mississippi is right in regard to that. The Government, however, have thought otherwise; they have instituted a different policy; they have done so in relation to this Department; and they began it in some other Departments before. They created an Assistant Secretary of State, not appointed by the head of the Department, but by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate—an independent officer. They did the same thing with the Treasury Department. I suppose the courtesy of the President permits the heads of those Departments to be heard in the selection of the Assistants, but in law they are not considered. These officers are supposed by the Government to be necessary, as a sort of watch or guard on the action of the heads of Departments, as a species of check and balance on the head in some way or other. The same policy has been carried into the Post Office Department. Formerly, the three Assistant Postmasters General were appointed by the head of the Department, and were removable by him; and, of course, the head of the Department was always responsible for their action. The Government have taken those three Assistant Postmasters General, and provided for their appointment by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate. Here I cannot but say that I think this a very important part of the case in the opinion I am about to give in relation to this Fourth Assistant; and I cannot but think that if the honorable Senator from Mississippi would give me his attention, he would see the propriety of this additional officer. Inasmuch as they have three Assistants now, who are independent officers, appointed by the President and Senate, this is an important element in forming an opinion upon the proposition before us.

That being the present condition of the Department, it is attempted to be shaped in its operations on the principle which governs all accountable Departments; that is, on a system of checks and balances. If you let the same officer make contracts, and say when the contractors shall have their pay, you might as well open the Treasury to him; there would be no check whatever upon him. Therefore it is that the man who makes the contract is never permitted, in that Department, to say whether the contract has been executed and performed, so that the contractor can get his pay. That is not allowed there, and should not be anywhere. The inspection office, as it is called, is founded on that principle. The Postmaster General arranges his Assistants to the different branches of the Department in his own way, and the Second Assistant Postmaster General is at the head of the contract office. He makes all the contracts, and I believe there are now about seven thousand contracts for carrying the mails, besides contracts for mail bags, locks and keys, and half a dozen other things. In order to enable a man to get pay on any of his contracts, he must obtain a certificate from the head of the inspection office that he has performed the contract. In order to enable the head of the inspection office to give that certificate, the postmasters at the end of every route are directed to make, and do make, regular returns of the time of the arrival and departure of the mails on the routes all over the United States. These returns are sent to the inspection office, where there are now seventeen clerks at work. They make up every man's account, by which the head of the inspection office sees at the end of the quarter whether the contractor has performed his service, and he gives a certificate accordingly, to enable him to get his pay.

Without describing that any more minutely, it will be seen, I think, at once, that, in order to secure the ends and purposes for which this arrangement is made, you must have at the head of the inspection office a man of the same rank, of the same talent, of the same importance, of the same pay, as the man who makes the contracts. The honorable Senator from Mississippi perfectly understands the necessity of the regular rank of these men, in order that their action may have the proper effect upon each other. Otherwise, we lose the check. The Assistant Postmaster General at the head of the contract office may say to the clerk who is at the head of the inspection office, "why do you not pay John Siles? I contracted with John Siles for such a thing to be done, but he does not get his pay; why is that?" "Oh," says he, "it is my business to inquire whether that man has performed that contract." The Assistant may reply to this, "Will you just have the goodness to mind your own business, and I will mind mine? You are nothing but a clerk; I am an Assistant Postmaster General. I will make your place here so hot that you cannot stay in it, unless you mind my wishes." That is exactly the condition of it at this moment. I do not say that language is held; but I say the want of position, the want of salary, the want of appointment, is such that the inspection office is now in the hands of a mere clerk, and the Department has nobody at its command of any higher rank whom it can put at the head. The Department has a couple of other Assistants. One of them is at the head of the appointment office, which is as much as he can attend to; and the other has charge of the financial affairs of the Department, and that is all he can possibly do. Now, for fourteen years they have been putting at the head of the inspection office the chief clerk of the Department—the highest officer the Department had to put there; but yet he is of inferior rank, and the Postmaster General is deprived of the proper uses and purposes for which a chief clerk is put in the Department. He has actually put him at the head of that division of service; thus depriving the Department really of a chief clerk. The want of the Department is an officer at the head of the inspection office of as high rank as the other assistants; so as to be able to command a man of as much talent to judge of these contracts, both at home and abroad, and be enabled to see what is their practical construction; a good and efficient lawyer, who would be enabled to say whether, in point of fact and truth, and say it independently, a man has performed his contract, and be enabled to speak as one having authority, and not as the scribes; for he is now a mere scribe.

Mr. DAVIS. The difference between the Senator from Vermont and myself in theory, if any, is very small; it is rather in practice that he dissents from the position which I occupied the other day, and I am sorry that I cannot say I entirely concur with the view he has now presented. His argument is complete, if it be admitted that we are to patch up an organization, which we both admit to be bad. For instance, if an assistant makes the contracts, and a clerk is the inspector, the assistant has that power and control over the clerk to which the Senator alludes. Equality of rank is necessary to enable the check to operate perfectly for the purpose for which it is instituted. I think, however, the whole organization is bad. I think that the head of the Department should have all the responsibility of the Department, and that whenever, from the extension of our country, and from the increase of our population, it becomes impossible for a single head to perform the duties of the Department, it should be divided—not by putting irresponsible persons under the head to perform duties which have increased beyond the power of a single individual, but by an absolute division, and marking responsibility when the division is made. In the Treasury Department there is an Assistant Secretary, and I have no doubt the Secretary of the Treasury is unable to perform all the duties of that Department, but I would prefer a division of it; and I think it could logically be made by leaving the Secretary of the Treasury all that relates to the raising and collection of revenue and separating from his Department all that relates to the disbursement of revenue. So in the State Department, you might separate all that belongs to the interior, as in reference to the Territories, the printing and publication of the laws; and if that does not sufficiently relieve the Department, send all which relates to consuls to a separate Department instituted for the purpose of taking charge of that to which the single Secretary cannot attend. In the Post Office Department why not have the Postmaster General exercising a general supervision, controlling the location of mail routes, the general subject of the revenue of his Department, with a bureau for contracts, and a bureau to inspect the execution of contracts, and pay the money when it was admitted the service had been performed? These divisions seem to be consistent with reason, and each division which you made would then have a head responsible to Congress. You would not compel the head of a Department to sign a paper which you admit beforehand he has not time to examine, and the accuracy of which it is impossible for him to know, and improper, therefore, that he should be held responsible for. If the present organization is to continue, if we are to have assistants not responsible to the heads of Departments, but equally charged with the responsibility in practice which should belong to a separate and distinct organization, then I admit this officer should be put on the same footing with the rest. I would prefer they should all be clerks, unless the Department be too large, and then that the Department should be divided on some rational principle. I have no further opposition to make to it.

Mr. COLLAMER. That is, in fact, the condition of the Department. You have created these assistants; they are there now, and the head of the Department cannot get rid of them. I do not know that he wishes to do so; at any rate he cannot. There they are. Now, what I insist upon is, that the head of the Department shall have an inspector of the same rank. The gentleman cannot but appreciate that, so long as this organization continues, that is really important.

Mr. DAVIS. If we are to continue this organization, I agree with the Senator; but I think the organization is bad, and that we should not extend it, if we have in future the view of discontinuing it.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not desire to anticipate whether we shall ever break that up or not. I say it is there, and we cannot get on with it with any degree of safety or efficiency to the public, but by having this other office, which the gentleman will concede is certainly much needed there, especially on account of the very great increase of business.

Mr. BIGLER. I approach, Mr. President, the proposition for the creation of an additional Postmaster General with great aversion; but the examination I have given to the subject has satisfied me that it is wise and proper. I have no hesitation in saying that, if I were about to maintain the Post Office Department on my individual account, as an individual enterprise, looking to efficiency and economy, I would create this office if the organization was to remain as it is. There seems to be a natural division in the business of the offices—the appointing department, the contracting department, the financial department, and the inspection department. Now there is no assistant to take charge of that important branch—the business of the inspection of the vast returns, the important and difficult questions of the execution of contracts. That branch of service requires a responsible and able head; and I shall vote for this proposition, not only because I think it will give efficiency to the Department and accuracy to its transactions, but because it will be a measure of economy. In passing upon fines for failures to perform contracts, how frequently are the decisions brought here, and how much of our time has been occupied, even at this session, with the question whether fines have been improperly imposed—whether wrong has been thrown upon contractors by them.

Sir, I think in this way we shall be the gainers. The Department would have in that branch of the service an efficient head; and I am sure that no Senator, who is in the habit of visiting the Post Office Department, will doubt for a moment that the head of that Department has enough to do, and that he ought to have a chief clerk to assist him without yielding that officer to the inspection office. Why, sir, we know that the Postmaster General is utterly unable to give that attention to the current business which we all desire. There is scarcely a day that some member of Congress does not complain that his business is not properly attended to before that Department.

I believe that, as a measure of efficiency for the Department; of economy, of convenience for Congress, we ought to grant this additional assistant. My prejudices against it, I am free to confess, were removed by conversations which I have had with ex-Postmasters General. I believe I have conversed with as many as four, all concurring in the necessity of this office; some of whom took this impression from their service in the Post Office Department many years ago, since which time the business has increased with great rapidity. I shall vote for the amendment with great pleasure.

Mr. CAMERON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered: and being taken, resulted—yeas 31, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Gwin, Hammond, Harlan, Haynes, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mason, Reid, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thompson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—31.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Cameron, Chandler, Clay, Davis, Dixon, Foster, Hamlin, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, and Pearce—14.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. I have another amendment from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads:

And be it further enacted, That the fourth section of the act of Congress approved the 5th day of August, 1854, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1855," be, and the same is hereby, continued for one year from August 5, 1855.

This is an allowance which has been made to the clerks of the Washington city post office since the year 1854. During the session of Congress, they distribute an immense amount of public documents, and even during the recess; and are occupied until late hours, and find very laborious employment in sending them off. In 1854, the city postmaster was authorized to be allowed by the Department one mill per pound upon the documents sent from the office, to be disposed of by making an allowance not exceeding two hundred and fifty dollars to each of the clerks engaged there, the balance to be accounted for to the Government. The postmaster himself gets no benefit from this; but he is allowed, by a tax of one mill per pound on the amount of free matter issued from the post office here, to raise the means of allowing $250 extra compensation to the clerks engaged in the city post office. It has been allowed every year since 1854; and this is a mere continuance. It has been continued from year to year in their favor every year since 1854.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. I have another amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the joint resolution of Congress of the 18th of August, 1856, which provides that there shall be one principal messenger in each of the bureaux of the several Executive Departments at an annual salary of $840 each, shall be understood to embrace within its true scope and meaning the offices of the Assistant Postmasters General.

I would state that this provision has already passed the Senate in the shape of a joint resolution, and has gone to the House of Representatives. It is to give a construction to the legislation of the last Congress to conform to the intention of the Committee on Finance which then reported the provision. The difficulty in the other House is, that the committees cannot be called for reports, so that there will be no likelihood of its being acted upon, unless it goes in the shape I now propose. It has already received the sanction of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. As legislation, this is all right enough. I only wish to say that the other House have been making great objection to the legislation we have put upon appropriation bills; and they certainly have a right to do so. I should like very much, especially at this late period of the session, to see these bills confined to their proper subjects. I have no objection to this proposition in itself; it is right enough, and I voted for it as a separate measure; but I think it ought not to be put on this bill.

Mr. YULEE. It is admitted to be right and to be necessary to give effect to the intention of Congress in the act passed in 1856, to which this is amendatory. The Post Office appropriation bill, upon which we are now acting, contains appropriations for these messengers. There are only two of them to whose salary this amendment relates, and I do not know that there can be any more appropriate amendment to an appropriation bill than this, which relates to the very subject-matter of one of its legitimate provisions. Inasmuch as the chairman of the Finance Committee agrees that it is right, and declares that he voted for it as a separate measure, and inasmuch as it relates to the salaries of two messengers who are provided for in the bill, I hope the Senate will not be more strict than usual.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. The next amendment is:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General may allow two dollars per diem in addition to what is now authorized by law, to the special agent of the Department for New York and the New England States.

I will say that this subject was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads by a resolution of the Senate; and that upon inquiry from the Post Office Department, we received a letter from the Postmaster General, in which he advised that the allowance be made.

Mr. SEWARD. How much does he get now?

Mr. YULEE. He receives now, as all others receive, $1,600 per year, and two dollars per diem. He is the agent for New York and the New England States.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the amendment will be adopted. I think it is necessary and just. He is a meritorious man.

Mr. FOOT. Let the letter of the Postmaster General be read.

Mr. YULEE. I send to the Chair the letter of the Postmaster General. This gentleman is agent in the most important and most extensive district, and is obliged to reside in New York and Boston nearly all the while. It is on that account that the Postmaster General recommends the allowance

Mr. FOOT. If there is no opposition to the amendment, perhaps the reading of the letter can be dispensed with.

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to hear the letter.

The Secretary read the following letter:

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT, June 2, 1858.

SIR: In the matter of increasing the compensation of James Holbrook, special agent of this Department at large for the district of New York and the New England States, this day referred to me from your committee, for my opinion, I have the honor to state that the long and faithful service of Mr. Holbrook, his assiduity, skill, and success in the performance of his difficult duties entitle him to the confidence and favorable consideration of this Department. The propriety of raising his salary above that paid to others of the same class of agents may be questionable; but inasmuch as his peculiar fitness for the post has induced this Department to keep Mr. Holbrook almost constantly on duty in the city of New York, where his necessary expenses must greatly exceed the amount allowed him by law, I cheerfully and earnestly recommend that an additional allowance be made him of two dollars per diem.

I am, respectfully, your obedient servant.

AARON V. BROWN, Postmaster General.

To the Hon. D. L. YULEE, Chairman Senate Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. YULEE. I will state that the committee had also before them a very strong letter indeed from Judge Ingersoll, United States district judge for Connecticut; Judge Nelson, associate justice of the United States Supreme Court; Isaac V. Fowler, postmaster at New York; William D. Shipman, United States district attorney for Connecticut; Mr. Hammersley, postmaster at Hartford; Mr. Thomas, postmaster at New Haven; Judge Hall, United States district judge for northern New York; John McKeon, late United States district attorney for the southern district of New York; Judge Betts, of the United States district court for the southern district of New York; Nahum Capen, postmaster at Boston; and Charles L. Woodbury, United States attorney for Massachusetts. This gentleman has been very much before the courts, and has managed some very delicate and important cases with so much credit as to attract the attention of the officers engaged in the administration of justice.

Mr. BAYARD. I am opposed to the amendment, because it is very evident to me, from the letter of the Postmaster General, that the intent of the amendment is to increase the compensation of one of a class of officers, founded on the particular merits of the individual. I think the principle a false one. Compensation for an office ought to depend upon the character of the office and the duties to be performed. You ought to suppose that a competent person will be selected by the Government to perform the duties. The system of increasing the pay of a particular office, founded upon favoritism towards an individual who may perform its duties, is a false principle of action, in my judgment; and the necessary result of it will be, that some other man of the class, who is able to obtain the favor of individuals to recommend him, will get his pay raised, and so you will go on. The Postmaster General himself says it is questionable whether, in reference to the duties, the compensation ought to be raised. The principle of raising it on individual recommendations of the particular incumbent, I think a false one. I cannot vote to increase the compensation on that ground. I shall ask for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the amendment.

Mr. YULEE. That is not the principle on which the committee have recommended the addition to this compensation, nor is it the principle on which the Postmaster General proceeds. This agent belongs to a division which comprises a larger population and a larger amount of epistolary intercourse than any other portion of the United States. He has more to do than any other agent, and his duties oblige him to reside in the city of New York and the city of Boston nearly all the while, which makes his expenses more than the present allowance by law, two dollars per day, which would generally pay the expenses of an agent elsewhere.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not so understand the recommendation of the Postmaster General. He says expressly, after speaking of the fitness of the agent, of which I have no doubt, "the propriety of raising his salary above that paid to others of the same class of agents may be questionable; but, inasmuch as his peculiar fitness for the post—that is the ground—"has induced this Department to keep Mr. Holbrook almost constantly on duty in the city of New York, where his necessary expenses must greatly exceed the amount allowed him by law, I cheerfully and earnestly recommend that an additional allowance be made." That is all founded on the peculiar fitness of the man, as I understand it, and not on the character of the office. I have seen enough of the danger of legislating on any such ground, to convince me of the impropriety of ever sanctioning a payment on account of the individual characteristics of a man filling an office. The office ought to be paid in proportion to the character of the duties, and the compensation requisite for their proper performance, and not in reference to the individual who happens to occupy it.

Mr. HUNTER. I concur entirely with what the Senator from Delaware has said. I know this Mr. Holbrook; I believe he is a capital special agent; he deserves all that has been said in regard to his personal merits; but I also know what is to be the consequence of increasing the pay of this particular individual in this district. We shall have to increase in all the other districts. At the next session we shall have propositions to put other districts on an equal footing, where there are other capital special agents in the employment of the Post Office Department. If this is done, I know we shall have to increase their pay also. I think what the Senator from Delaware says is perfectly true, that it is not right to raise the pay to an office which is to be permanent merely because it happens to be filled by an individual who is particularly meritorious.

Mr. BIGLER. I am sorry to differ with the honorable chairman of the Post Office Committee on this subject. I have the highest appreciation of the capacity of this officer; and he has very great experience and performs valuable service; but I think the objections interposed by the Senator from Delaware are conclusive. I do not know how to vote to increase the compensation of this officer, and refuse an increase to the same class of officers in other parts of the country. It may be that in the city of New York the expenses are higher than in certain country districts; but the application of those agents who travel through new countries, exposed to the inclemency of the season, traveling in small coaches, enduring hardships day and night, to my mind is a stronger claim for additional compensation than that presented in the case of Mr. Holbrook. It may be, and I think it is, true that the compensation for these agents is too low. They are subjected to constant expense, and to great labor. They ought to be men of very high character, men of integrity and capacity, and ought to be sufficiently compensated. My objection is to the discrimination. Whilst I would be very glad to give Mr. Holbrook the increased amount proposed, I could not deny it to others, if it be right to give it to him.

Mr. CLARK. I think there is another objection more fatal than that which has been stated to this proposition, and it is this, that it puts the pay upon the price of grub. It proposes to give this man an additional compensation because he is employed in a place where the cost of living is high. Suppose at the end of six months he is changed to a place where living is cheap: do you cut him down then? Suppose you change his place, and put him where living is cheap, and put another man in his place in New York, where living is high: then you will have to raise that man. I think that is a worse basis than that of the gentleman from Delaware. I oppose it on both grounds.

Mr. FOOT. I shall vote for this amendment. I think it eminently just and proper. I do not place it, however, in giving my vote for it, on the ground of personal favoritism, and I hardly think it proper that this proposed amendment should be prejudiced by that charge.

Mr. BAYARD. I did not say this was personal favoritism, but I said the basis of the proposed increase of compensation was incorrect.

Mr. FOOT. I have known Mr. Holbrook for a long time, and known him, as he is known to the country, as a most faithful and valuable public officer. He has recovered more money from depredators upon the mails, than the whole amount which has been paid to him during his official service of fourteen years. But, sir, as I said in the outset, I do not vote for this amendment on the ground of his efficiency and fidelity as an officer. His district is a larger one, and a much more populous one, than that of any other special agent in the Post Office service. His headquarters are at the city of New York, perhaps the most expensive place of living within the United States. The present compensation, I understand from the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, is two dollars per day. No Senator here need be told that the expenses of a person residing in New York necessarily much exceed that sum. I am willing to allow him a sum sufficient to cover his necessary expenses, and I think this addition to the present compensation will do no more than that. From the reading of the amendment, I do not construe it, or understand it, as applying merely to the present incumbent of the office. It is to be a permanent, continuing compensation to whoever may hereafter fill it, in consideration of the largeness of the district, the greater amount of business in it than in any other special district within the United States, and the greater expense of living in it. Upon these considerations, aside from the fidelity and high character of the present incumbent of the office, I shall vote for this amendment, as necessary to cover the expenses he must necessarily incur.

Mr. STUART. If I could be satisfied that there was a necessity for a special agent for the city of New York alone, I would vote to put one there, and put him on the pay that every other agent gets; but I make a very different inference from what the Senator from Vermont [Mr. Foot] does, in this case, from the size of this gentleman's district. That is the clearest evidence in the world to me that there is very little to do there. In many States of this Union a special agent is required for a single State, with additional service besides. The agent for the section of country in which I live has Michigan, Wisconsin, and Minnesota under his charge. It is a large district: it is more than any one man can well attend to. That agent is on the move all the time, and for a great portion of the time night and day. He is considered by the Department to be one of the best agents in the United States; and as an evidence of it, I may mention that he scarcely ever comes here to report himself, that he is not sent on special service to Illinois, Ohio, Indiana, or some other State, and yet he receives only the payment that is allowed by law.

I agree with what has been so well said by the Senator from Delaware and others, as to the policy of this proposition; and I say, also, that the size of this gentleman's district is proof that there is not much to do in the district. It consists of New York and all New England. Why, sir, if he was on service in some of the western and southwestern States, he could have no such sized district. He may occasionally have to reside in New York for a considerable length of time, and to pay his expenses there; but I would rather, in those cases, have an account made up at the end of the year, and pay a specific sum for expenses, letting Congress know what had been the expense for a particular service; but I cannot agree that an agent for the State of New York and the New England States is to stay in New York city all the time. I cannot believe that.

While I am up, I wish to say that the arrangements which are made at the Post Office Department upon this class of subjects do not meet my judgment. Take the route agents: they classify them upon the eastern roads as of the first class, and pay them $1,000 a year, though they do not perform half the service, and have not half the responsibility, of the agents on the western roads, who are considered of the second class, and get eight or nine hundred dollars a year. A route agent from here to Philadelphia is of the first class, and gets $1,000 a year; while a route agent who goes over the western roads three hundred miles is of the second class, though he goes through more population than there is between here and Philadelphia, and has ten times the amount of labor to perform.

Mr. COLLAMER. This does not relate to mail agents.

Mr. STUART. I understand that, but I am alluding to the classification made in the Post Office Department, and made by clerks. As Colonel Benton once said, if you send to a Department for an opinion you get the opinion of some subordinate clerk; sir, it is Gil Blas when you are done. It is such a letter as you can get a clerk to write. I say the evidence that is offered here for the purpose of sustaining this application is not evidence of great merit, in my judgment. There are no facts in it. What is the evidence that is presented to Congress in the letter which has been read of the great service of this officer? None at all, unless the statement that he is a very valuable agent, and has to spend a good deal of his time in the city of New York.

Mr. YULEE. That is not the letter.

Mr. STUART. I have heard it read twice.

Mr. YULEE. The paper signed by the judges?

Mr. STUART. I have not heard any letter read from the courts. I am prepared to say of this man, as gentlemen who know him here say, that he is a man of first order. That is clear; but so is the agent of whom I speak, and I venture to say that his service is four times as onerous as the service of this agent. He is obliged to ride day and night in stages, in buggies, on horseback, and to go afoot over the country to perform his business, and he is not at home four weeks in the year. It is very clear that if you commence to increase this compensation on any such suggestions as these, there is no end to it, and no justice in it. I am not prepared to say that the whole service ought not to be increased; I do not think myself the pay for this class of service is as high as it ought to be, and I would vote to increase it as a whole; but I am not willing to make a special exception of this case.

Mr. YULEE. I will only say that the committee thought they might safely trust to the discretion of the Department, and that it was prudent to adopt the opinion and recommendation of the Postmaster General upon a subject of this kind. That is all I have to say.

Mr. CLINGMAN. In order that this provision, if it passes, may not go into a precedent, I propose to amend the amendment by adding to it the words:

For the especial reason that his district is larger, and his duties more laborious than those of other offices of the same grade.

I have observed that most increases of salary, since I have been in Congress, have occurred in this way: some particular individual has great merit; he does hard work; his salary is increased on that account, and then, at the next session, all others who perform similar services are put up. Now, if the Senate is disposed to increase the salary of these officers, I hope the reason for doing so will appear in the law, so that it may not be a precedent hereafter for increasing the pay of other officers. I shall vote against the increase, whether my amendment be adopted or not. I do not affirm that the reasons which it assigns are true; but I understand that they are the reasons given by those who press the amendment.

Mr. YULEE. I do not say that the district is larger, but that it is more populous than any other.

Mr. CLINGMAN. Then I hope the Senate will modify my amendment to meet his view.

Mr. BAYARD. I have very little doubt that as regards the route agents, there is no class of officers under this Government who are more underpaid in proportion to the hazard of life and the degree of character and integrity necessary for the proper performance of the duties on most of the main routes. That, however, is not the question before us. These officers are special agents of the Post Office Department, and the recommendation is to increase the salary of one of the class. If I am not wrongly informed, the Postmaster General can district these agents as he pleases. They are special agents; they have no particular assigned duties under any law, but the Postmaster General uses them for one district or another in his discretion. He may enlarge or he may diminish their districts and their duties as he sees fit. He is simply authorized to appoint a certain number of special agents, and he employs them as he thinks proper. The result of this proposition, however, is simply to increase the pay of a single individual, one of the class, and the effect will be to affect the whole class hereafter. One of these agents, owing to a particular degree of favor, may get his compensation increased, and his duty may be diminished the next day. The Postmaster General may diminish the duties at any time he pleases. There is no law which prescribes any specific duties to these officers. They are special agents to be employed in any quarter of the country in which the Postmaster General chooses to employ them. I think the principle unsound, of taking one out of the class, on the ground of personal qualification, and raising his salary. If an increase is required, raise the salary of all of them.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall have the vote. The amendment of Mr. CLINGMAN to the amendment of the Post Office Committee was rejected.

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the committee, and they were ordered.

Mr. KING. I know the gentleman whose salary it is now proposed to increase, and I know him to be a most skillful and valuable agent, and if I could vote to increase the salary of any of these agents, I would vote to increase his. There is also, however, another agent in New York who is a very meritorious and a very valuable officer—Mr. North.

Mr. YULEE. He is not a special agent.

Mr. KING. I think he is an agent for ferreting out frauds on the Post Office, and he travels as Mr. Holbrook does.

Mr. YULEE. I think there is only one special agent for New York and the New England States.

Mr. KING. Until very recently, certainly, Mr. North was in commission and traveling as such, and he, too, is a most intelligent and skillful and active man. If I did not believe that this proposition, if agreed to, would be made a ground for asking for an increase of salary of all the other officers of this class, I do not know but that I might vote for this amendment. I think, however, the remarks of the Senator from Delaware are a true guide in these matters, and I shall be governed by them.

Mr. BROWN. I cannot vote for this amendment, because, if we increase the pay of this officer, the result will be that we shall have to increase the pay of all of them. Every mail agent in the United States will be here by petition, urging the same thing. They will show that they have performed a great deal more labor than this man ever did; that while they have smaller districts, they have traveled in stage coaches day and night, in bad weather, and put up at country hotels, where they are badly treated, and have undergone all sorts of fatigue and wear and tear of body and mind. They will make out a strong case. As to the argument that the gentleman lives in New York, where the expense of living is high, I have only to say that if he stays there he ought to be dismissed. There can be no important duties for him to perform that ought to keep him in the city of New York, at any time, longer than a week. He ought to be traveling; he ought to be attending to the duties of his office. Everybody knows that in New York and the New England States you can travel with great facility and comfort. There is no part of the continent where a man can travel so comfortably. They have the best railroads on this continent, certainly, and the easiest chairs. This officer travels for nothing. It is all humbug to talk about his expenses being higher than those of other officers elsewhere. Everybody knows that people live in New England almost for nothing—live almost for the mere sake of living. [Laughter.] To talk about paying this man two dollars a day more to keep him from starving is all nonsense.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 12, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Collamer, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Harlan, Johnson of Arkansas, Seward, Simmons, and Yulee—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clark, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Durkee, Green, Houston, Hunter, Jones, King, Mason, Reid, Rice, Stuart, Thomson of Kentucky, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. YULEE. The last of the amendments which I have to offer from the Post Office Committee I now present:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay Edward K. Collins and his associates the sum of $147,730, the balance of appropriations heretofore made for transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool and back, and withheld by the Department at the quarterly payments made on the contract for that service on the 30th of June and September and the 31st of December, 1836, and the 31st of March and 30th of June and September, 1837, respectively.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer an amendment to the amendment:

But there shall be deducted therefrom the sum of $115,500, or so much as is owing to the United States for advances made to E. K. Collins and his associates by act of Congress.

Mr. YULEE. There is no objection to that; but I will state that I inquired of the Secretary of the Navy whether it was necessary to make such a provision, and he told me that it was not; that he would be able to protect the Government without such a provision. I make no objection to it, however.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish barely to state, that this sum is ascertained, from the Secretary of the Navy, to be the amount due.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE. It is proper that I should explain to the Senate, which I may do in a very few words, the nature and object of the amendment. After the loss of one of his steamers—I believe it was the Pacific—Mr. Collins applied to the Navy Department to know if he might be allowed to substitute another steamer to take the mail in her stead, until the Adriatic could be prepared for her place in the line; and the Navy Department, by dispatch, as well as by letter, informed him that they agreed to accept the service by another boat, in the stead of the one which was lost. Afterwards, after some trips had been made, upon a suggestion of the Postmaster General, the Secretary of the Navy caused a deduction of half the pay to be made, upon the ground that the quality of the service was not as good as the contract contemplated. The point was referred by the Secretary of the Navy to the then Attorney General, Mr. Cushing, who was of opinion that it was competent for them to make that deduction; but Mr. Collins knew nothing of that reference, or of that decision, and was not present to be heard. The Secretary of the Navy, however, had not acted or decided upon the opinion which Mr. Cushing rendered, when he was succeeded by the present Secretary, who referred the subject again to the Attorney General, with an argument from the claimants. The present Attorney General, Mr. Black, gave an opinion to the Department, which is a very strong and very decided one, that they were bound to pay, and that the contractors were entitled to, the full pay stipulated in the contract, and provided by the appropriation made by Congress. Afterwards, the President, in a letter to the Navy Department, of which I have a copy, advised the Secretary of the Navy not to act upon the subject, inasmuch as the question had arisen under a preceding Administration, but to leave the matter to be considered by Congress, or the Court of Claims, as the party might prefer. It is on that account that Mr. Collins has been driven to Congress.

I should add, that upon the occasion of an advertised sale of the steamers belonging to the Collins line, the Navy Department sought to interpose, by an injunction against the sale, to protect the lien of the United States for the amount remaining due, and to which the amendment of the Senator from New York relates. Judge Hall, sitting in chancery, took up the whole subject, went into the merits of the question, and decided as the Attorney General had decided, that Collins was entitled to the whole amount; that it was a debt due by the Government; that there was no authority to impose any further fine than the contract imposed, which was a forfeiture of pay for service not performed; and that the vessel having been accepted by the Navy Department, whether it had the right to do so or not, and all other officers of the Government having acted on the presumption that it had the right, there was an obligation on the part of the Government to pay what the contract required. The committee have felt themselves bound to report an amendment to give effect to the opinion of the Attorney General, and to the decision of the court sitting in chancery, in New York, on this question.

Mr. HUNTER. I have read the opinion of the Attorney General, which was shown to me by my friend from Florida; it seems he has determined that this money is due to Mr. Collins; but it shows the improvident and reckless contract into which we have entered with him. In the first place, we entered into a contract with Mr. Collins, to be made by the Navy Department, under the idea that the ships were to be fitted for war. All that turned out to be a delusion; they proved to be utterly unfit for war purposes. When the merits of the ships were confined to being mail carriers, the Post Office Department attempted to interpose when Mr. Collins substituted the Ericsson, which was a slower ship than the others, and performed an inferior rate of service; but it seems that the Post Office Department could not interpose, because the contract was with the Navy Department. There was no proviso in it for forfeitures and fines, and that contract does not require him to execute the service within any particular time, so that he accomplishes so many trips in the year. He may be twenty days, if he wishes, and there could be no deduction. It seems that in this everything is in his power. He may fail for as many trips as he chooses, and we can only deduct the compensation for those particular failures. But, in regard to this matter, I understand it to be the opinion of the Department that the contract is a subsisting one. For myself, I should say that he had failed to perform the contract substantially, and that he has no equitable right to insist on our continuing it. In regard, however, to this point, I shall not argue against the opinion of the Attorney General.

Mr. YULEE. I will say, in a single word, that the point on which the whole case turned was the fact that the Navy Department, without qualification, accepted the new steamer as a substitute for the other.

The amendment, as amended, was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH. I have an amendment to offer, as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the eighteenth section of an act entitled "An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1845, as requires the advertisement of letters uncalled for in any post office to be inserted in the newspaper or newspapers having the largest circulation in the town or place where the post office advertising is situated, be, and the same is hereby, repealed; and the Postmaster General shall hereafter designate the newspaper or newspapers at each town or place where a post office is situated, in which such advertisement shall hereafter be made.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope this will not be pressed. Here is a matter of positive legislation, and legislation to which there will be objection and on which there will be debate. This is certainly the proper subject of a separate bill. It is enough for me to say that such matters ought not to be introduced in the appropriation bills at such a time as this. It cannot be expected that we shall be prepared, on this appropriation bill, to enter into the merits of all the legislation that may be proposed in regard to the Post Office Department. If it is proper, there is other legislation which I should like to make an effort, at least, to introduce; but, believing that it is not appropriate in this case, I have refrained from any such effort. I hope that, without regard to any opinion which may be entertained as to the particular merits of the measure proposed, we shall vote it down, as it is a change in the general law of the country.

Mr. FITCH. The objection of the Senator from Virginia does not reach the merits of my amendment. I do not know of any more proper place for it. Perhaps it would be somewhat more legitimate as a separate bill; but it simply proposes to repeal certain provisions of the existing law, relative to the Post-Office Department. There can certainly be no impropriety in introducing the repeal of such laws here. The whole purpose is to repeal that provision of the law of 1845 which compels the post office advertising of uncalled for letters to be given to the paper of the greatest circulation in the immediate vicinity. The intent of the law was well enough; but its practical effect is altogether different from what the intent was. It simply strengthens the strong, no matter how that strength has been acquired; whether by a healthy social moral and political tone or otherwise. It compels others—there is that much of politics in it—of politics opposite from those of the paper to which the advertising is given, to take that paper. They may be men of very little means whose sole desire, perhaps, for a paper is for the list of letters contained in it, to see if their own names be included. It encourages, likewise, struggles in some places between the publishers of opposition newspapers, to increase their subscription list by very unusual, if not very unfair means, by adding to their list the names of those who are not subscribers in the regular signification of that term, and sending the paper to them on terms altogether different from those advertised in their columns. It is well, in my estimation, to return to the old system. The expense is, or can be, the same, and no appropriation being required, I do not see the force of the objection of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. SIMMONS. I recollect very well when this provision was introduced into the general law, and at that time there was a Senator upon the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads who had formerly been Postmaster General, and I believe it was introduced, at any rate it was elaborated, at his suggestion. It was done to prevent party favoritism in selecting these papers. That provision was made thirteen years ago, and I recollect distinctly the arguments used in committee and in the Senate in favor of it. It is very singular that it is now proposed to repeal it in this way, so as to give the postmaster a chance to select mere party papers in which to advertise letters. A Senator has asked me what Postmaster General I alluded to. It was the former Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Niles; and he wished this provision introduced, to correct an abuse which, he said, had existed during his administration of the Post Office Department. I hope it will not be repealed in an appropriation bill at any rate.

Mr. KING called for the yeas and nays, but they were not ordered.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have an amendment to offer:

And be it further enacted, That not more than two thousand and five hundred dollars per annum shall be paid to any special agent of the Post Office Department as compensation for his services.

I listened to the discussion a few minutes ago, and I found that an agent in New York received $1,600 a year, and two dollars a day additional, which would make his compensation amount to about $2,300 a year. I understand that they are in the habit of making from five to eight thousand dollars a year. I do not want to give them more than $2,500.

Mr. SEWARD. I would suggest to the honorable Senator from California to amend his amendment, by inserting the words "for his services and expenses."

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not think there is any more than that sum paid now.

Mr. BRODERICK. Then nobody can have any objection to it. I understand that these officers, or some of them, are in the habit of drawing from six to eight thousand dollars a year.

Mr. HUNTER. Suppose they were sent on special service by which they were exposed to expenses, as in apprehending a thief, ought not some provision be made for that?

Mr. BRODERICK. I should be willing to except such cases.

Mr. HUNTER. My objection is that we are legislating in the dark. Two thousand five hundred dollars might be salary enough, but how far it would cover the expenses to which those officers may sometimes be exposed, I do not know.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The language is, "as compensation for his services." It does not cut off any allowance for traveling expenses.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I have no objection. The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I have an amendment to offer as an additional section:

SEC. — And be it further enacted, That if any postmaster or other person employed in any post office for the purpose of delivering letters, papers, and mail matter, shall wilfully detain, delay, secrete, or refuse to deliver on demand at such post office, in the usual post office hours, any letter or other article of mail matter which may have come to such post office, to the person to whom the same is addressed, or to whose care it is directed, or to his or her known and authorized agent, such postmaster, or other person so employed and so offending, in any post office, shall on conviction, forfeit and pay for each offense $100, to be sued for and disposed of in the manner provided in the case of pecuniary penalties in the "Act to reduce into one the several acts establishing and regulating the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1825.

tifies the postmaster in retaining letters to be sent to the persons to whom they are addressed by the regular carrier, where a dozen or twenty or more persons shall unite upon a particular individual for the purpose of having their letters given to him, on the ground that it is setting up an opposition carrier. I offered a resolution some time ago calling for information from the Postmaster General on this subject, and, in a very fair and frank reply, I obtained from the Postmaster General the issue on this question. The Department, by its constructions and regulations, justifies the refusal of the postmaster to deliver the letter to the party who can produce a written order from the person to whom it is addressed. Whatever may be the convenience or requirements on the part of the Post Office Department to sustain the system of letter carriers in the cities, I think there should be no authority that should authorize a postmaster to refuse to deliver to the person, or to his agent, a letter addressed to him; and the object of this amendment is to require that:

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from New York embraces more than he designs in his amendment. He is treading on very delicate ground. A proposition of this sort should be maturely considered when the language has been so studied as to make it certain that it does not involve difficulties which it is evident the Senator did not foresee. The general language here employed would bring a postmaster either under the penalties of the Federal Government or the State government in many cases. It is legislating in regard to penalties. There may be certain printed matter or pictorial representations forbidden by the laws of the States, and yet this provision would impose a penalty on the postmaster if he did not deliver them. The postmaster must be governed, in a matter of police regulation, by the laws of the State in which he lives. I fear that this amendment would result in a conflict of Federal and State jurisdiction, which I am sure the Senator cannot desire.

Mr. HUNTER. Surely this is not proper legislation for an appropriation bill. Here is a matter which evidently would require to be digested by some proper committee, and would require time and consideration in order to do justice to it. I believe that neither the Senator from New York nor myself, unless his interests or his tastes have led him much more to the study of Post Office matters than they have led me, can have the necessary information to legislate properly in regard to this subject. I understand that the system of letter carriers is one which has been recently organized, and which the Department has nearly perfected. I believe the boys have to settle daily at the post office—I speak only from recollection. I recollect that when the deficiency bill was up I had occasion to make some inquiries into the matter in order to understand an item in that bill, and I believe they give a credit of a day to these boys; they are such as the Department can trust.

Mr. YULEE. They are not boys; they are men—responsible men.

Mr. HUNTER. Well, whoever they are, I understand the post office gives them a credit of a day. It is important then that they should be men whom they know and whom they can trust. It would not do to say that we should break up the system and make postmasters deliver letters to anybody who can present an order from ten or twelve persons. It would be changing the ordinary course of things. I think, at any rate, it is a subject which we ought not to meddle with here. I hope the Senator from New York will not press his amendment in this shape. Even if it should be right, it does not belong to an appropriation bill. We are anxious to dispose of these bills, and get them to the House of Representatives.

Mr. KING. I am aware that the objection which the Senator from Virginia makes is a fair one in the main, to legislating on the appropriation bills. These subjects should, if they can, be brought before the Senate when they can be considered by themselves. Yet the Senator from Vermont [Mr. COLLAMER] introduced a bill at a pretty early day of the session, on this subject, which we have been unable to get up or dispose of, and this is a proposition which, from the complaints of citizens in my own State, I have felt bound to bring to the attention of the Senate. I think that the Post Office Department, in the transmission of communications from the sender to the party to whom they are sent, should be sacred from any interference by anybody, that whatever is placed in the post office should be transmitted to the place to which it is directed, and there delivered to the person. I have had some conversation with police agents of the city of New York, who called on me in relation to this subject, on account of a resolution that I offered, asking the Postmaster General for information. They stated to me that they desired to be able, by the aid of the Post Office Department, to delay or obtain letters, with a view of detecting rogues. Those who called on me were the gentlemen employed to suppress lotteries—an object which certainly is most praiseworthy, and which I would not be disposed to interfere with in any way. Still, I could not consent to have any tampering with the mails. I consulted with two gentlemen who have been Postmasters General, and they said it would never answer to allow any tampering with the seals by the Post Office Department—they must be sacred. This proposition, as I conceive, does not interfere with that matter at all. It is simply a requisition that a letter or package shall be delivered to the party to whom it is addressed, or to his known authorized agent, if the postmaster is aware that that person is his agent. I do not think any difficulty will occur in reference to the carriers. The postmaster will be required to deliver but one parcel at a time, under my amendment. The regular carrier has his letters set apart for him in the post office, and they are handed to him in a parcel, and thus he has a great advantage in time, over any person who may come to get letters singly. I think the effort to set up an opposition carrier, without the assent and concurrence of the postmaster in the locality, will prove a failure in a little time; but it is dangerous, on the regulations or instructions or authority of the Post Office Department, to allow a postmaster to refuse to deliver letters. I think the delivery should be made, when the demand is made for it, of any parcel which has come to the office to any person authorized to receive it. I have felt constrained to offer this amendment. I cannot consent to withdraw it. I am not aware how it can interfere with any provision of the laws of the States. I do not know of any that it would interfere with.

Mr. YULEE. I think it will not be wise to act on this subject in a manner so hasty. The general subject was referred, in a bill introduced by the Senator from Vermont at an early period of the session, to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads; and has been under the consideration of the Department; and in a letter which was published a few days since, which ought to be read before there shall be any action on the amendment now proposed, the Postmaster General states very fully his reasons for not thinking it advisable to legislate upon the subject at present. I know that some Senators—the Senator from Vermont, especially—differed with the Postmaster General in his view of this matter. I reported back the bill of the Senator from Vermont, to be sure, at a later time than it should have been, but as early as possible after I received the formal opinion of the Department. It has been reported and placed upon the Calendar, and will come up at the next session for the consideration of the Senate in a regular and orderly manner. The objection to the introduction of the subject now upon this general appropriation bill is, that we create a new offense, a new penalty. We are multiplying offenses; we are, at a single stroke, and without consideration, upsetting entirely the legislation of the past two years, which has been directed to the creation and organization of the carrier system—a system that is found to be working very well, and is being gradually organized into a very useful adjunct of the postal administration. The carriers employed are not boys, as the Senator from Virginia supposed; they are men, and obliged to be men, because they are required to give bond, with good security, for the faithful performance of their duties; and thus, all the letters which pass out of the daily custody of the postmaster go into the hands of a person who is under bond to the Government to return them safely if the owner is not found. It is an important protection to the people; and I think we ought not hastily to repeal that legislation, or to make other legislation that would in effect repeal it; and this would do so.

It seems that in Brooklyn some dispute has grown up by which a personal feeling has arisen with some persons against the carrier employed by the Government, in favor of a rival carrier, who proposed to do the business on private account; and he has gotten up a letter, signed by his own constituency, addressed to the postmaster, requesting the delivery of their letters to him, that he may serve as their carrier. The purpose of the amendment, if I understand the Senator from New York, is to enable them to carry that into effect. If you do that, of course you break down entirely the carrier system, and bring into rivalry with it private organizations, which may or may not be safe. I think the subject is one that ought not to be lightly handled, and that it had better pass over, and come up for consideration at the next session in the bill of the Senator from Vermont, when we can deliberately consider what is advisable, and adopt such further legislation as may then be deemed proper.

Mr. KING. I have modified my amendment by inserting the words "and unlawfully" before the word "detain," which would authorize a postmaster to refuse to deliver anything which the laws of the State prohibited from circulating in that State.

Mr. YULEE. I will state, as a further reason, which did not occur to me when I was up before, that the Attorney General has given a formal opinion on this subject, which has only been received within the past few days, and came into the Senate with his reply to the resolution of the Senator from California. It is now in manuscript, and has not been printed; and I think it would be well that the Senate should have an opportunity to see the opinion of the Attorney General before we act upon the subject.

Mr. KING. I have seen that opinion, and it is a clear, decided opinion in favor of the construction which the Postmaster General gives to his authority to make regulations. There is nothing in the letter of the law sanctioning it, and the regulation is a modern one. The issue is fairly and clearly made. There is no equivocation or impropriety in the manner in which the Postmaster General has presented this question. He has answered the resolution frankly and promptly. He sustains the local postmaster in refusing to deliver a paper or package. I think it better that the original law should be retained, and that is the wish of the parties on whose petition and request I have offered this amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I am entirely at a loss, on reading this section over for the third time, to find what possible objection can be made to it. It provides simply for the punishment, as an offense, by a fine of not more than $100, the refusing to deliver, in office hours, mail matter justly due to any citizen of the United States. I think it is incapable of being abused. If the law is not perfect now, it ought to be, and this is the way in which we generally perfect all our laws. I do not see any possible objection to it.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall have the vote.

Mr. KING called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not suppose I can change the opinions of anybody, but really it is singular to me that there should be opposition to this amendment, the object of which is to avoid what is regarded as a species of extortion. In the cities where there are letter carriers, the Department construes the law in such a way, that it will not send out letters by any other than the regular carriers. If I live a mile from the post office and give an order to my servant to go and get a letter for me, he cannot bring it, because the Department say it must be brought by the regular carrier. They say it interferes with their arrangements for their carriers.

Mr. HUNTER. The carriers for the cities are created by law, the same as we create other mail carriers. We have the same right to say that they shall carry letters in the cities as that letters shall be carried from here to Chicago.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that the Senator from Virginia will hardly sanction that construction if he reflects on the inconvenience of it. The mail arrives in the city and it takes the carrier some time to get to you. I suppose if I went for a letter myself to the post office, the postmaster would be bound to deliver it to me. But suppose it is not convenient for me to go, are we prepared to sanction a regulation which compels me to wait for the regular carrier. Perhaps the law will not justify it; I am not quarreling on that point.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to correct the Senator from Virginia. The law is not as he stated it. It is not true that the postmaster can compel every person to receive his letters at the office himself or through the letter carriers. He only sends by the letter carriers the letters addressed to those people who have not left a written order to keep them at the office. Everybody has a right to have his letters kept in the office and not sent by the letter carrier.

Mr. YULEE. That is the law. I will read it. Mr. TRUMBULL. I think I understand how it is. The Postmaster General admits that a person may retain his letters at the post office. As the Senator from Vermont says, they need not be delivered to the letter carrier; but the Postmaster General denies the right of parties to receive their letters from any other carrier—not that he cannot keep the letter in the office. The case I was stating, was that of a gentleman who resides a mile from the post office in a city. He wishes to get his letters. He must either go himself to the post office, or receive them through the regular carrier. That is what I object to; and it seems to me that it cannot be the intention of the law to throw such an obstacle as that in the way of the delivery of letters. If that is the law, it ought to be altered. I do not agree with the Attorney General in his construction of the law. I do not think it a fair construction. I am not disposed to say a word about that now; but I think the law does not justify the construction which the Attorney General has put upon it. I think the Postmaster General is bound now to deliver a letter of mine to the person I authorize, in writing, to receive it, if he is satisfied that he is the man; but still they decide differently, and to remove that defect, without inquiring whether the decision is right or wrong, the easiest way is to do it by a provision of law. I think it is just and reasonable that an individual should have authority to send whomsoever he pleases to get his letters at the post office, in regular office hours. That is all there is of it.

Mr. YULEE. I will read the law: "Whenever the same may be proper for the accommodation of the public in any city," the Postmaster General is authorized "to employ letter carriers for the delivery of letters received at the post office in said city, except such as the persons to whom they are addressed may have requested in writing addressed to the postmaster to be retained in the post office." The carriers, who are employed by the Government, give bond, and a certain postage is charged by them for the delivery of the letters, and the fund thus produced is used by the Postmaster General for the compensation of the carriers in conducting the business. Now the whole point which the Postmaster General makes is this: that while the law, taking into the hands of the Government the business of carrying letters in the cities exists, and while by law the streets of towns for that purpose are made post routes, private carriers shall not establish themselves to defeat the purpose of the law; and that the Attorney General decides he has a right to see to it. It may perhaps be advisable to modify the law in some respects. Those gentlemen who reside in the large cities where this practice is being chiefly employed, as it is supposed for the public convenience, can judge best on that point; but this is not the time or the place for such a provision. We cannot consider it deliberately and properly. The Senator from New York may be right; but he may be wrong. He differs with the Department in his view of what is right. It is better that we should give proper consideration to the subject, and as there is a bill now on the Calendar under which this whole subject will come up appropriately, I submit whether it is not better to postpone the consideration of the matter until that time, instead of going on with it now?

Mr. KING. The amendment which I have offered does not authorize the setting up of an opposition carrier. It is simply designed to require the delivery of a letter to any person who is known to the postmaster to be authorized to receive it—that is, who produces an authority which shall be proved to be the authority of the party to whom it is addressed before the postmaster shall be required to deliver the letter. It is, that when any person produces such authority, the postmaster shall deliver the letter to him. I have no doubt, from my knowledge of the mode in which this business is done, that it would be perfectly impracticable for private parties, by volunteer effort, to attempt to set up an opposition carrier. The facilities of the Government by the delivery of letters in packages to their carriers would make it impossible for any person who only got a letter at a time, as he called for it, ever to make any opposition to the regular carrier. In the city of Brooklyn, this regulation is more strictly construed; so that the complaints which come to me, are, that the postmaster there refuses to deliver letters to persons who bring a written order for them, under the assumption that if they are to go out to the party to whom they are addressed, they must go by the regular carriers, or shall otherwise only be delivered to the party in person. In the large cities there are a great many people who are anxious to get their letters before the carrier can bring them to them; and this proposition simply requires that, on producing the authority of the person to whom it is addressed, the letter shall be delivered to his agent.

Mr. BAYARD. We are falling rapidly into the system of legislation on appropriation bills, and on appropriation bills alone. We cannot mature any proper system in that way. Now, the honorable Senator from New York says that it would not be practicable for persons to employ a private carrier in derogation of the rights of the Post Office Department to employ public carriers. The fact is that it is done. Individuals may combine together, and the virtual effect of this proposition would be to compel the postmaster to deliver letters to the person whom they might select, no matter how employed, provided he had the authority of the parties to whom the letters were addressed. Private carriers do exist in many cases where the Postmaster General has appointed public carriers; and those private carriers receive a very large number of letters, under written authority from the persons to whom they are addressed. Thus they come in competition with the public carriers. If your system of making the post offices in the large cities a subject of Government action, and using public officers for the purpose of distributing the letters is to be carried out, you must prevent private individuals from engaging in it as a business. If you want an amendment of that kind, it ought to be coupled with some further provision preventing persons in those places where there is a public carrier employed from carrying on or engaging in the business of private carriers; but if you do not connect the two necessarily under this provision, the postmaster must run the hazard of an indictment if he refuses to deliver a letter to any person who chooses to call for it, no matter whether he is acting contrary to the intent of the law and interfering with the public carrier or not, for there is no express provision to render it unlawful. It is only unlawful because it is inconsistent with the post office regulations, and the post office law, which makes post routes of the streets of the large cities.

Mr. KING. I said it would be impracticable, and I think every Senator who examines it will see that it would be for any person to set up any extended system of carriers. A neighborhood of half a dozen, or a dozen, perhaps, may do it in that part of the district to which the carrier might go last. These people may desire to have their letters earlier than they would come by the regular carrier; but no great number of persons could do this, because their agent could only obtain their letters one at a time as he demanded them of the postmaster, which would of itself produce a delay vastly beyond that which this amendment is designed to remedy. I only propose, in this amendment, that the postmaster, upon the production of the authority of the party to whom the letter is addressed, shall be compelled to deliver it. As the Senator from Illinois says, I think that is the law now; but the Postmaster General and the Attorney General have given it a different construction. In a resolution which the Senate passed on my motion, I asked those officers if any legislation was necessary. They thought not, because they are disposed to sustain this construction with a view to support the carrier system. It is a small matter, it may be said; but the carrier postage, I believe, is two cents generally in the cities, and yet our postage is but three cents for carrying a letter to any distance under three thousand miles. Though the addition of two cents is not very large, it is two thirds the entire amount of the original postage; and when a business man is receiving several hundred letters in the course of the year, it enhances his postage very much. Why may he not get his letters by sending his servant or clerk to the post office for them? That is the object, and I do not think the amendment can go further.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think it will be obvious to the Senate, on a moment's reflection, that it will not do to pass this section. In the large cities letters are delivered out by mail carriers employed by the Government. If one of these penny carriers gets into a quarrel with an individual, that individual proceeds to subvert the Government policy in this way: he goes around and gets a paper subscribed by all the principal persons who receive letters in the town, authorizing A B to get their letters at the post office. He goes to the post office with that order, and in that manner an unauthorized individual constitutes himself a public carrier. The result is, that the individuals who do not join in that combination cannot get the letters through the carrier, and there is no man willing to assume the office of public carrier for the few scattered letters that remain to be carried to different parts of the town. This section originates in an attempt on the part of a private individual to turn out a public officer; or, in other words, it is a village quarrel between a penny carrier and some man who wanted a letter; and that is deliberately brought into the Congress of the United States for us to legislate upon.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I want to understand the operation of this system, and perhaps the Senator from Louisiana can enlighten me. Let me give an illustration. The southern mail arrives here at three or four o'clock in the afternoon, but it is not distributed to us until half past eight. Suppose a Senator should, at five o'clock, wish to get a letter in order to determine whether to leave the city in the afternoon train, and he sends me, or some other person, authorized in writing to receive his letter: ought the postmaster to have a right to refuse to deliver it when he knows that I am authorized to receive it? As I read the amendment, it only provides for the delivery to a person known to be authorized to receive the letter. Ought a postmaster, in that case, to be allowed to refuse?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Of course there is never any difficulty practically in a case of that kind. These are merely theoretical questions. I do not suppose there is a postmaster in the United States who ever dreamed of refusing a letter under such circumstances.

Mr. CLINGMAN. But is not this a provision simply to compel him to deliver the letter to the authorized agent?

Mr. BENJAMIN. It is compelling him to do that, and also to give the letters of a hundred men to one single man as a messenger.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If they direct that man to go and bring their letters, is there any real impropriety in allowing him to do it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. A very great impropriety. Suppose one hundred of us should employ a man to carry our letters between Washington and Baltimore, would there be no impropriety in it?

Mr. CLINGMAN. But this is merely to bring letters from the post office to the persons to whom they are addressed in the same town. In the southern country, generally, these carriers do not exist, but every man has to go for himself. Where the community is dense, the Government thinks proper to employ a carrier. If it turns out that so few persons take letters by the carrier that it does not pay, he can be withdrawn. Is there any real hardship in it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is a great hardship. If this amendment were amended so as to apply to places where there are not public carriers, I should have no objection to it; but that is precisely what the Senator from New York would object to.

Mr. YULEE. That would not be necessary. The object of the Senator from North Carolina is secured by the existing law. The act of 1825 provides:

"It shall be the duty of the postmaster at all reasonable hours on every day of the week, to deliver, on demand, any letter, paper, or packet, to the person entitled to or authorized to receive the same."

That is the law of 1825, and is only controlled by the subsequent legislation in respect to public carriers in those cities where public carriers exist.

Mr. CLINGMAN. If that is the law and it has not been altered, this provision is unnecessary; but if it has been altered, why not go back to that law?

Mr. YULEE. It has been altered only so far as the carrier system has been introduced in the large cities.

Mr. KING. It has been altered by construction—that is all.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I was stating to the Senator from North Carolina that I could not see what on earth is the necessity for this change of the law. Wherever there is a carrier every man gets his letters under the law. Why should that be changed?

Mr. CLINGMAN. We have a carrier here; but suppose a gentleman does not choose to wait six or eight hours for the carrier, as I sometimes do not want to do, has the postmaster a discretion to refuse to deliver a letter to his servant or any authorized agent who goes with a written order for his letters?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I state to the gentleman that we must legislate practically, and such a case never occurred. The object here is to enable parties to combine to break down public carriers. I do not suppose there is a postmaster in the United States who would ever refuse to comply with an order from an individual to deliver his letters; but you take an authority given to A B to receive all my letters, and get one half the people of a town to subscribe that, and carry it to the postmaster of a town as a general authority to receive all letters, and thus you substitute private for public carriers; you break up the accommodations of the remainder of the public; you interfere with the policy of the Government, on that point, just as much and just as clearly as you would by forming combinations to carry the letters between Washington and Baltimore. If it is wrong to establish the streets of a city as post roads for penny carriers, repeal that law; but if you keep the law in existence, then do not pass another section by which private individuals can combine to break it down.

Mr. BAYARD. There is another evil that the honorable Senator from North Carolina does not advert to. If the place is not a large one, or even where it is a large one, a dozen or two firms in active business, who receive a great number of letters, may select their own agent, and he will deliver letters for a less compensation than by law the public carrier is allowed to charge; because, probably, that is the least onerous business of the carrier, and he could deliver them easier, for they are more concentrated; but yet the great object of a public carrier in a large place is, that the whole community, who would not be able to go personally to the post office shall, for a reasonable sum, be accommodated by the delivery of their letters. If you allow those who have a great number of letters to receive, by combination to underbid the public, and have their own private carrier, you destroy the system. That is the effect of adopting this amendment, and the result would be that the Department could not employ public carriers, because you only pay them out of the compensation received for carrying letters, and they could not afford to carry them if the mass of letters in proportion to the size of the place, going to the men receiving the greatest number, could be received by private agreement for a less sum; and yet the onerous duty would fall on the public carriers of delivering letters to all the unknown persons, all the scattered persons, the public, for whose convenience in large cities, in order to prevent the non-delivery of their letters, as they may not have time to go to the post office, the system of public carriers is adopted. They would be injured for the purpose of benefiting a few persons who combine to employ a private carrier. It is private interest against the public.

Mr. KING. It is extreme cases that illustrate the law. The complaint in this case is, that a postmaster refused to deliver a single letter to a single person. My own opinion is, that that authority should not exist in the postmaster. He can refuse to one as well as to a dozen. As I said, it is impracticable for a very large number of persons to send a single agent for their letters, because he must get them one at a time for one person at a time, which would of itself delay the delivery beyond the period which would bring them their letters through the ordinary carrier. I have offered this amendment because I think the authority ought not to exist in the postmaster to refuse to deliver a letter when demanded.

Mr. PUGH. There has never been any case that I ever heard of before—I do not know what this one is—in which a postmaster refused to deliver a letter to the ordinary agent or servant of the party to whom it was addressed. I do not think there is such a case; I do not believe one can be found in the United States. That has been the construction under the law in force, but this is a contrivance for some fellow who wants to cut under your system of carrying the mails in the cities. As the Senator from Louisiana says, if you do not want the streets of your cities to be post routes, repeal your law; but you have made them so, and here is some fellow that wants to come in and pick out half a dozen firms in a city and get a general order from them to receive their letters, and thus cut down the receipts for box rents, which is a portion of your system of compensating postmasters, and break up your system of public carriers. It is a contrivance of some man to grind his own ax at the public expense. I do not believe there can be found a case in which a postmaster has refused to deliver a letter to the ordinary employé of a party, and I believe that is not only authorized but required by the law. That certainly has been done in the city where I reside. But yet we must have the system of public carriers, and it is a great convenience, for there are thousands of people who cannot afford to rent a box, and it might take them half a day to go to the general delivery window and stand there until their turn came. They might lose a day's or half a day's wages by it; but the public carrier takes their letters and leaves them at their houses. You break up the whole system if you permit men to interpolate themselves into the Post Office Department for their own private ends, and I hope the Senate will vote down the amendment. As I said before, I do not know what this case may be; but of course where a party represents his own case, he makes it as favorable as possible to himself. I do not believe there is any case, unless it be by a mistake of some clerk at a post office, where a postmaster has refused to deliver a letter to the ordinary clerk, servant, or employé of the party to whom the letter is directed.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Clay, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments made as in Committee of the Whole were concurred in.

Mr. SEWARD. An amendment was offered on the motion of the Senator from California [Mr. Broderick] providing that not more than $2,500 should be paid to any special agent of the Post Office Department as compensation for his services. I propose to add to that, "but this act shall not be construed so as to raise the rates of compensation of such agents in any case."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLLAMER. I offer an amendment:

And be it further enacted, That post offices shall be open for the receipt and delivery of letters and mail matter for all persons at the same time, and no practice or arrangement shall be allowed by which any person or persons, for any consideration, can obtain their letters or papers earlier or later at said offices, than all or any others may receive their letters or papers on applying therefor, nor shall any practice or arrangement exist whereby any person or persons can mail their letters or papers earlier or later than all or any other persons may mail their letters or papers on offering so to do.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. An amendment was offered in Committee of the Whole by the Senator from Indiana, [Mr. Fitch,] which I renew:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the eighteenth section of an act entitled "An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and to correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1845, as requires the advertisement of letters uncalled for in any post office to be inserted in the newspaper or newspapers having the largest circulation in the town or place where the office advertising is situated, be, and the same is hereby, repealed. And the Postmaster General shall henceforth designate the newspaper or newspapers at each town or place where a post office is situated in which such advertisement shall henceforth be made.

I propose to add a proviso that the compensation shall not exceed what is now allowed. It is not my purpose to alter the compensation, but it is to break up a very great abuse and a shameless fraud that is practiced on the community by this system. If the letter lists were, in point of fact, given in every case to the newspaper with the largest circulation, I would not care anything about it; but the fact is, that there are false affidavits, and pretexts, and fictitious circulations, set on foot to get the advertising the first time, and then, after that, the letter list gives the circulation, because people take the paper in order to get the letter list. There is no necessity for the present provision, because the circulation of the paper has no more connection with the delivery of the letters than the advertisement of the sheriff's list. The sheriff does not advertise in any such paper; nor are the advertisements of the State governments, or city governments, or county governments, published in any such way. If you give this list out to the lowest bidder, I have no objection; but the fact is, that a newspaper strives to get up a fictitious circulation to entitle itself for one year to the letter list, and then the letter list gives the paper a circulation, so that it goes on, and the object which Congress had in view in this provision of the law is not carried out at all. Although the compensation paid is not even more than sufficient to pay for setting up the type, the reason the newspapers want it is, that it gives them a circulation; and there has been great controversy about it. In the early part of this session I had a pamphlet sent to me—and I suppose other Senators had—showing that a great controversy had arisen in the city of New York between the New York Herald and the New York Sun, as to which of them had the largest circulation. There were a great number of affidavits, to show which was entitled to the advertising; and then they have a system of counting evening and morning editions, and weekly and semi-weekly editions, so that it is like the printing propositions that my friend from Arkansas brings before us occasionally—nobody understands, and nobody can understand it. I think we had better go back to the old system. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I do not rise for the purpose of detaining the Senate; but if the argument which the Senator from Ohio and the Senator from Indiana have used is correct, that the paper which gets the advertising of the letter list must of necessity be taken by the business community, we see at once that the whole patronage, so far as that is concerned, is put in the hands of the Post Office Department; and it will be a mere political engine. The influence which is exercised by the Post Office Department over the press, whatever party happens to be in power, is enough already. I think the law had better stand as it is. It is submitted on affidavits to the postmaster, and he decides on the affidavits as they are presented; and the paper which has the largest circulation, as a matter of course, is the paper which ought to publish the list. It is the best for the community, and does not compel one party to take a paper they do not like.

Mr. PUGH. How does the Senator estimate which paper has the largest circulation?

Mr. DOOLITTLE. The postmasters decide that; and they are generally disposed to decide in favor of a paper of their own political complexion, if they can bring their consciences up to the point of doing so.

Mr. BRIGHT. I concur entirely with what was said by the Senator from Ohio. I think this amendment will produce a very salutary influence. It will remove men from temptation. It is said the best prayer ever made was, "lead us not into temptation." It removes the temptation from the editors of newspapers to do just what my friend from Ohio stated—swearing a little beyond the mark, going out and getting fictitious subscribers, getting A B, or C D, to add a few hundred names to take the paper for a few days, and then throw it off. I am in favor of throwing the responsibility on the postmasters. It properly belongs there. The presumption is, that they will take that paper which has the most general circulation in the neighborhood of their office. I think there is great propriety in the amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. SEWARD. The principle of the honorable Senator from Indiana, if carried out, would make a very simple change in our whole system of laws and of administration. We should repeal all duties in order to take out of the way the temptations to smuggling, and to defraud the revenue; we should repeal all laws prohibiting crime in order to take away the temptation to perjury, and subornation of perjury to avoid punishment. The principle cannot be carried out against a paramount public policy. I think we all remember that, when this law was passed some thirteen years ago, there was an intolerable abuse. Then, I think, we had fifteen or sixteen hundred post offices to which the law was applicable, and now we have three thousand five hundred; and the proposition is, that the Administration shall have the opportunity of disposing of these advertisements, in the way of political patronage, at every post office in the United States. It results, necessarily, in obliging the Government to advertise in more than one paper; so that the effect of such a patronage may be counteracted by division between different parties. I am sure that if you repeal the law because it is not executed with entire success, you will introduce a system which will be subject to manifold and greater abuses.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I think, on reflection, that the object of the Senator from Indiana is a very praiseworthy one; and that is, to improve the morals of his friends by making it not so much a matter of necessity for them to resort to hard swearing to bring themselves up to a superiority over the circulation of the papers on the other side—

Mr. BRIGHT. I meant that remark more particularly for the side of politics represented by the Senator from Maine.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Not at all; that cannot be so. What the Senator means is manifest; because, if the papers of the Senator's friends had the largest circulation they could not bring forward such a proposition as this, and we know that at present they get a large amount of advertising, and of course it must be by hard swearing; because everybody knows that the Republican papers, as a general rule, have the largest circulation. As this goes to the improvement of morals generally on the other side of the House, and that is very essential, I do not know but that it is worth considering.

Mr. PUGH. It is your case, too. Your morals must be in a shocking condition if you get all these advertisements. The point I make is, that we had a good system; it worked well under Democrats and Whigs and everybody; but it was said we were going to have a grand patent plan which would make the Post Office Department more effectual. We have tried it, and it has come to be a perfect pretext and sham. Instead of fixing it upon any basis, they mix up, as I said before, the morning edition and evening edition, which differ only in five or six lines of telegraphic dispatches. They mingle tri-weekly papers and semi-weekly daily papers. It is all like this system of public printing that is brought before us. The initiated understand how to swear, and they swear so as to get it. It is an advantage conferred upon a newspaper, not for its merit, but for its having the most elastic conscience attached to the establishment to swear by. I think we had better go back to where we were before. When the Republicans come into power, I hope they will exercise all their patronage. I never object to that. When my party is in power I think we are entitled to it. If they are going to carry the next presidential election, as they say, they ought not to object to this proposition.

Mr. SIMMONS. When I was up before, I suggested the reasons for the alteration of the law, which was effected by the adoption of the present system. The Senator from Ohio did not happen to be in at that time. I was a member of the Post Office Committee in 1845, when this provision was made. The Senator says, that before that time we had an excellent system, of which no body complained. Well, sir, there was on that committee in 1845, a member who had been Postmaster General of the United States, and it was at his suggestion that the old system was broken up. He said it was carried on for the benefit of the party press, and nothing else, and it was time to put a stop to it. He suggested the present law. I allude to Mr. Niles, of Connecticut, who was Postmaster General during the administration of Mr. Van Buren. The committee devised the plan of giving this advertising to the papers having the largest circulation, because such papers would do the largest public service for the same money. Certainly, by putting the advertisements in such papers, the more readily will people ascertain whose letters are in the post office. In any considerable town there is a paper of each party, and it is an object to get the letter advertising, because, as the Senator from Ohio says, it gives circulation to a paper. The old plan was that persons got up a mere party paper, depending on the letter advertisements and the patronage of the Post Office Department.

Mr. PUGH. I did not say the patronage was enough. This patronage does not more than pay for setting the type, but it gives a paper circulation.

Mr. SIMMONS. Exactly. But through the instrumentality of the Post Office advertising you start up a new paper. That is the idea. Now, is it not better to let the paper which has the largest circulation take the advertising? As to the fraudulent manner of increasing the circulation, the postmasters ought to know enough to prevent such things. I do not suppose that in any city, East or West, there can be much doubt as to the paper which really has the largest circulation. There might be some close calculation about weekly and semi-weekly papers that might vary it, but it is pretty well understood, in almost every considerable town, what paper has the largest circulation. I suppose there are occasional disputes, and will be under any system; but I believe that it is best to provide for giving this advertising to the papers having the largest circulation. What is the use of employing a paper that has fifty or one hundred subscribers? The public get no information from that as to whether their letters are retained in the office or not. There is no better test of the advantage of employing a paper than the amount of its circulation. That shows the extent to which the information you want to convey is given to the public by advertising in it. That is the rule now applied; and no better one is proposed.

This proposition is a mere arbitrary rule, that a postmaster can employ whom he chooses. He might have a family paper got up for a particular clique, and he might give it this advertisement to put it afloat and get subscribers; for, according to the suggestion of the Senator from Ohio, if a paper can get the letter list, it will get a circulation. I think it palpable that the public interest is promoted by employing the papers having the largest circulation. I think it is the best possible rule we can apply for the Department to act upon in this matter.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend this amendment by striking out the words "the Postmaster General shall henceforth designate the newspaper or newspapers at each town or place where a post office is situated in which such advertisements shall henceforth be made," and inserting, "the Postmaster General shall henceforth cause the same to be published in such newspaper as will publish it at the lowest rate, provided the compensation shall not be larger than now allowed by law."

Mr. PUGH. I accept that modification, because I would rather have it than the present system, though I prefer the original amendment.

Mr. FITCH. I think it would be quite sufficient to retain the original amendment, limiting it by a proviso in such manner as to make it imperative that the advertising should not cost more than the law contemplates, without putting it up at auction.

Mr. PUGH. It already contains a provision that it shall not exceed the present compensation in any event.

Mr. POLK. I wish to have the amendment read as it has been amended, for I understand the Senator from Ohio accepts the proposition of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary read the amendment.

Mr. PUGH. Several Senators desire an opportunity to vote on the original proposition, and I would much prefer it. As the amendment now stands, I move to strike out the words which were put in at the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and restore the original words.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foor in the chair.) The Chair will state to the Senator from Ohio that the amendment is under his own control, and he can modify it as he pleases.

Mr. PUGH. A number of Senators prefer the original proposition I offered, to the proposition as amended at the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts, and I myself would prefer it; and in order to give them an opportunity to put it in that shape, I move to amend the amendment by striking out the words I accepted, and inserting the words which I originally proposed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can so modify the amendment without the question being submitted to the Senate.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the Senator from Ohio will do so, and then the Senator from Massachusetts can offer his proposition as an amendment to it.

Mr. PUGH. I modify my amendment so as to bring it back to its original form.

Mr. SEWARD. Can a Senator, of his own motion, modify an amendment which has been amended and submitted to the Senate, and accepted by the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That is not the condition of the amendment. The Senator from Ohio accepted the modification of his amendment upon the suggestion of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. SEWARD. And now retracts that assent?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEWARD. Now it is open to further amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Yes, sir.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend it as the Senator from Massachusetts proposed.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to make a simple statement of the case, and I want Senators to understand the position in which they are placing themselves. We have a law that requires these advertisements to be given to the papers having the largest circulation. The country knows that this provision is not strictly observed, and that every means is resorted to in order to prevent this law from being fairly and honestly carried out. Now the proposition is to change the law which has stood for thirteen years, and to allow the Postmaster General to designate in what paper the list of letters shall be published. That is, it puts the whole power in the hands of the Postmaster General, and he can give the list of letters in a town where there may be two or three papers of a large circulation taken by the whole community, to some little seven-by-nine partisan sheet. I think the proposition which I have made is a fair one, that if we repeal the present law the Postmaster General shall be compelled to publish the list of letters in the paper that will publish it the cheapest, provided, that in no case shall the compensation exceed the present rates. I think that is right and fair, for it will give all the large newspapers of the country an opportunity to compete for this printing, and they will do it at a very low rate, because it is for their interest to do so, and the community will be benefited thereby. It takes the matter entirely out of the range of partisanship, and opens the whole press of the country to a fair competition for this little patronage, which is for the benefit of the Government and of the people alike.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment, and they were ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I must say that I believe this proposition is right, and so believing, I shall vote for it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 22, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clingman, Fitch, Gwin, Hunter, Jones, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Slidell, Wright, and Yulee—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio as amended, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. PUGH. It is not material to take the yeas and nays on it. I suppose the Senator from Massachusetts, having got in his amendment, is willing to take it.

Mr. WILSON. Certainly, I will vote for it now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It is not in the power of a member to withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Toombs, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clingman, Fitch, Hale, Hunter, Jones, Pearce, Reid, Trumbull, Wright, and Yulee—15.

So the amendment, as amended, was agreed to, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That so much of the eighteenth section of an act entitled "An act to reduce the rates of postage, to limit the use and to correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1845, as requires the advertisement of letters uncalled for in any post office to be inserted in the newspaper or newspapers having the largest circulation in the town or place where the office advertising is situated, be, and the same is hereby, repealed. And the Postmaster General shall henceforth cause the same to be published in such newspaper as will publish it at the lowest price, and that the compensation to be paid for the said advertisements shall not be greater than that now allowed by law.

Mr. YULEE. An amendment was adopted on the motion of the Senator from Vermont, to which I desire to offer an amendment that I think he will have no objection to. I propose to except San Francisco and Sacramento from the operation of the provision, for the reason that they are differently circumstanced from other cities. The effect of the amendment of the Senator from Vermont, as I understand it, will be in a great measure to break up the present system of locked boxes, which is very convenient in the large cities, and is indispensable at Sacramento and San Francisco; for the reason that the mails arrive there in great bulk, and only twice a month, and the distribution consumes a great deal of time; but, by means of locked boxes, parties are enabled to obtain their letters, from time to time, as the distribution progresses. The distribution, I understand, sometimes lasts ten hours, or more. I presume there will be no objection to my amendment.

Mr. BRODERICK. I object to it.

Mr. YULEE. It was for the benefit of California that I wanted to introduce it.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the amendment of the Senator from Florida will be adopted, and that Stockton will also be excluded. In fact, I should like to have the whole State of California excepted.

Mr. BRODERICK. I should like to hear some reason for that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Perhaps it would be proper for Senators to hear the original amendment of the Senator from Vermont read.

The Secretary read Mr. COLLAMER's amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That post offices shall be open for the receipt and delivery of letters and mail matter for all persons at the same time, and no practice or arrangement shall be allowed by which any person or persons, for any consideration, can obtain their letters or papers earlier or later at said offices than all or any others may receive their letters or papers on applying therefor, nor shall any practice or arrangement exist whereby any person or persons can mail their letters or papers earlier or later than all or any other persons may mail their letters or papers on offering so to do.

Mr. GWIN. Now, I should like to except the State of California. The reason is, that our mails arrive every two weeks in great bulk, and it takes many hours to distribute the letters, especially at San Francisco. During the distribution, those persons who have boxes can go and take out their letters; otherwise, under this provision, they would have to wait till the whole matter is distributed, six or eight hours, or more. It is a great privation to persons in that country having absent families, to be deprived of the opportunity of getting their letters until the whole distribution is over. Gentlemen do not care about the cost of boxes, if they can get their letters a few hours sooner by that process; and, so far as my knowledge extends, no objection exists to it. The post office in San Francisco has been especially prepared for this convenience to the public. There is a large space, the finest I have seen in any city of the Union, for the purpose of having locked boxes, a large quantity of them, to enable the letters to be received while the distribution is going on.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would suggest to the Senator from Florida that instead of the amendment he proposes, he simply move to add to the provision introduced by the Senator from Vermont a proviso that it shall not apply to locked boxes. I do not know of any objection to that system at all.

Mr. YULEE. I agree with the Senator.

Mr. BAYARD. I would rather reconsider the whole amendment. I doubt very much the propriety of this species of legislation. You cannot see the effect of it. It may practically interfere with the Post Office system. I have no objection to a properly-guarded amendment which shall prevent an undue advantage being given to one set of citizens over others; but I can see difficulties in the way of carrying out such provisions as are now offered.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state to the Senator from Delaware that the amendment of the Senator from Vermont was agreed to in the Senate, and it is now in order to move to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted it.

Mr. BAYARD. I move then to reconsider the vote by which the Senate adopted that amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. The views which I entertain, and which governed me in presenting the amendment, would require some considerable time to explain. Gentlemen are, I perceive, exceedingly sensitive in regard to locked boxes. I suppose they are gentlemen who pay a price for them, considering the privilege worth paying for to have an advantage over common folks, and get their letters before other people. I do not like the idea of the Government taking a dollar from a man to give him an advantage over his neighbor. However, as gentlemen are so sensitive about the matter, and it would take some time to debate it, I prefer to let it go and wait until I can get up the bill which I have introduced, and which I hope, somehow or other, at some time, to get before the Senate.

Mr. GWIN. I am perfectly willing that that should be done.

Mr. HUNTER. I commend the example of the Senator from Vermont. We ought not to put legislation of this kind on the appropriation bills.

Mr. COLLAMER. I will not take up the time of the Senate now.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I regard this as a very important amendment, and I hope it will not be reconsidered. I ask for the yeas and nays on the reconsideration.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This amendment is of a character similar to the one introduced by the Senator from New York, [Mr. KING.] Both were intended to prevent partiality on the part of deputy postmasters. This amendment simply provides that the postmasters shall deliver letters to all persons alike. If we do not mean to do that, but mean to vest a discretion in the deputy postmasters through the country to serve whom they please, I ask what is to be the condition of persons receiving letters through the post office? I think we had better abolish the Department.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 25, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fessenden, Gwin, Harlan, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Wade, Wright, and Yulee—25.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Colamer, Doollittle, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Houston, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, and Wilson—15.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred on the adoption of Mr. COLLAMER's amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely wish to have the amendment read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That post offices shall be open for the receipt and delivery of letters and mail matter for all persons at the same time, and no practice or arrangement shall be allowed by which any person or persons for any consideration, can obtain their letters or papers earlier or later at said office than all or any others may receive their letters or papers, on applying therefor, nor shall any practice or arrangement exist, whereby any person or persons can mail their letters or papers earlier or later than all or any other persons may mail their letters or papers, on offering so to do.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I move to amend the amendment, by adding this proviso:

Provided, That nothing herein contained shall be construed to prevent the use of locked boxes as heretofore practiced.

Mr. COLLAMER. As that proposition is offered, I feel bound to say a word. The law is that postmasters shall account for all the money they get for boxes, except $2,000. Two thousand dollars they pocket. A postmaster then does this—I have seen it advertised so—he fixes locked boxes, to which gentlemen can have access by keys, and he takes in his mail, and distributes it to those boxes, and those who have them can get their letters before the office is opened for the general delivery. That just amounts to the postmaster saying to the community, "if you will give me enough to pocket a couple of thousand dollars from box rents, I will accommodate you." That system I do not like.

Mr. BAYARD. I am not aware of any such abuse; and it seems to me that the Postmaster General might, under regulations, prevent it. The danger I apprehend from all this legislation on appropriation bills is, that the construction given to it afterwards may go much further than the particular evil intended to be remedied would authorize it to go, and I think so in reference to this amendment. It seems to me that it might apply to cases where there would be no hardships and no evil to the public in allowing postmasters to have locked boxes. I think the Postmaster General could readily prevent any abuse of the system by a general regulation.

Mr. PUGH. I thought there was to be some amendments offered by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FESSENDEN. He agrees to the one I have offered.

Mr. YULEE. That will answer the purpose.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have in my hand a paper, called the Mountain Democrat, published in Placerville, California; and here is an advertisement by the postmaster which I find in it:

"A. M. Thatcher, postmaster; office hours: this office will be kept open daily, Sundays excepted, from eight o'clock in the morning until twelve o'clock noon, and from half past one o'clock to half past five o'clock in the afternoon. Box delivery open till eight o'clock, p. m."

A man who has a box can get his letters up to eight o'clock in the evening, while a man who has not cannot get them after half past five o'clock.

Mr. PUGH. These locked boxes that are to be left out are open the whole twenty-four hours. They are on the outside; and the party comes along the street and opens them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Here is a distinction between those having ordinary boxes and other persons. Is the Senator for sanctioning it?

Mr. PUGH. No, sir; I am opposed to the distinction.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Then let us have this proposition.

Mr. PUGH. I voted to reconsider because I understood the Senator from Florida was to propose some modification on account of the peculiar circumstances of the delivery at San Francisco and Sacramento. Otherwise, I am in favor of the amendment, because I think it is but fair.

Mr. YULEE. I think the circumstances of California require a discrimination. So far as other cities are concerned, the practice has been found to be very convenient, especially so to the merchants; but, as the proposition to abandon the practice comes from a commercial quarter of the country, if they desire to dispense with the facility and benefit which they derive from the practice, I make no objection. The difference of revenue derived to the Department will not be very material. It is a question of convenience to the commercial classes.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The proviso which has been moved does not sanction in any way the abuse suggested by the paper which the Senator from Illinois has read, because locked boxes, as was remarked by the Senator from Ohio, may be opened at any time, if they are on the outside, or at any period during the day, if they are on the inside, out of office hours as well as in. It is an advantage that they have, and it covers all that ought to be saved to California. California ought not to require, and I presume does not require, anything else than locked boxes. Then it covers the whole.

As to my friend from Vermont representing a commercial part of the country, as the Senator from Florida seems to suppose, that is a mistake. He does not speak for a commercial city at all. How it may be in Vermont where he lives, I do not know; but in all large places, such as Boston and New York, and even in smaller cities than these, it is a remarkable convenience to have locked boxes, and I never heard of any evil coming from it. To be sure it does give a little advantage to people who cannot afford to wait, and to whom time is very valuable. The price is not high, and nobody is harmed. An inequality which does not hurt anybody in reality, ought not to be complained of. The idea that we should go to such niceties as providing that no man shall have an accommodation because another has not got it, although that other suffers no inconvenience, and is not harmed in any way at all, is to me carrying the matter a little too far—much further than is necessary. That point is not so important as the convenience of a very large class of our fellow-citizens living in large towns. I hope my amendment will be adopted, and then I shall have no objection to the proposition of the Senator from Vermont.

Mr. BRODERICK. Since this debate arose, I have been waiting for some Senator to tell me why San Francisco and Sacramento should be excepted from this provision. The Senator from Florida has spoken for California. I would rather that my colleague or myself should speak for California.

Mr. GWIN. I have spoken.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am better acquainted with San Francisco than my colleague or the Senator from Florida.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Allow me to suggest to the Senator from California, that the provision, as it stands, does not apply to San Francisco any more than to Boston, or New York, or any other city in the Union. It puts them all on a par.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think these boxes are an abuse, and I hope they will be dispensed with.

Mr. YULEE. I will state why I proposed to except California. It was because the General Government is charged with the business of conducting the postal affairs of the State of California, and it therefore comes under the supervision of the Post Office Department and the general legislation of the country, as any other State; and inasmuch as there were peculiar circumstances attending the postal administration in California which did not belong to other States, I thought it proper to suggest to the Senate an inconvenience that would result there. The mails come to California twice a month in large bulk. The distribution, as I stated, is very protracted, sometimes spreading through several hours, and the merchants and others are anxious to receive their letters as the distribution progresses. That was the reason which I stated. There was another reason. The Government has constructed a post office building in San Francisco, and the system of locked boxes having been in practice at the time it was built, it was arranged with reference to it, with considerable expense, and it was done because it was understood that it would be very convenient to the inhabitants of San Francisco that the arrangement should be made. All the utility of that arrangement will be lost by the change.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to know what abuse is intended to be remedied by this general amendment if it is not in reference to locked boxes? That is what I understand the honorable Senator from Vermont to aim at.

Mr. COLLAMER. I am very unwilling to occupy the time of the Senate at all, and I shall say but very few words in reply to the question of the Senator from Delaware. I am not to disguise any views which I have. I think the whole system of post office boxes is unknown to the law. I know that after the boxes were made, one law recognized that there was such an income, and provided that the postmaster should account for all that he got over two thousand dollars. That recognized it; but it has never been legitimate as a matter of post office revenue. I acknowledge that I am so much set on the point that the post office should be free to all alike, that I should be willing to demolish every box, and let every man have an equal chance. However convenient they might be to gentlemen, I would demolish them all. At the same time, I do not say my amendment will necessarily produce that result. It will produce this result: it will not allow the postmaster to permit persons who have boxes to get their letters when the people at large cannot get theirs at the general delivery. Now, the persons who have boxes get their letters earlier and later than common folks can at the general delivery; and what for? Simply to enable the postmaster to pocket a couple of thousand dollars of box rents. He sells out this privilege to rich people by which the Government agrees to be bribed to give an advantage to a man who is able to pay for it. I am utterly opposed to the whole thing. If you can make regulations so as to provide that those who have boxes shall get their letters at the same time as other people can at the general delivery, very well.

Mr. BAYARD. The question I ask of the honorable Senator from Vermont is, whether his amendment will not be defeated by the proviso of the Senator from Maine? It seems to me it will. If locked boxes remain as heretofore, the very difficulty which the Senator wishes to correct will remain. I am afraid of this system of general legislation on an appropriation bill. I do not desire to destroy, by an amendment which might have that effect, the entire system of boxes, without further consideration. If it is proper to do so, do it; but let us have some bill, that we may know exactly what is to be its scope and effect, and not indulge in legislation on an important appropriation bill, which may have a different effect, when you come to give a construction to it, from what is anticipated by Congress at the time of its passage. I am entirely in favor of equality of rights among all citizens in the delivery of letters; but if you adopt the amendment to the amendment, it seems to me that you continue the only evil which it is said the general amendment is to provide against.

Mr. MALLORY. The proposition of the Senator from Maine is so reasonable and so just that I should be very much surprised if it were not adopted. The Senator from Vermont states the case very strongly, but I think his statement is calculated to mislead the Senate without his being aware of it. It is susceptible of the clearest demonstration that the use of locked boxes facilitates, instead of retarding, the delivery of the mails. That every man in the community gets his letters a little sooner because of the use of locked boxes is demonstrable. For example: there are one hundred men in the community whose names begin with A; each one has his box; and in that way he can put his hand upon all his letters, twenty in number, and get them at once. If those letters were put into the general delivery box, they would have to be handled over numerous times before other persons could be served; they would undergo twenty handlings before another A could get his letters. If you could take all the letters received by every mail, and divide them off into separate piles, so that each individual's letters would be by themselves, that would be the maximum of convenience; because, as a man called for his letters he could put his hands on them, without compelling the clerk to look over others. Locked boxes, to a certain extent, go to that perfection. It has been said that those who have locked boxes get their letters sooner than others. They ought to do so; as a matter of course they must. In all our post offices there is generally an ante-room, and upon that ante-room the locked boxes open; so that, when the clerks go to dinner or when the office is closed, the locked boxes can be opened by the keys of the holders, though the general delivery cannot be. There must be a clerk to attend to the general delivery; but the locked boxes are opened by those who hold the keys, and to this extent those persons have a convenience, and I think they ought to have it. The advertisement read by the Senator from Illinois is perfectly plain. There is a certain time for the clerks to leave the office, but not to close the entire building; and those who hold the keys to the locked boxes can obtain their letters as long as the building remains open, though after office hours.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Allow me to state to the Senator from Florida that the advertisement which I read does not apply to locked boxes merely, but to all boxes generally.

Mr. GWIN. Does it not say locked boxes?

Mr. MALLORY. I presume that the word "locked" was left out inadvertently.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The advertisement was in regard to the post office at Placerville. I will read it again:

"This office will be kept open daily (Sundays excepted) from eight o'clock in the morning until twelve o'clock, noon, and from half past one o'clock until half past five o'clock in the afternoon. Box delivery open till eight o'clock, p. m."

Of course that must apply to ordinary boxes.

Mr. MALLORY. I can assure the Senator from Illinois that the word "locked" is not intentionally left out.

Mr. SEWARD. How large a town is Placerville?

Mr. MALLORY. I know nothing about the locality; but if there is any Senator here who has been a postmaster, he knows that what I say is perfectly right and just. The idea that a mercantile community would wish to abolish these locked boxes is very extraordinary. Merchants want access to their letters the very moment they can get them. As the general mail is being distributed, if A, B, and C have locked boxes, their letters are thrown into their locked boxes, and they can take them out without asking for letter by letter. But those that are put in the general delivery are put in alphabetically, and you cannot attend to those until you give everybody a fair chance. When the general delivery is open, you have to take up all the A's, and look over them until you come to that particular one which is called for. Anybody can see at once, by this statement, the convenience of locked boxes, and that they facilitate the general delivery of all letters at an office.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall have a vote. The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I offer a further amendment:

And be it further enacted, That not more than two dollars per annum be charged for the rent of a box, locked box, or drawer at a post office; and no extra charge shall be made for depositing in said boxes or drawers letters for more than one person.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that will not be agreed to. I think this is a matter which ought to be regulated by the wants of the community.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. YULEE. These matters had better be left to the regulation of the Post Office Department.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I withdraw the latter part of my proposition, as there is objection to it. As modified, my amendment reads:

And be it further enacted, That not more than two dollars per annum be charged for the rent of a box, locked box, or drawer, at a post office.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I feel bound to vote against this amendment, because I think there are poor districts in the country that might be permitted to pay more than is paid for boxes in the cities. I will say to the Senator from Illinois that I should like to see some boxes established at the poorer post offices, where the present system does not allow a man to have a reasonable compensation, so that we can get a good postmaster to serve. If he would exclude them, and confine his amendment to the cities, I would vote for it; but really we ought not to act in such a manner as to deprive men from receiving a compensation which would induce them to consent to serve the public in regions of country where the law, at present, says you shall not contribute your money to support this system; and in the next place, that you shall not have the system unless you do contribute, for that is the result.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know how it may be in Arkansas, but in my State there are no boxes in post offices at small places. It is only in the larger towns that we have boxes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I can give the Senator the instance of the post office at Napoleon, in my State. There is an immense amount of post office work to be done there. At this office the mails are distributed, not only for the whole State which I represent here in part, but also for a portion of Texas, and of north Louisiana. There the pay of the postmaster amounts to hardly anything when you count the percentage on the amount delivered at that place; but it is the distribution and the separation that produce so much labor and so much cost. The compensation of the postmaster, if you confine him to his percentage, does not begin to answer. The consequence was that we had a most wretchedly conducted concern for years; and it was with the utmost difficulty that we could get a man fit for the place to accept it. There is another instance on the borders of Texas which I might mention. I think the people might be left to pay the box rent which they are willing to pay, because if an attempt be made to overcharge them, they can say, "we will not take a box; but will wait for the general delivery."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend that the Senator from Arkansas will not feel disposed to charge the persons in the immediate locality of Napoleon to make them pay the expenses of the general distribution of letters to that region of country.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. No; I would only provide that they must pay what they are willing to pay—what they choose to pay. If they are willing to pay five dollars, let them do it. I would rather give ten dollars than have to wait ten minutes every time I went to the office to get a letter at the general delivery; and I believe I am not uncommon amongst mankind. There are many others like me.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall vote against the amendment, not on its merits, but this ends really in what I anticipated. We are, on an appropriation bill, revising the post office regulations.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 14, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Doolittle, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Fugh, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, and Wilson—14.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clark, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Douglas, Fessenden, Fitch, Gwin, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Polk, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I beg leave to offer an amendment which I believe to be very important and necessary:

And be it further enacted, That after the 30th of June, 1858, the rate of postage on all letters sent through the mail shall be five cents for any distance under three thousand miles, and ten cents for any distance over three thousand miles.

Mr. GWIN. The Senator might as well strike out the latter part of his amendment; for the Government now charges ten cents for carrying a letter over three thousand miles.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Will the Senator explain how that is done?

Mr. GWIN. According to the present law, the rate is three cents for any distance under three thousand miles, and ten cents for any distance over that.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to ask the honorable Senator from California, who pay ten cents postage? We do not all pay it.

Mr. GWIN. The Pacific coast.

Mr. SEWARD. Does not the Atlantic coast pay a postage of ten cents?

Mr. GWIN. All the correspondence between any sections of the country over three thousand miles pays ten cents. That is the present law. I said it was not necessary for the Senator from Arkansas to put that provision in his amendment, because it is the law now.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then, I suppose the Senator will not object to its remaining in the amendment, for the simple reason that it makes the case no worse, and while it goes forth in the same section as regulating the whole postage of the United States, every one will see at once what our postal charges are. By fixing it all in one section, everybody will see that we charge five cents for one distance, and ten cents for more than that. The people do not now understand that ten cents is paid for letters carried over three thousand miles, and I confess that when I offered the amendment I did not know that you were already subjected to that charge; but I think you ought to be. That being so, you have no fault to find with this provision being placed here, as it is but a reiteration of the present law. I insist, however, that those who now pay so little should be brought up at least to five cents.

There is not one of the eminent gentlemen around me here who will not concede that the Post Office Department ought to sustain itself. There is not one of them who, if he were at the head of the Government, would not at once say so. It has often been said to me to be one of the soundest theories at the bottom of all systems of Government, and I would make the Post Office Department sustain itself. I do not believe there is a man here who would not declare, if he were at the head of the Government, that that was the proper policy. Then, can there be a solitary Senator here who will say that he has faithfully discharged his duty, and has given a vote which is best for the public interest, if he refuses to raise the postage so as to enable the Department to sustain itself? How can he draw a distinction between his position as head of the Government and his position here as Senator? Unless he has found some means to reconcile his conscience that is more Jesuitical, if I may use that term, than I can consent to consider for myself, I do not see how he can do it.

I hope to have the fair sense of the Senate upon this proposition. I expected that it would have been presented by abler heads, and by those far better entitled to your consideration than myself; but I have not found that there was a determination to present it, and I now submit it merely in deference to what I believe to be a very important public interest—an interest that ought to be regarded—and a policy which I think the Senate might as well originate as any other body that I know of, executive or legislative, under the Government. We know that we are now borrowing money largely to carry on the Government, and we have to provide large amounts for the Post Office Department. We are called upon to go to the Treasury in order to get means from the general taxation of the people to pay for letters that you write and that I receive. I know that there are many of our people who do not write ten letters in their whole lifetime, and yet they are required to contribute to sustain a correspondence with which they have no connection, or at least no immediate connection. This is not just to the great mass of the agricultural community that compose ninety-nine hundredths of the representation upon the floors of Congress. I know that this system has been brought about by deference to large cities, and I think it results from an illiberality on their part, which has reduced us to the present rates, and absolutely throws the expense of carrying the letters which we write upon the mass of the people, or casts it upon the Treasury, which is the same thing as throwing it on the whole mass of the people. I believe this is so palpable that no one can deny it. If there are those here who represent any local interest, I would simply say to them, "When you are not instructed against your conscience on this question, how can you say that the people who send letters shall not pay for them?" The people are accustomed to something like the regular receipt of letters, and in order to continue it to them, I think it is necessary to take the Post Office off the Treasury. To continue it on the Treasury is not in accordance with any man's conscience, I think. It is not right.

I will say now, with reference to my own State —and I think I can speak for every other new State—that among that people who depend on their daily labor for their subsistence, when the rate of postage stood at twenty-five cents I never heard the first complaint against it. Every man paid his twenty-five cents for a letter, and was glad and proud to receive one. He would probably give fifty cents as readily for the pleasure it gave him to receive a letter, believing it to be from some absent friend, or relating to a matter of importance. I never heard a complaint against it in my country, even when specie was not to be had except at a large premium, amidst the breaking of banks in 1839 and 1840; and we could not get letters out of the post office except by paying specie, and we had no circulation except paper, and very bad paper at that. You reduced the postage to five cents for the benefit of a few cities. That reduction resulted successfully, and everything was going on pretty well, when you still further reduced the postage to three cents. The representatives of the new States voted against it. We knew that every time we corresponded with a merchant at the East, and sent him our orders to transmit us goods, he charged us with the postage of the letter, and added it to the price of the goods. So it is with all the correspondence we send to the cities. They make their business profits by estimating all that it costs them to conduct their business; and the price of postage is one of the elements that enters into the calculation. You reduced the postage to three cents for the convenience of cities, and destroyed the revenue of the Department. You did it in obedience to what was proclaimed to be the example which had been set us by England, where postage had been brought down to a very low rate. You did not consider the difference of circumstance between the two countries. England is a dense country, and the towns are a very short distance apart, so that correspondence can be very easily conducted. Probably between the extreme points there is not a greater distance than a thousand miles, and perhaps correspondence there will not ordinarily average more than a distance of twenty-five miles over which it is to be carried. Some of our mails, however, have to be carried ten thousand miles, and a thousand miles is a very common distance. The consequence of reducing the rate to three cents is that the Post Office Department, at the very first collapse of public prosperity that occurs—and I consider the recent one as but exceedingly small—is thrown entirely on the public Treasury. This bill contains an appropriation of $3,500,000 from the Treasury to support the Department. You are borrowing money for the purpose of doing this.

The same cities which procured the reduction will perhaps protest against raising the postage; yet they are the ones that more immediately contribute the money that goes into the Treasury. As gentlemen of intelligence and sense, why should we not at once say, let the system support itself, and there can be no possible mistake that it will be justly done in laying the tax, for this is, perhaps, in its action, the most equal and just tax that it is in the power of the Government to lay. It is a tax on those who write letters and receive them. The Government should regulate the charge by the expense, and that is the idea upon which the system originated.

Those of us who represent the new States never voted for these reductions, because we saw the result would be to reduce the revenues from our States, so that when we ask the Postmaster General to give us mail facilities, he says "your revenue does not amount to anything." In many instances, I have had to get him to consent to put lines in operation for the profits they would yield, the Post Office Department giving up all jurisdiction over them, and no few lines have been conducted in that way in my own State. The principle of the Department is that we shall have no more facilities than our revenue entitles us to. When we propose to raise the price so as to permit us to obtain enough revenue, the Congress of the United States says the price shall not be raised, and, therefore, we shall have no mail facilities. This is the operation of the system upon us. That, however, is more a local complaint, which I do not press on the Senate; but I call attention to the fact, that the Government now is in straitened circumstances, and there is not a gentleman here, of enlarged intelligence, who would not, if he himself were at the head of this Government, say that the Post Office Department ought to sustain itself, when it can do so under the fairest system of taxation yet devised, each man paying for his own letter. We have the evidence before us that the Department is not supporting itself, and, therefore, that the rates of postage ought to be raised. With these views, I submit the amendment, and I hope the Senate will express a candid and conscientious opinion upon it.

Mr. HUNTER. I concur very heartily in the views which have been presented by my friend from Arkansas; and I believe that if we could induce Congress to adopt such a provision as this, it would be one of the best things done at this session. There is no doubt that the revenues of the Post Office Department are falling very far behindhand. The expenses of the Post Office Department are very far ahead of its revenue. I introduced, upon leave, I think a month since, a bill, the object of which was to increase the revenue from postage. That bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, and it has never been acted upon by that committee or returned to the Senate. I have been waiting for that bill to be reported for the purpose of asking the Senate to take action upon the subject. The deficiencies which are appropriated in this bill, $3,500,000, I am afraid are not much over half what will be required for the next fiscal year. I am afraid they will come to at least five millions; and the danger is, that unless we do raise the postage, we shall have a drain from the Treasury for the service of the Post Office Department equal to that which we now experience from either the Army or the Navy. I offered no such amendment here, because I did not hope that we could carry through any such reform on this bill, and I do not now press it, as otherwise I would. I will simply say in regard to it, that I had an estimate from the Auditor of the Post Office Department, showing that the bill which I presented (and its chief feature was an increase of the rate of postage under three thousand miles from three to five cents; and there were also some provisions in regard to newspaper postage, which would have aided the revenue) would have added to the entire revenues of the Department for the present year about three millions and a half. I will not, however, press this matter now further than to say that I will vote for this amendment with a great deal of pleasure.

Mr. GWIN. I hope the Senator from Arkansas will strike out the latter part of his amendment, so that it will simply provide that the postage on letters carried three thousand miles or under shall be five cents.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Is that modification necessary to secure the Senator's vote for my amendment?

Mr. GWIN. Not at all.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Then I would rather keep the amendment as it is, and show the public exactly how the matter stands.

Mr. GWIN. I shall vote for the proposition with great pleasure in any form, because I know perfectly well that you will not bring our postages down. You raised them from six to ten cents, while you brought the others down to three cents. That is the law at present; and therefore, I suggested that it was not necessary to reenact it in this proposition.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If we simply proposed to raise the postages for all distances under three thousand miles, a great many people would suppose that the postage for distances over three thousand miles was only three cents.

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest to the Senator from Arkansas that letters carried less than a thousand miles ought not to be charged five cents. If we are to make distinctions on account of distance, I think it would be better to let three cents remain as the rate for any distance under a thousand miles, and that would strengthen the proposition. ["Oh, no."]

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I know very well that the main contribution to the post office revenue comes directly from commercial sources; but we all know that commercial men look for the return of their investments from those with whom they deal, and they always get it with a profit. I speak in behalf of the consumers, and I know that the consumers are perfectly willing to pay this much for their correspondence. We shall pay it most willingly; and upon us at last falls the burden; for the commercial men charge it to us. I know that those who are not consumers, and who are subjected to a tax on account of friendly correspondence, never measure the cost; and, even if their letters were only to go five miles, lovers and friends would as soon pay five cents as three cents generally.

Mr. RICE. I must confess that I do not understand this question very well, but it strikes me, in the first place, that this is a revenue measure, and that, according to the Constitution, all revenue bills must originate in the House of Representatives. I must say, furthermore, that I cannot see why Congress should make appropriations out of the Treasury to pay postage on letters any more than to pay for the bread that the people eat. It seems to me that the postage system should be so established as to pay its own expenses. I shall not detain the Senate; I merely make these points as they have suggested themselves to my mind, leaving it to older and abler men to elucidate the subject.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it, "and that the franking privilege be abolished." Let us go at it effectually, if we want to produce reform.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will vote with the Senator from Ohio, for his proposition, as a separate measure, but I do not wish to embarrass my amendment with it.

Mr. PUGH. I am in favor of the general views of the Senator from Arkansas, but I am not satisfied that this is the place for us to cut, unless we cut something more than the Senator from Arkansas proposes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will go for the Senator's proposition, as a separate measure, with all my heart, but there are others who have doubts about it, and I do not wish it to complicate the question on my amendment. I hope the Senator will withdraw it.

Mr. PUGH. I will withdraw it, if the Senator thinks it interferes with his proposition. An organized system of cutting off extravagance I am ready to vote for; but to increase the rate of postage, which will operate hardly upon poor people, and within twenty-four hours of our having voted an immense gratuity to the Collins line, seems to me to be a system of economy that is not very well calculated to commend itself to the people.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the Senator from Ohio will not withdraw his amendment, but will insist upon it. I think that if the franking privilege were abolished, the present rates of postage would sustain the Department.

Mr. PUGH. I withdraw my amendment, and give notice that if the amendment of the Senator from Arkansas is now carried, I shall vote against it in the Senate unless you take back the gratuity to the Collins line.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have voted with the gentleman against the Collins line.

Mr. SEWARD. I believe the country is totally unprepared for any movement raising the rates of postage. Whatever merit there may be in the proposition, I think this is a wrong time for it. I, for that reason, irrespective of all others, shall vote against the amendment. I wish, also, to give another reason for my vote. I voted against discriminating postage on the ground of distance as a measure calculated to alienate the sections of the Union, the East from the West. That existing distinction is recognized and carried out by this amendment; and if I were prepared to go into this measure as a measure of reform, I should still be obliged to vote against it because it continues this discrimination.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 19, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitch, Gwin, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Sebastian, Thomson of New Jersey, and Yulee—19.
NAYS—Messrs. Bigler, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foster, Hamlin, King, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Stuart, Wilson, and Wright—15.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I move to add to the section just adopted:

And after the 1st day of December, 1858, no privilege of franking letters, packages, or public documents shall be allowed to any officer or person whatsoever.

Mr. DAVIS. I think the Senator from Ohio has probably inserted more in his amendment than he intended. There are some persons who possess the franking privilege to whom you can give nothing to compensate for it—for instance, the widows of the deceased ex-Presidents Adams and Taylor.

Mr. PUGH. It is a mere gratuity: it can be revoked.

Mr. DAVIS. I offer this as a substitute for the amendment of the Senator from Ohio:

And the franking privilege now accorded to members of Congress be, and the same is hereby, abolished.

Mr. PUGH. The reason why I offer my amendment in its general form, I will suggest to the Senator from Mississippi, is, that I want to make the Departments support themselves. If the Secretary of War, or any person under him, has a letter to write, let him pay the Post Office Department the postage out of the contingent fund of the War Department. I see no reason why executive officers should have the franking privilege more than we. I named the 1st of December, in order to give us time, and to give the Secretaries time, to get rid of the documents printed at this session of Congress, and there stop the business. I want to stop the franking privilege of the chiefs of bureaus and heads of Departments, and I want the Postmaster General himself to know that he shall not load the mails down with free matter, but that he shall pay for his postage out of the contingent fund of the Department. I want to make everybody pay postage—the Government and all the Departments, as well as the people. That is the reason I offer the amendment so broadly.

Mr. DAVIS. I have great confidence in reforms which begin at home. It is even more essential that reform than charity should begin at home. I have no fear of any reform which Congress will apply to itself. Then, again, there is no reform which will be effective for so much good as this. It will not only relieve your mails of the immense burden which is now piled upon them, but it will relieve Congress of the vast appropriations entailed upon it by the franking privilege. You will make no more books; for, if people will not pay postage on them, you will not want to send them. It will reduce the charge for printing for Congress more than it will save in the mails. It will have no such effect, however, upon the Executive Departments. They can send nothing but their correspondence, and it would be no great weight taken off the mails; and, moreover, if you abolished the privilege, so far as they are concerned you would only have to furnish the money, dollar for dollar, by an increase of the contingent appropriations. If it be well, let it come hereafter. It may be well; I have no positive objection to it. It is merely a different form of appropriation of money so far as they are concerned. With regard to ourselves, however, the abolition of this privilege is an economy; because it will lessen the amount of matter which will go into the mails. It will work a double economy, fruitful in every degree. I think it ought to follow the measure which has just been adopted. Indeed, it was at first with me an opinion that the two ought to go together; and the one I have just sent up was torn off from the one offered by the Senator from Arkansas, which has been adopted.

There is another matter which I think is quite as important—the charge put upon newspapers. When you mail a letter you have incurred half the expense of transporting it to the most remote point. When you have the letter started in the mail, it goes two hundred miles as easily as twenty-five by a regular line. The great expense is in mailing and delivering it. The letter itself is so light as scarcely to be felt; but you cumber the mail-bags with newspapers, with pamphlets, with books; you overload the inland mails with matter which increases the weight so as to render them difficult to transport. More than that, in the large cities, where they have great facilities for printing, they are enabled, at the very low rate now charged on printed matter, to scatter their newspapers all over the rural districts, and to break down the provincial press. If newspapers had to pay in proportion to their weight and the distance they were transported, you would very soon make the Post Office Department self-supporting; and if members of Congress would send a speech home which they wanted to print in large numbers for circulation among their constituents, it would benefit the local press whilst it relieved the mail. All this will be the effect if you merely strike off the franking privilege from members of Congress. There, I think, is the place where the first remedy should be applied.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment—

Mr. BROWN. This is an amendment to an amendment, and cannot be amended.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. BRIGHT.) The Senator from Mississippi offered his proposition as a substitute.

Mr. PUGH. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi, at all events, to fix a time at which the operation of his amendment shall commence, so as to allow the books printed at this session to be distributed. That is the reason I put in a future day.

Mr. DAVIS. I vote for printing so few of them that I think all I ever vote to print are worth the postage, and I do not want to send a book to anybody for which he is not willing to pay the postage.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not understand the Senator from Mississippi to move his proposition as an amendment to the amendment of the Senator from Ohio.

Mr. DAVIS. No, sir; but as a substitute.

Mr. WILSON. I move to amend the amendment by adding:

And that all mail routes, the income of which does not pay the expenses of such routes, shall be discontinued.

I agree entirely with the Senator from New York in the remark he has made, that the country is not prepared for the radical change that has been proposed here to-day. The system of cheap postage was adopted in imitation of the policy that had been adopted in England. Perhaps the country acted somewhat hastily and unwisely at that time; for there is a vast difference between a little island, densely populated by a commercial and manufacturing people, and a continent like ours. But, sir, the proposition which has been made here to-day to increase the postages, will, in my judgment, be most unwelcome to the country. I am ready to vote to abolish the franking privilege. I have no objection to that; but the people of my State pay into your post office revenue from one hundred and fifty to two hundred thousand dollars annually at the present rates, more than enough to pay all their expenses; and this excess is given to establish mail lines in the thinly-settled sections of the country, from which the demand now comes to increase the rates of postage. Thus, you are to tax the people of my section one or two hundred thousand dollars more in order to keep up lines in sections of the country where they will not begin to pay anything. This demand now comes from that quarter; and I have no doubt that if the policy of increasing the rates of postage be adopted, you will find, sooner or later, that many of those lines which have been forced on the country to meet the wants of people in newly-settled sections will have to be abandoned.

I am not willing to vote for an increase of the rates of postage at this time, but I will go with the Senator from Ohio in abolishing now the whole franking privilege. I had rather pay my own postage than be burdened as I am by letters of no account whatever, and by which I am compelled to sit up sometimes until three or four o'clock in the morning—letters not one in ten of which is of any value to me or any human being. I am ready to pay my own postage here; we can afford to do it out of our salaries; then we shall not have one fifth part of the letters to answer that we have now, and we shall not have to attend to the distribution of documents. That is a burden which I think every lazy man at any rate ought to be glad to get rid of. I confess that I am too lazy to toil, as I am actually compelled to toil, sitting up during the weary hours of the night franking speeches and documents, and answering letters that are of no account to me or anybody else. I am willing to save the country that; but I tell you, sir, it is a mistake at this time to change the rates of postage, and I hope that proposition will not prevail.

Mr. PUGH. It has prevailed.

Mr. BROWN. I shall vote for the amendment proposed by the Senator from Ohio, but I rise chiefly to say that all of us must know this measure brought in in this way and discussed in this manner is to end in nothing. We are wasting very precious hours here. You cannot introduce in this sort of side-bar manner a great reform in a usage which has existed since the foundation of the Government. It ought to be done, and I will vote for it, simply as indicating my opinion; but who dreams that the House of Representatives is going, in this sort of way, to give up this privilege? Why, sir, it is half their stock in trade. You would bankrupt the political fortunes of at least half of them, as they think, by abolishing the franking privilege. All young members of Congress think so. They set a much higher estimate on this privilege than those do who have been here ten or fifteen years. Experience teaches them that it is like the patronage of the President—it breaks them down at home because they cannot frank to everybody. At an early part of the session I should like this discussion to go on; it would enlighten the country; but we have not time for it now. Let us take the vote, however, and send the proposition over to the other House.

But I want to say a word to the Senator from Massachusetts, on the subject of old Massachusetts being so terribly taxed and belabored for the benefit of other people. How long have other people been taxed in other respects for the benefit of Massachusetts? What are all your tariff laws and protection laws, but to levy taxes from people outside of Massachusetts for the purpose of sustaining Massachusetts interests? I agree that is all wrong. I should like to have a postal system by which each State should sustain its own arrangements, and then I should like another system by which no discrimination should be made in favor of the industry of one State or one section, against the industry of another State or another section. I want equality all round. I do not think Massachusetts has much reason to complain of a discrimination of a few cents postage, for since I have had any connection with politics, and long before, she has been constantly asking favors. She cannot even take codfish without getting something for it. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. I take it that all the favors Massachusetts or the other manufacturing States get from this Government, in mitigation of their burdens, is dictated by the necessities of the Government in regard to revenue, and not by any consideration of favor or patronage to their great interests. Upon the question before us, I have to say that I will vote very cheerfully to abolish the franking privilege irrespective altogether of the other questions with which it is connected. The amendment suggested by the honorable Senator from Massachusetts as an amendment to that proposition, has a hostile look, and I hope, therefore he will withdraw it; and if he deems it proper that he will hereafter present it as a distinct proposition, so that we may now have a distinct vote upon the question of abolishing the franking privilege, which abolition I am in favor of. I would suggest, however, to my honorable friend from Massachusetts, that there is something which looks like retaliation in his proposition. I do not myself subscribe to the principle. I believe it is right to raise revenue, or some way to maintain postal communications. I do not believe that it is a principle to be absolutely fixed, that every man who receives a letter shall be taxed a proportionate cost of maintaining the whole of this system. I regard the inland postal system as a great instrumentality for maintaining and preserving and extending this Union. I regard the ocean postal system as a great agency for extending the commerce and the political influence of this country throughout the world. I am willing, therefore, that the system shall be maintained in all its amplitude, for the purpose of extending accommodations to those regions which are new and unable themselves to sustain them. I think that has been the experience heretofore of the system, and those States that do not now pay will ultimately come to be paying States, and in their turn there will arise new States that will not be self-sustaining. But I agree with the honorable Senator from Mississippi, who has just taken his seat, that this discussion may be well and wise enough, but the measure is premature; it is not well to raise the people's taxes, especially upon knowledge and upon the intercourse of affection, without their being heard and having an opportunity to express their opinions.

Mr. GWIN. I would suggest to the Senator from Mississippi, who, I know, is anxious that the proposition which has been adopted shall pass—as it is a very great improvement—whether it would not be better to stand by that for the present, and hereafter to take up the question of the franking privilege, and digest and prepare it, and bring forward a proper measure in regard to it? If we vote both on this bill we may lose both; but I am certain we can carry the one we have already adopted if we do not mix it up with this.

Mr. DAVIS. I will say to my friend from California that I have no great hope of abolishing the franking privilege. I brought forward such a proposition in the Senate Chamber some six or seven years ago, and it met with very little support.

Several SENATORS. We will agree to it now.

Mr. DAVIS. I am glad that it is finding favor, and I hope it will some day prevail. I want it disconnected from other propositions, so that they may all stand on their own merits.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have no objection to abolishing the franking privilege, but I think it is a very late day in the session to bring forward for consideration so important a measure. If it is to be abolished, I hope some of our heavy mail contracts may also be abolished, if we can reach them. If we are to send no letters to our constituents, and receive none without paying for them, we shall have no necessity for half a dozen mails to every large place in the United States and to Europe. I think it will interfere with the jobs that a great many gentlemen have been attending to during this winter. Why, sir, the city is full of contractors for carrying the mail to every place. It costs the Government very nearly two million dollars a year to carry the mails to my State. You have got a mail running from a little place in Missouri to some inland village in California; and I understand that a contract was made the other day for $100,000 to carry the mail from some place in New Mexico to an interior mining town in California of no earthly use to the people of the State generally; and I believe the time allowed to the contractor would be sufficient for an Indian to put the mail in his hat and walk the whole distance. [Laughter.] Still this contractor has made a contract with the Government, I believe, to carry the mail for $100,000 or $150,000. If gentlemen are exhibiting patriotism here, I hope they will strike at that great abuse, for we are paying too much for carrying the mail.

But, sir, I have no idea that one half of the Senate are sincere in asking for this radical change at this late day in the session. I do not believe that the House of Representatives will give any consideration to it; for a Representative that is elected for two years is very anxious to be popular with his constituents. It is very well for us who are elected for six years to show patriotism; but I believe the other House will treat it very differently. I think it is occupying the Senate unnecessarily; and I hope, after this exhibition of patriotism, we shall take a vote.

Mr. WILSON. I withdraw the amendment I proposed, and I say very frankly, I am not for it myself. I proposed it for the purpose of calling the especial attention of gentlemen to the fact that those sections of the country from whence this movement comes to raise the postage do not begin to pay their postal expenses.

Mr. CLAY. Adopt this, and we will do it.

Mr. WILSON. I wish to say a word before I sit down, in reply to the remark made by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown.] I wish to say to him and all who act with him—and I want them to understand it now and hereafter—that the State of Massachusetts now pays, and has paid for the last quarter of a century, more than any other people in the Union to support the Federal Government, and she will do so hereafter; she must as a matter of necessity. I want the Senator to understand that we do not believe we owe any special favors to this Government on account of the manner in which it raises the revenue of the country. With regard to the little fishing bounties that you have taken away, I make the acknowledgment that, on that single point, you have something to talk about and to boast of.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have but a word to say, and it is my practice never willingly to consume time. I never have voted for the abolition of the franking privilege heretofore; but I am inclined now to the belief that the franking privilege is at last but a tax, not perhaps justly a tax, on the newspapers of the country, that ought to furnish information to the people. It is a means which enables those who will not pay for getting information in regard to the action of the Government to rely on getting franked documents.

That I believe is one consideration; but there is a far worse one so far as the practical operation of the system is concerned. You may take the most eminent men in either branch of Congress, and you may take those not so eminent, who labor with the utmost faithfulness for their constituency, and you will find that they have not time to frank documents. No one will say that Congress does not sometimes have a pettifogger or a demagogue in it; and a man of that sort can pay seductive attentions to the people by devoting himself to sending insignificant or worthless public documents. He may spend his time in that way, and undermine the very best, most faithful and most laborious men you have, by that kind of trifling attention. The people of the country do not see it plainly, but when they are honored with an attention from one who has a position here, they feel kindly in return for it. The very essence of representation is poisoned at its inception by the process. The best men sent here are the most negligent in seeking to use such means in order to sustain themselves, and they have something else to do than franking documents.

As I have sent a large number of documents to my own State, I beg leave to say, in connection with the remark I have just made, that I have never franked them myself. I have franked parts of them, but I have never directed them myself. If I had done so it would have destroyed my power and ability, physically, to attend to the business of my constituency, and the consequence is what? It has been a tax upon my pocket; it has been a tax of hundreds a year, and a tax which is paid in deference to what is expected of me. I shall do it so long as the franking privilege exists. But when the privilege ceases, I know my people will not expect it, but will go to the public press to ascertain truly what are the facts; and they will not only get the information in regard to my course and my actions here, but they will get information very much more widely extended than anything they could get by the petty documents I might be able to send them. Therefore it is that practically I believe the franking privilege has advantages so few and disadvantages so great, so corrupting and so unjust in their influence and effect, that I shall henceforth vote to abolish the privilege of franking by members of Congress.

Mr. BROWN. I do not mean to speak, because I want to vote; but I do not want the Senator from Massachusetts to suppose that he convinced me, by his declaration that Massachusetts was paying so large a sum to the Government, that she stood in advance of all the other States. I wish to say to him now simply, that we will adjourn that discussion to December next. I will undertake to demonstrate that the people of Massachusetts are not to be credited at the Treasury for all that is paid at Boston; they are not her payments; and that she is to be charged with whatever she makes under your revenue laws as clear profit. I propose, in December, when we meet again, and come to overhaul the revenue system, as I suppose we shall, to discuss these propositions with the Senator from Massachusetts. This is not the time to do it now.

Mr. WILSON. I shall be ready.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no doubt that the franking privilege may be seriously modified, or perhaps abandoned altogether; but I do not intend to vote for any legislative proposition on this bill. I am satisfied the whole system is a vicious one that we are falling into, and it is becoming worse every day. I hope the House of Representatives will reject everything of the kind you put on the bill. We have committees organized for the purpose of considering and reporting to us on any subject-matter which is thought worthy the attention of the Senate. This species of legislation destroys the whole effect of that system entirely. We have partial and mingled legislation on every appropriation bill that comes up. We shall have our laws in a state that it will be almost impossible for anybody to understand them. Provisions are placed on them in the hurried discussion of a single day, without any previous notice of the subject you have to discuss, without any report of a committee; and it is impossible, whatever may be the extent of our intelligence, that we should not commit serious blunders by such a course of legislation. For this reason, and this alone, I mean to vote against the whole system of legislation upon appropriation bills.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not rise to make any remarks, but to suggest an amendment which I think will assist this proposition, particularly in its passage through the other House. It is to make this abolition of the franking privilege take date from the 4th of March next. Many members of the other House, having been elected until that time, consider that they have a right, under their election, to frank until that time; that it is a kind of contract, as it were; that they have a right to their franking privilege until the 4th of March next; and by that time we can get rid of the documents.

Mr. DAVIS. Half a loaf is better than no bread.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I think you will carry it in that way, and no other.

Mr. PUGH. I was about to accept the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis;] for I do not think there will be any blunder in abolishing the franking privilege to some extent. If it is the wish of the Senate, I will accept the amendment of the Senator from Mississippi.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendment, as modified, will be read.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the franking privilege now accorded to members of Congress, be, and the same is hereby, abolished from and after the 4th day of March next.

Mr. STUART. I desire to say only a few words on this question. I agree with what most gentlemen have said, that the franking privilege could be much better described by calling it the franking burden; but I doubt the propriety of abolishing it entirely, although I shall vote for that. I suggested to the Senator from Mississippi, the other day, when the question was up, when he made some remarks on the subject, to perfect his ideas by drafting a bill. One idea he suggested was for the distribution of certain documents that are ordinarily published throughout the States, through the officers of each body of Congress, to certain public libraries and county seats, or other places that might be designated. I think that wise and proper. All that can be done hereafter.

I must say also, that I doubt the propriety of abolishing this privilege so far as letters are concerned; still, I am not going to dispute about that; I am only throwing out my suggestions. It is undoubtedly true, as other Senators have suggested, that it is only on appropriation bills at the last hours of the session when these great questions of reform are presented, at a time when it is pretty generally understood that in one or the other House, or both, they will fail. I have no doubt that the honorable Senator from Arkansas has presented his proposition in good faith; he has shown that in all respects; but if it had been presented in the early part of the session, in a matured bill by itself, it is conceded by all it would have been much better considered.

I wish to make another suggestion while I am up, and that is as to the manner in which we do business on the appropriation bills. The constant argument is that no legislation shall be put on appropriation bills; still it goes on upon one subject or another, and what is the final result in the end? because that, I think, is important to be considered by the country. In the end, at best, the legislation of the country is done by six men, probably it is done by two, for I think it is generally true that the committees of conference are suggested by either the Presiding Officer of each House or the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means and the chairman of the Committee on Finance. If so, then the legislation of the country is in the hands of two men, or six, at the outside. I have tried, so far as I am concerned, to prevent this at this session, and I do not mention it now by way of complaint. The extension of the session will do us no good. But the other day, when the Senate was full, we rejected a proposition for increased steamers twice by a decided vote. When the Senate was reduced to a bare quorum—thirty-five Senators voting—the same proposition, in a more objectionable form, passed by one majority. Thus it is that we must sit here—no remedy for it—until the last hours of the day, and with a bare quorum we pass a bill. It then goes into the hands of a conference committee, as I have said, and as it comes from that committee, so it is the law. The best amendment that can be put on, if rejected by that committee, has gone to the tomb of the Capulets. You cannot reject the report of a committee of conference. It is not amendable by parliamentary law, and one has scarcely ever been rejected in the history of the country.

I do not wish Senators to misunderstand me as criticising the actions or the motives of anybody else; but I simply mean to suggest that we ought to consider the appropriation bills strictly as such, and in time; and we ought to perfect these other measures, and present them in time too. That is what ought to be done: now you cannot do it. What is the next best thing? Here we are again; you cannot perfect this measure; it is conceded by every gentleman that you cannot perfect it. When you have abolished the franking privilege, you have got to do something else; you have got to make appropriations to pay for some portions of the postage. All this has to be done. The documents you have got must be disposed of. They are not to be lumbered up. You have not got buildings enough in Washington to contain them; it is not the place for them; there are many of them which ought to go to the country. Certain of them are historically referred to for historical purposes, and they should go to the country, and be put in proper places. But, sir, I feel as other Senators do on this subject, never having spoken a word about it before in my life, and always ready to vote to abolish this privilege, either totally or qualifiedly. I am willing, with other Senators, now to strike the blow; and when the franking privilege is abolished, when your legislative documents which you publish here are upon you, and when the Capitol is not big enough to hold them, nor any of your other buildings, then the necessity will be upon you to provide the means for their proper distribution throughout the States.

Mr. PUGH. Quit printing.

Mr. STUART. But certain things must be printed. I know that when gentlemen refer to documents, they sometimes allude to those which are denominated as picture-books. That is quite another question. Your legislative documents, such as constitute the history of your country, and your business, are published, and must be published; and if there is any propriety in publishing them, it is in order to furnish information to the public; and they must go out that the public may see them. I beg pardon of the Senate for trespassing so far, but I thought my views might, perhaps, be misunderstood. I am ready to vote.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend the amendment by inserting before the words "members of Congress," the words "the President of the United States and the heads of Departments;" and after the words "members of Congress," "and any other persons."

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Connecticut will withdraw that amendment. I am satisfied that if we bring members of Congress up to their own question and take this privilege from themselves, we can carry it. I believe the other House will agree to it. That is the reason I accepted the proposition of the Senator from Mississippi, and although I am in favor of striking at the other, I shall be compelled to vote against the amendment of the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. DAVIS. It will require immediate provision to be made, or the very operations of your Government will be checked. The Departments have not the means of prepaying the postage on letters which they necessarily send out.

Mr. SEWARD. I am very sorry that a question of detail should embarrass us; but I cannot see how it will be unreasonable to vote for the amendment of the honorable Senator from Connecticut. If I tie my hands, and agree to pay the expense of my communications with my constituents, during a Kansas debate, I am not willing to give the franking power to the heads of the Departments and the President of the United States. I like fair play.

Mr. FOSTER. I am by no means desirous of embarrassing the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, and I regret that gentlemen should request me to withdraw my proposition, when I feel that I ought to insist on it. I believe it will strengthen the first proposition in the other House, most decidedly, and there is manifest justice in it. To abolish the franking privilege in part, and not abolish it altogether, is unjust; it is contrary to the analogy we see adopted in England, where I believe the Queen cannot frank a letter. If she puts a letter in the mail she must pay the postage on it. There is certainly equality in this; and any other system than this is unequal and unjust.

Mr. BRODERICK. I ask for the yeas and nays. ["Oh, no!"] It is a very important question, and I hope we shall have the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. The heads of Departments have no power of franking. They have the power to indorse "official business" on a paper, and then it goes free; but they, as heads of Departments, have no power to frank.

Mr. DAVIS. It is a duty, not an option.

Mr. COLLAMER. The duty of sending off official papers.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe the amendment is to include the President and heads of Departments in the provision for abolishing the franking privilege, when it is done after the 4th of March next. That will not affect my rights or my convenience at all, and therefore I feel at liberty to ask the gentleman who has offered it—I am not aware who it was—what is the object of abolishing the franking privilege? What will you substitute in its place for the purpose of distributing public documents? I should like the mover of the amendment to let me know the object of it. I have been indisposed and have not been present before, and I hope he will be so kind as to let me know the object of it, and the benefits to arise from the provision. Before the amendment is adopted, I ask him to state what his object was, and if it is anything beneficial, I am prepared to vote for it. If not, I am not prepared to vote for it. I hope to be enlightened on the subject. ["Question!" "Question!"]

The question being taken by yeas and nays on the amendment of Mr. FOSTER, resulted—yeas 19, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Doollittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamilton, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Rice, Seward, Wade, and Wilson—19.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Davis, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yutec—20.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. SEWARD. I now ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment of the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH.]

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose this is urged as an economical plan because Government is a little straitened for money. I do not know how much it will bring into the Treasury, but certainly it will make some changes. I think it will be the means of creating about fifty situations for clerks in addition to the present number of clerks employed in the Post Office. How it will save any money I cannot possibly conceive. I have heard no reason.

Mr. DAVIS. How?

Mr. HOUSTON. Find that out yourself.

Mr. DAVIS. How will it create a necessity for additional clerks?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will tell you how it is. It is necessary that many of the official documents shall be distributed. Of course, when they are distributed by the mails they will have to be registered. The Postmaster General has, perhaps, twenty or thirty thousand to go from his office. He must pay for every one of them. Who is to keep the registry of them? Are not other officers in the same state? Then, will it not be necessary to have more clerks? This proposition cannot affect me; it will affect the public, and will have to be relegislated upon at some future day. I could never see any advantage that could possibly result from the abolition of the franking privilege. I thought the proposition came from a man who was a little crazy or demented, when it was made some years ago, that no advantage could arise from it, and that multiplication of offices would be the consequence; because the public must pay the expense of the necessary correspondence of the officers that are engaged in public business; for they cannot support it. It would take the salaries of the heads of Departments to give distribution to their documents, if they had to pay for them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. You are talking about what is not in the proposition.

Mr. HOUSTON. Members of Congress are to make distribution of documents. How are they to do it? Must they be registered at the post office, or must you pass a special law at every distribution of a document? I trust there will never be fewer than there are to-day. Not a day passes that I do not receive applications for the Patent Office reports. They are the most important matter connected with the civil administration of this Government, out of the dispensations of this city. Are we not to have the privilege of distributing them? I am going out on the 4th of March next, and no benefits or convenience will result to me, I grant you; but it is a principle, a fixed principle with me, that justice ought to be done; that the Government ought to be administered on the most economical terms. Is this the way to do it? Not at all. What will it save? Will the increase of clerks save money? Will it increase the morality of the Government? Will it strengthen our institutions, or build them up by the multiplication of officers? I think not. It makes places for friends. Members have got friends. A great many of them do not care how many friends they can get into office; but they do not wish to treat their friends at a distance with any degree of favor, or to conciliate them by conferring actual benefits on them through any official medium; and hence it is that you block up the rays of light that ought to be disseminated to the people at a distance. You may talk of benefiting contractors. I wonder how that would be. Do you think you will get your mails carried for a less sum than now? Not a farthing; their cost will never be reduced. They are like the salaries of officers which you are every day eking out. Who ever heard of a salary being reduced? Who ever heard of the number of officers being reduced? You may increase them; but you cannot diminish them.

I am in favor of continuing the system that has done well, without any modification of it, unless it be to simplify it, or to save money. If you say that, when officers are writing on official business, they cannot frank a letter in the discharge of their duties, and it is not beneficial to them but to others, what do you gain? If the Government does not get three cents on such a letter, is it swindled out of anything? I really have never heard the first reason given for this modification of the postage laws, and I should like to hear some.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask the Senator did he agree to a modification of the postage to five cents?

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it ought to be ten or five cents at least. There is no source of revenue on earth as equitable as it is; for, if a man does not write, he does not pay.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Texas has argued one question, and the Senate is considering another. He is arguing the necessity of having the franking privilege continued to heads of Departments and executive officers, and we are treating the subject of the franking privilege to members of Congress.

Mr. HOUSTON. The other amendment was rejected.

Mr. DAVIS. Then why did the Senator argue it after it was disposed of, after it had been rejected, as he says?

Mr. HOUSTON. I wanted to let the people understand it. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator did, however, make some remarks which had application to the subject before us. He spoke of this being the center of light, from which the rays were to be disseminated by the franking privilege throughout the country.

Mr. HOUSTON. Intelligence.

Mr. DAVIS. Rays of intelligence; light, I believe, was the Senator's word, and I understood him to mean intellectual light. He mentions also that he has no interest in it, that it continues to the 4th of March next, and that he will be no longer among us. That, of course, is a matter of regret to us.

Mr. HOUSTON. None at all.

Mr. DAVIS. But it may still be a loss to the country. If that light from the center be taken away, which is disseminated through the franking privilege, we may look to the other side of the case, and see if it will save money. I think the Senator asked, in the beginning, what was the reason of this, and required explanation. I did not know really that he had heard nothing of the debate. Reasons were given plenty as blackberries in summer.

Mr. HOUSTON. I did not hear them, for I was indisposed, and lying down.

Mr. DAVIS. Surely the Senator will not come in after lying down until the question has been discussed and brought up to the point of voting, and require us to tell him, then, all that has been said.

Mr. HOUSTON. No; I want only one reason. [Laughter.]

Mr. DAVIS. One reason, then, which I think a very good one, is, that it is in the line of equality. The Senator's correspondence, widely diffused as it must be, from his general acquaintance with the people of the United States and their general admiration of him, still must be limited to but a small portion of the people, even of his own State, whilst the whole body of the people of the State are taxed by a postal system which exceeds its revenue. Now I propose that those who receive the benefits of the system shall bear the burdens; that those who receive letters, or those who send letters, shall pay for them. Let Congress pay, in any form which may be provided, for such official correspondence as it is necessary to conduct, and let all be prepaid. All that is voluntary let a member pay for himself. Let those who write to him prepay their letters. They will write to him either from interest or on matters of business; he will answer them, and, I suppose, the correspondence will be quite equal in each case to the postage. It is a burden which they ought to bear. It is their business; it is not the business of the public.

Then I will say to the Senator that I have another motive. He asked me for one reason, I will give him two, in that true spirit of Christian charity which always gives double what is demanded. I want to reduce the vast expenditure for printing, which has made the Congress of the United States the greatest publishing establishment in the Union, and I believe it will be reduced, when members no longer have bound books to send through the mails free of cost to their friends in different sections of the country. If the book is worth anything it is worth the charge on its transportation. The man who receives the book should pay for its transportation, or if it is not worth that, burn it here, and stop the publication in future.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe this mail business is carried on by prepayment—

Mr. DAVIS. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not answer one point which he made on me, and I will do that. That was about clerks. I believe he left me to find that out for myself, and therefore I feel that I am bound to answer. To take the case he cited, the Postmaster General will get five hundred or five thousand stamps, which will be put on a letter when it is sent away instead of his sign manual, and in neither case will it require any registry by clerks. The putting of the post office stamp upon the letter will require less time than the signing of his name, and as the one letter need not be registered so of the other.

Mr. HOUSTON. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion; but these stamps have to be paid for, and they will report after a while that the Government is swindled out of more than they would gain out of this system. I really cannot understand any advantage that can possibly result to the Government. As for the public documents, is it not important that the people should at least receive a portion of the public documents: the President's message, and the reports of the heads of Departments?

Mr. DAVIS. They are printed in the newspapers.

Mr. HOUSTON. But every man is not able to pay for a newspaper. It would be imposing a very heavy tax upon him if you were to oblige every man disposed to read these documents to subscribe for a newspaper. They are matters of record, and will be matters of reference. The humblest man of the community, if he intimates his desire to a member of the Senate, or of the House of Representatives, can obtain the President's message with the accompanying documents. Hence, I think if it should impose a little duty on members they might well bear it. I have, in my life, borne it for sixteen years here. I never had, until the last few years, any assistance in discharging my duties in this way; and I am for leaving gentlemen heirs to a full share of the labor of it. I am not for imposing any arduous or unjust task on them, for I know when the people have reposed confidence in them, in their fidelity, good feeling, and patriotism, that it is a poor requital when they furnish them with such articles or such documents as contain important intelligence in relation to the Government of the country, and which are furnished by the Government. Therefore it is that I never could see any advantage in this proposition, though perhaps it will be a saving to the country. If it is, I know not what that saving can be. I thank the gentleman from Mississippi for his information. He may have given me light, but I do not perceive it. It may be owing to my dullness of apprehension. I have no doubt of his acumen, or of the explanation which he has offered, but I really cannot comprehend that there is any advantage in it. Taking for granted all that he has said, I cannot see any advantage to result to the country, and therefore I am opposed to it.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I have paired off on this question with the Senator from Connecticut, Mr. Dixon. I should vote for it, and he would vote against it.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 38, nays 4; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Collamer, Davis, Doollittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—38.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Clingman, Houston, and Reid—4.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I offer the following amendment as a separate section:

And be it further enacted, That, from and after the 4th day of March next, all postages shall be prepaid.

Several Senators. That is the law now.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand that to be the law now. I do not understand the amendment. Is not that the law?

Mr. YULEE. Certainly that is the law.

Mr. CLAY. I make this suggestion to the Senator: the amendment we have just adopted substantially is, that, from and after the 4th of March next, the franking privilege of members of Congress be, and the same is hereby, abolished. The question still recurs to my mind, whether letters, under existing laws, would not still be addressed to them free of postage; and I think this amendment would obviate that.

Mr. SEWARD. There is no harm in having the amendment offered.

Mr. PUGH. We had better amend it.

Mr. GREEN. I suggest to the Senator that the difficulty which occurs to my mind is this: this is the existing law, probably, except where there is a special exemption. By moving this as an amendment, the construction of it will be that that, probably, is not the law until the 4th of March next, and this interregnum will be considered to be a time in which mail matter can go without being prepaid. There is the difficulty.

Mr. SEWARD. Perhaps it would be better to obviate that difficulty by making the amendment read:

That from and after the 4th day of March next, all matter passing through the mail shall be prepaid.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That would abolish the franking privilege of the heads of the Departments and the President.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator can have a vote taken on the measure in another form by presenting the amendment which has been rejected.

Mr. SEWARD. I know that embraces this proposition; but it does also other important things. I want now a vote on this amendment as a separate measure.

Mr. YULEE. I will suggest to the Senator from New York to exempt foreign letters. There will be an inconvenience attending the application of that rule to foreign letters.

Mr. SEWARD. I cannot help it.

Mr. YULEE. Then I hope we will vote it down.

Mr. PUGH. Let us hear the amendment read again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. PUGH. That is all right.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. I believe a short time since there was a proposition to abolish the franking by heads of Departments, who now have the privilege of sending official papers free. I thought that was rejected. I take it the adoption of this amendment would readopt that, because everything is to be prepaid. Voting as I did against abolishing what they call the franking by heads of Departments, I cannot vote for this amendment, because, in my judgment, it will amount to the very same thing.

Mr. HAMLIN. In the debate which took place upon the other amendment, I think several Senators said (or if it was not said in debate, it was said in private conversation) that they did not want to vote for that amendment, because it would embarrass the proposition then under consideration; but would vote for it in a separate one. Now, this is a separate and distinct proposition. It is not embarrassed with the one which has been adopted, and I understand its effect to be precisely what the Senator from Vermont says. It entirely cuts off this thing of franking, and I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I would like to inquire of the honorable Senator from Vermont, whether, under the law as it now exists, the heads of Departments, or any person connected with those Departments, have the privilege of franking anything except upon official business?

Mr. COLLAMER. The President has the power without limitation. The heads of the Departments have not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. Have the heads of Departments, or any person under their authority, the power?

Mr. COLLAMER. The heads of Departments, together with the assistants in those Departments, have; that is, the Postmaster General, and the Assistant Postmasters General, and the Secretary of the Treasury, and the Assistant Secretary of the Treasury have the power of franking in this way on official business.

Mr. SEWARD. It is the same way with us.

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir; we have the right to frank on our own business, whether on official business or not; they have not.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I wish to put this question directly: have they the right to frank newspapers or speeches?

Mr. COLLAMER. No, sir; for they cannot honestly put on any such paper as that that it is official business.

Mr. SEWARD. They do.

Mr. COLLAMER. They do not in the Post Office Department.

Mr. FITCH. I think the Senator's amendment would cover more than it was intended it should do. It will embrace newspapers, compelling publishers to pay postage in every instance, and all foreign matter which we have by treaty allowed to be free.

Mr. SEWARD. I will modify my amendment by saying "excepting newspapers and foreign matter."

Mr. HALE. There is another class that ought to be excepted. I do not know whether Congress intends to abolish the franking privilege or not, but they ought to reserve the applications of old soldiers and their widows for pensions. All communications are to be prepaid, under this provision. [Why should they not?] I am not going to say it should not be so.

Mr. TOOMBS. I should think those people who get donations might well afford to pay for their letters on the subject. I do not know a better class in the United States for paying.

Mr. YULEE. I ask the attention of the Senator from New York a moment. I suggested to him the propriety of excepting foreign letters.

Mr. SEWARD. I have already modified my amendment in that way.

Mr. YULEE. Let me read the law as it stands, and see whether it is necessary to legislate at all in the direction the Senator proposes:

"And upon all letters passing through or in the mail of the United States, excepting such as are to or from a foreign country, the postages as above specified shall be prepaid, except upon letters and packages addressed to officers of the Government upon official business, which shall be so marked on the envelope."

Does not the law stand well as it is now?

Mr. SEWARD. No, sir. I prefer to make no exception.

Mr. TOOMBS. If I understand the proposition of the Senator from New York, it is to make all pay. He wishes to except everybody. It embraces the proposition lost on the last vote, by making all be prepaid. You arrive at the same thing in another way.

Mr. RICE. I would like to ask the honorable Senator from New York if he has taken into consideration the garden seeds in this amendment? [Laughter.]

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, everything.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 23, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clark, Doolittle, Douglas, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Davis, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Polk, Reid, Wright, and Yulee—20.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask to amend the amendment by inserting after the word "matter," the words "and periodical publications."

Mr. HUNTER. You cannot add to the amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I move to insert those words in the bill. There will be no objection to that.

Mr. PUGH. I object to it.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well; I move it as an amendment to the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suggest whether that will not include all our speeches.

Mr. PUGH. We have adopted that amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. Are we in Committee of the Whole, or in the Senate?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. In the Senate. The amendment which has been adopted cannot be modified except by unanimous consent.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the bill by inserting after the word "newspapers" the words "and periodical publications."

Mr. HUNTER. I should like to hear the last amendment reported. I should like to know what it is.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator proposes to add the words "and periodical publications" to the amendment which is now part of the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. What is that connected with?

Mr. SEWARD. Newspapers.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read the amendment which is proposed, and the amendment which has been adopted, to show the connection that they will have.

The Secretary read, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 4th day of March next, all matter passing through the mail shall be prepaid, excepting newspapers, periodical publications, and foreign matter.

Mr. HUNTER. Why except newspapers? I think they are required to be paid now. ["Oh, no,"]

Mr. KING. Not from any part of the United States.

Mr. GREEN. The postage is paid quarterly.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe the proposed amendment will include members' speeches. As I shall be away from here, I want to have the benefit of their speeches; but I do not want to pay for them.

Mr. PUGH. We have adopted that amendment. What does the Senator propose?

Mr. SEWARD. This is another amendment to the bill.

Mr. PUGH. It cannot be put to that amendment, for the Senate has inserted it in that form. There must be a regular section, or the vote on the other vote must be reconsidered.

Mr. SEWARD. I move, then, to reconsider the vote by which the last amendment was agreed to.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. SEWARD. I now move to amend the amendment by inserting the words "and periodical publications," after the word "newspapers."

Mr. YULEE. I ask the Senator to allow me to suggest another modification in regard to transient newspapers. They are now prepaid, but under the Senator's amendment they would not be prepaid.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will have the amendment read.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. PUGH. How did those words "and periodical publications" get in there?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senate reconsidered the vote by which the amendment was adopted, and being reconsidered, the Senator from New York offered this proposition.

Mr. PUGH. He could not do it after the yeas and nays were ordered. I want a vote on these things separately.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment is amendable after the yeas and nays are ordered as before.

Mr. PUGH. That is against all the rules I ever heard of.

Mr. FITCH. I wish to ask the Senator from New York if he desires the discontinuance of all the small country post offices? If he does, he will have taken the most effectual method of doing it, if the amendment is adopted, for almost the sole inducement on the part of those who fill those places to discharge the duties of them is the franking privilege given them, within certain limits, under the old law. If he deprives them of that privilege, he deprives them of all inducement to retain the office, and four fifths of the small offices will become vacant at once. The percentage pays them nothing, and yet, for that privilege, and for the small pittance they receive, they will wait the arrival of the mails at nights, and perform services which the gentleman himself would not perform for hundreds of dollars.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment as amended.

Mr. YULEE. I beg the Senator to amend his amendment further by adding the words "to regular subscribers," after newspapers and periodicals, the object being to continue, as is now the requirement, the prepayment of postage on transient newspapers, and to confine the amendment to regular subscribers.

Several SENATORS. That is right.

Mr. SEWARD. I accept it.

Mr. FITCH. Will not the Senator accept an amendment to exclude those postmasters who are now entitled to this privilege?

Mr. SEWARD. That has no relation to this amendment.

Mr. GREEN. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SEWARD. Let the amendment, as amended, be read.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. SEWARD. Is not that confined solely to newspapers, and periodicals? I do not know that the modification of the honorable Senator alters it at all.

Mr. YULEE. It does not help it.

Mr. BROWN. I was under some misapprehension in voting for this amendment originally. As it is amended now, I shall vote against it. I wish simply to say that, to set myself right on the record.

Mr. SLIDELL. I have paired off until seven o'clock with the Senator from Rhode Island, Mr. SIMMONS, or I should have voted "nay" on this amendment.

The question being taken by yeas and nays resulted—yeas 18, nays 28; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Pearce, Seward, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wade—18.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Thomson of New Jersey, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—28.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. HAMLIN. I desire to offer the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 4th of March next, all laws which confer the right of franking letters or other matter, on any person or officer, be, and the same is hereby, repealed.

Mr. CLAY. I raise the point of order that this is the same amendment substantially which has just been voted down. ["Oh, no!"] It is the same thing.

Mr. HAMLIN. I think we had better have the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. COLLAMER. Let the amendment be read.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. COLLAMER. That amendment has been voted down twice.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope this amendment will prevail. We have just voted an amendment down which I think covered the whole matter. We are giving the franking privilege to the postmasters throughout the United States, while taking it away from ourselves. The postmasters can flood the country with documents of every kind. They can send bag after bag of papers; and are we to sit here and deny that privilege to ourselves, while we extend it to postmasters? I hope the amendment will be adopted. I think the amendment which has just been voted down is a very wise and judicious one, and should have been adopted by the Senate.

Mr. FITCH. My friend from California is mistaken. The country postmasters cannot flood the country with documents. They have the privilege to frank written letters, and nothing else.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 20, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Pearce, Seward, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—20.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Davis, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Thomson of New Jersey, Wright, and Yulee—26.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. WILSON. I offer the following amendment as an additional section to the bill:

And be it further enacted, That the printing of post-bills, blanks, printing drafts and warrants, postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and printing parchment for the use of the Post Office Department, shall hereafter be given to the lowest responsible bidder, after due public notice.

I have no speech to make in support of this amendment. I will simply say that if adopted and honestly carried out, it will save the Government tens of thousands of dollars, and put an end to these jobs.

Mr. DAVIS. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts instead of the Post Office Department, that he might modify his amendment by saying "Post Office and other Executive Departments."

Mr. WILSON. I will accept that modification most cheerfully.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will put the amendment in that form.

Mr. BROWN. I cannot go for that amendment; and I will state, in a very few words, why I cannot. A great deal of this printing is to come up to a particular standard—your stamped envelopes, for instance. Let them out to the lowest bidder, and prescribe what shall be the quality of them; at the end of the time they are sent in, and fall below the standard; suppose you reject them; then you advertise again; but, in the mean time, what is the country to do for the work? We are forced either to accept an article which is below the standard, or we get nothing at all. I do not think it will do. You cannot do these things in a day. This a part of the humbuggery that has been going on here all day. That is my judgment about it. We shall not accomplish anything by this proposition. In two days more you will be compelled to adjourn, unless you get another extension from the House—and I hope you will not. I do hope, while I do not assume to dictate at all, but simply give my opinion, that a stop will be put to this thing. Nobody expects that reform will grow out of this proposition. The Senate has indicated, on its part, that it wants to abolish the franking privilege; but you are not going to do it in this slipshod sort of way. The subject should be taken up and considered, and abolished by some plan which looks into all its ramifications.

Then as to the idea suggested by the Senator from Massachusetts, that a good deal of money can be saved by placing little amendments on the Post Office bill in this loose way! I can see very well that you will want these parchments and these papers; that you will want them at all times. Suppose you cannot get them, or that they are sent in vastly below the standard: what then? You are compelled either to take them or to have nothing. They are forced upon the Government, although they are far below the standard required.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The opinion which the Senator from Mississippi has just expressed with regard to the present proceeding of the Senate is precisely the opinion which I have entertained of the proceedings for the last two hours. We had better be about something else, for they will all amount to nothing. I do not propose to discuss this amendment, but simply to say, as the Senate is going on in this way, that they could certainly act upon this proposition, which is a perfectly plain and practicable one, and will save a good deal of money. Therefore, after saying that, I have only to ask for the yeas and nays on the amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MASON. I would inquire of the mover of this proposition, whether it is intended to embrace the advertising of the Departments?

Mr. WILSON. No, sir; the printing.

Mr. MASON. That is the advertising.

Mr. WILSON. No, sir.

Mr. MASON. It embraces the advertisements.

Mr. KING. I think not.

Mr. HUNTER. It would embrace them as it now stands. We had better confine it as it stood originally. I will go for it then.

Mr. WILSON. I accepted the modification on the suggestion of the Senator from Mississippi, for whose opinions on these matters I have great deference.

Mr. HUNTER. I am afraid it would be too hasty.

Mr. WILSON. I will withdraw the modification, and let the amendment stand as it was proposed originally.

Mr. SLIDELL. I would prefer to have it as it stands. I renew it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In what form does the Senator from Massachusetts propose the amendment?

Mr. KING. As it was originally proposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it as it was originally offered.

The Secretary read, it as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the printing of post-bills, blanks, printing drafts and warrants, postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and printing parchments for the use of the Post Office Department, shall hereafter be given to the lowest responsible bidder, after due public notice.

Mr. REID. It occurs to me that the Senator from Massachusetts, in embracing one item of printing in his amendment, will go beyond, perhaps, the object he would like to attain. I can readily conceive that the same man who would propose to print the blanks of the Post Office Department, might be willing to do the whole printing; but I suppose it would be the duty of the Post Office Department to contract with an individual in whom it had confidence; that those blanks are not to be printed and used by anybody who chooses to sell them at a very small amount. That is a kind of printing that we ought to be very particular about. The lowest bidder might be such a man as neither the Government nor the Senator from Massachusetts would be willing to intrust that sort of work to.

Mr. WILSON. He must be a responsible bidder.

Mr. SLIDELL. I suggest to the Senator from Massachusetts to insert the words, "the lowest responsible bidder."

Mr. WILSON. They are in the amendment.

Mr. SLIDELL. Then I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. REID. The word "responsible" would perhaps be construed to mean a man who could execute his contract.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no.

Mr. POLK. I have read that amendment; and if there are other things printed in the other Executive Departments, that amendment is objectionable. It goes on, and mentions stamps, &c.; and all except the last—the printing of parchments—are applicable only to the Post Office Department; and then it adds other Executive Departments. It does not say the printing for other Executive Departments, but the printing of parchments for the other Executive Departments.

Mr. HALE. Oh, no.

Mr. POLK. I will ask for the reading of the amendment, and I will call the attention of the Senate to it.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. POLK. I submit the question to the Senate.

Mr. DAVIS. You are right.

Mr. POLK. I hope the mover of the proposition will modify it.

Mr. HALE. I move to amend the amendment by inserting "and all printing of the other Executive Departments."

Mr. YULEE. Except advertisements.

Mr. HALE. I am told that that has been once voted on to-day, and I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. The executive printing goes to one of the two contractors for the printing of the Houses of Congress; we cannot meddle with that. We had better take the proposition as originally presented by the Senator from Massachusetts. I will go for that.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand now by the amendment, that the printing of the Executive Departments is confined to the parchment only.

Mr. POLK. Yes, sir.

Mr. WILSON. Oh, no.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendment again.

The Secretary read it.

Mr. DAVIS. It is confined to printing parchment for the use of the Executive Departments.

Mr. YULEE. Strike out the words Executive Departments.

Mr. DAVIS. I understand the existing law requires the executive printing, as it is termed, to be sent to the Superintendent of Public Printing, and it is to be done by one of the two Printers of the two Houses of Congress. With that understanding I was going on to say that I thought it entailed a great deal of delay, and a great deal of expense upon the Executive Departments, and that they get along much worse than if they had their own printing done in their own way, responsible only for the money which was expended. The delay must be great, for the orders of Congress lie right before the orders of the Departments. When the Department requires something to be printed and sends it here, it has to wait its time; though it requires it promptly, it cannot get it promptly. In many things the expense is far greater under your printing law than the cost of printing them would be in Philadelphia, New York, and other places where large printing establishments are managed. I believe there would be a great saving in money and a great saving in time if we were to return to the system that formerly existed, and allow each Executive Department to control its printing for itself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. DAVIS. I would state that I have paired off with the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. DURKEE] for the evening. I believe he is absent, and therefore I do not vote.

The result was then announced—yeas 34, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bright, Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Clay, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Hammond, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Stidell, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bigler, Brown, Clingman, Johnson of Arkansas, Mallory, Mason, and Reid—8.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. SLIDELL. Is an amendment to the amendment that has been adopted now in order?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair does not understand that there is any amendment pending.

Mr. HUNTER. If it is adopted, how can it be amended?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not amendable.

Mr. SLIDELL. Can I add to it?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will first hear what the Senator has to offer.

Mr. SLIDELL. I voted under a misapprehension in this matter. I find this provision, in fact, confined to the Post Office Department.

Mr. POLK. That was stated.

Mr. SLIDELL. I did not so understand it. It does not go so far as I should wish it to go.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I will move to reconsider the amendment.

Mr. SLIDELL. I desire to extend the provisions of this section to all the printing of the Executive Departments.

Mr. SEWARD. Add it by a separate section.

Mr. SLIDELL. I prefer to reconsider it and do it in that form. I move a reconsideration.

Mr. DAVIS. I will suggest to the Senator from Louisiana that some time since I sent to the Committee on Printing a resolution directing them, if they thought it expedient, to bring in a bill to reform this matter. I am willing to wait, though I concur with him entirely.

Mr. DOUGLAS. The Senator from Louisiana can add those words to it.

Mr. SLIDELL. By general consent I desire to add those words. At any rate, I move a reconsideration, because I voted under a misapprehension.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Senator's amendment can be offered without reconsideration.

Mr. WILSON. I do not object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection. The question is on the amendment offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

Mr. KING. What is it?

Mr. SLIDELL. I propose to amend the amendment so that it will read:

The printing of post-bills, blanks, printing drafts and warrants, postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and printing parchments for the use of the Post Office and other Executive Departments, and for the printing of parchments and all other printing, except advertisements, for the use of the Post Office and the other Executive Departments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to the amendment being offered.

Mr. HUNTER. If we do that, it seems to me we are acting against the law established in regard to public printing. We have elected Public Printers under the existing laws, who are to do what is called executive printing. The effect of that amendment would be to destroy their contract.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will say to the Senator from Virginia, that it is in consequence of the fact of their being elected Public Printers to the House and Senate that they have the accessory advantage of the Executive being obliged to choose either one or the other of them to do the departmental printing. The object of my amendment is to throw all this printing open to competition, and put it on the same footing.

Mr. STUART. I only wish to say that the Senator from Virginia is clearly wrong. There is no contract, nor any part of a contract, which compels us to give any particular amount of printing. They are simply Printers for what we choose to give them.

Mr. HUNTER. These Printers expect a certain amount of printing. That may be more or less in amount. It is now proposed to take that from them.

Mr. STUART. Precisely. While the previous contract existed, so far as the contract calls for printing, they should have it. We passed an amendment in regard to the printing. It was put on the last amendment, and the chairman—

Mr. HUNTER. It was put on before the Printers were elected. They were elected without reference to that law.

Mr. STUART. Precisely. We elected him to do the printing for two years, but only such things as we proposed to give him to print—that is all.

Mr. BROWN. I must say that the last remark of the Senator from Michigan astonishes me. You elect a Public Printer. You agree to give him the printing of the Government. He makes his calculations that it is going to be so much, makes his outlay, and then when he has executed one fiftieth part of it, perhaps, you take away the whole of it, and let it out by contract. Is that fair dealing? He is entitled to the printing of the Government for the Congress to which you have elected him, whatever it may be; it may be small or it may be great. He takes that risk, buys material, puts up an office, gets ready to do the work; and after doing that, we suddenly change our minds and say to him, "you shall not do it under the contract we made; but we will let it out to the lowest bidder." That is monstrous.

Mr. STUART. I did not say that at all.

Mr. BROWN. That is the amount of it.

Mr. STUART. I do not say when he is elected Printer to Congress, that then Congress should take it away from him and have it done somewhere else; that is not the thing; that would be bad faith. It does not at all affect his contract. He was elected as Printer to Congress, but you are not obliged to make any amount of congressional printing; the congressional printing which you have ordered belongs to him; but the printing of the Executive Departments not at all. He can have that as it suits your pleasure.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am a little afraid, although it is not so intended, by any means, that this proposition will have the effect to defeat the whole thing in the House. You so change it that in the House all the interest and all the friends of the Public Printer would defeat what we have done. We are mixing up the Public Printer's interest and matters of contract. We made a quasi contract, or whatever you may be pleased to call it, with these gentlemen originally, without meddling with anybody. As the law stands now, it is a useful reform, so far as it goes; but, if you undertake to meddle with it in this way, connected with a matter which interferes with the public printing, we enlist, of course, against this amendment, all the feeling for the Public Printer, and all the influence that he can bring to bear upon the subject. Moreover, the public printing is very well regulated, and we are perfectly safe in leaving it in the condition in which it is now.

There is another point of view in which it does great injustice to the Public Printer. If it be true that the Public Printer, in order to get the office, has to give large fees, has to contract with A, B, C, D, E, and F, to share the plunder, he does it with reference to what he has got to do. It would be very unjust to him, under such circumstances, to deprive him of the little profit that remains to him. I understand that the contract is not by any means a profitable one. There is too little printing ordered to make it profitable, when you take into consideration what is paid for doing it. Let us have it all fair all around, and not enlist not only the Public Printer, but everybody who shares with him, and have him bringing a lawsuit claiming damages for a large amount. I think we had better not complicate the matter.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have listened with a great deal of pleasure to what the Senator from Maine has stated. I have been connected, as the Senate is aware, directly and immediately, as a member of the Committee on Printing of the Senate, with this particular subject, and I am very well aware myself, that if you introduce elements of this character you will introduce those that will be adversary and hostile to any effort of reformation. In regard to the particular matter we have been considering connected with the Post Office Department, if we adopt a proposition of this kind we adopt the most hostile movement we can towards that which we have done this afternoon. I do not believe that should be done. I do not believe that a man who is opposed to what we have done this evening could desire that the steps we have already taken should be defeated in the other House. Why? Because they do not take effect until after the 4th of March next; because, in the mean time, another session of Congress must occur, and because all interests, being united by the steps we now take, the very best intellects of each House will be brought to bear to mature a system and perfect a plan to settle the whole of this postage system.

Mr. GREEN. Mr. President—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. As you said to me, some days ago, I say, "Take your seat, sir." I regret very much to do it. I will yield to the Senator, however.

Mr. GREEN. I thought you were through. I merely wish to make this remark; we have had discussion enough here to prove that we need the previous question. I know of no parliamentary law which prohibits the application of that rule; and I ask for the previous question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I presume that the motion of the Senator from Missouri, with all the respect I have for him—and I certainly have very great—does not demand an answer from the Chair. I have listened, as I said before, to the remarks of the Senator from Maine; and I do think that the adoption of this proposition bears directly upon those who have the public printing.

I wish to state to the Senate in regard to the amendment directly, that it proposes to transfer all the printing of the Executive Departments. Under the law as it now stands, when printing goes to the Public Printer, it is not just and right to take it away from him. It goes to the Public Printer, and if you take it away from him you take away the opportunity on his part to comply with his contract, and give him good ground to come before you for damages afterwards. I think that when we have done that which places the whole subject in our power hereafter, we ought to be satisfied with it, and leave to the next Congress the power to set the whole system right, which the operation and action we have had this evening will certainly effect, without having disturbed or interfered with, or deranged our public business up to the 4th of March next.

I therefore hope and trust they will wait for the results of a resolution which was introduced in this body by the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis,] to know what was the effect of the change in our public printing on the part of our Executive Departments; that is to say, whether it costs more in being done by the Public Printer under existing laws, than it did when it was left to the Departments themselves to have that printing done. No report has been furnished to you, because the Committee on Printing have not been able to get the facts from the different Departments; and this is the only reason why you have not received an answer from that committee on the subject. I hope the amendment will not be adopted.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not propose to prolong this discussion, notwithstanding the call for the previous question. I wish to make an inquiry as to this particular amendment, whether the effect would or would not be—it strikes me in one sense, and may strike other Senators in another—if hereafter an application should be made for more Treasury notes, to require them to be printed by the lowest responsible bidder?

Mr. BIGLER. As I understand this amendment, it provides that the contract for the manufacture of Post Office stamps and stamped envelopes shall be hereafter given to the lowest responsible bidder. Now, as I understand the present condition of that business, the contract has been made in pursuance of laws now in existence, which contracts have two and a half or three years to run for supplying these blanks and stamps.

Mr. BROWN. If my friend will allow me, I will read a proviso I have drawn up, which I will move at the proper time, to add:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to affect any existing contract or rights of the present Printers of the Senate and the House of Representatives.

Mr. BIGLER. Then we had better vote down the amendment. It amounts to that.

Mr. BROWN. Very well.

Mr. PUGH. The mistake Senators have fallen into is, that a greater portion of it has not been executed.

Mr. BROWN. Then my proviso does not refer to that.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senator from Massachusetts will strike out all but that which gives express authority to have certain work done in Washington city. The post-bills and printing parchments can be done at Washington, not by the Printer, but done in the process specified in this act; and, in my judgment, the work will be done two thirds cheaper than by this process; and I hope the Senator will confine it to printing post-bills and the printing on parchment. Then we have no question about the Public Printer. He does not print a line of them—neither the Printer of the House nor of the Senate.

Mr. BROWN. I know he does not; but let me call the attention of the Senator from Ohio to the fact that you have subsisting contracts made under existing laws, which, by this amendment, you propose abruptly to violate. If you do it, as certain as the Senate meets again you will have claims for damages, heavy damages. Parties will come here and claim that they made preparations, at vast expense, to execute contracts which, by this amendment, you violate. Your Public Printers will say that they made vast outlays for material to fulfill a contract which was suddenly taken from them by this abrupt change of your law. What I propose, when it shall be in order, is that nothing in this act shall be so construed as to affect any present contract, or affect any right of the Public Printers elected by Congress. If they do that, let the whole thing go; but if you do not do that, I tell you, Mr. President, that you will be asked for more than a million dollars' damages done by this amendment. You have got contracts out now for printing blanks; you have contracts out, running for two or three years, to print stamped envelopes, and other contracts which it is proposed by the amendment abruptly to cut off without a moment's notice, and the result will be heavy bills of damages.

Mr. PUGH. I move to amend the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts by striking out all but the two things I have named.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is an amendment to the amendment now pending, offered by the Senator from Louisiana.

The amendment to the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SLIDELL. If that amendment be not adopted—

Mr. BROWN. Let me move my amendment.

Mr. SLIDELL. I understand that this subject has been reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It has not been; but by unanimous consent it can be received.

Mr. SLIDELL. It was reconsidered by unanimous consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Unanimous consent was given that the amendment should be offered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Unanimous consent was given to the Senator from Louisiana to offer his amendment.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move to reconsider the amendment as it stands. Unless it is reconsidered I shall vote against the original proposition.

The motion to reconsider was not agreed to.

Mr. BROWN. Is it in order now to move a proviso?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is not, except by unanimous consent.

Mr. BROWN. I offer the following:

Provided, That nothing in this section shall be so construed as to affect any existing contract or rights of the present Printers of the Senate and House of Representatives.

Mr. HUNTER. That is right. I hope there will be no objection to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the reception of the amendment?

Mr. PUGH. I object, unless the original amendment is reconsidered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, it cannot be offered.

Mr. BROWN. I notify Senators that they are voting for an amendment that will perhaps cost a million; certainly half a million. That will be the end of it.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time.

Mr. BROWN. I am so impressed with the importance of moving that proviso, that I move it as a separate section.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It cannot be done at this stage of the bill.

Mr. HUNTER. It is too late now. They will manage it in the House.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the passage of the bill.

Mr. COLLAMER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 30, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Clay, Clingman, Douglas, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mallory, Mason, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Yulee—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Brown, Collamer, Dixon, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hanlin, Kennedy, King, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—14.

So the bill was passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by

Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to some, and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had agreed to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate to the said bill, with an amendment, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford; and it was signed by the Vice President.

JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

The joint resolution from the House of Representatives (No. 37) in regard to carrying the United States mails from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, California, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

CHOCTAW LANDS.

The bill (H. R. No. 399) for the relief of certain purchasers of land within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830, was twice read by its title.

Mr. DAVIS. I would ask the consent of the Senate to consider that bill at this time. It relates to the entries of some persons who settled upon Choctaw land and purchased it at fifty cents an acre—it being held to be land which had been thirty years in market; but it was afterwards ruled that eight of those thirty years it had been withdrawn from sale, and therefore it was not esteemed as land thirty years in market, and thus a difficulty of that kind was created. The Commissioner of the General Land Office and the Secretary of the Interior have recommended the bill which has been passed by the House. It was reported unanimously by the committee of the House, and the Representative of the district in which the land lies, being a district in the State of Mississippi, who has paid particular attention to it, gave me a history of it, which I will not detain the Senate by reciting, but which, I am sure, would satisfy every one, if I did, that the bill ought to be passed, and I hope it will pass now.

Mr. STUART. I think the Senate passed a bill at the last Congress for this purpose.

Mr. DAVIS. Not exactly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to the consideration of the bill?

Mr. HUNTER. I shall not object if the Senator consent, should it lead to debate, to lay it down.

Mr. DAVIS. I will.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

LAND CLAIMS IN NEW MEXICO.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to postpone the prior orders for the purpose of taking up the bill for the collection of the revenue.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Before that is done, I will ask the Senator from Virginia to permit me to pass a little bill in which the public are much interested, and which will prevent the loss of a great deal of public money. There can be no debate upon it at all. I will state, in a word, what it is.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall not object to it if the Senator will agree to lay it down should it cause debate.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Undoubtedly. There has been a bill passed, by the House of Representatives, to-day, at the request of the Interior Department, for the purpose of confirming the titles of certain pueblos, in New Mexico, which are now being encroached upon by the whites in the neighborhood, and it is feared that it will lead to war. The Committee on Private Land Claims have examined these land claims, and no possible objection, I think, can be made to the bill. I am instructed by the Committee on Private Land Claims to report the bill back with two small amendments, and ask for its present consideration.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 565) to confirm the land claims of certain pueblos and towns in the Territory of New Mexico; which the Secretary proceeded to read.

The original bill proposed to confirm the pueblo land claims in the Territory of New Mexico, designated in the corrected lists as: A, pueblo of Jemes, in the county of Santa Ana; B, pueblo of Acoma, in the county of Valencia; C, pueblo of San Juan, in the county of Rio Arriba; D, pueblo of Picaris, in the county of Taos; E, pueblo of San Felipe, in the county of Bernalillo; F, pueblo of Pecos, in the county of San Miguel; G, pueblo of Cochili, in the county of Santa Ana; H, pueblo of Santa Domingo, in the county of Santa Ana; I, pueblo of Taos, in the county of Taos; K, pueblo of Santa Clara, in the county of Rio Arriba; L, pueblo of Tesuque, in the county of Santa Fe; M, pueblo of San Ildefonso, in the county of Santa Fe; N, pueblo of Pojuaque, in the county of Santa Fe; reported upon favorably by the surveyor general of New Mexico, in his report of the 30th of September, 1856, to the Department of the Interior, and the claim designated as O, pueblo of Zia, in the county of Santa Ana; P, pueblo of Sandia, in the county of Bernalillo; Q, pueblo of Isleta, in the county of Bernalillo; R, (supposed) pueblo of Nambe; reported upon favorably by the surveyor general, on the 30th of January, 1857; also, the claim number seven, of the town of Tecolote, in the county of San Miguel; number eleven, of the town of Chilli, in the county of Bernalillo; and number thirteen, of the town of Belen, in the county of Valencia; reported for the favorable action of Congress by the surveyor general, on the 30th of September, 1857. The Commissioner of the Land Office is to issue the necessary instructions for the survey of all these claims, as recommended for confirmation by the surveyor general, and cause a patent to issue therefor as in ordinary cases to private individuals. This confirmation is only to be construed as a relinquishment of all title and claim of the United States to any of the lands, and is not to affect any adverse valid rights, should such exist.

Mr. HUNTER. If we take it on faith, what is the use of reading the bill?

Mr. BENJAMIN. There is no use in reading the bill, but only the amendments.

Mr. STUART. I want to hear the amendments read.

The Secretary read the amendments of the committee. The first was, after the words "fifty-seven," in line thirty-seven, to insert:

Also, the claim No. 2, of the town of Tome, reported upon favorably by the surveyor general of New Mexico, in his report of the 30th of September, 1856, to the Department of the Interior.

Also, the claim No. 29, of the town of Casa Colorado, reported upon favorably by the surveyor general of New Mexico, in his report of the 31st of December, 1856, to the Department of the Interior.

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in line twenty-seven, to strike out the words "30th of January, 1857," and insert in lieu thereof, "30th of November, 1856."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was, in line twenty-nine, to change the word "Tecolote" to "Tecolote."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Those amendments are to correct mistakes in the House bill.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. TRUMBULL. As the Senator from Virginia seems to be in a good humor, if he will give us a moment to breathe between these appropriation bills, I ask him to allow me to take up a little bill (H. R. No. 538) to confirm a land claim.

Mr. HUNTER. I will give way between this and the next appropriation bill. I have one to come after this.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That will answer just as well.

Mr. BRODERICK. I wish to make a motion to reconsider the vote on the Post Office appropriation bill, for the purpose of allowing two gentlemen who are absent, to vote on the amendment raising the price of postage from three to five cents. I shall not change my vote in favor of raising it to five cents.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator simply desire the motion entered?

Mr. BRODERICK. I want to give those Senators an opportunity of voting.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senators can state how they would have voted if they had been present. It cannot be necessary to postpone everything by again considering that bill.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am satisfied.

Mr. HUNTER. I am sure they will be satisfied to get up and state how they would vote if they had had an opportunity.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. HUNTER. I am instructed by the Committee on Finance to offer this amendment as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to discontinue all ports of delivery, the revenue received at which does not amount to the sum of $10,000.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. WILSON. I have an amendment to offer. I move to strike out the two first sections of the bill, after the enacting clause, and insert a substitute. The sections which I move to strike out are in these words:

"That, instead of the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the half year, from the 1st day of January, 1858, to the 1st day of July, 1858, contained in the joint resolution approved on the 14th day of February, 1850, there be, and hereby is, appropriated for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for said half year, the sum of $1,600,000, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, together with such sums as may be received from storage, cartage, drayage, and labor said half year."

"Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, annually appropriated for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each and every fiscal year, from the 1st day of July, 1858, the sum of $4,000,000, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, until otherwise ordered by law, together with such sums as may be received from storage, cartage, drayage, and labor, for each fiscal year: Provided, That from and after the said 1st day of July, 1858, all laws and parts of laws which authorize the payment of the expenses or any portion of the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs to any port or ports on the Pacific coast of the United States out of the accruing revenue, before the same is paid into the Treasury, shall be, and hereby are, repealed."

And I move to insert the following:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, the sum of $1,500,000, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, together with such sums as may be received from storage, cartage, and labor for said half year.

And be it further enacted, That from and after the said 1st day of July, 1858, all laws and parts of laws which authorize the payment of the expenses, or any portion of the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, to any port or ports on the Pacific coast of the United States, out of the accruing revenue before the same is paid into the Treasury, shall be, and hereby are, repealed.

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot understand that amendment. There was so much noise that I could not hear it read. I should like to hear it read again, if the Chair can keep order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair would remind Senators that more than half the Senate are now engaged in conversation, and consequently amendments have to be read three or four times for the benefit of Senators.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Chair will suspend business until quiet is restored.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will have the amendment again read. It has been read, but the chairman of the Committee on Finance could not hear it.

The Secretary again read it.

Mr. HUNTER. The bill which comes from the House repeals that, and requires the revenue bill to be in payment of expenses paid out.

Mr. WILSON. Mr. President, I know how precious are the minutes of the closing hours of the session, and no one is less disposed than myself to consume by words these crowded moments which should be given to deeds. Reluctant as I am to claim the attention of the Senate, I am nev-

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

FRIDAY, JUNE 11, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 182.

ertheless constrained to ask its indulgence, while I briefly explain the amendments I have proposed.

By the act of February, 1850, the expenses for collecting the revenue east of the Rocky Mountains, on the Canadian frontiers, on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, were limited to $1,225,000 semi-annually—$2,450,000 annually. This act of 1850 was pressed through both Houses of Congress during the first year of General Taylor's administration, under the lead of gentlemen now high in the councils and confidence of the present Administration. This sum of $2,450,000 for the collection of the revenues on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, was then deemed most ample, if not extravagant, by Mr. Thompson, the Secretary of the Interior, then a member of the House, and the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER], and other gentlemen, who now propose to repeal that act, and take off the limitations imposed by it, and appropriate $4,000,000 annually for the collection of the customs. The Secretary of the Treasury, whose name as Speaker of the House was affixed to the act of 1850, now asks the repeal of that act, and the chairman of the Committee on Finance reports this House bill which repeals the restriction act, and sets apart $4,000,000 for the collection of the revenues hereafter.

I now propose, Mr. President, to strike out the first two sections of the bill, which repeal the act of 1850, and appropriate $4,000,000 for the collection of the customs; and I propose to insert two sections, appropriating $1,500,000 semi-annually, or $3,000,000 annually, for the collection of the revenue, and also to require the revenues collected on the Pacific coast to be paid into the Treasury before the expenses of the collection are deducted therefrom. If my amendments prevail, if they shall receive the sanction of both Houses of Congress, $1,000,000 less will be appropriated—$1,000,000 will thus be annually saved in the collection of the customs. The expenses of collecting the revenue can be, should be, and Congress ought to say to the Secretary of the Treasury shall be, kept within $3,000,000. The customs can now be collected for less than three million dollars. One thousand men can be discharged, and ought to be discharged, from the now overcrowded custom-houses. The public interests and the public morals will in no respect suffer if Congress shall require the Secretary of the Treasury to promptly dismiss from the public service men who have been crowded into the packed custom-houses—not to perform actual, necessary duties, but as a reward to them for services rendered elsewhere, or to keep them in pay, ready to perform services in the future.

Your system of collecting revenue, Mr. President, is full of the grossest abuses. Your custom-houses are reeking with corruption. These scandalous abuses and this reeking corruption have been nursed, fostered, and protected by the Treasury Department during the five past years, and that, too, in violation of the law of 1850. Law has been disregarded; hundreds of thousands of dollars beyond the limitations of the act of 1850 have been squandered to support in the Department men crowded into it as the reward for party fealty and party services; and now, when your Treasury is empty, when your Administration is borrowing tens of millions beyond its income, the Secretary of the Treasury, instead of reducing the expenses of collecting the revenue within the legal limits of the act of 1850, by discharging the hundreds of supernumerary officers, thrust into the revenue service to fatten upon the Treasury, comes to these Halls and asks Congress to grant him $4,000,000 to keep up this wretched system, created for corrupt ends and used for corrupt purposes. I am amazed that the House of Representatives should respond to the demands of the Secretary of the Treasury by sending this bill here, and I am amazed, too, that the Finance Committee should report this bill to the Senate, and that the chairman of the committee should consent to stand on this floor as the champion of this bill, which grants $4,000,000 of the public money to keep up the shameless abuses of your system of revenue collection.

I have spoken, Mr. President, of the shameless abuses which have grown up in our system of collecting the customs, under the fostering hands of the past and present Administrations. A recurrence to facts will give the Senate and the country some faint conception of these abuses, and of the way they have been nursed and cherished by the men now in power, by the leaders of that Democracy which ever prates of economy, retrenchment, and reform.

The expenses of collecting the revenue on the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, in all the country east of the Rocky Mountains, were $2,000,000 annually during the four years of the administrations of Taylor and Fillmore. The act of 1850 allowed the administrations of Taylor and Fillmore to expend $2,450,000 annually in the collection of the customs, exclusive of all the expenses on the Pacific coast. Those Administrations, denounced by that Democracy which always talks economy when out of power and always practices extravagance when in power, saved $1,623,000; or rather, those Administrations did not expend what the act of 1850 allowed them to expend by $1,623,000. Mr. Corwin turned over to his successor, Mr. Guthrie, this $1,623,000, which he had refused to squander upon officials in the revenue service.

With this rich legacy of $1,623,000 from the outgoing Administration, the Pierce administration entered, on the 1st of July, 1853, on its first financial year. At one bound that Administration carried its expenditures for the customs on the Atlantic coasts up, not only to the amount allowed by the act of 1850, but beyond that amount more than two hundred thousand dollars. On went the Pierce administration, and up, up went its expenditures for the collection of the revenue, until its closing year carried the expenses to $3,162,000, nearly one million two hundred thousand dollars more than the average annual expenses of the administrations of Taylor and Fillmore. The average annual expenses of the collection of customs on the Atlantic coasts, during the Democratic administration of President Pierce, exceeded two million nine hundred thousand dollars, being $900,000 annually more than the average annual expenses of the four preceding years.

The legacy of $1,623,000 received from the Fillmore administration was expended in excess of the unusual amount of $2,450,000 allowed by the act of 1850, and $70,000 more, making, during the four years, $1,690,000 more than the act of 1850 allowed for the collection of the revenue east of the Rocky Mountains. The Pierce administration added more than six hundred and thirty men to the force employed in the custom-houses on the Atlantic; three hundred and forty-six men were added to the force in the New York custom-house, thus increasing the annual expenses more than three hundred thousand dollars in that city. The Pierce administration expired in 1857, having added more than six hundred men to the revenue service on the Atlantic coast, and increased the expenses of collecting the customs annually more than nine hundred thousand dollars in this section of the Union.

Sir, the present Administration must be considered as the extension, the promulgation of the Pierce dynasty. The same policy is continued, the abuses, the corruptions, the extravagances of the system are nursed, fostered, and cherished, with the same hearty zeal by the present Administration. And the fruits of this mad policy are before us, in an expenditure for the first year of about three million three hundred thousand dollars in the Atlantic ports, and in this demand for $4,000,000 to meet the expenses of the system for the coming year. The expenses of collecting the revenue on the Pacific coast last year were about four hundred and sixty thousand dollars, and we are told that they will be reduced this year to about three hundred thousand dollars. Therefore, the Secretary of the Treasury asks for the repeal of the act of 1850, limiting the expenses on the Atlantic to $2,450,000, so that he can have $3,700,000 to expend, during the coming year, on this side of the continent—$1,700,000 more than the average expenses of the four years of the administration of Taylor and Fillmore. Can extravagance and profligacy go further?

This addition, Mr. President, during the past five years of more than six hundred men to the revenue force on the eastern slope of the Rocky Mountains, this addition of $1,500,000 to the annual expenses of collecting the customs on this side of the continent, will give the Senate and the country some faint conception of the extravagances and corruptions which have been nursed, fostered, and cherished by the Democratic party during the five years past. And now, sir, in this time of general depression in all the business interests of the country; when labor is neither fully employed nor adequately rewarded, when the Government is forced to issue millions of Treasury notes and to borrow millions of dollars to meet its current expenses, when private claims are thrust aside, and river and harbor improvements suffered to go to ruin, to the danger of life and property; when every interest of the people is remorselessly sacrificed for want of money, the Secretary of the Treasury comes to the Halls of Congress, not with a matured plan for the reduction of the expenses of collecting the customs within the limits now allowed by law, but with a proposition to repeal the act of 1850, to increase the expenses of collecting the customs by hundreds of thousands, even over the last year of President Pierce's administration, when the Treasury was overflowing and the revenues larger by millions than they now are. And this demand of the Treasury Department has been responded to by the House of Representatives, under the lead of the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means; and the Committee on Finance have reported this measure to the Senate, and the chairman of the committee [Mr. HUNTER] stands ready to give this bill his support and the influence of his name and position. The country will not fail to see and to note this ill-timed proposition to squander the public money upon Government officials and political favorites—men put into office, not because the public service needed them, but because they needed public office.

Now, Mr. President, I want the Senate to understand—I want the Administration to understand, that the country clearly comprehends the scope and intent of this measure—that the people know this to be simply an office-holder's measure. Yes, sir, this is a simple proposition to make it legal for Secretary Cobb to expend some twelve hundred thousand dollars more than the law now allows him to expend for the collection of the customs in the Atlantic and Gulf ports. This is the whole purpose of this bill—nothing more, nothing less. Let Senators not deceive themselves. Let them remember that this measure is simply an office-holder's measure, that there is nothing in it about the Mormon war, nothing about British outrages in the waters of the southern Gulf, nothing in it about the defense of the interests of the country. Let them remember that it is only a proposition, a bald and naked proposition, to squander annually upon custom-house officials, beyond the amount now allowed by law, not less than one million dollars of the $15,000,000 we have just authorized the Government to borrow. Let them remember this, and then let them vote for it if they had rather incur the displeasure of the people than the perpetual importunities of Mr. Secretary Cobb.

I do not hesitate, Mr. President, to avow here on the floor of the Senate the opinion that Mr. Secretary Cobb merits the censure of the country for his management of the collection of the revenue during the past year. When he assumed the duties of his office he knew the act of 1850, which his own hand had signed, limited the expenses of collecting the customs on the Atlantic side of the country to $2,450,000. He knew, too, that the whole legacy of $1,623,000 bequeathed by Mr. Corwin to his successor had been expended by that successor. He knew that the revenues would be diminished by the provisions of the tariff act of March, 1857, and he knew that he could reduce, that he ought to reduce, and that he should reduce, the number of persons employed in the collection of the revenues. Instead of making the needed reduction, instead of devising some plan for the reduction of the expenses of that branch of the public service, he demands the repeal of the law of 1850, and complacently assures Congress that the expenses of collecting the customs in 1859, when they will be millions less than they were in 1857, will be hundreds of thousands more than they were even in that year—that the expenses will not be less than four million dollars. This is indeed an extraordinary proposition to come from the head of the Treasury Department, at this time, and under existing circumstances. The proposition itself partially reveals to the country the extent of the influences exerted by these custom-house retainers over the Administration; they serve, only to control. It now remains to be seen, sir, whether their influences are as potent over Congress as they are shown to have been over the executive department of the Government. The House has submitted to their demands, and we are now to see if the Senate will yield to their will.

But I may be asked, Mr. President, how the Secretary of the Treasury could reduce the expenses of collecting the revenue to the amount allowed by existing laws? I answer: let him discharge at once the six hundred men crowded into the service from 1852 to 1857. Let him go further, and discharge one third of the present force employed in the custom-houses; by so doing, he can reduce the expenses not less than the $1,000,000 he now asks for. Let him discharge the three hundred and forty-six men added to the too large force in the New York custom-house, since 1852, at an annual expense of nearly four hundred thousand dollars. Enough would remain to perform promptly the duties of the office to the satisfaction of the country. Perhaps the remaining officials of the port of New York would have less time, if their force should be reduced one third, to attend to the elections, to take care of the political affairs of Mr. HASKIN's district, or to engage again in the pastime of bearing through the streets of the commercial metropolis of America a coffin with the name blazoned upon it of HORACE F. CLARK, the independent and inflexible Representative, who could not be seduced by the blandishments of power, or driven by their fierce denunciations, to vote for the Lecompton bill of the Senator from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN,] or the English swindle. Let the Secretary turn to the Canadian frontiers, Oswego, Niagara, Buffalo, Plattsburg, and Burlington, to New England, to Boston, Salem, Marblehead, Newburyport, Portsmouth, Belfast, Wiscasset, Barnstable, New Bedford, and New Haven, to Perth Amboy, Philadelphia, Wilmington, Baltimore, and the districts of the South and West, and to the ports on the shores of the Pacific, and he will readily find, wherever he turns his glance, opportunities to discharge supernumerary officers, and to reduce exorbitant expenses.

Sir, the Secretary will find, as he surveys the field, on every hand evidences of gross abuses, of reeking corruptions. He will find at Niagara nineteen men employed at an expense of $12,000 to collect $8,000; at Oswego twenty-three men at $18,000 to collect $6,000; at Buffalo twenty men at $17,000 to collect $10,000; at Plattsburg twenty-six men at $14,000 to collect $18,000; at Burlington thirty-three men at $16,000 to collect $8,500; at Wiscasset eight men at $7,000 to collect $130; at Portsmouth twenty-one men at $11,000 to collect $5,500; at Newburyport thirteen men at $6,200 to collect $9,900; at Marblehead nine men at $2,200 to collect $250; at New Bedford fourteen men at $7,500 to collect $4,800; at Perth Amboy thirteen men at $4,500 to collect $1,500; at Norfolk twenty-three men at $49,000 to collect $61,000; at Ocracoke seven men at $2,000 to collect $82; at Toledo seven men at $4,400 to collect $567; at Detroit ten men at $3,600 to collect $495; at San Francisco one hundred and thirty-four men at $402,000 to collect $1,580,000; at Benicia three men at $4,400 to collect $2,300; at Stockton one man at $3,100 to collect $143; at Sacramento one man at $3,600 to collect $402; at San Diego four men at $7,600 to collect $3,011; at Monterey three men at $7,950 to collect $45; at San Pedro three men at $4,200 to collect $304. The Secretary, without further legislation, can cut off many of these abuses, without detriment to the public interests, or inconvenience to the people. I do not hesitate to declare here, and now, that the Secretary of the Treasury can discharge one third of the men employed in the collection of the revenue, and so reorganize the system that he can reduce the cost of collection more than one million dollars, and this without detriment to the interests of the Government or the people.

Adopt, Mr. President, the amendments I have proposed, limit the expenditures for the collection of the revenue to $3,000,000, tell Mr. Secretary Cobb that he can, he must, and he shall, so reorganize the system that the revenues can be collected for the $3,000,000 we have appropriated. Let the Senate, let both Houses of Congress do this, and the Secretary will obey the embodied will of Congress, and a needed reform will be inaugurated, and many flagrant abuses and much corruption will be arrested. It is in the power of the Senate, this day, to rebuke this extravagance, to reform these abuses, to dry up the welling fountains of this corruption; and all this it can do by adopting the amendment I have proposed, limiting the appropriation for the next fiscal year to $3,000,000, thus compelling the Secretary to enter at once upon a comprehensive system of economy in the collection of the customs.

The issue is made up—Senators cannot avoid it. They must meet it here and now. Shall the demands of Mr. Secretary Cobb be assented to by Congress, or shall retrenchment and reform be now introduced into the revenue service? The issue is between continued extravagance, abuse, and corruption on one side, and the proposed economy, retrenchment, and reform, on the other. This issue must be met on this question, here, in the Senate of the United States, on this the 10th day of June, 1858. Let honorable Senators look well to the record they make up; for the searching eye of the American people will rest upon that record.

I propose, Mr. President, to add an additional section to the bill, reducing the salaries of the revenue officers in California to the New York standard. It costs the Government thirty per cent. to collect the revenue in California, and this enormous expense is incurred in part by the extravagant salaries paid to the officers employed. These salaries were fixed at a time when the imports into California were large, and at a time when the cost of living there was very great.

Now, we are told by the Senator from California [Mr. BRODERICK] that the cost of living in that State is not greater than in this city. In spite of the great reduction in the expenses of living there, these exorbitant salaries continue to be paid, and no demand comes from the Treasury Department for the reduction of these salaries, or for the dismissal of the supernumerary officials quartered upon the revenue service in California. The cost of collecting the $1,600,000 of revenue in that State should not exceed $150,000 annually. At San Francisco one hundred and thirty-four men are employed at enormous salaries to collect $1,600,000 of revenue. Fifty men, at salaries fifty per cent. lower than are now paid to them, could perform the duties required in that collection district.

In the commercial metropolis of the Republic, where two thirds of the customs of the nation are collected, the collector, the responsible head of more than eleven hundred men, has a salary of $6,400—in San Francisco the collector has $10,400. The deputy collector in New York has $2,500; the deputy collector in San Francisco has $4,000; the naval officer has $4,950 in New York, in San Francisco he has $8,000; the surveyor $4,900 in New York, in San Francisco $7,000. There are four appraisers in the great port of New York, with salaries of $2,500 each; there are three appraisers at San Francisco, with salaries of $6,000 each. Weighers, gaugers, inspectors, clerks, and laborers have salaries from fifty to one hundred per cent. higher in San Francisco than in the city of New York. Now, sir, I propose, by this additional section, to reduce the salaries of the custom-house officials in California to the New York standard. If this amendment shall receive the sanction of the Senate, if it shall be sustained in the House of Representatives, it will save to the Treasury from one hundred to two hundred thousand dollars, now squandered in extortionate salaries on the Pacific coast.

We are accustomed, Mr. President, to hear in these Chambers professions of economy, retrenchment, and reform. This is one of those opportunities when our professions can be wrought into acts, when our words can be hardened into deeds. It now remains to be seen whether, in this time of general depression, we shall imitate the example set us by the people of the country of every profession and calling, by farmers and mechanics, by merchants and professional men of every condition, and reduce our extravagant expenditures, or whether we will not only continue our profigate expenditures, but go on to increase them. Let honorable Senators look well to the votes they now give. Whatever others may do, I shall vote to limit the expenditures for the collection of the revenues of the country, although by so doing I may incur the displeasure of Mr. Secretary Cobb, and the hostility of his pet official favorites, who are greedy to devour the $4,000,000 he now demands of this Congress for them.

Mr. HUNTER. Of course it is my purpose to say as little as possible in explanation of this bill. The estimate made by the Secretary of the Treasury of what the collection of the revenue would probably cost annually (that is, upon the present scale of expenditure) is $4,000,000. There is, I know, a little margin. He has sent us a table, beginning with 1850 and ending with 1857. It appears that the collection of customs on the Atlantic coast has grown from $1,966,000 in 1850, up to $3,162,000. Upon the Atlantic coast, under existing laws, all customs were paid into the Treasury before the expenses of collecting the revenue were taken out; but on the California coast they were paid out of the revenue, and the net sum deposited in the Treasury. On the California coast in 1852 it was $1,316,000, but we have been gradually reducing it since, until in 1857 it had been reduced to $464,344. The Senator from California [Mr. GWIN] tells me that the last three quarters show a still greater reduction. Two hundred and eighty-nine thousand five hundred dollars is the expense of collecting the revenue of the last three quarters, as he tells me, from tables made at the Treasury Department. It is found that the sum total for collecting the revenue for the year 1857, on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, amounted to something like $3,600,000. The Secretary of the Treasury asks for $4,000,000, which of course, leaves some margin, but it is to be remembered this is a permanent appropriation. It has been found most expedient to make these appropriations permanent in order to avoid the delays which are incident on the passage of our appropriation bills. The means of paying the expenses of collecting the revenue must always be at hand and within the reach of the Treasury Department.

With regard to the enormous expense, I admit at once it is too much. I believe it ought to be reduced. I believe it has reached the present extent as much through the fault of Congress as from any other cause. We have multiplied the ports of delivery; we have thus added expenses to collecting the revenue which do not belong to it; and in order to reach that, the Committee on Finance reported an amendment, which has been adopted, allowing the Secretary of the Treasury to discontinue ports of delivery at which the revenue collected was less than ten thousand dollars. I know, however, that the Secretary of the Treasury means to take up this subject. He is called upon to do so by the last section of this bill as it comes from the House; and I believe he will endeavor to apply the knife and reduce the expenditure as far as is consistent with the absolute necessities of the public service. Some of those expenses were entailed upon the Department, not at their request, in times past. They are unnecessary; but they are here, and we have to meet them. There are, I believe, more revenue-cutters, a larger revenue service than we ought to keep up. This is not all: we forced on the Treasury Department a steam revenue-cutter for the port of New York—the expense of which is three or four times greater than a sail vessel; and we shall have applications from other ports. Unless Congress shall aid the Secretary in his efforts to diminish the expenses of collecting the revenue, it will be impossible for them to do it to the whole extent to which it ought to be reduced, and may be reduced consistently to the wants of the public service.

I believe, then, under the circumstances, that it is necessary for the present to allow him the sum which he asks, and to apply ourselves hereafter to cut off and frown down these excesses and abuses which have, I believe, crept into the expenses of collecting the revenue. I believe there are too many officers. I believe there are too many ports of delivery. I believe that the revenue service is larger than it ought to be; and I trust much to the future efforts of the Secretary of the Treasury to reduce these things when he can do it under the present laws, and to point out to Congress where they may do it, when it will be necessary to require the assistance of new legislation. Until then, I am ready to pass this bill, and I hope we shall vote down the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to state, in reference to what the Senator from Massachusetts said in regard to the collection districts in California, that, when the State was first admitted into the Union, the country had been so recently settled that it was not known to what points foreign commerce would go; and there were several districts established with the expectation that they would be important commercial points; but subsequently it has turned out that they have not collected the revenue that was anticipated; and it was proposed by a former Secretary of the Treasury to abolish these districts. That bill failed during the last Congress. I do not think it would be objected to by anybody if we could get a revenue system to abolish some of those districts which were originally established under the expectation that large foreign commerce would go to those points. So far as I am concerned, whenever the system is brought up, as I have no doubt it will be at the next session of Congress, I hope those districts referred to will be abolished, and turned into surveyors' districts. In addition, that is a very expensive coast. At some of those points it is necessary to keep up an efficient system to prevent smuggling; and while there is not much revenue collected, there is a large amount saved by preventing smuggling, which would otherwise have taken place.

Mr. WILSON. The Senator from Virginia tells us that it is best to vote this amendment down, and that we shall sustain the Secretary of the Treasury in his future plans for the reduction of the expenses of collecting the revenue. The average expenses for that purpose, during General Pierce's administration were about $3,300,000, and you want now to carry the expenditures up to $4,000,000. Instead of retrenchment, we have got a positive increase of more than ten per cent. proposed by the Secretary, and sustained, I am sorry to see, by the chairman of the Committee on Finance.

Now, a word or two in answer to the Senator from California, about the expenses of the Pacific coast—

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him, for I do not mean to reply?

Mr. WILSON. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. I would say to him, if it were an annual appropriation, I should deem it but justice not to appropriate more for the next year than we expended in the last. It must be remembered, however, that this is one of the permanent and indefinite appropriations that lasts through a term of years, and therefore we have to allow a margin, in order to meet any future increased expenditure.

Mr. WILSON. This proposition for each and every fiscal year has permanency in it. It repeals the old law of limitation of 1850.

Mr. HUNTER. That was a permanent appropriation too; but it was not enough. That was only $2,500,000.

Mr. WILSON. I know it. It was $2,500,000; but it cost but $2,000,000 a year for the four years. It has been carried up, I believe, unnecessarily.

Mr. BRODERICK. I do not rise for the purpose of defending the officers. I believe their compensation is too high, but I would remind the Senator from Massachusetts that it is idle for him to insist upon his amendment, because the other House of Congress has sent us a bill raising the fees of officers in California fifty per cent. It is now upon the table of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. What bill is that?

Mr. BRODERICK. A bill which came from the House the day before yesterday to raise the fees of district attorneys, marshals, witnesses, and jurors, fifty per cent. Now, I ask the Senator from Massachusetts what chance is there to get his amendment through the House, if it should pass the Senate? I suppose a committee of conference would refuse to reduce these salaries. We are put to the trouble, therefore, of occupying the best portion of this night with this subject, while we could devote it to better business. If the Senator will consent to let the amendment lie over until the next session, I will go with him for a reduction of the salaries of those officers. I will not go for so great a reduction as he has recommended, though I think they ought to be reduced. But I rose only for the purpose of reminding the Senate that there is a bill now upon its table, proposing to raise the pay of officers in California fifty per cent., and here we are discussing the propriety of reducing them fifty per cent.

Mr. GREEN. I have but a word to say. The bill to which the Senator from California alludes, is one relating entirely to the courts, for it has been found impossible to compel the attendance of witnesses at the present ordinary compensation allowed under the general pay law. It but restores the law in regard to California, to what it was before the 28th of February, 1857. It was the law up to that period of time, when it expired by its own limitation, and by neglect was not renewed.

But, enough of that; it will be time enough to discuss it when it comes up. I agree with the Senator from Massachusetts, that the expense of collecting the revenue is most exorbitant, and it ought to be reduced. As an initiative step to that reduction, I proposed a resolution, which is now upon the Secretary's desk, believing that we ought to proceed systematically, asking the Secretary of the Treasury to report certain facts at the beginning of the next session of this Congress, when the subject can be taken up and the reduction be made not only as low, but perhaps lower, than has been intimated by the Senator from Massachusetts. There are many collection districts, as I know the facts will prove, where the annual expense is $7,500, where the cost of erecting buildings has been $3,500, and where the annual amount received in duties is $130. In other collection districts, where the annual expense is $12,500, and the cost of erecting buildings $75,000, the annual amount received is $2,300, and so on. Much of this can be reformed. I desire to proceed with that system of reform by which we shall be enabled to correct evils, and not to strike down the effectiveness of the service, for of necessity there must be some collection districts as a prevention of fraud. There may be a necessity for custom-houses, and all the paraphernalia necessary to keep them up, and yet the only public good they subserve is to prevent dishonesty; to prevent dishonesty a revenue cutter must be constantly plying about that port; but to strike out the appropriation in gross, leaving the present collection districts all in existence, leaving the present laws just as they are, will just leave the necessity for a higher appropriation in a deficiency bill at a subsequent session.

Therefore, I shall vote for the bill as it comes from the committee; but I shall insist upon taking up that resolution, and I shall coöperate with the Senator to collect all the facts in regard to these collection districts and supernumerary officers, to cut off all unnecessary expenditures, to bring them in a proper compass, to subserve the public good, and yet protect the public interest. Why, sir, in California, there may be a necessity for a large expenditure, but it looks large when we speak in gross terms, only about a million and a half received and $440,000 expended, and then comes special ports where a preventive force is required. That is expensive. In the little port of St. Louis, where we collect from eight hundred thousand to one million dollars, it only costs you $16,500 a year. There is economy; and a similar system of economy can be superinduced, I trust, all over this Union.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I have not said much on these bills, and I shall not say much now. I confess I am not startled at the facts to which we are referred by the Senator who offers this amendment. The extravagance is so manifest and so glaring that it is impossible to hear it without surprise. It is difficult always to reform. We know that. There is a reluctance. It touches individuals; it seems to them to be exceedingly inimical, and there is a natural dislike to doing it. Our judgments approve of reform, but we naturally desire to postpone it. We desire to do it at a more convenient time, when we shall have more opportunity of looking into it; and we are referred to the next session. The next is a short session, and there will be much business to do. I doubt whether we shall be more prepared to act on the subject then than we are now. It is a subject on which we cannot act in detail well. The details belong to the executive power of the Government; but we can say to them, judging of the sum from experience, "this sum shall be allowed for the collection of the revenue, and no more; you must, therefore, bring the expense of collection within the sum we prescribe." That is the only general limit in our power to prescribe; and I am for prescribing a limit which seems to me to be liberal enough, and which shall compel some degree of reform in the mean time.

I approve, therefore, this amendment, believing that it is an abundant sum to pay for all the labor and services in the collection of the revenue. Sir, all the labor of the country has gone down. Is official labor the only labor which we will appreciate, and to which we will give high wages, and increased wages?—for these $4,000,000 will be an increase, as I understand it, upon the gross annual expenditure that has ever been made for the collection of the revenue. My friend from Virginia acknowledges that $4,000,000 is too much, and he proposes that at some future time we shall investigate it and reform it. The best time to reform it is now, when it is discovered, made known, and palpably seen. There can be no excuse for postponing it. We can as well pass this measure limiting the expense, as we can pass an original bill. It takes no more time. I can see, then, no reason why we ought not to do it now.

The inequality of salaries in one part of our country and another part of our country, where there is now, whatever there may have been in former times, no difference in the cost of living, is enormous. We must blush to answer the inquiries that our constituents would make of us, why this thing is so? We ought to increase the wages given to our officers of collection at New York, or we ought to diminish them in California. Who says we ought to increase them? Nobody. All agree, una voce, that reduction is the word, and that we now spend too much money. The executive Government can collect, I believe, without a doubt, the revenue for $3,000,000 instead of $4,000,000; and, if it turns out that we are mistaken in this calculation, let me tell gentlemen what we can do at the next session of Congress, that is but half a year off: we can then increase it if we find an absolute necessity for it. If, as gentlemen suppose, we shall have time to investigate the matter, and if, upon that investigation, we shall discover that we have made too narrow a limit, we can extend it. In the mean time, no gentleman will say but that $4,000,000 is an extravagant sum to allow for this service. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be adopted.

Mr. GREEN. I think the Senator from Kentucky misconceived the spirit of my remarks. I concur with him and the Senator from Massachusetts that a reduction ought to be made.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. So I understood.

Mr. GREEN. The latter part of his remarks tends very much to reconcile me to the limitation of $3,000,000, because I know, on a scrutiny and examination, $3,000,000 will not only be ample, but more than enough. There is no question about that.

But the Senator was mistaken in one remark, that, by indicating to them a certain limit, and saying, "thus far shalt thou go, and no further," they will be restrained and it will prevent the expenditure of any more; that here they must stop. Until 1848, there never was an appropriation to pay the expense of the collection of the revenue upon customs. Every officer got his fees, and paid in the net revenue; but in 1848, Mr. McKay, of North Carolina, brought in a bill requiring the gross revenue, including even cartage, to be paid into the Treasury, and then to make an appropriation to pay the expenses of collecting the revenue. The first appropriation made was $1,750,000, and that was for the fiscal year commencing the 1st of July, 1849. He based it on the expenditure for the preceding year. That fiscal year ended the 30th of June, 1850. It was a long session; and at the termination of the fiscal year, they asked for a deficiency of $750,000. Here was a limitation imposed, specially and strictly imposed, and yet the Administration—I impute no fault to anybody—went $750,000 beyond that limitation, and we appropriated the money.

Therefore the prescription of a certain limit does not necessarily restrain them. I think the better plan is to take up a revenue system in detail, and abolish every collection district that is unnecessary, either to prevent fraud or collect revenue. By taking this systematic course we can bring it down within the limit of less than three million dollars, and as the Senator from Kentucky intimates, if mistaken in this, the time for the next session will soon be upon us. If the restriction did restrain them, I would change my opinion upon the subject, and vote for the limitation of $3,000,000.

Mr. HAMMOND. As I understand this matter, the expenditures of the last year were some three million six hundred thousand dollars. The appropriation proposed now is $4,000,000; and the Senator from Massachusetts proposes to reduce it to $3,000,000. I confess I am very much inclined to vote with the Senator from Massachusetts. I have no doubt that these expenditures far exceed any of the necessities of the Government; but such a proposition suddenly sprung upon any Government would be calculated to embarrass them. I see no reason why the Government should have for the next year more than they have had for the last year. I would, therefore, cheerfully vote, if I had the least idea that it would produce any embarrassment, for the same amount for next year. I believe that the present Secretary of the Treasury is disposed to economize expenditures as much as possible. In that I have the utmost confidence. I do not desire to embarrass him. If, at the beginning of another session, upon an exposé about the tariff on the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, or from any other cause, we could reduce it still further, I should go in favor of that. I propose, therefore, for the present, to make an amendment, or to suggest—for I do not say that I shall offer anything myself—to the Senator from Massachusetts, if he will place his amendment at the exact amount appropriated for the last fiscal year, I will vote for it very cheerfully.

Mr. GWIN. If necessary, I could go into the value of California to this Confederacy; it would not be hard to be shown in dollars and cents. When they estimate the amount that is expended in California, compared to the amount collected from revenue there, they do not do justice at all to the importance of that section of the Confederacy to the rest of the Union. During the last fiscal year we exported, of gold bullion and coin, $60,000,000; while the other exports of the country amounted to $303,000,000. One sixth of the entire products of the country were produced in California—California gold; and consequently one sixth of the revenues that were brought by customs into the Treasury returned to the country in exchange for our products. One sixth of the revenue was derived from the exports produced by California. The income, instead of $1,500,000 collected at our custom-houses, owing to the increased facility of intercourse with foreign nations, exchanging our products, made it twelve or thirteen million dollars. That is the amount which was brought in.

In regard to the expense of living there, as I said before, it is entirely regulated by labor, as it is here and elsewhere; and the labor in the mines, which is the great standard of value in the country, averages from two to five dollars a day at this time. It is well known that labor, in other sections of the State, is regulated by that. But in regard to these salaries, it must be known to those who were here at the last Congress, that the late Secretary of the Treasury revised the whole revenue system, and brought a bill before Congress, which was very voluminous, in which he revised these offices, (it was lost, I know not how—I believe on account of its being very voluminous,) and abolished a number of them. The Senator from Massachusetts speaks about appraisers, and says there are four on that coast. He is mistaken; there are only two. There is an appraiser general for the whole Pacific coast, including Washington, California, and Oregon; and the bill of the late Secretary of the Treasury reduced these to one. This system was adopted in 1850, and has continued from that time; but whenever the revenue system of the whole country is revised, I have no doubt the salaries can be properly reduced there. The Secretary of the Treasury now has a commission of three intelligent gentlemen, one of them the late commissioner of customs, who have been sent to that country expressly to ascertain to what extent the expenses can be reduced.

With regard to the bill to which my colleague referred, increasing the salaries of the officers, I will speak of that when it comes up.

The bill was informally laid aside to receive a message from the President.

UTAH AFFAIRS.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by J. B. HENRY, Esq., his Secretary.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand the message is in regard to Utah. I hope it will be read. I trust it may save us the necessity of considering one appropriation bill.

The Secretary read the message, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit the copy of a dispatch from Governor Cumming to the Secretary of State, dated at Great Salt Lake City, on the 2d of May, and received at the Department of State on yesterday. From this there is reason to believe that our difficulties with the Territory of Utah have terminated, and the reign of the Constitution and the laws has been restored. I congratulate you on this auspicious event.

I lose no time in communicating this information and in expressing the opinion that there will now be no occasion to make any appropriation for the purpose of calling into service the two regiments of volunteers authorized by the act of Congress approved on the 7th April last, "For the purpose of quelling disturbances in the Territory of Utah, for the protection of supply and emigrant trains, and the suppression of Indian hostilities on the frontiers."

I am the more gratified at this satisfactory intelligence from Utah, because it will afford some relief to the Treasury at a time demanding from us the strictest economy, and when the question which now arises upon every new appropriation is, whether it be of a character so important and urgent as to brook no delay, and to justify and require a loan, and most probably a tax upon the people to raise the money necessary for its payment.

In regard to the regiment of volunteers authorized by the same act of Congress to be called into service for the defense of the frontiers of Texas against Indian hostilities, I desire to leave this question to Congress, observing at the same time that, in my opinion, this State can be defended for the present by the regular troops which have not yet been withdrawn from its limits.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 10, 1853.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the message be printed, and laid on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

The Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, the pending question being on the amendment of Mr. WILSON.

Mr. SIMMONS. The proposition pending, I understand, is to reduce the collection of the revenue to $3,000,000; but I wish to inquire what is the amount proposed by the original bill?

Mr. HUNTER. The original bill proposes $4,000,000. The expenditure for the last fiscal year was $3,600,000. This year it is a little over that.

Mr. SIMMONS. This is a very opportune message when we are talking about reducing expenses; for it is literally true that we make no appropriation for anything but salaries to officers but what there is a loan attached to it. When it comes to appropriations for officers, however, there is, somehow or other, every time a necessity for larger appropriations than ever. I cannot, for my life, conceive why it should need more money to collect revenue this year than last. I do not suppose the Senator from Virginia believes that the collections will be two thirds of what they were last year.

Mr. HUNTER. I said when I was up before, that if it was an appropriation for the next fiscal year, I could see no reason why it should be larger than last year. The estimate allowed some margin, because it was designed to run through a series of years—a permanent and indefinite appropriation.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is the very reason I do not want to give a margin if it is for a series of years. I never knew an appropriation larger than was needed being made, but what the expenses would come up to it within a year or two. If we made it $5,000,000 they would bring the expenditures up to it. There is no difficulty in bringing up the expense, but there is every reason under heaven to reduce these expenditures.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me a moment?

Mr. SIMMONS. Certainly.

Mr. HUNTER. By deferring reform until next year, the Secretary will be able to suggest legislation after taking all the measures by regulation which are within his power, to reduce the expenses. When that is done, we can revise the system fully; but until that is done it will be unsafe to reduce the appropriation for this service below what has been actually expended, for we find the expenditures growing, little by little, and they will grow with the growth of the country.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to know what risk we run. Suppose we suggest to the Secretary of the Treasury that, in our judgment, the expenses of collecting the revenue at its present amount should not exceed $3,000,000 a year, and he should come in next year with his report saying that, upon a careful investigation of the matter, he thinks he ought to have two or three hundred thousand dollars more, what is the trouble?

Mr. HUNTER. There would be no trouble, if Senators did not object to deficiency bills; but then there will be the old argument against deficiency bills.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no objection to a deficiency bill where there is a proper estimate. My objection is to passing things under the form of a deficiency bill without an estimate, and putting in $5,000,000 for the Utah war that I never believed in my heart would take place. I thought it would turn out just as it has. I have never known any modern war about women; though there was one some three or four thousand years ago that I have read of; but I never had any idea that the Utah war would amount to anything. That, however, has nothing to do with this question.

I say I cannot perceive what ground a man can take who every day here says he is for retrenchment, and that he will go with anybody to reduce the expenditures, and yet invariably goes for the highest appropriations asked—goes for every item, particularly if it is for the support of officers. I do not understand that kind of logic. I do not want to make appropriations so as to embarrass any Government. I think the appropriations ought to be ample; but I can see no possible reason for increasing the expense of collecting the revenue ten per cent. when the revenues have fallen off one third. If we were not going to be here again in six years, there might be some reason for allowing a margin; but we shall be here in six months more, and then not over five months of the next fiscal year will have expired; and I do not see any modesty in presenting deficiency bills where they are really necessary. The truth is, the deficiency bill which we passed at this session, amounting to $9,000,000, was brought up after only six months of the fiscal year had expired. They expended the appropriations for this carrying trade—I do not know exactly what you call it—in the first half of the year, and we supplied them with the balance they wanted. We can do it again. Nobody desires to embarrass the Government, especially in the collection of the revenue.

The Senator from California tells us that there is a proposition to increase the fees of officers there. I like California, and I am disposed to be liberal towards every State and every department of the Government; but I should like gentlemen to read a bill that came here from California for fitting up a court-house. I cannot undertake to state it, it was so fabulous, but I think it was something like seventy-five dollars apiece for chairs. I never saw or heard of such a bill in all my life before, and I think the chairman of the Committee on Claims [Mr. IVERSON] may perhaps remember it better than I do.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Senator from Rhode Island will permit me to say a word. Notwithstanding that extravagant price paid for everything, there are one or two gentlemen who have spent the winter here for the purpose of inducing the Government to take a new building, one on which they intend to lay out about the same amount.

Mr. SIMMONS. This court-house is fitted up like a palace. There is no eastern prince, in my opinion, that ever had such furniture extorted from his laborers. I never heard of such a thing, and I do not know what they could do with it. No doubt we reported in favor of paying the amount.

Mr. IVERSON. My friend from Rhode Island is under a mistake. The Committee on Claims did not report a bill to pay the amount, but they reported a bill authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to take evidence as to the value of the property furnished to the Government, and to pay what in his judgment was a reasonable compensation for it.

Mr. SIMMONS. We took the most prudent course we could, no doubt, and did not intend to ruin anybody; but I believe the Senator from Georgia will bear me witness that he never read such a bill in his life for the expense of fitting up any rooms for any purpose.

Mr. IVERSON. I agree with the Senator that it was a very extravagant bill, and the furniture was of a very extravagant character; but where gold is so plenty (as the Senator from California has properly said) as it is in California, they carry on everything upon the high-pressure system, and nothing will do them there but chairs that cost from seventy-five to one hundred and fifty dollars apiece to sit in, with cushions, for their petit jurors. Their common people must sit upon cushioned seats that cost from fifty to one hundred dollars apiece. It is the most extravagant fitting up of a court-room and jury-room and clerk's room that I ever have seen or heard of in the United States; but I presume it is all correct, and all in accordance with the condition of things in California! It is all upon that "high-falutin'" and high-pressure system, which has continued in California from the settlement of the country, and I think will continue to the end of time, as long as California is a member of this Union.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think some of us who live on this side of the mountains, and who have to get our living in a little different way, should try to retrench on this side, any way. I am willing to make an exception of California; and I understand from the remarks made by the Senator from California, [Mr. GWIN,] that the expenses of collecting the revenue there have gone down from $400,000 last year to $280,000 this year. There is a saving of $120,000 in that State alone; and yet we are asked to appropriate $400,000 more than this service cost last year altogether. How do you make that out? When Senators rise here and say they are for reducing the expenses of collecting revenue in those places where it has been so extravagant, and in the same breath ask us to appropriate ten per cent. more than we ever did before, I do not understand their species of calculation. If they are for reduction, they certainly ought to reduce these appropriations. When the Senators from California state the fact that the expenses of collecting the revenue in California have been reduced one fourth in the last year, and are likely to be still further reduced this year, why should we be asked to appropriate more for the next fiscal year than was spent last year? There is every reason in the world to reduce the appropriation, instead of increasing it.

The Senator from California says the Secretary of the Treasury is sending out a commission to examine into these matters. You will multiply officers, sending them to hunt for places to retrench, until it will cost ten times as much to look up retrenchments as you will save by them. That is not the way to reform and retrench. Nobody wants to go to California to ascertain that it is unnecessary to buy chairs at a hundred and fifty dollars apiece. We know that before we go there. So it is with all these expenses. You might just as well refuse this appropriation at once. I have no purpose of embarrassing anybody; but so long as Congress talks about retrenchment and reform, and every time a bill comes up appropriates more than was ever appropriated before, it is perfectly idle to expect the people of this country to believe you are in earnest. Why should they believe it? I see no disposition to retrench anything except it may be that if you have a building going on, and you can injure it and destroy the work you have done on it by cutting off an appropriation, you are ready to do that. We have spent, as I said to the Secretary of the Treasury, $500,000,000 since I was here ten years ago, and all I can see for it that is good for anything, is the public buildings that we have erected, and most of which rest on granite, that they may stand. As to what goes to officers, it is almost as bad as wasted. It keeps up a scramble for office. Gentlemen here talk about our public printing and about trying to promote the public morals by reform in that respect. I want to know what would do more to promote public morals than to cut down salaries so that there will not be forty men after every office there is in the gift of the Government? I think it would be the best thing for the Government itself, the best thing for those who are administering the Government, to reduce salaries and to stop the incessant cry for office, and let people work for their living. I am willing to give fair, liberal salaries to those who do work for us; but can anybody say that it is worth six or eight thousand dollars a year to be a naval officer in California?

I am astonished at the chairman of the Finance Committee proposing to enlarge these appropriations, and especially to make them permanent. I like the suggestion of the Senator from South Carolina, and I hope Senators will go for this amendment of $3,000,000. I do not profess to understand the details of this bill; but if we appropriate $3,000,000, and there should be a deficiency, I pledge myself, if I am living and am here, to supply it at the earliest moment, and without any reflection upon the Secretary either. I say, if Congress shows no disposition to curtail expenses, but to give out for every purpose of official patronage more and more every time it is asked, you must never expect your executive officers to try to curtail. They will talk about curtailing, and that has been the cry ever since I can remember; they are going to reform abuses; but when you appropriate money, that is the end of it. Congress may be found fault with, and there will be a bantering between Congress and the Departments as to who is to blame for the appropriations. They will say, "we have been trying to retrench, and Congress does not strengthen our hands." Sir, let us begin here, in regard to the collection of the revenue. The first year, as I understand the Senator from Missouri, there was an appropriation of $1,750,000, and there was a deficiency of $750,000, carrying it up to $2,500,000. Probably that was a fair standard. I do not know much about it; but here is an appropriation of $3,000,000, and I think it is quite enough. We are told that over one hundred thousand dollars will be saved in California alone, this year; and probably a proportionate amount in other places. We are not collecting near as much revenue as heretofore, and I cannot see why it should cost more to collect it.

Mr. HUNTER. In 1851, $49,000,000 of revenue were collected, and the expenses of collection were a little upwards of three million dollars. In no year since 1851 have the expenses been less than something more than three millions. That $3,000,000 was on $49,000,000. Now, it will be found that the per centum of collecting the revenue from that time to 1857, the last year we have reported, has not varied very much, and that the comparison is not against last year, commencing with Mr. Fillmore's administration and coming down through General Pierce's. It will be found that since 1854 the expenses have never been less than $3,500,000. Yet it is now proposed to reduce them to $3,000,000; that is, to reduce them to a less sum than has been paid since 1851; and that when we know that the inhabited portions of our coast are increasing; when we know that there must be an increase in the northwestern part of the Pacific coast, in Oregon and Washington, as those countries are settled, which will probably more than make up for any reductions that may be made in California; and that, too, in face of the fact (for it is to be remembered this a permanent appropriation) that the expenses of collecting the revenue have been constantly increasing with our population and with our revenue.

I said before, that if the bill appropriated only for the next year, it would be perfectly safe to confine the amount to the expenditures of 1857, and I should not object to that. The only reason I gave for allowing a margin was that we might not have to repeat this appropriation every year.

I do not believe the Secretary of the Treasury will necessarily expend the $4,000,000 if we appropriate it. On the contrary, I believe that he is earnestly desirous to reduce, and will reduce if he can; but I am not disposed to attempt a reduction now, until I have some scheme presented for reduction, some system of legislation that will attain and accomplish the end.

Mr. STUART. I wish to ask the Senator a question, that I may distinctly understand the bill. The first section seems to appropriate $1,600,000 semi-annually, for collecting the revenue.

Mr. HUNTER. That is for the last half of the present fiscal year, from the 1st of January to the 1st of July, 1858. After that it appropriates $4,000,000 a year.

Mr. STUART. The first section makes the appropriation I suggested.

Mr. HUNTER. The first section appropriates $1,600,000 for the last half of the present fiscal year, and the second section appropriates, hereafter, $4,000,000 a year.

Mr. STUART. That is what I wish to know, because I suggest to the Senator that I shall vote for the amendment of the Senator from Massachusetts; and unless that prevails I shall move to strike out the second section of the bill which appropriates $4,000,000 a year, for an indefinite period, or until altered by law. I am willing to make, for the next year, such an appropriation as is deemed necessary; but it must be seen that we have reduced the revenue, according to the standard of our tariff, to $50,000,000—

Mr. HUNTER. But we have not cut off any of the collection districts; we have not cut off any of the machinery which costs money.

Mr. STUART. I am aware of that; but I think the amendment of the Senator's committee, which he has had adopted on this bill, which cuts off ports of entry that do not collect $10,000, will save a much larger amount of money than he supposes, and I think that is pretty large. We have extended ports of delivery up the Mississippi and its tributaries, and in one instance, at Dubuque, we have actually built a custom-house, where there was neither collector nor collection district, but simply a port of delivery. The Senator's amendment he will find will be a most efficient weapon to cut down this abuse, and it will reduce the expenses, in my opinion, to what the Senator from Massachusetts proposes; but, at all events, I suggest to the honorable chairman that the indefinite appropriation of $4,000,000 a year, made in the second section, cannot be necessary at this time.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the amendment of the Committee on Finance may have the good effects the Senator from Michigan anticipates. I have no doubt it will reduce the expenditure somewhat, and I have no doubt that other reforms will be suggested to us by the commencement of the next session, which will enable us to reduce still further. I would not object, as I said before, for the next fiscal year, if it be proposed only to provide for the next fiscal year, to reduce the appropriation to the expenditure for the last year of which we have any account; but I submit that it would not be safe to reduce it to a sum lower than was expended in the year ending June, 1857.

Mr. SIMMONS. The Senator calls my attention to the percentage spent in 1851. He says we then collected $49,000,000 of revenue, and the percentage has not increased since. Well, if the expense of collecting the revenue depends on the amount collected, I ask the Senator if he supposes $2,500,000 would be required this year?

Mr. HUNTER. I said it did not increase up to 1857, when the revenue went up to $63,000,000. Of course the percentage will be increased, if we estimate the revenue at what it is in this year of deficiency.

Mr. SIMMONS. I wish to ask one further question. I understand now there is an appropriation of $1,600,000 for the last half of the present year. Why should it be any more for the next six months?

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot tell. The Secretary has had some balances on hand. What the amount of those balances was I do not know.

Mr. SIMMONS. He has asked us, it seems, for appropriation at the rate of $800,000 a quarter for collecting the revenue in the current six months, and I cannot see any reason why it should be more than $800,000 a quarter for the next year.

Mr. GWIN. I do not want to detain the Senate in this discussion; but I think the two members—and I have no doubt they are very efficient members of the Committee on Claims—who have spoken should have looked at the remarkable bill they spoke of. If they had done so with the determination to do justice to California, they would have ascertained the fact that the whole of that extraordinary and extravagant expenditure was made without the slightest shadow of authority of law; that the gorgeous fitting up of those court-rooms was a speculation of an individual, encouraged, no doubt, by those who were to participate in the grandeur that was produced by those magnificent rooms; and hence the claimant is here. There was no authority of law for it, and it has never been contended that there was any. There is no obligation on this Government to pay for those magnificent chairs unless the gentlemen upon the Committee on Claims choose to report a bill, and have it passed through Congress. The magnificence they speak of in those court-rooms, and their fitting up, was a matter entirely outside of any authority, according to law. It is a claim that has been presented to Congress. Here it is. If we pay it, it will be all right, I suppose; but I have never encouraged it in any shape, manner, or form.

But in regard to the collection of revenue, and reducing the expenses of collection, many gentlemen who are familiar with our complicated system know that it ought to be approached with great caution and care; and the principal reason that it has not been revised, was on account of the extraordinary amount of money that was received into the Treasury during the last four or five years. Last winter we revised the tariff, and reduced the amount of revenue from twelve to fifteen per cent. on what was formerly collected. Now the time has come; and I take it for granted the Secretary of the Treasury will reduce the expenses of collecting the revenue, but I hope it will be done systematically. I hope it will not be cut into here and there; and that my State particularly, because it happens to produce gold, and salaries there are high, will not be made a scape-goat of. I am willing for it to come in upon others with a system, and be brought down. I want no extravagant salaries there, or anywhere else. But, inasmuch as the Senator from Massachusetts seems to have singled out California for his attacks, I hope the Senate will bear in mind that we have brought the expenses of collecting the revenue in that State from $1,300,000, down to $300,000; and we have probably reduced them one hundred thousand dollars within the last twelve months, and reduced our officers more than one fourth, dismissed a large number who were organized for the purpose of protecting the revenue system and preventing smuggling. It is known that, in all the Mexican possessions, they carry on smuggling. The former system, which it was known was extravagant, has been reduced; and probably it can be reduced still more. I hope, however, it will be by a regular law, and not by an amendment to an appropriation bill.

Mr. WILSON. The bill before us is intended to repeal the existing law limiting the annual expenditures for the collection of the revenue on the Atlantic coast to $2,500,000. The proposition made by the Senator from Virginia to carry up this limit to $4,000,000, he defends here to-night as a permanent system. He says that, if the appropriation was intended only for this year, he does not know that he would ask for the four millions. The Senator proposes to repeal an existing law, for which he himself fought in Congress when it was passed; for which the present Secretary of the Interior battled in the House of Representatives day after day, and arraigned the administration of General Taylor for extravagance when they passed beyond the limit of the first law limiting the expenditures to $1,750,000.

The Senator from Virginia says, in reply to a remark made on this side by the Senator from Kentucky, in regard to the expenditures of last year and the year before, that the Department had reserved funds. Where did they get those reserved funds? I will tell you, sir. The administrations of Taylor and Fillmore saved $1,623,000, and Franklin Pierce's administration spent it. That is the way they got their reserved fund. The expenditures on the Atlantic coast, in 1851, were $1,966,000; last year (1857) they were carried up to $3,162,000, being an advance of $1,200,000 on the Atlantic coast. They were brought down on the Pacific coast from nearly six hundred thousand dollars, in 1851, to about three hundred thousand dollars—and why? In 1851 the imports into California were six or seven million dollars; now they are but a million and a half. The expenses there have been dropping off every year for the last five or six years, until, with all these great salaries, they are now down to about three hundred thousand dollars, and you can bring them down to $150,000. Reduce the salaries to the same footing as in the city of New York, and you can bring down the expenditures on the Pacific coast certainly to $250,000; add that to $2,450,000, which is surely ample for the Atlantic coast, and you have altogether $2,700,000. I believe that will be enough; but, in order to be liberal, I propose to allow $3,000,000, which will give about two million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the Atlantic coast.

Now, I ask the Senator from Virginia by what authority you have added, during the last five years, six hundred officers on the Atlantic coast?

By what authority have you added forty officers in the city of Boston, and three hundred and forty-six in the city of New York? Why have you increased your force on the Canadian line, so that, in places where you have got a dozen officers, you collect no revenue? Where you collected formerly one hundred or two hundred thousand dollars, you now come down to nothing, and yet you have doubled your force. Go to New England—I tell you of my own State—I do not complain of extravagant salaries, for you do not pay extravagant salaries there; but you have too many people. Take the city of Salem for example. In 1854 you had six inspectors there at $600 a year. Without authority of law you have added four inspectors, and carried their salaries up to $1,095, making $11,000 expenses there. It is so all over New England; it is so in New York; it is so everywhere on the Atlantic coast. You have increased your officers unnecessarily, and if you want to diminish your expenses you can very easily do it by dismissing seven or eight hundred of these men. What are they doing now? A member of the House of Representatives, the other day, gave a vote that did not suit these gentlemen, and they went up into one county of New York, on the Hudson river, and started public meetings to censure him. Another gentleman, a member from the city of New York, gave a vote they did not like, and they got up a coffin and carried it through the streets of New York. This was done under the lead of the Government officials who have taken the politics of this country into their care. Your expenditures are to be carried up to four millions a year to pay your army of office-holders, your American-Swiss guard. I want the people of this country to understand it, that you propose to take off the limitation of law restricting these expenditures to $2,500,000, and carry them up to $4,000,000—an increase of $1,500,000—to pay your pensioned Government office-holders, who do more of the politics of the country than they do in the way of business in collecting revenue.

Now, sir, a word in regard to any complaints I have made about these great salaries in California. My votes in this body, I think, can be appealed to for liberality towards California, and every other section of this country; but I say here to-night what you know to be true, sir, and the country knows to be true, that everything connected with the expenditures of this Government in California has been carried on in the most extravagant manner—salaries unheard of in this country; appropriations unheard of; no system; nothing but put your hand in the Treasury and take out what you can. I want to see it checked; and it shall be checked—it shall be checked in this branch and the other.

Mr. President, I want to say here, and I mean what I say, that in regard to these extravagant expenditures, be they in my own State or any other State, I mean to point them out; I mean to resist them; I mean to demand their reduction; and we will have that reduction, too. You can vote down this amendment if you choose; but there is no need of this extravagance; the country knows it; everybody knows it that has examined the subject.

Mr. BRODERICK. I am very glad that the Senator from Rhode Island mentioned the expenditure that was incurred by the Government in fitting up court-rooms in California. I have been informed by the chairman of the Committee on Claims that the amount is $18,000; and I was somewhat surprised at my colleague when he said that the parties who had the work done—at least I so understood him—were not connected with the parties who performed the work.

Mr. GWIN. Not at all.

Mr. BRODERICK. While I am up, since so much has been said about the collection of revenue in California, and the cost of collecting it, I may as well mention, for the information of the Senate, that the collectors have been very handsomely paid in California. When I arrived here in 1857, I was present at an interview which took place between the then Secretary of the Treasury, Mr. Guthrie, and my colleague, and I heard him inform my colleague that the collector of customs at San Francisco, in 1854 and 1855, was a defaulter to the amount of $430,000. My colleague can correct me if I have misstated what took place. Well, sir, last year the melter and refiner and assayer of the Mint in California, was discovered to be a defaulter to the amount of about one hundred and seventy-five thousand dollars. At least there has been a suit commenced against him for that amount; and a great many believe that he took about a million dollars. I only mention these items to show that the officers in California have a way of getting outside fees, besides the salaries they receive from the Government. I mention these two cases; there are a great many other small ones.

Mr. WILSON. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. KING. I propose simply to state to the Senate, that I intend, whether this amendment is adopted or not, as I hope it will be adopted, to move to change the permanent appropriation, at whatever amount it may be fixed, to an appropriation for a single year.

Mr. SEWARD. I should like to inquire of the honorable Senator from California [Mr. BRODERICK] if the collector to whom Mr. Guthrie referred in the conversation of which he has spoken, was Colonel Collier?

Mr. BRODERICK. It was not Colonel Collier. Colonel Collier, I believe, made some two or three or four hundred thousand dollars while he was collector; but the courts decided that he was all right.

Mr. SEWARD. I was going to say that Colonel Collier had been prosecuted by the Government.

Mr. BRODERICK. I did not refer to him.

Mr. SEWARD. A judgment was rendered in his favor; and I felt that perhaps an erroneous impression might go out in relation to him.

Mr. BRODERICK. That is generally done, sir. [Laughter.]

The yeas and nays were taken upon the amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN, when his name was called, stated that he had paired off with the Senator from Alabama, Mr. CLAY.

Mr. BRODERICK at first voted in the negative; but before the result was announced, said: I see there is a very large vote in favor of this amendment, and I suppose I shall have to change my vote and go for it. My vote will do no good on the opposite side.

The result was announced—yeas 28, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Foster, Green, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Iveson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—28.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bright, Hammond, Hunter, Slidell, and Wright—7.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I only want to call to the attention of the Senate the fact that they are allowing half a million less than has been expended in any year since 1854.

Mr. WILSON. I offer another amendment:

And be it further enacted, That no collector of the customs, deputy collector, naval officer, deputy naval officer, surveyor, deputy surveyor, general appraiser, superintendent of warehouses, or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenue, shall receive a greater compensation than is now paid to the officers and persons engaged in said service at the port of New York: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to increase the compensation of any officer of the customs, or of any person engaged in the collection thereof.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KING. I stated that I should offer an amendment to limit to one year this law, which seems to be a permanent one, making the appropriation continuous until it shall be changed. For that purpose I move, in the third line of the second section, to strike out the words "each and every," and insert "the" before "fiscal year;" and after the words "1st of July, 1858," insert "to the 30th of June, 1859." These alterations will make the act an appropriation for one year. My object is, that this bill may come before us next year necessarily, when we shall have passed through something more of the experiment of the present condition of things, and may determine what ought to be done.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The first two sections have been stricken out.

Mr. KING. Then I shall not offer my amendment.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time.

The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MAIL STEAMER BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the second amendment, and had disagreed to the first, third, fourth, and fifth amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 538) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

JOHN SAWYER.

Mr. KING, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 619) for the relief of John Sawyer, a soldier of the war of the Revolution, reported it without amendment.

Mr. HAMLIN. This is a little bill which gives a pension for revolutionary services to a man who is one hundred and three years old. I ask that it may now be considered. ["Certainly."]

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of John Sawyer, of Penobscot county, Maine, on the pension roll at the rate of twenty-four dollars a year, during his natural life, commencing March 4, 1831.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to take up the Indian deficiency bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senate will not adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have been here nearly eleven hours without eating bread, or drinking water.

Mr. HALE. Discussion is not in order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll, and Mr. ALLEN answered.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to withdraw the motion to adjourn, for the purpose of allowing gentlemen to take up a few local bills.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. BRIGHT.) By unanimous consent the motion may be withdrawn.

Mr. HALE. Go on with the call.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. One Senator has answered to his name, and the call must go on.

The Secretary continued the call of the roll; and the result was—yeas 15, nays 20; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Crittenden, Foster, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Iversen, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, and Wade—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bright, Doollittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—20.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

SETTLERS IN ILLINOIS.

Mr. SEWARD. Is there any special order now?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia has a motion before the Senate to take up the Indian deficiency bill.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I believe I had the promise of the Senator from Virginia, that he would allow me to have a little House bill, for the relief of some constituents of mine, considered and passed.

Mr. HUNTER. With the understanding that it gives rise to no debate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume there will be no debate about it. The Committee on Public Lands of the Senate recommend the passage of the bill, and it has already passed the House of Representatives. It is a bill (H. R. No. 538) for the relief of settlers on lands in the State of Illinois. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides that every settler on any of the public lands heretofore selected by the State of Illinois, but which have not been confirmed to that State, under the provisions of the act of 4th of September, 1841, who has settled thereon in good faith, shall be entitled to preëempt his claim by legal subdivisions, not to exceed one hundred and sixty acres in a compact body, at the ordinary minimum of $1 25 per acre, unless within the six-mile limits of any railroad grant, and in that case at the usual double minimum of $2 50 per acre. Such settlers, however, are to establish their rights according to the rules and regulations prescribed under the provisions of the act of 4th September, 1841, and pay for the lands within three months from the date of the publication of this act by the register of the proper district.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN ARKANSAS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There is a bill lying on the table which was considered nearly three weeks ago, and then laid aside. It is a matter of public interest to my State, and was reported by the Judiciary Committee—in which, I believe, the Senate have the highest confidence. I move to take up that bill now; and I hope the Senate will pass it at once. If it gives rise to debate, I shall withdraw it. It is a bill concerning courts in Arkansas.

Mr. DOOLITTLE. I offered an amendment to that bill, which I beg leave to withdraw. The amendment had reference to courts generally throughout the United States; but this is a local bill. In offering that amendment, it was not my intention to embarrass the bill at all; but I desire to give notice, that, when the subject comes up on a bill for reforming the judiciary system of the United States, there is a provision in my amendment which I desire to insist upon.

Mr. HUNTER. If the bill of the Senator from Arkansas gives rise to no debate, I shall not object to its consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I think it can be disposed of at once; at any rate, I make the motion to take it up.

That motion was agreed to; and the consideration of the bill (S. No. 278) concerning the courts of the United States in the district of Arkansas was resumed, as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the appointment of a district judge of the United States for the western district of Arkansas, who shall have and exercise the same jurisdiction and powers which are now had and exercised within it by the judge for the district of Arkansas, and the jurisdiction and authority of the last mentioned judge are to be hereafter confined to the eastern district of Arkansas. The annual salary of the judge of the western district is to be $2,500.

It further provides that there shall be hereafter two terms of the circuit court of the United States for the eastern district of Arkansas, on the second Mondays of April and October in each year.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to take up the Indian deficiency bill.

Mr. PUGH. I trust the Senator will allow me to call up a little House bill that will not give rise to debate.

Mr. HUNTER. I may as well abandon business, and move an adjournment. ["Oh, no;" "Go on!"] If gentlemen will allow me to go on with the appropriation bills, I will not make the motion. ["Go on!"]

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 555) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1858, the pending question being on the following amendment of Mr. HOUSTON:

And be it further enacted, That the superintendents and agents within the superintendency of Texas shall be hereafter appointed in the same manner as other superintendents and agents are appointed and confirmed; and that the Wichita agency is hereby attached to the superintendency of Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I was entitled to the floor early this morning, and yielded to the honorable chairman of the Committee on Finance. Again, when I was entitled to the floor, I yielded through courtesy, as he desired other business to be taken up. He has availed himself of my courtesy, and now inflicts on me the disagreeable duty of going into a discussion at this late hour of the night. I intend that the bright rays of to-morrow's rising sun shall come through the windows of these halls before I lose my privilege. Before commencing the argument, that I may be enabled to condense it within the nine hours allowed me from now until sunrise, I should be glad if the Senator from Arkansas would give some explanation of the reasons why he opposes the amendment. I desire to know the grounds on which his opposition rests, that I may respond.

Mr. IVERSON. If the Senator from Texas will give way, I wish to propose a compromise. The Senator proposes to speak until sunrise; but I understand that, if we now adjourn, he will occupy only half an hour to-morrow. If he will pledge himself to that, I will move an adjournment.

Mr. HOUSTON. I cannot make such a pledge now. I am not going to swap nine hours for half an hour. [Laughter.]

Mr. GREEN. I move an adjournment.

The motion was agreed to; and at ten o'clock, p. m., the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, June 10, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

SICK AND DISABLED SEAMEN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a communication from the Secretary of State, transmitting a letter addressed to the Committee on Commerce relative to provision for sick and disabled seamen; which was referred to the Committee on Commerce, and ordered to be printed.

MISSOURI AND CALIFORNIA MAILS.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be on Mr. CRAIG's motion to suspend the rules to enable him to introduce a joint resolution in relation to carrying the United States mails from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, California.

LANDS IN THE CHOCTAW CESSION.

Mr. SINGLETON. I told the House the other day that if it then passed one little bill of mine I would not trouble it any more; but that was on the hypothesis that Congress would adjourn last Monday. As the session, however, has been extended a week, I now ask that I may report back a bill from the Committee on Public Lands.

There being no objection,

Mr. SINGLETON reported back, from the Committee on Public Lands, House bill (No. 399) for the relief of certain purchasers of lands within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830.

The bill authorizes and requires the Commissioner of the General Land Office to cause patents to be issued on all certificates for entries made within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830, at less than the true graduation price issued prior to the reception, by the local land office, of the true graduation lists, when such certificates and entries are regular.

Mr. COBB. I move that the bill be put upon its passage, and ask for the reading of the letter of the Secretary of the Interior.

The letter was read, as follows:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, June 4, 1858.

SIR: In compliance with the request contained in your letter of yesterday, I have examined House bill (No. 399), "For the relief of certain purchasers of land, within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830." I have also referred the bill to the Commissioner of the General Land Office, and herewith inclose a copy of his report.

In expressing my concurrence in the views of the Commissioner, I will add, that, in my opinion, the increased expense necessarily attending the settlement and determination of suspended entries, within the cession mentioned, would probably equal, if not exceed, the additional amounts which might accrue under existing laws, and therefore the amendatory legislation proposed would not materially, if at all, conflict with the interests of the Government. The bill is returned.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Hon. W. R. W. Cobb, House of Representatives.

Mr. SINGLETON. I now ask that the letter of the Commissioner of Public Lands be read.

The letter was read, as follows:

GENERAL LAND OFFICE, June 3, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to return herewith the bill proposed by the Hon. Mr. SINGLETON, of Mississippi, with a view to the confirmation of certain sales in the Choctaw cession, which had been made at less rates than the proper graduation prices; and in consideration of all the facts, this office respectfully submits, the only mode of adjustment, under existing laws, would be to cancel the entries which have been made, reexpose the lands to sale; that, in doing so, it would necessarily be with prejudice to individual interests, and, after all, with the probability of but little benefit to the public Treasury.

Under the circumstances, a liberal spirit to our citizens is the better policy, and in that spirit, the passage of the bill is recommended; another benefit of which will be to dismember our files from suspensions, and relieving that section of the country from the embarrassments of contested titles.

With great respect, your obedient servant,

THOMAS A. HENDRICKS, Commissioner.

Hon. J. Thompson, Secretary of the Interior.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM S. BRADFORD.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move to reconsider the vote by which House bill (No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford was passed yesterday; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCUSED FROM SERVING ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a privileged question. It will be recollected that a few days ago I submitted a motion to reconsider the vote by which the honorable gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was excused from further service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I voted in the affirmative on the motion to excuse; but a night's subsequent reflection satisfied me that I voted wrong, and therefore I submitted the motion to reconsider next morning. That motion not having been disposed of, my object in rising is to have it disposed of now. I am satisfied that, on reflection, the gentleman from Kentucky must feel convinced that this House did not intend to treat him with any discourtesy or disrespect. I am also satisfied that this House desires his further continuance on that committee, particularly in view of the present critical condition of our affairs. I, for one, am therefore unwilling to excuse him from further service on the committee, although I may not be able to support every or any measure that may meet with his approbation. Still, I am satisfied that he will bring to the discharge of his duty an ardent and devoted patriotism; and hence, believing that at this time, when our flag is being insulted on the high seas, and when British aggressions are being made on American vessels, the Committee on Foreign Affairs ought to be composed of men fitted for the crisis, I hope that the vote by which the gentleman from Kentucky was excused will be reconsidered.

Mr. RUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Illinois whether the gentleman from Kentucky desires to be excused from serving on the Committee on Foreign Affairs?

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I do not wish to place the gentleman from Kentucky in that position. I have no doubt of the fact, however, that, although he would not express a desire to continue on the committee, yet, if it be the wish of the House to continue him on the committee, he will serve. I hope the motion will be now disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I understand there is a motion pending to suspend the rules; and if so, the gentleman from Illinois cannot call up a motion to consider when there is a subject before the House. He can call it up at any time when there is no subject before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is correct. The gentleman from Illinois called up his motion, and the Chair heard no objection at the time. The Chair supposed that the House was willing to dispose of it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I supposed he was stating the reason why he would call it up. I see there is a new practice likely to grow up here now. One gentleman gets the floor and makes a motion, and then yields the floor and lets the motion remain in abeyance, till others ask the unanimous consent of the House to make other propositions. I think it is better to follow the proper practice of the House.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I would say to the gentleman from Tennessee that the gentleman from Missouri is willing that I should have this question disposed of in advance of his.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I call the previous question on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I insist on my question of order.

The SPEAKER. If there be objection, the proposition will be first put on the motion of the gentleman from Missouri, [Mr. CRAIG.]

MISSOURI AND CALIFORNIA MAILS.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. If there be no objection to the introduction of the resolution, I suppose there is no necessity for the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

The question was taken on the motion to suspend the rules, and it was agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes 130, noes 25.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended; and the joint resolution in relation to the carrying of the United States mails from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, California, was introduced, and read a first and second time.

The resolution directs the Postmaster General to order an increase of speed on the mail route between St. Joseph, Missouri, and Placerville, California, so as to require the mails to be carried in thirty days, instead of thirty-eight days, provided the same can be done at a pro rata increase of compensation to the contractor.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I would ask the gentleman from Missouri whether this resolution has been reported by a committee of the House?

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. I would state that it has been twice passed upon by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads—once in the shape of a resolution requiring information from the Department.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There is a good deal of money involved in this thing. The whole proposition is to give money to the contractors.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri. The existing law authorizes the Postmaster General to order an increase of speed on any mail route he chooses; and the contractors are obliged to obey that order. It is, then, usual to furnish evidence to the Postmaster General as to how much the expenses are increased; and that amount is allowed. I move the previous question.

Mr. REAGAN. That is a very important bill. It has never received the sanction of any committee, and it is opposed to the opinion of the Post Office Department.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The joint resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution on the table. I think it is wrong for Congress to make contracts for carrying the mails, when the general law authorizes the Postmaster General to do it.

The motion was not agreed to.

The joint resolution was passed.

Mr. CRAIG, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

EXCUSED FROM SERVING ON COMMITTEE.

Mr. MORRIS, of Illinois. I now call up the motion to reconsider the vote by which the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. CLAY] was excused from serving on the Committee on Foreign Affairs. I will only say, in addition to what I had said when I was interrupted, that this motion was submitted at my own suggestion, without the knowledge of the gentleman from Kentucky. I believe it is due to him that I should make this statement. I now move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to—ayes 90, noes 53.

The question recurred upon the motion to excuse Mr. CLAY, and it was decided in the negative.

So the House refused to excuse Mr. CLAY from further service on the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

SUPPLEMENTAL INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES, by unanimous consent, from the Committee of Ways and Means, reported back the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859; which were referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed the mail steamer appropriation bill, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

MAIL STEAMER APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask that an order may now be made to have those amendments to the mail steamer appropriation bill printed, so that we may have them before us when we come to act upon them.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to say that the Committee of Ways and Means have informally considered those amendments, and have agreed to recommend a non-concurrence in all but one of them. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Inasmuch as the Committee of Ways and Means have already considered these amendments informally, I now ask leave to report them back, in order that they may be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and ordered to be printed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would say to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that I do not want to have these amendments referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until they have been printed, so that we may have an opportunity to see what we are legislating about.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that the order to print is rarely ever made until the amendments are reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I suppose it is within the competency of the House to order the amendments to be printed at any time before they are referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. What I am trying to avoid is getting into a maelstrom, in which we are called upon to legislate without seeing what we are legislating about, as we were last night.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I should prefer to have them printed; but if we are to act upon them to-day or to-morrow, we must go on with them.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, I object to the amendments being reported back.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and the rules were suspended.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am instructed by the Committee of Ways and Means to report back the amendments of the Senate to the mail steamer appropriation bill. There are five amendments. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend that the House concur in one of them, which is to strike out $120,000, and disagree to the others. I move that the amendments be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and printed.

The motion was agreed to.

RECESS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the House, or the Committee of the Whole, if the House shall be in committee at the time, will take a recess from four o'clock, p. m., till six o'clock, p. m., this day.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois, and others, objected.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce the resolution.

The motion was agreed to, (two thirds having voted therefor,) and the resolution was introduced.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question upon the passage of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. REILLY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill (No. 394) for the relief of William Compton, and to put it on its passage.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have no objection to giving way to one or two gentlemen to take up cases to which there is no objection, and on which there will be no debate.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. There is not a gentleman upon this floor but has some bill which he desires to put upon its passage. I hope the public business will be first transacted, and then give us all an equal chance.

The SPEAKER. The Chair recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] for that purpose.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give way to enable me to make an effort to get up a public bill of great interest, upon which I will call the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. I hope we will proceed with the public business, and finish it; and that the gentleman from Pennsylvania will either press his motion, or give way, and let us take charge of the business.

Mr. REILLY. Unless I am permitted to get up my bill I shall object to every one.

The motion of Mr. JONES was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. Boccock in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the Senate amendments to the

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Fortieth amendment:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the balances from appropriations for preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities, and for traveling allowances to volunteers already expended in payment of Florida volunteers called into service by the authority of the War Department, may be applied, by the accounting officers of the Treasury, to the settlement of the accounts of the paymaster by whom said balances were disbursed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. HAWKINS. I desire some information from the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means on this subject.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I confess that there is a great deal of difficulty in complying with the gentleman's request. The amendment has come to the Committee of Ways and Means without being printed, or without a solitary paper or explanation that I have been able to lay my hands upon. The only information I have upon the subject is, that the State of Florida called out a number of volunteer companies during the Seminole war. The State paid the expenses, and presented the account as a claim against the United States for services in that war. It has been pending before the War Department for a number of years, and there has been a difficulty in getting at the amount of the balance due. The difficulty arose from the manner of enrolling the men. The papers are not clear upon the subject. The Department was not satisfied with the vouchers, and sent them to us as they had them. The subject was before the Committee of Ways and Means, and the objection made to them was that they were not explicit enough. The Senate, however, have put the amendment into the bill, and it comes to this House with no more light than we had before.

Mr. HAWKINS. I desire to ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means whether or not this has been recommended by the War Department?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. All that I can state on that point is that the War Department has sent in an estimate of the amount that will be necessary to pay it. I am not certain as to whether they recommend its payment.

Mr. HAWKINS. I have now on my desk a most positive recommendation from the Secretary of War as to the payment of this amount, and I would like to have it read.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There is another claim for Florida volunteers; and inasmuch as these amendments have not been printed, I may be confounding one with the other.

Mr. HAWKINS. There was an item yesterday in the Army appropriation bill for the payment of Florida troops, amounting to $385,000. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means adverted then to a letter purporting to be from the Secretary of War, stating that besides the amount of $385,000, $200,000 more would be necessary. The impression made on me, and on the House, was that that claim was rejected by the Committee of Ways and Means because the vouchers were not in form—because these claims were presented to the Department informally, and that therefore they ought not to be allowed. I obtained, this morning, from the Finance Committee of the Senate, a positive recommendation from the Secretary of War that this amount should be paid; and I here state that these troops were not the troops of the State of Florida. They were troops raised in Florida, however; but were regularly mustered into the service of the United States on the requisition of the Secretary of War. There were ten companies of them. They served their country faithfully, and brought the war to a close by their gallantry; and now this debt is due to them by this Government. Why, therefore, this amendment should be recommended by the Committee of Ways and Means to be rejected, I do not know. I do not understand the principle of morality by which an honest debt should be thus summarily given the go-by. These troops were as much entitled to their pay as any troops in the regular Army. Indeed, the moment they were mustered into the service of the country, they became a part and parcel of the regular Army.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Were they not paid by the State of Florida?

Mr. HAWKINS. No, sir; the gentleman is mistaken in all this transaction. He has not made himself acquainted with the true state of the case; and it is of that I complain. I thought yesterday that it was the amount of the debt that seemed to stagger the Committee of Ways and Means. Why, if the amount of a debt is to take away the obligation to pay it, every man could very easily pay his small debts and let his larger debts take care of themselves. I now send to the Clerk's desk two papers, one from the Secretary of War, and another from the Paymaster General, asking the appropriation from the Committee on Finance for the payment of these claims. It is an honest debt due by the Government to these troops of Florida, and I trust that, when the question comes up to be voted on formally by the House, my remarks will not be forgotten.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman allow me to put an interrogatory to him?

Mr. HAWKINS. Yes.

Mr. GIDDINGS. I desire to know whether this claim was not formerly before the Committee of Claims, and whether it was not rejected by all the committees of the House?

Mr. HAWKINS. No, sir. There were other claims of Florida volunteers before the committee, and those claims are now pending before Congress.

Mr. GIDDINGS. This claim is a recent transaction?

Mr. HAWKINS. Yes, sir.

Mr. GIDDINGS. In what year did these troops serve?

Mr. HAWKINS. In 1856 and 1857.

Mr. GIDDINGS. That is what I wanted to get at.

Mr. HAWKINS. I would state to the gentleman from Ohio that these were troops brought into service on the requisition of the President of the United States.

Mr. GIDDINGS. Will the gentleman inform us why the proper Department has refused to pay them?

Mr. HAWKINS. It was owing simply to the fact that the vouchers were not in proper order, and did not conform to the rigid requirements of the various Departments. I ask that the letters be read.

The letters were read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, June 3, 1858.
SIR: I have the honor to inclose herewith a communication from the Paymaster General of the Army, submitting an estimate for the payment of the Florida volunteers, called into service by General Harney, and to request an appropriation in accordance with the suggestions therein contained.

I am, sir, very respectfully, your obedient servant,
JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.
Hon. R. M. T. HUNTER, Chairman Committee Finance, United States Senate.

PAYMASTER GENERAL'S OFFICE, June 3, 1858.
SIR: I have the honor to report, agreeably to your directions, that the regiments and the independent companies of Florida volunteers called into service by General Harney, for the period of six months, will require for their payment $385,000.

Upon the discharge of this force, ten companies were mustered into service by Colonel Loomis, for the same period. These have been ordered to be discharged, with the exception of two companies; but the muster-rolls have not yet reached the Adjutant General's office. From the best data to be obtained, it will require the further sum for their payment of $140,000; making, for both services, the sum of $525,000.

In my former estimate for the payment of Florida volunteers, the sum of $172,000 was asked for to refund to the Treasury that amount, drawn from balances of old appropriations, and expended in paying Florida volunteers for services prior to this estimate, which were then supposed to be applicable to that object. But the accounting officers do not feel authorized to credit the paymaster with the amount disbursed by him from said funds.

The balances referred to were for "preventing and suppressing Indian hostilities," ($132,000,) and for "traveling allowance of volunteers," ($40,000.)

If the $172,000 be added to the estimate, it will only be with the view of refunding that amount to the Treasury, and to enable the accounting officers to close the paymaster's accounts.

I have the honor to be, respectfully, your obedient servant,

BENJAMIN F. LARNED,
Paymaster General.

Hon. JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, my friend from Florida seems to be laboring under the impression that the Committee of Ways and Means have not sufficiently investigated, or are not fully posted, on this matter. Now, there is some truth in that allegation; and I wish to give the reason of it. We have been in session six months. This is an item charged against this Government as long ago as 1855-56. The regular estimates for the year were made out by the War Department; but no estimate for this reached us from that time till after we had passed on the Army bill and had reported it to the House. We were then asked to take this up and offer it as an amendment to the bill. The only paper submitted to the Committee of Ways and Means was a letter from the Secretary of War, and perhaps another paper connected with it, asking for the sum of $385,000 for those volunteers. It came to us at so late a period that the committee had no time to investigate the facts. The papers were then transferred to the Senate committee, and the Senate put this amendment on the bill. I now ask to have read the letter of the Secretary of War.

The letter was read, as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, WASHINGTON, June 9, 1858.

SIR: Upon consultation with the Paymaster General, since I saw you this morning, I find it will require $525,000 to pay the indebtedness of the Government to the Florida volunteers; and that this sum is independent of the credit of $172,000, which can be settled by transfer.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

JOHN B. FLOYD, Secretary of War.

Hon. D. L. YULEE, United States Senate.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, that letter reached me yesterday, informing me that a further sum of $200,000 would be required to pay the amount claimed for the Florida volunteers. I simply stated the fact yesterday after the letter had reached me. I submitted all the facts and all the light that the committee had. I wished to make these remarks to show the gentleman from Florida that it was no fault of the Committee of Ways and Means; and that, if he or his predecessor had brought this matter before the Committee of Ways and Means, it would have been investigated thoroughly, and reported upon.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I would like to inquire of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, or of the gentleman from Florida, under what law or authority these volunteers were called out? I understand that, by the act of 1795, the President is authorized to call out the militia to repel foreign invasion; but that law does not confer on him any power to call out volunteers; and, as I understand, the case of invasion did not arise here. A hostile movement of a tribe of Indians within a State is not an invasion of the State.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I should have stated that the investigation of this subject should have been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and not to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The question was taken on the Senate amendment; and it was not concurred in.

Forty-first amendment:

SEC. 3. Be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any commissioned officer of the Army to administer the prescribed oath of enlistment to recruits, provided there be no civil magistrate authorized to administer the same within reach.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence.

Mr. LETCHER. That proposition ought to be amended so as to substitute in lieu of the words "within reach" the words "where the service of no magistrate can be obtained."

The amendment was agreed to; and the Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Forty-second amendment:

SEC. 4. Be it further enacted, That there be appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for preparing for printing the drawings of the sailing charts of the Behring's Straits and northern Pacific exploring and surveying expedition, under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Navy, but not for printing the same, $6,700.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence.

The amendment was not concurred in.

Forty-third amendment:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the eleventh section of the act of March 3, 1847, entitled "An act making provision for an additional number of general officers and for other purposes," which deprives sutlers of the Army of the right to a lien on any part of the pay of a soldier, or to appear at the pay-table to receive the soldier's pay from the paymaster, be, and the same is hereby repealed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As the law now stands, the sutler has no lien on the soldier's pay. This amendment would give the sutler a lien on the soldier for all his pay. It is considered a very objectionable amendment, and the Committee of Ways and Means, recommend non-concurrence.

Mr. CURTIS. There is no doubt the Senate amendment is right, and I hope the House will adopt it. This matter was before the Military Committee, and they were unanimous in favor of a law which would give the sutler a right to his due, as this amendment of the Senate is designed to do. As the law now stands, the soldier has the power to cheat the sutler out of his just dues. I hope, therefore, the amendment of the Senate will prevail.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Why should the sutler have more right than anybody else?

Mr. CURTIS. He is a useful agent, and a convenience to the Army, and has therefore been incorporated and recognized as a part of the military organization; and he ought to be secured from being defrauded in his just dues, as other persons, in and out of the Army, are protected by reasonable restraint or provisions of law. Such provisions in regard to sutlers existed from the early history of our country down to the year 1847, when the existing law was most unfortunately interpolated, very much as this repealing law is now fortunately attempted by this amendment of the Senate. The sutler has to follow the Army, where no other than military laws prevail; and in such localities, as the law now stands, when soldiers are discharged, they have the opportunity to receive their pay from the paymaster, and leave the sutler to follow them to some unknown place in the States, where civil laws would be utterly unavailable. Sutlers are thus defrauded of their just dues; and of my own knowledge, I can say that many of them have been cheated out of large amounts; and from easy circumstances, some have been reduced to poverty. I am sure that the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs will concur with me in urging the adoption of the Senate amendment.

The price of the articles furnished by the sutlers is fixed by a board of officers in every regiment, and there is, therefore, full provision against the soldier being cheated. There is no protection for the sutler, and I am told by letters received this winter, that soldiers boast of the number of sutlers they have cheated. The adoption of the Senate amendment will restore to sutlers a just and reasonable remedy against such frauds, and I am confident if the rules allowed a full statement in regard to this matter, the Committee of Ways and Means would recommend a concurrence in, and not a rejection of the Senate amendment.

Mr. QUITMAN. I move, pro forma, to strike out the first four lines of the amendment.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that a bill for the relief of the sutlers of the United States Army, reported from the Committee on Military Affairs, some time last December, stands second upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. That subject had been referred to the Committee on Military Affairs, and they promptly and unanimously reported the bill I allude to. Most of the members of that committee are military men, and knowing the operation of the law, are in favor of its repeal, in order to give the sutlers a lien upon the soldier's pay. They believe that the repeal would be of service to the soldier himself. The arguments in favor of the proposition have been submitted by my friend from Iowa, [Mr. CURTIS.]

There is a council of administration in every regiment that fixes the price of every article which the sutler supplies. There is a mischievous propensity on the part of the soldiers of the regular Army to run up accounts with the sutlers, and then fail to pay the debts they have contracted. There is sometimes a sort of personal pride in overreaching the sutler. They pay for the contraband articles which they get outside as a debt of honor, while they postpone and put off the honest debt. The consequence is, that the council of administration, in fixing the price of the sutler's articles, increase the price because of the uncertainty of his being paid. The articles are put at a higher rate than they would be if this lien were allowed. Besides, cash is frequently required down, and thus the soldiers are deprived of many of the conveniences and comforts which they can only get from the sutler. These sutlers, indeed, are necessary for distant posts, and there must be a certainty of pay to induce them to take there the conveniences and comforts required by the soldiers. Under the Senate amendment they will have to pay only the price fixed by their own officers, and when they are transferred from one post to another the sutler's account will be transferred with them, and be allowed on their pay-day. It is only just that he should be allowed that which he has advanced for the comfort of the soldier. The matter has received the unanimous approbation of the Committee on Military Affairs. They reported a bill, which is now second upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, but has been, like most other business there outside of the appropriation bills, absorbed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.]

Mr. LETCHER. This single illustration will show some of the embarrassments and difficulties which surround us who constitute the Committee of Ways and Means. Now, here is a proposition which it seems is unanimously reported by the Committee on Military Affairs, and placed upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for consideration. We never heard of it until now, and the first we do hear of it, it comes from the other end of the Capitol, in an appropriation bill, to pass in the shape of an amendment to the Army bill.

Mr. QUITMAN. I desire to say that I fully concur with the gentleman from Virginia in his opposition to putting extraneous matter upon the appropriation bills.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not complain of the distinguished gentleman at all, because I know what his views are on that subject; but I refer to this as one illustration to show the embarrassments and difficulties which surround us in the discharge of our duties.

In regard to the merits of this proposition upon which I decided as I found it in that bill, I could not see, and really do not see now, why a lien should be given to a sutler upon the pay of the soldier, for the grog of that soldier or any other pecuniary obligation he contracts with an Army sutler. I do not see why it should be given to him and to no other creditor. He may have creditors for furnishing his family. He may have creditors for furnishing other articles to himself, and I cannot really see how the line of demarcation can be drawn which would give to sutlers a preference, or rather a lien on his pay, while it would deny to every other creditor, who was as fair a creditor, as just a creditor, as honest a creditor, the same sort of lien for obligations due him.

Mr. CURTIS. The object is to induce the sutlers to carry these conveniences and necessities out to Army posts where there can be no competition and no sale for them. It would a soldier now at Camp Scott receive little conveniences and luxuries, except through the sutlers who have followed the Army there? By giving them this power to collect their debts, they are willing to carry their articles to remote posts, where the soldier could not otherwise be accommodated.

Mr. LETCHER. My idea about all that sort of legislation is this, that where the relation between creditor and debtor is established, it is a voluntary relation between the parties themselves; and I do not like that system of legislation which undertakes to say that that which has been a voluntary arrangement shall be made compulsory for the benefit of one creditor to the exclusion of all other creditors equally if not more meritorious. But it is a matter which I care nothing about. If it is acceptable to the Military Committee, it is agreeable to me.

Mr. CURTIS. The sutler is just as much a part and portion of the Army as the quartermaster himself; and he is governed by rules and regulations peculiar to his branch of the service. He is quite as necessary to furnish accommodations to the sick, wounded, and weary, as any officer of the Army.

Mr. QUITMAN, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I desire to say one word in response to the gentleman from Mississippi. I think the gentleman from Iowa and the gentleman from Mississippi will do great good, and help the Committee of Ways and Means in their desire to occupy less of the time of the House, if they would only join us in cutting off all legislation matured by other committees. The great consumption of time by the Committee of Ways and Means arises from the fact that other committees instead of having their own bills legislated upon, at the end of the session have them ingrafted upon the appropriation bills, without explanation or examination. The only remedy is, for them to join the Committee of Ways and Means in striking out everything coming from other committees, unless they are germane to the bill.

Mr. CURTIS. I make no objection to this matter, coming from the Committee of Ways and Means as it does; but I am satisfied that, if they understood this matter, they would be satisfied of the beneficial operation of this amendment.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. I wish to amend the amendment of the Senate by adding to it this proviso:

Provided, That there shall be no lien upon the wages of the soldier for any sum due by him to a sutler for any spirituous liquor, or other intoxicating liquor sold or furnished to him.

It is probably true, as has been stated by my friend, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, and by the gentleman from Iowa, that it is proper that a lien should be given to the sutler for supplies furnished to soldiers for necessities which are essential to their comfort at remote posts. I have no doubt that the failure to give that lien results in the manner in which my friend from Mississippi states: that it increases the cost of articles of real necessity for the soldiers. It may be proper, therefore, that thus far the law which has been referred to, should be repealed. But according to my notions, that lien should extend no further than to such accounts as grow out of the supply of actual necessities. So far as to accounts which might grow out of sales of liquors to them, I have this to say: we all know the weakness of many of our common soldiers, and their habits in relation to intoxicating drinks; and we are all aware of the temptation in the way of sutlers to make money by furnishing them with excessive supplies of articles of that description.

Mr. QUITMAN. In the abstract I concur with the position of the gentleman from Louisiana, but I rise to state the fact that in nineteen twentieths of the Army, the sale of liquor is entirely forbidden. The commanding generals forbid the sale of liquors, and where forbidden of course no lien arises from the sale of articles which are held in the nature of contraband. In the army of Mexico the sale of liquors was generally forbidden. Only General Wheat allowed soldiers to drink as much as they pleased, but if he found a soldier drunk he punished him very severely. I desired only to say that the amendment of the gentleman, of which I am in favor, is applicable to but a very few cases in the Army.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. Before offering my amendment I made the inquiry whether it was the practice of sutlers to sell liquors. I was informed by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs that there were instances in which it was done. It is a permission liable to abuse, and may be taken advantage of by sutlers to the great injury of the soldier. I would have no objection to the adoption of the principle involved in the Senate amendment so far as relates to the real necessities purchased by the soldier, as it would operate, I have no doubt, to cheapen all the articles he might really require, but I would extend it no further than this, and therefore hope that the proviso presented by me may be ingrafted on the Senate amendment, if it is to become a law, so that the soldier may be protected from the effects of his own imprudence so far as relates to the indulgence of his appetite for liquor, and that a motive for gratifying improperly this appetite may not be furnished to the sutler.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The law now proposed to be repealed by the Senate amendment was passed in 1847—eleven years ago; and this is the first intimation I ever heard that it was wrong, or had any wrong tendency in practice. That law was passed for the protection and for the benefit of the old soldiers, who get but the small pittance of nine dollars a month, I believe, while the one which is now proposed to be passed, abolishing that law, is, in its effect, for the benefit of the sutlers, and nobody else. If you continue that law of 1847 in force, what will be the effect of it? It will be that the sutler credits the soldier at his own risk. If, then, he will not credit the soldier because he cannot compel the old soldier to pay him a portion of his small pittance, let him refrain from crediting him. Let the soldier get his money, and then let the sutler sell to the soldier for the money. Who will be injured by this? The whole credit system, I have no doubt, has a tendency to make the cost of articles vended to the soldiers much greater than they would be if they were to be paid for at the time they were sold.

But, sir, what justice, what propriety is there in giving the sutler a lien upon the wages of the soldier, any more than there is in giving a hotel keeper, or a boarding-house keeper, in this city, a lien upon the compensation of members of Congress, or of giving to the various persons who credit the clerks here in the Departments, a lien upon the salaries of these clerks? What more justice is there in giving sutlers a lien upon the soldiers' wages than there would be in giving persons in this city a lien upon the compensation of the various employes of the Government in this city and throughout the country? The law of 1847 was intended for the benefit of the soldiers, and, so far as I know or believe, it has worked well, and has been salutary in its operations since its passage, and I can see no good that can result to anybody by its repeal, unless it is to the sutler. The sutler is a favored, a privileged individual at best, because when he gets the appointment to keep and sell these articles to the Army at a post, no other person can keep them at that post, as I understand the regulations. Why, then, should you allow him a mortgage on the wages of his customers? I hope the House will reject the whole thing.

The amendment of Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana, was disagreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was non-concurred in.

Forty-fourth amendment:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That all the existing laws, or parts of laws, which authorize the sale of military sites which are or may become useless for military purposes, be, and the same are hereby, repealed; and said lands shall not be subject to sale or preemption under any of the laws of the United States: Provided further, That the provisions of the act of August 18, 1856, relative to certain reservations in the State of Florida, shall continue in force.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That amendment forbids the sale of military sites hereafter unless provided for by legislation. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The forty-fifth, forty-sixth, and forty-seventh amendments of the Senate relate to the same subject; and I ask that they be read and considered together.

There being no objection, the amendments were read, as follows:

Forty-fifth amendment:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That the second section of the act of the 2d of March, 1851, entitled "An act to found a military asylum for the relief and support of invalid and disabled soldiers of the Army of the United States," be so amended as to reduce the number of commissioners authorized by that section to three, to consist of the Commissary General of Subsistence, the Surgeon General, and Adjutant General, any two of whom shall be a quorum for the transaction of business, whose duty it shall be to examine and audit the accounts of the treasurer quarterly, and to visit and inspect said asylum at least once in every month; this section to take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1858.

Forty-sixth amendment:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the benefits of the said act shall be extended so as to include invalid and disabled soldiers of the war of 1812, and of all subsequent wars, subject only to the restriction in the proviso of the fourth section of said act; this section to take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1858.

Forty-seventh amendment:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That all pensioners on account of wounds or disability, incurred in the military service, shall transfer and surrender their pensions to the institution, for and during the time they remain therein, and voluntarily continue to receive its benefits; this section to take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1858.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The forty-fifth amendment reduces the number of commissioners. The forty-sixth amendment extends the privileges of the asylum to all soldiers disabled or wounded in the war of 1812. The forty-seventh amendment proposes that they shall surrender their pensions during the time they are in the military asylum. These amendments appear to have originated with the Military Committee of the Senate. It is a revision of the pension laws. It may, perhaps, be a good reform, but it is legislation upon a very important subject; and the Committee of Ways and Means were called upon to pass upon it without a single paper or estimate, or any information except what appears upon the face of it. We are of opinion that it is legislation, and should be presented to the House in some other shape, and from some other committee; or, at all events, that it should be examined. It may be meritorious; but, under the circumstances, the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendments were non-concurred in.

Forty-eighth amendment:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That the deduction of twenty-five cents per month from the pay of every non-commissioned officer, musician, artificer, and private in the Army, shall be reduced to twelve and a half cents a month; this section to take effect from and after the 1st day of July, 1858.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Under the present law, twenty-five cents a month is paid by the soldiers of the Army for an asylum fund. This amendment proposes to reduce that amount from twenty-five cents to twelve and a half cents per month. The Committee of Ways and Means know of no reason why this should be done. They had no information on the subject, and recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Forty-ninth amendment:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of the unexpended balance of the appropriation for the war debt of the State of California, made by the last section of the act approved August 5, 1854, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th June, 1855," any outstanding and unpaid bonds and coupons issued by said State for said war debt prior to the passage of said act, but bearing date subsequent to the 1st day of January, 1854: Provided, That no payment shall be made beyond the unexpended amount of said appropriation now remaining in the Treasury.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This is the last amendment to the Army appropriation bill. The California war debt, with which the House is familiar, has been adjusted and paid by that State. By the act of 5th August, 1854, a certain amount of money was appropriated by Congress to reimburse the State of California for the war debt. There was a proviso to that bill, which compelled them not to exceed the sum appropriated in that act. The Secretary of War was directed to examine into and ascertain the amount of expense incurred and actually paid by the State of California in the suppression of Indian hostilities within that State, prior to the 1st of January, 1854. It turned out, in the adjustment of these accounts, that some few of the debts accrued subsequent to the 1st of January, 1854. The main bulk of the debts had accrued prior to that time, but as the limitation in that act confined the payment to expenses incurred prior to that date, the accounting officers of the Treasury could not pay the other expenses, although the sum appropriated was sufficient to cover them all.

The object of this amendment is to enable the accounting officers of the Treasury to pay the debts which accrued subsequent to the 1st of January, 1854, with a proviso limiting them to the amount already appropriated. There does not appear to be any objection to the amendment, except that it is legislation upon a very important subject. I have examined the question, and, so far as my information goes, I believe the amendment to be right. The Committee of Ways and Means, however, recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move that the committee rise, and report the amendments to the House, with its action thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BOGOCCK reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to the Army appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with a recommendation that some of said amendments be concurred in, and others non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question upon the amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union with reference to the first and second amendments of the Senate was concurred in.

The third amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

Strike out the following paragraph:

"For the alteration of old arms, so as to make them breech-loading arms, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, $100,000."

And insert in lieu thereof the following:

For the purchase of breech-loading carbines of the best model, to be selected and approved by a board of ordnance officers, $45,000.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. DURFEE. I hope the House will concur in that amendment. I call for the yeas and nays upon it.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. DURFEE. I ask for tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. PEYTON and FOSTER were appointed.

Mr. FAULKNER. The Senate substituted two paragraphs for what they struck out—the third and fourth amendments. They were considered together in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and I ask that they may be acted on together now.

The Clerk read the fourth amendment of the Senate, as follows:

For alteration of old arms, so as to make them breech-loading arms, upon a model to be selected and approved by a board of ordnance officers, $25,000: Provided, That any portion of said sum not exceeding $5,000 may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in applying to the old or new arms the recent improvement of Captain J. M. Ward, in the mode of applying Maynard's primer.

Mr. DURFEE. I merely desire to say that this has been recommended by the Secretary of War.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not understand this question exactly. It seems to me that the Senate have put in that $45,000 as an independent proposition to buy breech-loading carbines. They have stricken out the appropriation of $100,000 for altering old arms, and put in a provision appropriating $25,000 for that purpose. Let us take the vote on purchasing the new arms as a separate proposition, and then let us take the vote on striking out the House provision and inserting that of the Senate.

Mr. DURFEE. I call the gentleman to order. I was not allowed to debate the question.

Mr. SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the gentleman as debating the question.

The Chair, after looking at the amendments, cannot see any connection between the two propositions. The vote will be taken separately, first upon striking out the provision of the House and inserting the amendment of the Senate appropriating $45,000 for breech-loading carbines, and then the vote will be taken on inserting the provision of the Senate appropriating $25,000 for altering old arms into breech-loading arms.

Mr. GROW. How, then, after we have voted on striking out and inserting, can we act on the $25,000 provision for altering old arms?

Mr. COVODE. It strikes me that it takes both provisions to make a whole; and that, therefore, both should be voted on together. There should be a vote on striking out, and inserting the two provisions, one for the carbines, and the other for altering old arms. I understand that the Secretary of War is satisfied with the Senate amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It strikes me that the question ought to be taken on striking out the provision of the House, and inserting the amendment appropriating $25,000 for altering old muskets. Both provisions correspond in reference to the object aimed at, and the only difference is in the amount appropriated. The other provision is for breech-loading carbines.

The SPEAKER. The Chair can only regard the amendments in the way in which they are reported from the Senate. That may have been the intention of the Senate, but the papers do not show it.

The House then divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 52, noes 83.

So the amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with reference to the amendments of the Senate, numbered from four to seventeen, inclusive, was concurred in—the fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, and fifteenth amendments being concurred in; and the fourth, sixteenth, and seventeenth, being non-concurred in.

Eighteenth amendment:

For the payment of the volunteers operating in Florida, during the year 1837, $385,000.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. HAWKINS. I have already troubled the House with some remarks in relation to this item. I will now send to the Clerk's desk some papers which clearly establish the propriety of this amendment.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. HAWKINS. Can I not have the papers read?

The SPEAKER. If there be no objection the papers can be read.

Objection was made.

Mr. HAWKINS. Then I call for a separate vote on the amendment.

The question was taken; and there were, on a division—ayes nineteen, noes not counted.

So the amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

Nineteenth amendment:

For continuing the construction of the following works of defense:

For Fort Knox, at the narrows of the Penobscot river, Maine, $50,000.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence.

Mr. WHITELEY. The next seventeen or eighteen amendments are all similar in character. I ask that the vote be taken on all of them together; and I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand that all these amendments are in relation to fortifications.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I do not care. I want separate votes on them.

Mr. WHITELEY. I withdraw the call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I renew it. I want to test this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Can I, by any means, obtain information as to the work? for, if I find it in operation, I am desirous to go for it.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 53, nays 115; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Barksdale, Bryan, Burlingame, Cavanaugh, Claflie, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clay, Collins, Cragin, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dick, Dowdell, Eustis, Faulkner, Florence, Foster, Goode, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Keitt, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Maclay, McKibbin, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Palmer, Potter, Reilly, Rit die, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Sandridge, Scott, Shorter, Sickles, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, Wood, and Zolliecoffer—53.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Brayton, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Caruthers, Case, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dimmick, Dodd, Edmundson, English, Fenton, Foley, Garnett, Garrett, Giddings, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Harlan, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Gancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kilgore, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Morgan, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Niblack, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Quitman, Ready, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stan on, Stephens, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, Thompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Walton, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, White, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—115.

So the amendment of the Senate was not concurred in.

The amendments of the Senate from number twenty to number twenty-nine inclusive were severally non-concurred in.

The thirtieth amendment of the Senate, in which the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence, was then read, as follows:

Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, $100,000.

Mr. DOWDELL demanded the yeas and nays, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Thirty-first amendment:

Fort Jefferson, Garden Key, Tortugas, Florida, $200,000.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a non-concurrence.

Mr. DOWDELL demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, with reference to the amendments of the Senate numbered from thirty-two to thirty-eight inclusive, was concurred in, and the said amendments were disagreed to.

The thirty-ninth amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

For the construction of bridges, and the improvement of the crossings of streams on the road from Fort Smith, in Arkansas, to Albuquerque, in New Mexico, $50,000; and that the sum of $10,000 be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be expended in completing connected sections of the road extending from Albuquerque, in the Territory of New Mexico, westward on the route of the Colorado river, and on or near the thirty-fifth parallel of north latitude.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri, demanded tellers. Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HAWKINS and BURLINGAME were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported seventy-five in the affirmative.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 92, nays 72; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Caruthers, Case, Cavanaugh, Claflie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Corning, Covode, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilmer, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Hughes, Huyler, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Lovejoy, Maclay, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Murray, Niblack, Pendleton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Ready, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandridge, Scott, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Walton, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, Woodson, and Zolliecoffer—92.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bocock, Bryan, Burnett, Clemens, Cobb, Collins, Cragin, Burton Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Fenton, Garnett, Garrett, Gillis, Goode, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Gancy Jones, Kilgore, Knapp, Leiter, Letcher, Mason, Matteson, Millson, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, Powell, Quitman, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, Talbot, Tompkins, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Waldron, Israel Washburn, White, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—72.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, stated that his colleague, Mr. SHAW, had paired off with Mr. PIKE, of New Hampshire, for the rest of the session.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, as we are now paying seven hundred and odd thousand dollars for transporting the mails to California by way of Panama; three hundred and odd thousand for the same service over the Tehuantepec route; and six hundred and odd thousand for the overland route, to which we have added over one hundred thousand this morning, I shall vote "no."

The vote was announced as above reported.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

The action of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on Senate amendments, from the fortieth to the forty-ninth inclusive, was concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to reconsider the several votes on concurring in the Senate amendments; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CASE OF JUDGE WATROUS.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I wish to call up the case of Judge Watrous, with a view to move a postponement of the further consideration of the case until the second Thursday of December next.

No objection being made, the case was taken up.

Mr. CHAPMAN. I move that the further consideration of the case be postponed until the second Thursday of December next. I will merely remark that this proposition is acquiesced in by the members of the Judiciary Committee on both sides. It will be remembered that reports were presented by two branches of the committee, one report favorable to Judge Watrous, and the other report adverse to him; one on the presumption that he is entirely innocent and guiltless of the charges, the other recommending that he be impeached. This acquiescence was entered into by the respective members of the Judiciary Committee, believing that it was impossible during the present session that the case should have as full and complete a hearing as its importance demands. It will be remembered, also, that there is a memorial by Judge Watrous, and there is a volume of testimony of several hundred pages; and I doubt very much whether any member of this body has yet examined that testimony in full. It is impossible to avoid protracted discussion in this case. And if that discussion which should be desired by many members who have spoken to me upon the subject, should be entertained, I do not believe the House can adjourn at the time that has already been agreed upon. It is from these considerations that the committee have unanimously agreed to make the proposition which I have submitted.

Mr. REAGAN. I know the impatience of the House; but I desire to ask its indulgence in a few remarks upon this case. I would not interpose an objection to the recommendation of both branches of the committee. I know that committee has gone through one of the most laborious investigations that they could be called upon to go through. I know they are better apprised of the facts of the case, the importance of its investigation, perhaps, than I am. I desired to say that if the members of this House could have been satisfied from the reports of the committee, and from the evidence before them, it would have been greatly desirable to me, as a Representative from Texas, to have urged upon the House action upon this case at this time. It may not be out of place to say that I think it is due to myself, and to the State I represent, that I should make the statement I desire now to make in reference to this matter. At the time Judge Watrous went upon the bench in Texas, in 1846, he was known to be interested as counsel for the establishment of a very large class of fraudulent land claims.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I hope the merits of this case will not be gone into upon this motion to postpone. The gentleman is making statements, whether they pertain to the merits or not, calculated to do great injustice to the parties in this matter.

Mr. REAGAN. I will say to the gentleman that statements are being published throughout the land intended to influence public judgment; and I am going to appeal to the House to allow me to put upon the record of the nation, to be sent to the country, a refutation of the statements made, as I have stated, to vindicate the course and character of Judge Watrous.

The SPEAKER. On the motion to postpone, the debate must be confined strictly to the propriety or impropriety of the postponement. It does not open up the merits of the case at all.

Mr. REAGAN. I had hoped most sincerely that, inasmuch as statements have gone forth to the country, first in the answer of Judge Watrous himself, and then by a memorial which has been laid upon the desks of members, which misrepresent the facts, and leave a wrong impression on the public mind—not in Texas, for that cannot be done there—I say I had hoped this House would permit me to make a statement. But as I cannot have that privilege, I will limit my remarks to assigning a few reasons why, if it should meet the approval of this House, I desire the trial of Judge Watrous.

The present term of the district court has been lost by the necessary absence of Judge Watrous here to defend himself against the charges. At the last Congress, a report of the Committee on the Judiciary, after an elaborate investigation of the facts, recommended an impeachment.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I think the gentleman is traveling outside of the record.

Mr. REAGAN. I will confine myself to the record.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. These remarks will have no other effect upon the public mind than to create prejudice against the persons prosecuting here.

Mr. REAGAN. The gentleman will see that I am only preparing to submit the reasons why this case ought to be acted on at the earliest practicable day. I was going on to show that the Judiciary Committee, at the last session, did recommend an impeachment, after an elaborate investigation of the case. The Judiciary Committee of the present Congress has investigated the case; and part of the committee recommend an impeachment, and another part that he be not impeached. The question will arise as to the condition of the district over which he presides, in case the House fail to act on the report of the Judiciary Committee. I suppose it is hardly to be presumed that a man whose impeachment has been recommended by the Judiciary Committee of one Congress, and by four members of the Judiciary Committee of this House, will go upon the bench to decide cases pending the action of this House; and hence it is, Mr. Speaker, that it is desirable, for the purpose of the administration of the law in that district, that this trial should be had at as early a period as possible. If the judge cannot, under the existing facts, hold the court in that district, I presume he will not attempt to do so till this case is acted upon. It will be seen that this constitutes one important reason why this case should not be postponed.

Mr. READY. I wish to know whether Judge Watrous did not go on and hold his court after the adjournment of last Congress?

Mr. REAGAN. I understand he did.

Mr. READY. And was there not a unanimous report in the last Congress recommending his impeachment?

Mr. REAGAN. There was.

Mr. READY. Then why should he not hold court now?

The SPEAKER. The Chair has indulged gentlemen in making reference to the proceedings of a former Congress. The Chair must now confine the debate strictly to the question of postponement.

Mr. HILL. I would inquire to what time the postponement is to be made.

The SPEAKER. The second Thursday in December.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I understand the Judiciary Committee agree, unanimously, to that plan.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Yes.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I do not see why there should be any difficulty about it.

Mr. HOUSTON. My friend from Pennsylvania, in speaking of the acquiescence of the committee, used, as a matter of course, the proper term, for I acquiesced in what the other members of the committee had determined on. That term expresses correctly my position on the subject; but I propose to suggest that it would be better to shorten the time, if possible, and for what I regard as a good reason. The difference of a week or two will be important. If this resolution for impeachment be adopted by the House of Representatives at the next session, it will be important that it be adopted at as early a day as possible. It will be recollected, that at the close of the next session this Congress terminates, and if a trial should be had, and not completed by the ending of this Congress, it would, as a matter of course, have to be gone over again, or have to go into the hands of persons who had not witnessed the first part of the trial.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. My friend is mistaken. If the Senate acquire jurisdiction by articles of impeachment, they can retain the jurisdiction until the trial takes place.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am aware of that; but my friend from New York did not get the point, and I suppose it was my fault. I say that if the House should pass the resolution of impeachment, then it becomes a case in court, and remains in court. There is no doubt about that. The impeachment does not expire with the ending of Congress; but I say this: that the Senators who are the judges of the court are changing, and the Senators who are in this Congress will not be, all of them, the Senators of the next Congress; so that it is important that, if this case is to be tried at all, it should be tried at the next term of the court, or else, if it goes over to the next Congress, it will have to be tried de novo. Besides, the managers would have to be changed; out that could be done with much less difficulty. It is vital to the whole case that it should be tried at the next session, if at all, and therefore the saving of a week may be important.

The SPEAKER. The second Thursday will be the 9th of December, and will be the first Thursday after the meeting of Congress.

Mr. REAGAN. I wish to make one further remark; and, as I see a disposition on the part of the House to concur in the recommendation of the committee, I shall not press my opposition. I wish to say that it is no part of my desire to precipitate the action of the House in a matter of so great importance as this. I only rose to conform to what I believe to be the feeling and wish of my State—not, indeed, what I believe, but what I know, to be their wish. That State has twice acted in relation to this judge; once asking him to resign, and, at last session, asking an investigation.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. The gentleman has already, time and again, alluded to this action against Judge Watrous. I ask him if the resolutions of the last Legislature did not expressly avoid expressing any opinion as to his guilt or innocence?

Mr. REAGAN. What I said was, that they instructed their Representatives here to urge the trial of Judge Watrous; and, as the gentleman from North Carolina says, they very properly waived an expression of opinion as to his guilt or innocence. I only wish to say that I do not want to precipitate the investigation of so important a case; but, if this House is satisfied to act, it is of the utmost importance that it should act promptly, for the reason I first assigned—that we ought to have a court in that district as early as possible—and for the reason that the ultimate investigation of this case may not be embarrassed by delay.

Mr. BRYAN. In consequence of the impatience of the House, Mr. Speaker, I have not much to say in regard to the question now before the House. I know that the House is anxious to dispose of it, but as the previous question was moved when the matter was last before the House, and as this may be the last time that it will be before the House this session, I trust that the House will not consider it an intrusion on their patience or their time, for me to occupy a few moments of it. Representing, as I do, a large portion of the district of Judge Watrous, the greatest portion of those who are affected by his acts are consequently represented by me. I was a member, Mr. Speaker of the Legislature of Texas which passed the resolution requesting Judge Watrous to resign, and am somewhat acquainted with the facts connected with that transaction.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas cannot go into that.

Mr. BRYAN. I am not going into the merits of the question. I understand my position.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas must confine himself to the question of postponement.

Mr. BRYAN. I shall do so.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I hope the gentleman will say nothing calculated to prejudice the minds of members.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the question is to be debated let it be thrown open fairly to debate.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. It is very extraordinary that the chairman of the Judiciary Committee did not notice that when the other gentleman [Mr. REAGAN] was speaking.

Mr. HOUSTON. That gentleman spoke so low that I could not hear what he said, and I noticed that the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. CRAIGE] called him to order, and presumed that it was for that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine himself to the question of postponement.

Mr. BRYAN. I will not depart from the question. I also have in my mind the resolutions of the last Legislature of Texas. Those resolutions requested that there should be an examination into the charges that were preferred against Judge Watrous, without pronouncing upon the guilt or innocence of the judge.

Sir, we feel, the people of Texas feel, the judge feels, a deep interest in the investigation of these charges. A judge should be above suspicion; but that he is suspected is no evidence of his guilt.

If, then, the House can, with justice to themselves, make the investigation at this session, we desire it. The evidence is presented before them. They know whether they have time to make the investigation, and whether they can give it that examination which the subject is entitled to. If they feel that they cannot act upon the question this session, I, as one of the Representatives of the State of Texas, would say defer it.

I will call the attention of the House to the published memorial of Judge Watrous, which has been laid upon our desks, simply for the purpose of explanation. He says that one of the eleven-league grants—

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that does not enter into the merits of the question whether the House will postpone the further consideration of the subject.

Mr. BRYAN. Then, sir, I will only say that if the House can, in justice to themselves, and will set aside other less important business, examine this case this session, it would be gratifying to me, as one of the Representatives of Texas, that they should make the investigation. But if the examination is to be hurried and imperfect from want of time to give the subject that examination which its importance demands, I am in favor of its postponement.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I do not know whether it would be proper, as a part of this order, to change the order for printing heretofore made in this case. There is a transcript of a case which was tried before Judge Watrous, and was offered in evidence, covering nearly a thousand pages. About half of it is in the Spanish language, and the remainder is a translation of that. It will not enlighten the House to print the Spanish portion of it, and I desire to have the order to print so modified, before the subject passes from the control of the House, as to dispense with the printing of the Spanish.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Assuming that the recommendation of the Committee on the Judiciary will be acceded to by the House, upon the ground that there is not sufficient time, this session, to give that careful examination to this case which its importance demands, I ask the consent of the House for leave to file an individual report upon the facts of the case, at any time before its consideration. I should have presented it to-day, but I came prepared to enter on the consideration of the question, if the House saw fit to do so. I presume there will be no objection to granting me this leave. I differ, in some respects, from the views of my colleagues, and desire to present an individual report of my conclusions.

The SPEAKER stated that if there was no objection, it would be so ordered.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. My proposition is to modify the order to print.

Mr. REAGAN. If the gentleman from New York will file his report during this session I have no objection; but I shall object to his doing it afterwards.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. No harm can result from it. I only ask the privilege if the case is not considered this session. I came prepared to address the House on this subject to-day or tomorrow.

Mr. MILLSON. Is it in order to move to lay the motion to postpone upon the table?

Mr. STANTON. I hope the report will be laid on the table if there is no other way of disposing of it, for it is evident that it will lead to endless discussion.

Mr. MILLSON. I do not want to lay the report upon the table. I desire to move to lay the motion to postpone upon the table, because I see that the yeas and nays will not be ordered upon it, and I can see no good reason for the postponement. Is it in order to lay the motion to postpone on the table without laying the report itself upon the table?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. PHILLIPS. Mr. Speaker, [loud cries of "Question!"] I am not going to occupy the attention of the House for more than a moment or two. [Renewed cries of "Question!"] I merely wish to say that I am perfectly willing that this matter shall be disposed of, but I am unwilling to postpone the matter, coming up as it does on the report of half of the Committee on the Judiciary, and upon the application of the judge himself. He asks an investigation, and while I am aware of the want of time, I for one will not aid in deferring this judge of an opportunity of being tried. [Loud and vociferous shouts of "Question!"]

The motion to postpone was agreed to.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the motion to postpone was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I now move the following order:

Ordered, That in printing the testimony reported by the Committee on the Judiciary in the case of Judge Watrous, all that part of the case of Cavazos et al. vs. Sullman and Belden et al., the transcript of which constitutes one item of said testimony, as is printed in the Spanish language, be omitted.

I will merely state that all the Spanish is translated into English.

Mr. READY. I think the resolution eminently proper, and I think there can be no difference of opinion in regard to it amongst the members of the committee who investigated the case.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. It may be proper to state that the transcript of the case referred to in the resolution makes a book of eleven hundred pages; and it is hardly worth while to subject the Government to the expense of printing that part of it which is in the Spanish language.

Mr. REAGAN. I hope the House will not consent to this resolution unless the Committee on the Judiciary unanimously recommend it, which I understand they do not.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. The committee has taken no action on the subject.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. The resolution merely proposes to dispense with the printing of the Spanish.

Mr. REAGAN. I want the Spanish printed.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. It can throw no light upon the subject. I ask the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. CLEMENS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAPPAN, by unanimous consent, presented the memorial of Judge Watrous; which was laid upon the table, and ordered to be printed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a bill of the House (No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford; and also notifying the House that it had passed the following joint resolution and bills, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House:

A joint resolution (No. 52) for the relief of William Hazzard Wigg;

A bill (No. 120) for the relief of David Myerle; and

A bill (No. 263) granting the right of way over, and depot grounds on, the military reserve at Fort Gratiot, in the State of Michigan, for railroad purposes.

JUDGE WATROUS—AGAIN.

Mr. REAGAN. Was the memorial of Judge Watrous ordered to be printed?

The SPEAKER. It was.

Mr. REAGAN. I should have objected to any such proposition; and, at the time, I did not know that there was any proposition to print. There is no action to be taken on it. Why order it to be printed? It is made up of what purports to be a defense of his conduct.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Then I object.

SUPPLEMENTAL INDIAN BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the Senate amendments to the supplemental Indian appropriation bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order there until disposed of.

There was no objection; and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the general debate, in committee, on those amendments, be terminated in five minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I ask leave to introduce some bills for reference. One is a bill to reorganize the judicial circuits of the United States.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object. I want all to have a fair chance. Some forty have got ahead of me. I have tried day after day to get the floor, and failed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. FAULKNER in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the supplemental Indian appropriation bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The report of the Committee of Ways and Means on these amendments has been mislaid, and I will state the action of the committee as the amendments are read.

First amendment:

Add as a new section:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to perform the engagements and stipulations of General Harney, made with the Sioux Indians at Fort Pierre, in 1856, $72,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. One hundred thousand dollars was asked for. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

I will make a short statement of the reasons for this appropriation. The documents I have on the subject I will append. It appears that, in 1856, General Harney, then in command of the military force of the United States, in order to secure amicable relations with various bands of the Sioux Indians, agreed to the enlistment into the Army of certain Sioux Indians. A list of them was sent to the War Department here. And, in that agreement, he stipulated that they should have uniforms, rations, and various other things; the policy being to have portions of all the various bands of Indians connected and dovetailed into the Army, so as to keep them continually in check, and to keep our Indian relations upon an amicable footing. He made the promise, but it has never been fulfilled; and it was in consequence of this non-fulfillment that the difficulties arose with the Sioux band last summer. They threaten to renew those difficulties this summer, and the Secretary of the Interior, together with the superintendent of Indian affairs, earnestly recommend an appropriation of $100,000 for the purpose of carrying out the agreement of General Harney. The Senate thought $72,000 would be sufficient, and they placed that amount in their amendment. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

Mr. CRAWFORD. There is one difficulty in the way of giving my support to this appropriation of $72,000. I am perfectly willing to pay that sum to the Sioux Indians as a present, or if this Government has at any time authorized General Harney to make a promise to the Sioux Indians, to give it to them. But my difficulty is in reference to the authority vested in General Harney to make a promise to the Sioux Indians that this Government would give to them, for the purpose of securing a check upon that tribe, some seventy-two thousand dollars. If the head of the Ways and Means Committee suggest to the Clerk any portion of that document which he has, which shows the authority by which General Harney made the promise, I should like to hear him read it, and then I will give this amendment my support. I have never seen any authority, and I presume the chairman of the Ways and Means has not.

If our officers are to be permitted to make promises to the Indians, or to anybody else, without authority of law, to pay them seventy-five, one hundred, or two hundred thousand dollars, we have no control over the Treasury. I ask my friend if he can show me the authority for this promise?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I think I understood my friend from Georgia, the other day, to say that if he were in command of the vessels in the Gulf, and he understood that a British man-of-war was boarding our vessels, he should not wait for orders from Washington before he resented it. Apply that principle to this case. General Harney is sent out among these savage tribes as commander-in-chief of them, of the Army of the United States. They look to him as the representative of this Government. Of course, being savages, they have no conception of the powers with which he is clothed. They meet him clothed with military power, and he tells them that if they do certain things which he believes to be for the interest of this Government, he will recommend to the Government to appropriate money enough to enlist them into the regular Army and to secure peace. He does this thing, of course, subject to the approval of this Government. He makes the arrangements for the good of the country, and he reports the facts to his Government. The thing is neglected, and the Indians complain. But that is not all. These documents inform you that the white citizens upon our frontier tell us that in consequence of your having withdrawn the troops from the frontier, no white man is safe, either in life or property, for a single day: that the Indians are assembling upon the Yellow Medicine, in numbers something like ten thousand, alleging that the United States has broken faith with them. They are prepared to deluge that country with blood. Now I want to know if Congress is willing to see our frontiers unprotected by military force, the scene of Indian barbarities and cruelties for the want of a small appropriation of money; and then come here next Congress and be told that although you were apprised of these facts, you chose to let our citizens be destroyed merely because you had not ascertained whether General Harney had the right to do a certain act to save the lives of your citizens. But to put the committee in possession of all the facts, perhaps the communication from the Department had better be read. Here are the documents:

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
WASHINGTON, June 7, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor herewith to transmit, for your information, a copy of a letter addressed by me, this day, to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, recommending that an appropriation be made to enable the Department to fulfill the stipulations of the agreement made by General Harney, in 1856, with certain bands of Sioux; also, a copy of the report therein referred to.

I have the honor to be, with much respect, your obedient servant,
J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Hon. J. GLANCY JONES, Chairman Committee Ways and Means, House of Representatives.

Extract from a letter from Agent A. J. Vaughan, dated St. Louis, May 5, 1858, to the superintendent of Indian Affairs at St. Louis, and by him transmitted to the Indian Office:

"It pains me to state the belligerent and refractory condition in which I found the Sioux in passing through their country, particularly the Menecongrees and Uncpapa bands; the past year they have been robbing indiscriminately every white man passing through their country, and in many instances threatened their lives.

"A war party of the Menecongree band of Sioux, on the 31st of March, while passing down the river, between Fort Union and Fort Berthold, fired ten shots at us while on the boat, taking deadly aim on our lives, which were miraculously preserved. The withdrawal of the troops from Fort Pierre has caused the Indians to believe the Government are afraid of them; and, from their conduct and threats, I feel satisfied that no agent's life is safe in distributing the Sioux annuity without a suitable force to protect him."

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, June 5, 1858.

SIR: General Denver, in his annual report as Commissioner of Indian Affairs, page 2, says: "The agent reports that the Sioux, to whom General Harney promised presents of clothing for their soldiers, are very much dissatisfied with the non-compliance with that promise; and he recommends that Congress make provision for its fulfillment. An estimate for $200,000, to be placed at the disposal of the Department for that purpose, was presented by your predecessor to Congress at the last session of that body; but no appropriation was made. Concurring in the propriety and importance of the measure, I respectfully recommend that the amount necessary to carry it out be appropriated."

The Sioux agent, above referred to, is A. H. Redfield, who, in his report to the superintendent, (page 125 of Commissioner's report,) expressed himself thus: "They spoke of a promise, made them by General Harney, to give them certain clothing for their soldiers, and expressed great surprise that the promise had not been fulfilled. I explained this matter to them as well as I could. Congress ought, undoubtedly, to make provision, at its first session, for the fulfillment of that promise. It was a reasonable one, and made in good faith by the General. The Government will suffer much, in the estimation of the Indians, if a promise, made by an officer so high in rank and character as General Harney, is long left unfulfilled."

General Harney, in his report, dated Fort Pierre, Nebraska Territory, March 8, 1856, (Ex. Doc. No. 130, first session, Thirty-Fourth Congress, page 3,) says, that he "caused the Sioux nation to select and appoint a certain number of head chiefs and chiefs to govern them, and to see that they carry out the conditions to which they have consented in council." Again, on the same page, he says: "That the organization of the Sioux may be more complete, I proposed to the chiefs to have a number of soldiers in each band, to assist them to carry out my views. They have each given in the number which they deemed sufficient for that purpose in each band, and I recommend that these soldiers be regularly named, and receive from the Government a dress, or uniform, by which they will be known; and that for the time they may be doing duty under their chiefs in the villages, they will receive their rations. The expense would be trifling, and their young men would be stimulated and encouraged to seek those positions. The dress should be durable and gaudy, particularly the head dress, (they are fond of feathers.) The uniform of the different bands should be different, and the same should have place in the different grades of chiefs, sub chiefs, &c. By gradually causing the interests of a portion of the nation to depend upon the wishes of the Government, the remainder will be easily controlled."

The Secretary of War, reporting to the President under date of May 10, 1856, that he had received from Brevet Brigadier General William S. Harney the minutes of a council held by him with nine bands of Sioux Indians, at Fort Pierre, Nebraska Territory, beginning the 1st and ending the 5th of March, 1856, (see same document, page 8,) says: "Brigadier General Harney having recognized the chiefs named herein as the only head chiefs of their respective bands, and so declared in council, proposed that each chief should have a certain number of soldiers in each band, to maintain order and enforce its laws, and recommends that these soldiers receive from the Government a uniform dress, with badges to designate the band and rank of each; and that, for the time they may be employed in discharging the duties appropriate to their position as a tribal police, they shall be subsisted at the expense of the Government. In accordance with the proposition of Brigadier General Harney, in relation to this organization, the following list of 'soldiers' was named by the principal chiefs at the council: (Here follow the names.) I recommend the foregoing articles and stipulations be regarded as a valid compact, to be faithfully observed by all officers and agents of the United States, and that the necessary appropriations be asked to carry it into effect."

The President of the United States, in his message dated July 24, 1856, "communicating minutes of a council held at Fort Pierre with the Sioux Indians, by General Harney," &c., (same document already referred to,) concludes with the following words: "Regarding the stipulations between General Harney and the nine bands of the Sioux as just and desirable both for the United States and for the Indians, I respectfully recommend an appropriation by Congress of the sum of $100,000 to enable the Government to execute the stipulations entered into by General Harney."

The amount of $100,000 was fixed in this manner. The Secretary of the Interior requested Thomas S. Twiss, Indian agent, Upper Platte, then in Washington, to make an estimate of the probable amount sufficient to carry into effect, and to fulfill the conditions, stipulations, and promises made by General Harney to the Sioux bands, who, in a letter addressed to the Commissioner of Indians, dated June 24, 1856, estimated the sum necessary for that purpose at $72,000, (see page 10 of the document above referred to,) and says: "My experience in the Indian country, as to what Indians expect to receive as presents when they are called to act as soldiers, has been my guide in making the estimate for uniform, clothing, arms, and provisions, whilst acting in the capacity of tribal police."

The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, in his report accompanying the above letter of Agent Twiss, dated June 25, 1856, says: "My opinion is that the estimate of the agent is below the amount that will be required to carry out the various stipulations and promises of General Harney."

The Secretary of the Interior, submitting the above report of the Commissioner, and the letter of Agent Twiss, to the President of the United States, says, in his letter, dated June 26, 1856: "It is impossible, with the imperfect data now possessed by the Department, to make any satisfactory estimate; but, from all the information on hand, I am inclined to think that, besides the estimate of the Indian bureau, there should be enough added for contingencies to make the whole amount $100,000." (See same document, pages 9 and 10.)

Congress did not act upon the recommendation contained in the President's message of 24th July, 1856, because it was sent in so late in the session, and before it came out of the hands of the Public Printer, Congress had adjourned. At the beginning of the second session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, the Secretary of the Interior renewed his application for $100,000 for the current year, and applied for $100,000 more for the fiscal year commencing on the 1st July, 1857. When the matter came up the House Committee on Ways and Means reported favorably upon it; but, at the suggestion of a member that the treaty made by General Harney had not as yet been ratified by the Senate, the House took no action on that report of its committee.

The President, however, did not consider this subject in the light of a treaty, requiring the confirmation of the Senate, but guardedly designated it as "stipulations;" and the Secretary of War says, in his letter to the President, of May 10, 1856, already referred to, on page 8 of the above-mentioned House document: "I recommend that the foregoing articles and stipulations be regarded as a valid compact to be faithfully observed by all officers and agents of the United States, and that the necessary appropriations be asked to carry it into effect." The Secretary of War, in his letter to the Secretary of the Interior, dated June 9, 1856, (see page 10 of the above mentioned House document,) says: "It is important, as a means of maintaining peace in the Indian country, that the convention made by General Harney should be faithfully observed, and fully carried into effect."

This letter was referred, on June 11, 1856, to this office, with the following indorsement, signed by George C. Whiting, the then Chief Clerk of the Department of the Interior: "As this Department is now charged with the whole subject, and responsible for its whole management, it is the desire of the Secretary of the Interior that every effort should be made to carry out the within suggestions, and to preserve the friendly and peaceable relations with the Indians."

It thus appears that the stipulations were favorably reported on by the House Committee of Ways and Means, but that the recommendation of the President for an appropriation to carry them into effect was not responded to by the House of Representatives, on account of a misconception of facts. The stipulations were never transmitted by the President to the Senate for confirmation and ratification, because he never considered them to be a treaty, but merely a new system initiating a tribal police—a mere administrative regulation, requiring no ratification, but merely the necessary funds to carry it into effect.

In view of the hostile attitude which some of the Sioux tribes have assumed, as appears from a letter of Agent A. J. Vaughan, herewith transmitted, and considering the critical position of our relations with the Sioux generally, it seems to me of the utmost importance that every semblance of a grievance should be carefully removed, and the promises of General Harney to those Indians promptly redeemed. I think that the sum of $100,000 would at present suffice for that purpose, and I therefore respectfully recommend that Congress be asked to appropriate that sum to enable the Government to execute the stipulations entered into by General Harney.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

Acting Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, June 7, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a copy of a report, with accompanying documents, addressed to this Department on the 5th instant, by the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs, calling my attention to the hostile attitude assumed by the Menecongrees and Uncpapa bands of Sioux, or Dakota Indians, and suggesting that an appropriation of $100,000 should be asked for to enable this Department to redeem the promises made by General Harney to nine bands of the Sioux, at the Council held at Fort Pierre, in March, 1856.

The subject has already been brought to the attention of Congress, in a special message from the President of the United States, dated July 24, 1856, accompanied by an estimate of the amount that would be required for the purpose, (Ex. Doc. No. 130, first session Thirty-Fourth Congress.)

An estimate was again submitted by my predecessor, at the opening of the second session of the Thirty-Fourth Congress, but no action was taken, although the Committee of Ways and Means reported in favor of the appropriation.

For this reason no estimate was submitted this year, but attention was again called to the subject in the annual report of the Commissioner of Indian Affairs.

The Menecongrees, Uncpapa, Brulé, and other bands of Sioux occupying the country south of the Missouri river, are among the wildest, most turbulent, and dangerous within our limits; and in view of their present hostile attitude, of which the Department has been but recently advised, and the absence of troops, I feel constrained to call the attention of Congress to this subject, and respectfully to recommend that a sufficient sum be furnished to enable the Department to fulfill the stipulations of the agreement made by General Harney with the Sioux. Good faith and sound policy alike demand it, and unless measures are promptly taken serious disturbances will be likely to result.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Hon. JAMES L. ORR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PEYTON. It seems that General Harney made an agreement with the Indians that if they enlisted in the Army he would make these presents. Did they enlist in the Army, and perform their part of the contract?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. A full list of Indians was never made out and sent to the Department and put upon the records. The Department has never given them their rations, uniform, or anything else.

Mr. PEYTON. Have they complied with their part of the contract?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. So far as they had the power to do so.

Mr. PEYTON. Then they have never entered the Army or performed any service?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There were other stipulations besides what I have mentioned.

Mr. PEYTON. If they have performed no service upon their part, I am unwilling to pay them.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. They have done a good deal. They have dispersed their bands, declared that they would be upon terms of peace, amity, and good will, and that they would not disturb our settlements; and a hundred other things, just such as the gentleman from Kentucky might expect the Indians would make stipulations for. They complain that two years have elapsed, and that we have not performed our promises.

The question was taken on the Senate amendment; and it was concurred in.

Second amendment:

To enable the Secretary of the Interior to adjust difficulties and preserve peace with the Cut-Head and Yantonaise bands of Sioux Indians, $25,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend concurrence.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Third amendment:

For compensation of five extra clerks employed in the Indian office under the acts of 31st March, 1854, and 3d March, 1855, and under appropriations made from year to year, $7,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is represented by the Indian department that temporary clerks are necessary; but the Committee of Ways and Means, not perhaps having sufficient information on the subject, did not deem it expedient at this time, and recommend a non-concurrence.

The question was taken, and the amendment was not concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Pawnees.—For fulfilling the stipulation of the treaty with the Pawnees on the 24th of September—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendments from number four to number twenty-five all relate to one treaty with the Indians. The Government of the United States entered into a treaty with the Pawnee Indians on the 24th of September, 1857. That treaty has been ratified by the Senate this session; and hence this appropriation could not come into the original Indian appropriation bill, and had to be put into the supplemental bill. This treaty, however, is now ratified, and is the highest law of the land. The amendments from four to twenty-five inclusive, are for appropriations in accordance with the stipulations of the treaty, and admit of no debate. The amount of the whole is $87,230.

The question was taken on the amendments in gross, and they were severally concurred in.

Twenty-sixth amendment:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior is hereby authorized to release the American Board of Commissioners for Foreign Missions from their obligations, under the fourth article of the Cherokee treaty, to expend the value of the Union and Harmony mission reservations, awarded them, on schools among the Ojegas, and in improving their condition: Provided, That the Secretary of the Interior may, at his discretion, direct what other destitute tribe or tribes among whom said money shall be expended by said board for such purposes, and make such other regulations as will secure the proper and faithful application of said fund.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This being an Indian supplemental appropriation bill, and not a bill to regulate public lands, the Committee of Ways and Means think it is not proper to legislate in this particular, and recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the amendment right in itself, or is it objected to because it is in the wrong bill?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The committee have great doubt about its being right, and it is not a pressing case.

The question was taken, and the amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-seventh amendment:

And be it further enacted, That where, by or pursuant to the provisions of any treaty with any tribe of Indians, tracts of land outside of the limits of any tribal reservation have been or shall be set apart for the use of individual Indians, to be held in severalty, and the power reserved to Congress, or the President of the United States, to authorize the issue of patents therefor, and to make regulations respecting the sale or alienation of such tracts, or where the treaty is silent on the subject, it shall and may be lawful for such reserves to sell and convey such tracts of land, whether they be held as reservations by the usual Indian title, or by grant and deed of conveyance of such lands, duly executed by the reservee, shall be so construed as to vest in the purchaser a title and fee-simple to the lands so conveyed: Provided, That such sales shall be made in conformity to such rules and regulations, for the purpose of preventing fraud and imposition, and of securing to and for the reservees the full and fair value of the lands, as may be prescribed by the Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior: And provided further, That no sale or conveyance of such tracts shall be of any validity, except the same shall have been submitted to, or received the approval of, the Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Mr. Chairman, there is a considerable amount of legislation in this amendment. It is well known to the House that under the present system of conducting our relations with the Indians, we grant reservations to the tribes. In some few cases, however, in making treaties with the Indians, there has been a stipulation to apportion the lands among the Indians individually, and not to give them to the tribe. This amendment proposes to allow each individual member of the tribe to dispose of his own real estate without the advice or consent of any one. In some cases it might be important; but it is a very dangerous change in the law, unless it should be well matured, and very carefully examined. For this reason the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-eighth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs shall be, and he hereby is, authorized, whenever the interests of the reservee render it expedient, to require the purchase money for any such tract of land to be paid to the United States agent for the tribe to which the reservee belongs, or other officer of the United States authorized to receive it, and to retain the same, to be afterwards applied, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, for the benefit of the reservee, in such manner as may be deemed best for his interests and welfare.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That amendment is open to the same objection as the last; and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Twenty-ninth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That, where the tribal reservation of any tribe of Indians is, or shall be, in pursuance of the provisions of any treaty with such tribe, divided among the individual members of the tribe, to be held by them in severalty, no sales by individuals of the tracts assigned to them shall ever be made, except to members of the tribe or to the United States; and if any person not employed under the authority of the United States should attempt to treat or negotiate, directly or indirectly, with any individual Indian, for the purchase of any tract of land held or claimed by him, such person shall forfeit and pay the sum of $1,000, to be recovered before any court of the United States having jurisdiction, in the manner prescribed by the twenty-seventh section of the act of Congress of June 30, 1834, commonly called the intercourse act.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Thirtieth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be, and he hereby is, authorized, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to remove from any tribal reservation any person found therein without authority of law, or whose presence within the limits of the reservation may, in his judgment, be detrimental to the peace and welfare of the Indians, and to employ for the purpose such force as may be necessary to enable the agent to effect the removal of such person or persons.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means think this a very good amendment. It will enable the Indian agents to expel from the Indian territory all persons who have no right there, and to use sufficient force to drive them out. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. MORGAN. I do not know but that this may be all right; but it seems to me to be placing very great power in the hands of these Indian agents; and I know of some of them who ought to be kept out of the Indian country themselves, and who are very incompetent to put off others. I hope the amendment will not be concurred in.

Mr. LEITER. I hope the provision will be agreed to. There is immense trouble growing up in the western country, owing to the fact of squatters going upon the Indian reservations in violation of law. I hope, therefore, that this amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. CURTIS. I wish to amend the amendment so as to require the Commissioner to remove all persons. This leaves it in his discretion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Indian agent has no discretionary power. The Secretary of the Interior may instruct the agent to remove persons who are in the Indian country in violation of law, or who are deleterious and injurious to the Indians. The agent cannot remove a single man, but he may report to the Secretary of the Interior, and if the Secretary thinks that they ought to be removed, he will so instruct the agent.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to amend the amendment by striking out the word "any," and inserting "all," so as to make it "all persons." I understand the operation of the amendment perfectly well, because I am familiar with the frontier. I know very well that men have heretofore gone, and will hereafter go, to the Indian agents and obtain their permission to remain in the Indian country, and I think this would be a very dangerous power to place in the hands of Indian agents. Persons can go into the Indian territory for the purpose of trading lawfully, under certain restrictions; but all persons who are in the territory unlawfully ought to be removed thence.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa the purport of his amendment? The Senate amendment authorizes the removal of any person found to be injurious to the Indians. The gentleman proposes to amend it by striking out "any" and inserting "all." What is the force of his amendment?

Mr. CURTIS. It proposes that all persons who are there contrary to law shall be removed.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. The amendment of the Senate provides that any person there contrary to law, or who is found to be injurious to the Indians, shall be removed.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I suggest that instead of granting permission to the officer to do it, he be required to do it.

Mr. CURTIS. I move to strike out the word "any" and insert "all," so that it will apply to the removal of all.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I suggest that instead of reading "that the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be authorized," &c., it read, "authorized and required."

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I move mine instead of it.

Mr. COLFAX. By the first clause he may remove all persons there contrary to law, and by the latter clause he may remove such other person or persons, as he may consider detrimental. I think that it gives him too much power.

Mr. GROW. No person has a right to go upon Indian lands now, without permission. Any persons who go there without permission can be put off by military force.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. The amendment only reenacts the law now upon your statute-book. Our Indian agents are required to remove all persons who may attempt to settle in the Indian country, or upon any of the Indian reservations, unless they have licenses from the Indian agents. Persons can go there for trade, but they must be licensed. Military force may be used, in cases of extremity, to put off intruders.

The question was taken on the amendment of Mr. Davis, of Maryland, and it was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. The first branch of the amendment authorizes him to remove all persons there contrary to law; and the second branch authorizes him to remove everybody else that he chooses. I am opposed to that latter branch, and I move to strike it out.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If my friend does not want every person removed who, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, is detrimental to the Indians, then he had better have the amendments voted down.

Mr. STANTON. The effect is to give Indian agents the control of the settlement of the Indian country—to decide what class of white population shall settle there. It may be used for political purposes or any other purposes. He may select his own political friends. He can permit one class to go there to the exclusion of all others. I do not know what the law has been heretofore, but that is the effect of it.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. As it strikes me here, the Indian agents have nothing to do with it. The Indian agent has no power at all until the military force comes to be used. The discretion and judgment are to be exercised by the Secretary of the Interior. The Commissioner of Indian Affairs, with the approbation of the Secretary of the Interior, has a right to remove from the Indian reservations any persons found there without authority of law, and any person who, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior, may be injurious to the Indians; and he has the right to use such force as may be needed for that removal. The agent is not an actor at all until there is a determination on the part of the Secretary to use force. The discretion is with the Secretary only.

Mr. CAVANAUGH. I move to strike out "agent," and insert "superintendent."

The amendment was disagreed to.

The question then recurred on the amendment of the Senate, as amended.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 62, noes 22.

Mr. BUFFINTON demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 77, noes 48.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Thirty-first amendment:

Sec. 7. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Interior be, and he is hereby authorized and directed to pay to such persons of Miami blood as have heretofore been excluded from the annuities of the tribe, since the removal of the Miamies in 1846, and since the treaty of 1854, and whose names are not included in the supplement to said treaty, their proportion of the tribal annuities from which they have been excluded; and he is also authorized and directed to enroll such persons upon the pay-list of said tribe, and cause their annuities to be paid to them in future: Provided, That the foregoing payments shall be in full of all claims for annuities arising out of previous treaties. And said Secretary is also authorized and directed to cause to be located for such persons, each two hundred acres of land out of the tract of seventy thousand acres reserved by the second article of the treaty of June 5, 1854, with the Miamies, to be held by such persons by the same tenure as the locations of individuals are held, which have been made under the third article of said treaty.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Upon examination of the matter, it was ascertained that some of the Miami Indians were omitted from the list. The amendment provides that they shall be reckoned in. It brings in a few Indians who were unjustly left out. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

All the amendments having been disposed of, Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. FAULKNER reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the Senate amendments to a bill (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the support of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with certain Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with the recommendation that some be concurred in, and that others be non-concurred in, and that others be concurred in with amendments.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I demand the previous question upon the amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The SPEAKER. If it is the pleasure of the House, the Chair will put the question first upon all the amendments in gross in which the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence.

Mr. CRAWFORD. I desire to say that I am opposed to the first amendment, though I do not propose to call the yeas and nays upon it.

No objection being made to the suggestion of the Chair, the question was taken upon the first, second, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, tenth, eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, fourteenth, fifteenth, sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, nineteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, twenty-fourth, twenty-fifth, and thirty-first amendments of the Senate; and they were concurred in.

The third, twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth amendments of the Senate, were severally non-concurred in.

The thirtieth amendment of the Senate was reported with the following amendment:

Line three, after the word "authorized," insert the words "and required," so that the amendment will read:

And he further enacted, That the Commissioner of Indian Affairs be, and he hereby is, authorized and required, with the approval of the Secretary of the Interior, to remove from any tribal reservation, &c.

The question was taken on the amendment, and it was agreed to.

The question recurred on the Senate amendment, as amended.

Mr. STANTON called for the yeas and nays. The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 66, nays 60; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskey, Chapman, Clemens, John Cochrane, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Graige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Edmundson, Eustis, Faulkner, Foley, Gartrell, Gregg, Lawrence W. Hall, Hatch, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Milston, Morrill, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Powell, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Singleton, William Smith, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Walton, Winslow, Woodson, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—66.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Fenton, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Harlan, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Lovejoy, Mattheson, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Murray, Olin, Palmer, Parker, William W. Phelps, Purviance, Roberts, Royce, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stanton, Stephens, William Stewart, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, and Ellihu B. Washburne—60.

So the amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Pending the vote, Mr. MORGAN stated that Mr. KELSEY had been detained from the House, yesterday and today, in consequence of sickness in his family.

Mr. FLORENCE stated that if he had been in the Hall when his name was called, he would have voted in the negative.

The SPEAKER. The hour having arrived (four o'clock, p. m.) for the House to take a recess, the House takes a recess till six o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at six o'clock.

SHERLOCK AND SHIRLEY.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask unanimous consent to report back from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, Senate bill (No. 287) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley. The committee recommends its passage. It appropriates no money, but is simply to provide for reopening and adjusting the account of these men on principles of equity and justice. It is very carefully guarded, and will work no injustice to the Government.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. ENGLISH. The bill makes no appropriation of money.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But it releases money forfeited to the Government.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to suspend the rules; and call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 51, noes 40; no quorum voting.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have no desire to embarrass the House, and therefore withdraw my motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I would inquire of the Chair if there is a quorum present?

The SPEAKER proceeded to count the House; and announced that there were one hundred and twenty members (a quorum) present.

HEIRS OF JOHN PAULDING AND OTHERS.

Mr. DAWES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report a bill from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, in order that it may be placed upon the Calendar. I ask nothing more.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. A great many of us here have bills which we desire to report.

Mr. DAWES. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and the rules were suspended—ayes 101, noes 24.

Mr. DAWES, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, then reported a bill for the relief of John Paulding, David Williams, Isaac Van Wirt, and John Champ; which was read a first and second time, referred to a Committee of the Whole House, and, with the accompanying report, ordered to be printed.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS.

Mr. GILMER. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee on Public Lands be discharged from the further consideration of House bill (No. 368) to prevent the accumulation of an unnecessary surplus in the Treasury, and to equalize the grants of land to the several States.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. GILMER. I move to suspend the rules, and on that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. ATKINS (at twenty-five minutes after six o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn, and on that motion I ask the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House refused to adjourn.

WILLIAM S. BRADFORD.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 610) for the relief of William S. Bradford; when the Speaker signed the same.

DISTRIBUTION OF PUBLIC LANDS—AGAIN.

The question recurred on the motion to suspend the rules, for the introduction of a motion to discharge the Committee on Public Lands from the further consideration of House bill (No. 368) to prevent the accumulation of an unnecessary surplus in the Treasury, and to equalize the grants of lands to the several States.

Mr. LEITER. I ask that the bill be read.

The bill is as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled: That hereafter, whenever, at the end of any and each fiscal year, there shall remain in the Treasury of the United States a surplus over and above the immediate demands on the Treasury, and the sum of $6,000,000, subject to the Treasurer's drafts, in payment of warrants, such surplus shall be deposited with such of the several States, in proportion to their respective representation in the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, as shall, by law, authorize their treasurers, or other competent authorities, to receive the same on the terms hereinafter specified; and the Secretary of the Treasury shall deliver the same to such treasurers, or other competent authorities, on receiving certificates of deposit therefor, signed by such competent authorities, in such form as may be prescribed by the Secretary aforesaid; which certificates shall express the usual and legal obligations, and pledge the faith of the State, for the safe-keeping and repayment thereof, and shall pledge the faith of the States receiving the same to pay the said moneys, and every part thereof, from time to time, whenever the same shall be required by the Secretary of the Treasury for the purpose of defraying any wants of the public Treasury beyond the amount of the $6,000,000 aforesaid: Provided, That if any State declines to receive its proportion of the surplus aforesaid on the terms before named, the same shall be deposited with the other States agreeing to accept the same on deposit in the proportion aforesaid: And provided further, That when said money, or any part thereof, shall be wanted by the said Secretary to meet appropriations by law, the same shall be called for in ratable proportions, within one year, as nearly as conveniently may be, from the different States with which the same is deposited, and shall not be called for, in sums exceeding ten thousand dollars from any one State in any one month, without previous notice of thirty days, for every additional sum of $20,000 which may at any time be required: And provided further, That the surplus moneys in the Treasury hereby required to be deposited shall not exceed the proceeds of the sales of the public lands from and after the passage of this act.

SEC. 2. And he it further enacted, That from and after, and during this Congress, in all cases, when any portion of the public lands is granted or given by Congress to any State, or to any county, township, school, company, or corporation, in said State, there shall, also, at the same time, be due, and granted to each of the other States respectively, other public lands in quantity, so that each State, at the same time, shall receive of the public lands equally, in proportion to the representation of said States in Congress: Provided, however, That a grant of the right of way for roads of all kinds through the public lands in any State, and the lands given to any State on its admission, shall not entitle the other States to have or receive any lands as an equivalent therefor.

SEC. 3. And he it further enacted, That the Commissioner of the Public Lands, under the direction of the Secretary of the Interior, shall issue to each of the States, respectively, land warrants to the amount in all, to which each State is respectively entitled under this act, and said States are severally authorized to receive and to sell and dispose of said land warrants for their own useful purposes, and said warrants are to be valid and effectual in the hands of any owner or holder thereof, and may be located by such owner or holder upon any public lands for sale, or subject to private entry, and the same fees to be paid therefor by the holders thereof. And the title of the land so located by any owner or holder of said land warrants, shall be secured and perfected to such owner or holder in the same manner as other land warrants issued by the United States. Said land warrants shall be engraved and printed, so as to prevent deception and counterfeiting; shall be signed by the Secretary of the Interior, or Commissioner of the Public Lands, or for them by such other persons as the said Secretary may direct, and countersigned by the Governor of each State receiving the same, or by such other officers as the said States may respectively designate for that purpose; and said land warrants be for not less than eighty, nor over one hundred and sixty acres each: Provided, That no State shall be authorized to locate any warrants in its own name, or for its own benefit; and that no warrants issued under the provisions of this act shall be located upon any lands to which there shall be any preemption right, or on which there shall be any actual settlement or cultivation, except by the person holding such preemption right, or by such settler or cultivator.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That all mineral lands are hereby reserved to the United States from the operation of this act, except such as are, or hereafter may be, by law, subject to private entry by individuals.

The yeas and nays having been ordered, the question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 68, nays 66; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Andrews, Bennett, Blair, Bliss, Bratton, Burlingame, Case, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dewart, Dodd, Durfee, Eustis, Foster, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Harlan, J. Morrison Harris, Hill, Hoard, Kellogg, Kilgore, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Murray, Palmer, Parker, Purviance, Ready, Reilly, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Judson W. Sherman, Stanton, William Stewart, George Taylor, Thayer, Thompson, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Warren, and Zoll-coffer—68.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Atkins, Billingshurst, Bowie, Cavanaugh, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Edmundson, English, Fenton, Foley, Giddings, Goode, Gregg, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Hopkins, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Letcher, Maclay, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Millson, Mott, Niblack, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Pottle, Quimman, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Savage, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, Elihu B. Washburne, White, Winslow, Woodson, and Wortendyke—66.

So the rules were not suspended, (two thirds not voting in the affirmative.)

Pending the call,

Mr. WALBRIDGE stated that his colleague, Mr. WALDRON, had paired off with Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia; for the remainder of the session.

MAIL STEAMER APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the amendments of the Senate to the mail steamer appropriation bill be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until disposed of; and on that motion I call for the previous question.

Mr. SAVAGE. I am rather opposed to this steamer bill. I ask that it be read before we make it the special order. I think there are many better ways of spending the public money.

The SPEAKER. The bill is in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. SAVAGE. I think that we have a right to have it read. I make that point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the gentleman's point of order. The bill, with the Senate amendments, is in committee; and of course the reading of it is not in order in the House, if objected to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I only ask that we shall follow the regular course. I ask for the previous question on my motion.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that general debate in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be terminated within five minutes after the House shall go into committee.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. MILLSON in the chair.)

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendments of the Senate to the mail steamer appropriation bill are before the committee as a special order. There are five amendments, and the Committee of Ways and Means report a concurrence in one, and non-concurrence in the remaining four. I will explain as the amendments come up:

First amendment:

Strike out the following paragraph:
"For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, $346,500; and it is hereby provided that there be paid to the Post Office Department, out of said appropriation, such sums as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, on such days as the Collins line may fail to take them from New York."

And insert, in lieu thereof, as follows:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, in pursuance of the contract with E. K. Collins and others, $346,500. And it is hereby provided, That for such days as the said Collins and others shall fail to perform said service, the Postmaster General is authorized to contract with the owner or owners of any other steam vessel or vessels to perform said service, by transporting the mails from such port in the United States to such port in Great Britain as he may select, and that the cost thereof be deducted from any amount which may be due, or may become due, to E. K. Collins & Co. for services actually performed. And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommended a non-concurrence in that amendment. The substance of the amendment is the same as the original provision. It proposes, however, to change one of the termini, substituting Southampton for Liverpool. It being a contract, the committee thought it ought not to be interfered with.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does it not also differ in authorizing the Postmaster General, if the Collins line failed to carry the mails on the days contracted, to contract with other vessels, not to carry from New York to Liverpool, but from any port in the United States to any port in Great Britain?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There is a slight difference in that respect. I have not examined that point particularly; but this bill, as originally passed by this House, contained a proviso that the Postmaster General might draw upon this fund to contract with any other steam vessels to carry the mails between New York and Liverpool, in case of default of Collins & Co. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to call the attention of the committee to a peculiarity which has been brought to my notice in relation to this amendment, and which operates upon two other lines, (the Bremen and Havre lines,) as I understand, most unjustly. The bonus given to Collins & Co. was a bonus which we were told would be necessary to enable them to enter into competition with the Cunard line of steamers plying between New York and Liverpool. I recollect that I was one of those who, upon a representation of that fact, voted to them the increased bonus. But Congress gave notice of a termination of that new bonus, and they have dropped back to the original contract, which I think is about nineteen thousand dollars a trip. I understand that our own Havre line gets about seven thousand dollars a trip.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Provided they earn that sum by postage.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Yes, provided they earn that sum by postage. I understand that the French Government charges this American line at Havre about two thousand dollars, thus reducing the amount, in fact, to $5,000. By changing the terminus from Liverpool to Southampton, Collins, in effect, puts his line, with the $19,000 bonus, not as a competitor with an English line between New York and Liverpool, but as a competitor with an American line, whose compensation is diminished to about five thousand dollars; so that the effect of this Senate amendment will be to crowd an American line out of that which has heretofore been granted to it, and leave the New York and Liverpool line without a competitor, while the Collins line draws out of the Treasury $19,000. I think this is unfair; and I think it would be impolitic upon our part, not to characterize the operation with terms of more severity, which I think it richly deserves.

I would not agree, as a legislator, that the Postmaster General and the contractors should make an agreement, if an agreement could be made, by which this line of steamers could crowd upon another American line of steamers, and take the profits which properly belong to them under a grant, while this Collins line put into their own pockets the large bonus which the Government gave to them, under the idea that it was necessary to enable them to compete with an English line of vessels. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I move to strike out the first three lines of the amendment, and I do this for the purpose of obtaining the opportunity of making a brief explanation of the question which is suggested by this amendment. The Collins contract, so-called, provided for the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and to Liverpool alone. Southampton was not the terminus of the line. That contract was under the law of 1847, and has not yet expired, owing to the period at which the full service commenced. About the same time two other lines, one to Southampton and Havre, and the other to Southampton and Bremen, were set on foot. Then lines running to the Channel carried mails for a less amount of compensation than the Collins line. The contracts for the Havre and Bremen lines expired in June last. Congress had failed to enact a law authorizing their renewal. The proprietors of those lines made a proposition to the Postmaster General, in pursuance of which they undertake to carry the mails (as they had previously done under the terminated contracts) for the sea and inland postage, and during the past year they have been transporting the mails to Southampton and Havre, and Southampton and Bremen, without any charge upon the national Treasury beyond the sums which they had actually earned by way of postages.

The Collins line, the contract not having expired, is still entitled to run to Liverpool, but has no right to go to Southampton. It is now proposed to permit the Collins line to withdraw from the Liverpool trade, and bring them to Southampton, in direct competition with two American lines, now transporting the mails for the amount of the postages actually earned. The effect of this proposition, if acceded to, may possibly be to drive those two lines out of existence; for how can one man, receiving only the postages, compete with another receiving the munificent bonus of about twenty thousand dollars the round trip from the General Government? If this amendment is adopted, it will permit the Collins line to run to Southampton, instead of Liverpool, and perhaps drive off the other lines, or force them into a ruinous competition for freight and passengers, while at the same time there may be diverted from them a portion of the mail matter to which they are specially entitled.

I know not how private interests may be affected by this amendment, nor do I care. I have no prejudice against the Collins line, nor am I actuated by any desire to thwart their plans or interfere with their prosperity. I have often thought and said that the Collins enterprise, although in some respects deserving the highest praise, has, nevertheless, accomplished more to retard ocean steam navigation than everything we are likely to do this session of Congress will probably advance it. I have no objection to the continuance of that contract, holding them to its letter. They demand the stipulated sum for the stipulated service—while other responsible American citizens are willing to undertake the service for less. I would perform the contract implicitly, for I would have no imputation of a breach of good faith fall upon the Government. Let the Collins contract continue its enterprise—let it continue to compete for the Liverpool trade with the English line, and let these American lines which are struggling, perhaps ineffectually, for the purpose of inaugurating this newly suggested self-sustaining ocean mail system, live in spite of any special legislation. It is clear that this amendment may operate unjustly, and I hope it will be rejected.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I ask leave to withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I object to my colleague withdrawing his amendment, and for the same reason that prompted him to offer it, namely: to afford an opportunity of making a few remarks. I am in favor, Mr. Chairman, of the amendments proposed by the Senate; and, in brief, for these few reasons: a contract was entered into between the Government and Mr. Collins in 1849—

Mr. CLARK, of New York. In 1847.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I refer to the last contract. In 1849—the 19th day of April—the last contract was made, I think. That contract is now in existence, and will continue till the 1st of June, 1860. It has been stated by the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. MARSHALL] that a bonus under the contract was given to Mr. Collins by the Government for certain services which it was anticipated that line would perform for the Government and for the benefit of the country. In 1854 and 1856 this line was so unfortunate as to be deprived, by accident, of two steamers—the Arctic and the Pacific. Because of these losses the contractors were obliged to substitute other steamers, but with the consent of the Navy Department. Because of that substitution, the Government withheld from the line $147,750; which, I presume, is something of an offset against the bonus which the gentleman from Kentucky has alluded to.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Will my friend permit me to inform him that there is a bill before the House to refund that money to them?

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I regret that I cannot yield now. I am engaged in the argument from which the interruption will divert me. Then, sir, having withheld from this company the amount of money, it has been that the company was obliged to suspend its operations; and the money is still thus withheld. Under these circumstances the contractors, hoping that the money may be restored to them by the Government, and they be thus enabled to resume operations, come here and ask of Congress that they enable them to reestablish their line, and as some return for the injury suffered by them at the hands of the Government, to authorize them to determine their route at Southampton instead of at Liverpool; and for the avowed reason that they are unable to compete with the Cunard line of steamers. It is, moreover, better and more advantageous for them to run to Southampton. It is true that, to some degree, a competition would be thus raised between this line and two other lines of steamers—American steamers. But I do not see, for my part, why any one of these lines is entitled to preference over another one.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Then bring them on a level.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. My proposition is simply this: that, in case of a competition so created, it cannot be to the injurious extent claimed by my colleague, [Mr. CLARK,] but will be a competition which, of its very nature, will enlarge the compass of business between the port of Southampton and the United States, by establishing more frequent days of arrival and departure than at present exist.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out all after the first line of the Senate amendment. It seems to me that it is very remarkable, to say the least of it, that, while there are two lines running through from the city of New York to particular points, which are costing the Government nothing, which are working for what they can make, and for that alone, the gentleman from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] should undertake to advocate the perpetuation of another line, with the Government as a contributor of over nineteen thousand dollars for the round trip, to keep it up at that rate. Is it the interest of this Government, is it a part of our legislative duty here, to pay a bonus to a party to perform what two other parties are performing without a bonus from the Federal Treasury? If these two lines are running now to Southampton, and getting nothing but the inland and ocean postage for that service, are they not entirely competent to carry all the postal matter that may be transmitted between those points, and in good time for the interests of the country? Why, then, should we undertake to establish a third line between these self same points?

But the gentleman says, that, owing to the unfortunate loss by this Collins line of two of its steamers, they have been fined by the Postmaster General in the amount of $147,750 for failures.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. The gentleman from Virginia is mistaken. He must have misunderstood me. There have been no fines.

Mr. LETCHER. Very well, then. It is withheld. It is only another name for it. Then he says that $147,750 has been taken from their allowance, and withheld by the Post Office Department for the reasons which they assign. Now, the gentleman says if they could have gotten that money there would have been no failure—that they would have been able to execute their contract faithfully and to the letter. Sir, if this be true, will the gentleman explain to the House how this company came here some years ago asking for an increase of $500,000 a year? Is it not the allegation now, that because of the termination of the bonus of $500,000—because it is no longer contributed to the company, they have been compelled to suspend operations; and instead of executing the contract, have necessitated the employment by the Post Office Department of other vessels to carry the mails between these points? Then, it seems to me that unless we are satisfied that the Government has abundance of money to squander, to throw away on one company which is running in competition with others to the same point, it becomes us, as guardians of the public weal—as those who are interested in taking care of what little money is left after the appropriations of this session—that we should endeavor to withhold it for some more practical end than the protection of a company by Government to crush other American citizens engaged in the same sort of business.

Mr. SICKLES. With reference to that portion of the argument of my colleague from New York [Mr. JOHN COCHRANE] which relates to the sum of $147,000, claimed by the Collins line, I will say that that payment is provided for in another bill, and I presume that no opposition will be offered to that appropriation here or elsewhere.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Yes, there will be. I will fight it to the death. [Laughter.]

Mr. SICKLES. Well; I am very sorry to hear it, for I have no doubt it is justly due. It will, at all events, receive my cordial support where ever I can extend it. But that proposition, and the proposition now before the committee, are two very different things. The proposition now before the committee is that the service between New York and Liverpool, for which the Government has paid such munificent bounties, shall be entirely abandoned. I think this would be a great detriment to the commerce of the country, and its result would be to leave to the Cunard line an entire monopoly of this most important branch of our intercourse with Europe. It was the policy of the Government originally to maintain, and it has maintained, at a great sacrifice, steam communication between New York and Liverpool in American bottoms. Sir, I do not think the country, or the House, is prepared to abandon that policy; and although the Collins line has met with misfortunes, and nowhere are they more keenly sympathized with than in the city of New York, yet we are not prepared, I believe, however deep our sympathy with those misfortunes, to reconcile ourselves to the abandonment of steam communication in American bottoms with Liverpool, the most important commercial town in the Old World. It is now proposed to abandon that communication, and establish an additional line to Southampton, where we already have two.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I rise to a question of order. I insist that the gentleman has no right to make a speech on the same side as the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.] I understand that the rule provides that when an amendment is offered one gentleman has a right to speak upon one side and one gentleman upon the other. Now, it will not be said by the Chair or by anybody else, that the gentleman from New York is speaking in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York can only speak in opposition to the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SICKLES. Well, I am very glad to hear that I am out of order, because I shall be able to have five minutes more on some other amendment, when I shall be in order. But I did not intend to be out of order, and I am in favor of striking out the whole amendment of the Senate. As, however, the Chair thinks I am not in order, I will not persist at this time.

Mr. LETCHER, by unanimous consent, then withdrew his amendment.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I move to amend the amendment by reducing the appropriation to five dollars. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] told the House just now that because there is not a superabundance of money in the Treasury, gentlemen ought not to be in favor of this proposition. That seems to be a magic word with that gentleman, and he uses it on all occasions when he desires to frighten the House out of their propriety; and thus defeats, I think, very often, prudent action by the House. It is said that there are three lines of steamships now in operation between New York and different points in Europe, by virtue of existing contracts with the Government. Now, what are the facts? The Collins line is the only line now under any regular contract with the Government for the transportation of the mails between New York and any point in Europe. Nearly twelve months ago contracts were made with two other lines to transport the mails to certain other points in Europe for the postages they might receive. Those contracts have almost expired. They have hardly a month more to run, and the Postmaster General has informed the House that he cannot and will not be able to renew those contracts upon the same terms as those on which he made them last year. He therefore asks at this time, when the great scarcity of money exists in the Treasury, of which the gentleman from Virginia so often and so clamorously speaks, that a sum of two hundred and odd thousand dollars shall be appropriated by Congress in order that he may subsidize those lines, in addition to the postages which they may receive.

Now, what is the effect of the proposition before the House? If the amendment of the Senate shall prevail, not less than one hundred and thirty thousand dollars will be saved to the Government; whereas, if the amendment be rejected, we shall be compelled to pay subsidies to these lines, and, in addition to the $250,000, this further sum of $130,000.

Mr. SICKLES. By what law?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. By this bill, as it went to the Senate; because it provides $230,000, besides the $130,000 for contingencies, which the Senate has stricken out.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire an explanation from the gentleman. I see that there is already in the main text of this bill, which has passed beyond our control, this provision:

"For the transportation of the mails from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Bremen, and from New York, by Southampton or Cowes, to Havre, $230,000."

That is already in the bill. Now, what I want to know is how you are going to save anything by putting on another line?

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. We do not put on another line. The proposition is to shorten the trips of the Collins line; because it is not so far from New York to Southampton as it is from New York to Liverpool. You only change one of the termini; and in doing that, you will save, certainly $120,000, and probably $500,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. BLISS. I move to substitute for the amendment of the Senate, these words:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, $50,000.

And I do it for the purpose of saying a word in relation to what I understand should be the principle on which we vote any subsidies whatever. I voted the other day, with great reluctance, for the original bill, for I feared what has since happened. I doubted, also, whether the amount was not too large, though greatly reduced from the Collins grants, but I voted for it as a peace measure, as a substitute for a large and useless Navy. I have always believed in the much-abused exhortation, "in time of peace, prepare for war;" not by grinding our people to the dust by heavy taxation to support armies and navies; not by oppressing commerce by imposing burdens; but, as we have always done upon land, so upon the sea, to improve a time of peace to build up, as it were, a marine militia. It is thus that the pursuits of peace harmonize with constant preparation for defensive war. Navies and armies are necessary for conquest, not for defense. For that reason I have been in favor of continuing the fishing bounties. I am in favor of their continuance, in order that we may have on hand, at all times, a body of able seamen, if, unfortunately, we should need them for national defense. It is for the same reason that I am in favor of giving such encouragement to our mercantile marine as to make it useful to the Government, whenever it shall be needed for the naval service. I would have a sea as well as a land militia. I am in favor, then, in time of peace of preparing for war, by giving such aid to our citizens engaged in the pursuits of peace that they may be fitted; and at all times ready, for the public service, if we should be driven into war. The glorious example in our Revolution, of the invaluable services of the Marblehead regiment, and the achievements of our little Navy in the war of 1812, where, almost alone, we acquired any reputation in that war, show the prowess of those seamen who have been banded in the pursuits of peace alone.

But, Mr. Chairman, within a few days we have voted for a large increase to the naval force of the country. This House has voted for the construction of ten vessels of war—Congress having, at the last session, ordered five—making fifteen vessels in addition to our Navy in a short period of less than two years. The cost of the Navy in consequence of that increase, with attendant measures, will be not only three or four times as much as formerly, but will be eight or ten times the amount expended under the old administrations of the naval Department. Now, I am not in favor of continuing these fishing bounties, and otherwise aiding to build up the commercial marine by grants from the public Treasury, if, at the same time, we are to go on and build up a great Navy. If we are to imitate the aggressive military monarchies of the Old World; if we are to oppress our industry, load our people with taxes, to pursue a policy so at variance with our traditions, and hostile to the true interests of a free people, then we can no longer afford these bounties. Let us then withdraw the fishing bounties and the money we pay our ocean steam marine. If the policy of a large naval establishment is to be carried out, the other policy is entirely unnecessary. Preferring, as I have always done, encouragement to the pursuits of peace, I was then in favor of, as I am not now, of paying these limited subsidies for the ocean militia.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SAVAGE. Mr. Chairman, if I were to make a motion it would be to strike out every dollar in connection with this Collins line of steamers.

Mr. CURTIS. I make the point of order that the gentleman is speaking on the same side that the gentleman from Ohio has spoken.

Mr. SAVAGE. I oppose the gentleman's amendment, because I think that not a dollar ought to be appropriated.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must see that his remarks would be, to a great extent, of the same character as those submitted by the gentleman from Ohio. The Chair would suggest that the gentleman would better accomplish his object by moving an amendment himself when this is disposed of.

Mr. SAVAGE. Will the gentleman from Ohio withdraw his amendment?

Mr. BLISS. I have no objection.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I object. I want to speak in opposition to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I am opposed to the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and in favor of the amendment proposed by the Senate, for reasons which I will briefly state. It surprises me that the gentleman from Kentucky, [Mr. MARSHALL,] and the gentleman from New York, [Mr. CLARK,] and the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER,] should all of them have fallen into the manifest error which they did, in their arguments, by asserting that inasmuch as there are now independent lines of American steamers running to Southampton, which carry the mails for the amount of postage realized from each trip, which is, I believe, $7,000, that therefore the Government pays nothing for that service. It is known to the members of the committee that this Government is under a subsisting contract with the Collins line, for carrying the European mails, from New York to Liverpool, until the year 1860.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I deny it.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. So I understand. And I beg to refer the gentleman to an extract from the opinion of the Attorney General, Judge Black:

"Collins & Co. bound themselves to build four steamships, of certain dimensions and power, within a fixed time, and a fifth one as soon as practicable; and to carry the mails between New York and Liverpool. The United States were to have the privilege of taking the ships and converting them into vessels of war upon paying a fair valuation for them."

"In the mean time, Collins & Co. were to be paid a certain sum for carrying the mails. The time for building the first four ships was afterwards enlarged by Congress; and a still later act of Congress increased the mail pay and the number of trips to be run; but the terms and conditions of the contract remain as at first. Four ships (the Baltic, the Atlantic, the Arctic, and the Pacific) were built in due time, which were larger and stronger by fifty per cent. than the contract required; and the fifth one, the Adriatic, has been for some time in course of construction. These four vessels carried the mails with regularity and speed, which nobody complained of, until the Arctic was lost in September, 1854."

It is a subsisting contract, and if this Government, under that contract, can have the service which is now being performed by these other lines, why should it not be done and the Government saved about two hundred and thirty thousand dollars per year?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. How, then, will the mails be carried from Southampton to Havre, and from Southampton to Bremen?

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. They may be transhipped and sent forward from that point. It is right that we should favor the Collins line, because the vessels were constructed under the eye of the Navy Department with a view to their being taken for the naval service in case of war. The public faith was pledged to the builders that if they should construct these steamers the proposition then pending before Congress for ten additional vessels of war would be abandoned and these steamers considered as at the disposal of the Government in case of need.

Sir, I agree with gentlemen all around the House that if it were possible to reduce the expenditure of the public money in the mail service of the country, it would be a gratifying and laudable result; but, this contract existing with the Collins line, I cannot see why the additional duty should not be imposed upon them of running to Southampton as well as to Liverpool, if Collins & Co. consent to do so, and thus save the Government the amount of postage they are now paying to other mail lines for such service.

Mr. BLISS, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to amend by reducing the amount to one dollar. Sir, the subject of the Collins line of steamers has been before us for many years, harassing Congress from time to time through lobby agents. This is not the first time that I have had to fight against it, and it may be that upon this occasion, as upon others, I may not be the victor. But it is clear that we have not yet got rid of the Collins line, but we are furnished with stronger arguments against it than before. I think the facts show that this line has not only lost all claim upon this Government for any remuneration by its failure, but that it is wholly inadequate for the purpose for which it was established. This amendment provides for a perpetual failure in advance; and it shows that the Postmaster General was not willing to rely upon the Collins line of steamers. I am opposed to this whole system, to this vast, mighty monopoly which exists here, and which, I might well say, is an injury to commerce in general. If we are going to pay vast sums from the Treasury for carrying the mails, let us take the matter into our own hands, and derive a benefit from the experience we possess. Let the ships be ours, the officers ours, and let the whole thing be ours. We can do it just as well as we can through this Collins line. I think the whole thing is wrong from the beginning. If we do nothing else, let us cut loose from these contracts, and let the Postmaster General make the best contract he can with such parties as may offer to do the service. Let him offer the postage and such additional sums as may be necessary to carry out the plan. Let the work be put into market, and the contract be made with the lowest responsible bidder, and not, by force of legislative power, rule out competing interests, and give to this party a vast sum of money for doing that which he has wholly failed to do. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I desire to bring this controversy to a close; and in order to do so I submit the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "perform," in line eighteen, in these words:

"And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio, that he assigned the floor to him, supposing that he rose to oppose the amendment of the gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I hope the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his amendment.

Mr. SAVAGE. I withdraw it.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I rise to a question of order. I desire to know whether, if this amendment of the gentleman from Ohio should prevail, we can go back and amend the Senate amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Virginia, that in his opinion the Senate amendment is the text upon which the House may ingraft amendments, and that an amendment offered to the Senate amendment, is an amendment in the first degree, and that an amendment may be offered to an amendment in this committee. The Chair, in giving his opinion, conforms to what has been the usage of the committee, and never, in his judgment, departed from, until within a few days past.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The Chair did not understand my remark. If the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio—and I am in favor of it—prevails, does it prevent amending other parts of the Senate's amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the question submitted to him is not a question of order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, sir, I desire to amend the Senate amendment ahead of this one.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman cannot take the floor from the gentleman from Ohio for that purpose.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. Now I trust the gentleman from Virginia will allow me to proceed without further interruption.

The gist of the controversy between the Senate and the House is contained in these few lines, and there is no substantial difference which is not found therein. Now, I think this last provision ought to be stricken out, for these reasons: that if we give a bounty of over nineteen thousand dollars a trip to the Collins line, they ought to run that line, according to the contract, between New York and Liverpool, and in competition with the Cunard line. They ought to comply with the contract on their part, by carrying the mails from New York to Liverpool, and then the Government should comply with its contract by paying the stipulated price. The only reason which existed for paying this large sum was to enable it to compete with the Cunard line, thereby placing an American line in opposition to a British line. Now they ask not only a continuance of this large grant, but they seek to drive from the ocean other lines which are running for the simple ocean postage. I am willing to stand by the contract, and to pay them the $20,000 monthly, for carrying the mails between New York and Liverpool; but I am not willing to let them take a better contract with the same bonus, and run their line to Southampton, thereby having three lines to Southampton, and none to Liverpool.

If we strike out that portion of the amendment which I have indicated, we reduce the contest between the House and the Senate to just nothing at all.

Mr. EUSTIS. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] is laboring under a mistake. The amendment of the Senate differs very materially from the provision of the House in this bill, and his proposition to strike out the last three lines does not, in my opinion, relieve the amendment of the Senate from some of the objections that have been urged against it. But I agree with him, Mr. Chairman, that the material difference between the Senate amendment and the proposition of the House is to be found in the last four lines. And, in answer to the question of the gentleman from Maryland [Mr. KUNKEL] whether the Collins line did not perform the duty which is now being performed by the Bremen line and the Havre line, we have simply to say that when the Collins line has performed the trips from New York to Liverpool and back again, they have performed their contract. And all that we ask here—all that we insist upon—is, that they shall be held simply to the performance of their contract which they are now endeavoring to shirk from. They are endeavoring to shirk from their contract while they are receiving nearly four times the amount of compensation received by the two other lines.

In answer further to the gentleman from Maryland, we are not laboring at all under the impression that these two lines to Havre and Bremen are performing this duty without compensation. They are performing this duty, and in lieu of any bonus from the Government, they are receiving the inland and ocean postal receipts which amount to $130,000 for the two lines; whereas, on the other hand, the Collins line receives an amount equal to $346,500.

Now, what does this Collins line propose to do? They propose to abandon the trade between New York and Liverpool entirely to the Cunard line, and leave it without competition. This argument about competition was the argument urged at the time of the establishment of the line, and the one which actuated Congress in furnishing means to carry it on. It was precisely for the purpose of competing with the Cunard line. Now they propose to abandon this, and to enter into competition with two American lines which are performing the duty at the rate of $7,000 a trip. That is, they propose to abandon this contract for the purpose of entering into a new scheme which cannot fail to be a material injury to the other two lines.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it be in order now to move to strike out all of the Senate amendment after the word "dollars," in the tenth line?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair holds that it would not be in order.

Mr. HOUSTON. I suppose I can move to strike out additional matter to that which the gentleman from Ohio proposes to strike out?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair has already stated that the amendment of the Senate is considered the text, and that the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio is an amendment in the first degree only, so that an amendment can be offered thereto.

Mr. HOUSTON. I desire to amend the Senate amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I desire to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, by striking out the words "with the consent of the contractors." I desire this amendment because I wish to leave the matter under the control of the Postmaster General, and also for other reasons which I wish to state to the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Virginia, that the motion of the gentleman from Ohio is to strike out these and other words; and the effect of the gentleman's amendment would be to retain these words in the bill.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Well, how shall I get them out? Does not the Chair readily see that if these words were out, some gentlemen might be induced to vote for, and some against the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio, who would not do so under other circumstances?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia does not understand the suggestion of the Chair. The motion of the gentleman from Ohio is to strike out these and other words. The motion of the gentleman from Virginia is to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, by striking out these words. The parliamentary effect of that would be to retain these words in the Senate amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. How shall I shape the amendment? I confess I do not understand the Chair. Well, I move to strike out all after the word "dollars," including the gentleman's amendment, down to the word "Southampton."

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order. It will be competent for the gentleman from Virginia, at this time, to move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, and no further.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I try to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio, but I am not permitted, under the ruling of the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman mistakes the ruling of the Chair. The gentleman from Virginia may submit the amendment which he suggested. The Chair only informed him that the effect would not be what he supposes.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Then I submit that amendment. Mr. Chairman, I wish the committee to understand that I do not regard that there is any Collins line subsisting or existing. Last November, I think it was, Collins & Co. voluntarily, and of their own accord, abandoned their contract, and their steamers have since been sold at auction. If one side has a right to abandon the contract, so has the other; and we all know perfectly well that in these contracts for the transportation of the mails, there is uniformly a right reserved, on the part of the Postmaster General, to annul a contract which is not executed, but has been abandoned. Collins & Co., then, have failed, for about eight months, to execute their contract. There is no contract that can inure to them; and, acting upon that idea, this House, on a former occasion, passed the provision which the Senate has undertaken to amend. They recognize the fact that the contract is at an end, and accordingly provided for the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool without any reference to the late contractors, because they are no longer contractors. As to their steamers being suitable for war purposes, why they cannot even stand the pelting of the storm, but go to wreck in the tempest. The only two steamers they had left have been sold at auction, as is known to every gentleman here, and have been, I understand, bought in by foreigners—by Englishmen.

In this state of things, what do we see? Citizens of the United States, with genuine enterprise, undertaking to maintain the war which we paid a heavy premium to the late contractors to maintain against the Cunard line. We see American citizens—Mr. Cornelius Vanderbilt amongst others—putting their own steamers on the ocean, without the bounty of the Government, and maintaining the contest. And, sir, the contest will be maintained, and American and Yankee enterprise will still hold it on the ocean, as it has done heretofore. But, sir, if we still recognize these men as contractors, give them a bonus of nearly twenty thousand dollars a trip out of the Treasury, how is individual enterprise, however ardent and active and efficient, resting upon postages alone, to struggle at the same time against the Cunarders and an American company fed by Government bounty of such large amount?

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope the gentleman from Virginia will withdraw his amendment. I desire to offer one.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will do so to oblige the gentleman, although I think my amendment is a very proper one.

Mr. HOUSTON. I move to add at the end of the Senate amendment the words:

Upon condition that E. K. Collins & Co. shall relinquish all claims upon the Government on account of their present contract.

Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there is a very important principle which underlies the legislation now proposed. The contract between Collins & Co. and the Post Office Department is a subsisting one by which Collins & Co. get, in round numbers, $20,000 per round trip, between New York and Liverpool. They, however, have become dissatisfied with the contract, because, as one of the friends of the company has avowed in his speech here this evening, they cannot compete with the Cunard line; and because they cannot do so, they ask the Government to pass a law authorizing them to change the European termination of their line so as to bring them in competition with two other lines which are performing service between New York and European ports.

The principle which I regard as important and which is involved in the legislation now proposed is this: the policy of this Government has been, or if it has not been, it ought to be, that we should establish free trade (if I may apply such terms to it) in our ocean mail service as well as in regard to everything else. That we should, if we can do so, get all our ocean mail service performed for the postages. That is the case now with the Bremen and Havre lines. A contract subsisted at one time between the Department and those lines, by which they received a compensation out of the general Treasury for the service they performed. But that contract has terminated, and now those lines are performing the service for the postages. They are performing the service precisely as the Government ought to desire it to be done, for what they earn by the postages without any additional compensation.

Gentlemen endeavor to excite sympathy in favor of the Collins company, because they say they have been competing with the European line between New York and Liverpool. They say that Collins is entitled to kind consideration and the favorable regard of this Government, and therefore he ought to be released from his contract to run between New York and Liverpool, and allowed to change his European termination so as to come in competition with the lines that are already running between the same points. The lines now running to Bremen and Havre perform the service for the postages alone. That is what we desire all our lines to do. We must bring them to that, and then the mail service on the ocean may be as abundant as there are applications for it; there should be no restriction. If they will be content with the postages, I am willing that any amount of ocean mail service shall be performed. But it is proposed now to bring the Collins line, with a bounty from the Government of $20,000 for the round trip, in competition with the very lines which are performing the service upon the principle upon which the Government desires all of the service to be performed, and thereby to break down those lines, and defeat all our reforms in our ocean mail service. I am striving to produce the state of things on all of our ocean mail steam lines that now exists with the lines running to Bremen and Havre. They cost the Department nothing. They only receive the postages earned on their lines respectively, and it would be highly unjust that they should be required to contend with a new competing company to which the Government pays a bonus of $20,000 per round trip; and for one I will not vote for it.

Mr. SICKLES. Does the gentleman from Alabama withdraw his amendment?

Mr. HOUSTON. As the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. SHERMAN] will accomplish the object I have in view, I withdraw mine, and shall vote for his.

Mr. SICKLES. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Ohio an amendment which I think will more nearly accomplish the object he has in view than the motion he has made.

I move to amend the Senate amendment by striking out the words, "by transporting the mails from such port in the United States to such port in Great Britain as he may select;" and also by striking out the words, "and the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton." The amendment of the Senate will then read:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, in pursuance of the contract with E. K. Collins and others, $346,500: And it is hereby provided, That, for such days as the said Collins and others shall fail to perform said service, the Postmaster General is authorized to contract with the owner or owners of any other steam vessel or vessels to perform said service, and that the cost thereof be deducted from any amount which may be due, or may become due, to E. K. Collins & Co. for services actually performed.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment is not in order at this time.

Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio. I withdraw my amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is double, and is not in order as it has been moved.

Mr. SICKLES. They both relate to the same thing. I will, however, only offer the first at this time.

Mr. Chairman, the words that I propose to strike out are equally objectionable with those embraced in the amendment of the gentleman from Ohio. The effect of these portions of the Senate amendments is to expose two existing American lines which stop at Southampton to an unfair competition entirely inconsistent with the whole theory of the amendments proposed by the Senate to this bill. One of these lines—the New York and Havre line—has never missed a trip, and has performed its service faithfully, from the beginning of its contract to the present hour, and at a smaller compensation than has been accorded by the Government to any other of its lines. The proposition is to allow the Collins line, a third line, to go to Southampton, at a compensation of over nineteen thousand dollars a trip, while the other two lines are compelled to do the same service for postages only, which amounts to $7,000 a trip.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. You say that there are two other lines. What two other lines?

Mr. SICKLES. The line from New York to Havre, via Southampton, and the line from New York to Bremen, via Southampton.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. And is there any law which will authorize the Postmaster General to renew the contract which will shortly expire?

Mr. SICKLES. Yes, sir. In the first place, the bill, as it passed the House originally, authorized the continuance of his services for postages, and the amount appropriated, $230,000, was the estimated amount of the postages for both lines; whereas the proposition now before the committee, in the Senate amendment, is to give $346,000 for the same service to one line.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. The gentleman says that there is a law, and then refers to a pending bill, and which has not yet passed.

Mr. SICKLES. If the gentleman will hear me through, he will see that his interruption was not necessary. The laws of 1836 and 1845 give the Postmaster General authority to make these contracts for postages, and under those laws he has made the contracts under which this service is now performed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I deny that the gentleman can produce any such law.

Mr. SICKLES. I have only five minutes, and the gentleman will excuse me if I do not consume it in sending off to the library for the laws; but I will produce them at my leisure, and satisfy him of his error.

I was proceeding to say that the service to Southampton is performed creditably to the lines of steamers engaged, and to the satisfaction of the Government; and I wish to impress upon the House again the importance of continuing, not abandoning, the very important service between some one of our commercial ports and Liverpool—New York and Liverpool; as the contract now stands; and it is entirely true, as the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. Houshron] suggests, that, if the terminus of the Collins line on the other side is changed from Liverpool to Southampton, the contract necessarily falls with it; if so, the Collins line, as well as all other lines, ought to be placed on the footing required by the new principle embodied in these amendments—to wit, that the service shall be performed for postages. It seems now to be the policy of the Government to try this experiment.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I hope that we will come to a vote on this proposition. The committee seems to be substantially divided on two systems; one to continue the Collins contract under this Janus-faced amendment of the Senate to this bill, and the other to fall back upon our own proposition in regard to the Collins line, and to permit the Southampton lines to continue as they are now. I am entirely opposed to the Senate amendment, from the beginning to the end. The question will be put on the two propositions; and I think that the committee have discussed them sufficiently to understand them, if they are going to understand them at all. The same remarks are made over and over again by gentlemen, and they add nothing. They may be a little better said by one than another, but there is nothing added to the information of the committee by this discussion. I hope, therefore, we will come to a vote, first on the pending amendment, and then upon the Senate's amendment. If the Senate's amendment be non-concurred in, and our own provision retained, I shall be satisfied; but I am anxious to see the business progress. We are not gaining an inch.

Mr. ENGLISH. I agree with the gentleman from Illinois; and I hope we will vote, and not talk.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. When the vote shall be taken on the proposition of the gentleman from New York, [Mr. SICKLES,] will it be in order to move to insert matter behind that?

The CHAIRMAN. It will.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 35, noes 47.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I call for tellers. Tellers were ordered.

Mr. SICKLES. I withdraw my amendment.

The question recurring upon concurring in the Senate's amendment,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded tellers.

Mr. MORGAN. What became of the amendment of the gentleman from New York?

Mr. SICKLES. I withdrew it.

Mr. MORGAN. Well, I renew it. I propose to make no remarks upon it, but I want a vote.

The CHAIRMAN ordered tellers; and appointed Messrs. CLEMENS and KELLY.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 33.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment, as amended, was then non-concurred in.

Second amendment:

Strike out the following:

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The committee recommend a concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I believe that on a former occasion, when this bill came from the Committee of Ways and Means, and we had it under consideration, the Committee of Ways and Means reported this very paragraph. It was voted in by the committee and retained by the House. Now, sir, I would like to be informed by my friend, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, why it is now that the same committee recommend that to be stricken out which they then recommended should be retained? I am in favor of its retention.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I can answer my friend from New York, by saying that the Committee of Ways and Means, like all other committees, sometimes changes its mind; but the reason why it does so is beyond my knowledge or comprehension. The Postmaster General sent us his estimates asking for this, and the Committee of Ways and Means approved of the estimates and recommended the appropriation to the House. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union and the House agreed to it, but the Senate has stricken it out. The Committee of Ways and Means now recommend a concurrence with that amendment of the Senate; but the reason why it does so, it is not for me to give.

Mr. SICKLES. Was there not a letter from the Postmaster General read when this matter was up before, recommending that appropriation for contingencies?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There was.

Mr. SICKLES. I had it read as a part of my speech. I stick to the action of the House, and hope the clause will be retained.

The question was taken, and the Senate amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any steamship or other contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than five years.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend non-concurrence. I believe the reason for the recommendation is, that they do not propose to have any contract for any number of years. The old contract allowed a period not exceeding ten years. This fixes it at five years. I believe it to be the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means that it is better not to have any for any longer period than one, so that the whole system may be revised.

Mr. GARNETT. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out the words "five years," and insert:

One year, or for any other compensation on lines to Europe than the sea and United States inland postages, if by an American vessel; and if by a foreign vessel, the sea postages only on the mails so conveyed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. My friend from Virginia has got hold of the wrong amendment. That is the fourth amendment.

Mr. GARNETT. The difference between the fourth amendment and mine is this: I have examined it and know what I am about. The fourth amendment authorizes the Postmaster General to make contracts for the postages. If you add my amendment to the third Senate amendment, you say it shall not be lawful for him to contract for any other compensation. I wish to limit the Postmaster General in his contracts to the postages, and nothing more. And I desire to remind the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means that in the Senate such an amendment as this was reported by the unanimous vote of the Finance Committee, and was carried in the Senate, but that it was subsequently reconsidered and lost by a majority of two only, simply because the Southampton clause had been put into the bill; otherwise the Senate would have sent us what I now propose, as their amendment. We have stricken out the Senate clause in regard to Southampton, and I now propose to restore the bill to the condition in which the majority of the Senate had once placed it. I am willing to comply with existing contracts; but when the contracts are out, I wish to declare that it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any contract providing for any compensation more than the postages, because I do not believe that any other contracts are expedient, and most certainly they are not constitutional.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I am opposed to the amendment and ask the gentleman if he proposes now to enter upon a system of legislation on the whole subject of ocean mail service in an appropriation bill?

Mr. GARNETT. I will say this; our rules, it is true, have forbidden us to enter upon any system of legislation in an appropriation bill, but the practice of the Senate is different, and I am not willing that this House shall stand in an inferior condition of power to the Senate. The gentleman himself has reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, recommendations to concur in divers amendments to other appropriation bills which inaugurated systems of legislation. He should not have urged this objection against an amendment looking only to reform and retrenchment when he did not urge it against amendments leading to reckless extravagance.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There can be no disparity except to the advantage of the House, because we originate all the appropriation bills, while the Senate have only the privilege of amending them. I concur with the gentleman from Virginia as to its being the will of the country that we should get along for one year, and merely appropriate money to fulfill contracts, and to give the proceeds of the mail service to the vessels carrying the mails.

Mr. GARNETT. How stands the appropriation for the Havre and Bremen line? is that to fulfill a contract? Has not that contract expired?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The only appropriation for those lines is the proceeds of the postage, and that is for one year only. The object here is to get along temporarily for this year until a general system that would be self-supporting is established.

Mr. GARNETT. If my friend will refer back to the bill he will find that there is an appropriation here for these lines of $220,000, and not a word about postages.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. But if my friend turns to the estimates he will find that that is the estimated amount of receipts.

Mr. GARNETT. And these estimates are usually proved to be wrong, and the gentleman will come in next year with a deficiency bill and say that they were wrong.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Very well; let us have a vote.

Mr. SICKLES. I propose to amend by inserting two years instead of one. I am opposed to the Senate amendment, and also to the amendment proposed by my friend from Virginia. I think that this is not the period of the session to initiate a policy with respect to these steam lines, and I protest against the coördinate branch of Congress seizing such an opportunity, while considering an appropriation bill at this period of the session, to establish a permanent policy. It has been the understanding all through the session, in view of the embarrassed condition of the Treasury, and of other circumstances not necessary now to allude to, that it was inexpedient for Congress at this session to go into this question of establishing a permanent system for the regulation of this service. Such has been the understanding, I know, in this House. I believe it was the view of the Post Office Committee, and of the Committee of Ways and Means, and, I believe it has been the general expectation of the country, that this subject would be postponed until the next session of Congress.

Mr. GARNETT. I ask my friend from New York if he will allow us to take this amendment into the House, so that gentlemen may have the satisfaction of recording their names on the yeas and nays, either for or against this steamship subsidy system?

Mr. SICKLES. I have no objection, at any time, to give gentlemen an opportunity of putting themselves on record when they desire to do so. But I appeal to the gentleman from Virginia if it is fair or just to these interests or to the country, when it has been the understanding throughout the session that we were not to make up a record on this subject, that, at this time, a snap-judgment of this kind should be taken? Whether an opportunity should be seized, in the last days of the session, when there is no time for a full and fair discussion of this subject, to establish a policy or make up a record? I would go with the gentleman from Virginia, at the proper time, to make up a record. I would have gone with him at an earlier period of the session. I will go with him next session. I invite the fullest discussion of this subject; but this is not the proper time for it.

Mr. GARNETT. That was the very argument made at the close of the last short session. We were assured then that the whole subject would be taken up at this session.

Mr. SICKLES. And so it would have been, but for the condition of the Treasury.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I do not think that this is the time for us to initiate a new policy with reference to the lines of steam communication for our foreign mails. It was the opinion of the Committee of Ways and Means, earlier in the session, that it would be impossible, at that time, owing to the condition of the Collins contract, and others, to make a satisfactory arrangement; and surely we are in no better condition now to perfect one than we were at that time. It is, therefore, greatly to be regretted that the Senate should have seen fit to send to us material modifications of a bill which was intended only to be temporary in its character, providing only for the present emergency, and looking to an ulterior arrangement at the next session.

We all know that one of the committees of this House is now engaged in earnestly elaborating a system. Gentlemen are investigating with great care the system the English are pursuing by which they have successfully spread their network of steam lines all over the world. They are preparing a system by which we may imitate the English system, and at a less expense accomplish the great result they are accomplishing, in placing on a firm footing our own steam marine, in securing our own interests against foreign competition, in aiding our own companies in great steam enterprises, and in laying the foundation here for that great arm of modern defense, a steam Navy; and any hasty legislation at this time which would complicate the arrangements with contractors, or further entangle the Government, is by all means to be deprecated.

I therefore trust that the committee will come directly to a vote, and that that vote will result in a refusal to concur in the crude suggestions of the Senate, thrown out here in the last hours of the session, to be considered in a five minutes' debate—hasty conversation—to effect great national interests, the magnitude of which no man can ever state in the time allowed for their consideration.

The amendment to the amendment was rejected.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. GARNETT] by striking out all after the words "one year." I offer this amendment with a view of proposing to the sense of this committee the adoption of the views which have been presented by the gentleman from Maryland, [Mr. DAVIS], who last occupied the floor, and of my colleague from New York, [Mr. SICKLES]. It is now for this committee to decide, in the first place, whether they are willing to take the policy proposed as the basis of a policy to be inaugurated, furnished to us by the Senate at this late stage of the session. To my knowledge repeated application has been made to the Postmaster General by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of this House for a system of ocean postal communication, and as steadily and repeatedly has there been a failure to communicate to them any proposed system. And now, at this late hour, when we are mooted current questions in short and rapid moments, is a policy here thrust upon us for our adoption which is not only to influence, but to control, our commercial and postal communications with Great Britain and Europe for years to come. Sir, it is not the proper time for us to deliberate upon the subject. We are not prepared for it, in the first place, by reason of the magnitude of the interests presented to us in these steam lines; and, in the next place, because of the hurry and dispatch attending upon the business of this late period of the session. Therefore it is that I have risen to add my voice to the voices of those who have preceded me, and to protest against inconsiderate action. I now withdraw my amendment.

The question recurred upon Mr. GARNETT's amendment to the Senate amendment.

Mr. GARNETT called for tellers.

Tellers were not ordered.

The question was taken; and Mr. GARNETT's amendment was not agreed to, only thirty-one members voting therefor.

The amendment of the Senate was then non-concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

SEC. 5. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports, by steamship, allowing and paying therefor, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, if by an American vessel, the sea and United States inland postage, and if by a foreign vessel, the sea postage only, on the mails so conveyed: Provided, That the preference shall always be given to an American over a foreign steamship when departing from the same port for the same destination within three days of each other.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This amendment, if there was to be any legislation on the subject, perhaps would be a good one; but, for reasons I have already assigned, the Committee of Ways and Means thought there should be no legislation on the subject in this bill, and therefore recommended a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to provide for and maintain, if practicable, at a cost not to exceed, in any instance, the sea and United States inland postage on the mails conveyed, a weekly mail to and from Europe by United States mail packets, to alternate at regular intervals with the British mail packets plying between New York and Liverpool, and Boston and Liverpool, the preference to be given to such line or lines of American steamships, suitable in all respects for the service, as shall offer the best permanent contract: Provided, That no contract shall be made, under the provisions of this act, for the same service on the same week for which E. K. Collins and others have contracted, during the continuance of that engagement.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. This amendment is of the same character as those the committee have already voted on. I hope they will vote on it without further discussion. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendments of the Senate have now all been acted on; and I move that the committee rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. MILLSON reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail, by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and had directed him to report the same back to the House, with the recommendation that one be concurred, and that the others be non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I demand the previous question on concurring in the amendments of the Senate.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

The first, fourth, and fifth amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in without division. The second amendment was concurred in, as follows:

Strike out the following:

"For contingencies in the mail service between New York and Europe, $120,000."

The third amendment was reported, as follows:

"SEC. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any steamship or other contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than five years."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays upon concurring in that amendment, with the view of giving so strong an expression of opinion upon the part of the House as to control the action of the House committee of conference upon it.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Tellers will answer the same purpose, without consuming as much time. I demand tellers.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOWARD and BRYAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 4, noes 140.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to reconsider the several votes upon concurring in the Senate amendments; and also move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary.

The message was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I transmit the copy of a dispatch from Governor Cumming to the Secretary of State, dated at Great Salt Lake City, on the 2d of May, and received at the Department of State on yesterday. From this there is reason to believe that our difficulties with the Territory of Utah have terminated, and the reign of the Constitution and the laws has been restored. I congratulate you on this auspicious event.

I lose no time in communicating this information, and in expressing the opinion that there will be no occasion to make any appropriations for the purpose of calling into service the two regiments of volunteers authorized by the act of Congress approved on the 7th April last "for the purpose of quelling disturbances in the Territory of Utah, for the protection of supply and emigrant trains, and the suppression of Indian hostilities on the frontier."

I am the more gratified at this satisfactory intelligence from Utah because it will afford some relief to the Treasury at a time demanding from us the strictest economy, and when the question which now arises upon every appropriation is, whether it be of a character so important and urgent as to brook no delay, and to justify and require a loan, and most probably a tax upon the people to raise the money necessary for its payment.

In regard to the regiment of volunteers authorized by the same act of Congress, to be called into service for the defense of the frontier of Texas against Indian hostilities, I desire to leave this question to Congress, observing at the same time that, in my opinion, this State can be defended for the present by the regular troops, which have not yet been withdrawn from its limits.

JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON, June 10, 1858.

On motion of Mr. SICKLES, the message was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

COMMITTEE OF THE WHOLE.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. As we have now disposed of all the appropriation bills before us, if it is the pleasure of the House, I will move to suspend the rules, and go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the loan bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to amend that motion by inserting House bill (No. 483) making appropriations for the improvement of certain rivers and harbors.

The SPEAKER. The motion to suspend the rules is not amendable.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I only wish to amend that portion of it.

Mr. STANTON. I move that when the House adjourns, it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. That motion is not in order.

HEIRS OF GENERAL PORTERFIELD.

Mr. LETCHER. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to withdraw his motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of allowing me to ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up and put on its passage the Senate bill (No. 203) for the relief of the heirs of General Porterfield. If the House will hear the report read, there will be no objection. An elaborate report was prepared in the other end of the Capitol by the Senator from Massachusetts, [Mr. WILSON], and it was, I believe, unanimously concurred in by the committee in this House. It is the only request of the kind, I believe, I have made during the present session, and the only bill before the House in which my constituents are directly interested. I ask the consent of the House to take it up.

Mr. DEWART. I object.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to suspend the rules.
The SPEAKER. The motion is not in order at this time.

HARDY AND LONG.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. As the motion of the gentleman from Virginia to suspend the rules cannot be entertained, I ask the indulgence of the House to call up a motion to reconsider the vote by which the Senate bill for the relief of Hardy & Long was referred to the Committee of the Whole House on the Private Calendar. I entered the motion to reconsider at the request of my colleague, [Mr. CARUTHERS,] who is absent.

Mr. LETCHER. What motion is depending?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. LETCHER. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion.

Mr. ARNOLD. I move that the House adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and thereupon (at five minutes past nine o'clock, p. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

FRIDAY, June 11, 1858.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Journal of yesterday will be read.

Mr. STUART. I suppose the Journal is made up, in a great measure, of amendments to appropriation bills and of lists of yeas and nays. I suggest that we dispense with the reading of those.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection, and the Secretary will omit the reading of those portions of the Journal.

With those exceptions, the Journal was read and approved.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

Mr. STUART submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, (the House of Representatives concurring,) That the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses be suspended during the remainder of the present session.

These rules are as follows:

"16. No bill that shall have passed one House shall be sent for concurrence to the other on either of the three last days of the session.

"17. No bill or resolution that shall have passed the House of Representatives and the Senate shall be presented to the President of the United States for his approbation on the last day of the session."

FLORIDA CLAIMS.

Mr. MALLORY. I gave notice, in the beginning of the week, that I should ask the Senate, on Wednesday last, to take up the bill (S. No. 373) declaratory of the acts for carrying into effect the ninth article of the treaty between the United States and Spain, and I referred Senators to a report on the subject, made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK.] I presume, unless we can have a hearing on this bill this morning, the adjournment will take place without disposing of it. It is a very important one in view of our foreign relations. I do not feel at liberty to discuss the merits of the bill now; but I will say to the Senate that it is to carry out the provisions of a treaty with Spain, and while we have reclamations on her, she is throwing it in our teeth almost daily, that we have not yet carried out our treaty stipulations with her. I am not disposed to interfere with the appropriation bills, and there is one measure to come up to-day affecting the Senators from Indiana, which I would not interfere with, and if the discussion on this bill shall interfere with that, I shall consent to lay it aside. I ask that the vote may be taken on taking it up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. HUNTER. I object. There are appropriation bills on the table on which I want to get conference committees appointed.

Mr. MALLORY. Can I not have a vote of the Senate on my motion? I move to postpone all prior orders, and take up the bill which I have named.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Such a motion is not in order until the Chair calls for petitions and reports.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask unanimous consent to take up the appropriation bills on the table, for the purpose of having committees of conference appointed. ["No objection."] I move, first, to take up the naval bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendment of the House to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, it was Ordered, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the House amendment of its fourteenth amendment, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, and by unanimous consent, the Vice President was authorized to appoint the conference committee on the part of the Senate; and Mr. PEARCE, Mr. FOOT, and Mr. MALLORY, were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

Mr. PEARCE was, on his motion, excused from serving as one of the committee of conference, and Mr. PUGH was appointed.

Subsequently, Mr. PUGH was, on his motion, excused, and Mr. BENJAMIN was appointed, so that the committee consists of Mr. MALLORY, Mr. FOOT, and Mr. BENJAMIN.

A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House insisted upon its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1859; insisted upon its amendment to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate, and appointed Mr. THOMAS S. BOGOCK, Mr. JOHN KELLY, and Mr. FREEMAN H. MORSE, managers at the conference on its part.

MAIL STEAMER BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers, and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, it was Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments, and ask for a committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, and by unanimous consent, it was ordered that the committee be appointed by the Vice President; and Mr. YULEE, Mr. SEWARD, and Mr. CLAY were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

A message was subsequently received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House insisted upon its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mails by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. GEORGE W. JONES, Mr. HUMPHREY MARSHALL and Mr. WILLIAM H. ENGLISH managers at the same on its part.

SUPPLEMENTAL INDIAN BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various tribes for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendment of the House to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate to the said bill.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the amendment of the House to its thirtieth amendment, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, and by unanimous consent, the Vice President was empowered to appoint the conference committee on the part of the Senate; and Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. STUART, Mr. SEBASTIAN, were appointed.

Mr. STUART was, on his motion, excused from serving on the conference committee; and Mr. RICE was appointed.

Subsequently, a message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House insisted upon its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1856, and upon its amendment to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate to the said bill; and agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses; and had appointed Mr. GEORGE S. HOUSTON, Mr. JAMES B. CLAY, and Mr. BENJAMIN F. LEITER, managers of the same on its part.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate proceeded to consider its amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, and the amendment of the House to the forty-first amendment of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. In regard to that bill, I wish to try the sense of the Senate before asking for a conference. I am informed by the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means (I have not had time to cast them up myself) that the Senate, by their amendments, added $3,000,000 to the amount appropriated by the bill. The House of Representatives disagreed to most of our amendments. Although I would not concur entirely with the action of the House, yet I believe they have made the bill much better than it was when it went to them, and much better than it will probably be after it comes out of a conference. For the purpose of taking the sense of the Senate, and preventing a conference if possible, I move that the Senate recede from the amendments to which the House disagreed, and concur in the House amendment to our forty-first amendment.

Mr. SEWARD and others. What are they?

Mr. HUNTER. Let the Secretary read them.

The Secretary read the first amendment of the Senate, in which the House of Representatives non-concurred, to wit:

On page 2, at the end of line twenty-one, insert:
Provided, That the superintendent of the Military Academy, while serving as such by appointment of the President, shall have the local rank and the pay and allowances of a colonel of engineers; that the commandant of the corps of cadets at the Military Academy, while serving as such by appointment of the President, shall have the local rank, and pay and allowances of a lieutenant colonel of engineers, and, besides his other duties, shall be charged with the duty of instructor in the tactics of the three arms at said academy; and that the senior assistant instructor in each of the arms of service, to wit, the artillery, cavalry, and infantry, shall severally receive the pay and allowances of the assistant professor of mathematics.

Mr. SEWARD. Are we to take the question separately?

Mr. HUNTER. We probably can take the question on all the amendments to which the House disagreed. The important ones are those involving money for fortifications, military roads, and the Florida volunteers. These are the main amendments, and perhaps the opinion of each Senator upon those three questions would determine his course. On this statement the Senate probably will be ready to give their vote at once on the motion I make, which is to concur in the action of the House on the Army appropriation bill.

Mr. BENJAMIN. We had better have the other amendments read.

Mr. BAYARD. Is it in order to ask that the vote be taken separately on receding from each amendment? I wish the vote on the fortification amendment to be taken separately.

Mr. TOOMBS. The question can be taken separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Delaware calls for a division.

Mr. HUNTER. I submitted the motion in relation to all the amendments generally. I thought the Senate would probably determine in that way without debate.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope not. I do not think there is ever worse legislation than that done in conference committees. I think the judgment of each member of the Senate ought to be given on the questions upon which he is called to vote. Some of these amendments I am in favor of, and some I am against. The result of rejecting them in gross, will be to put them all in the power of a committee of conference. I do not wish to enlarge the legislative power of any six gentlemen of the two Houses to do important legislation for the country.

Mr. HUNTER. I propose that the Senate should determine without submitting the matter to a conference.

Mr. TOOMBS. But if you force me to vote on all the amendments together, I cannot vote properly. Some of them I approve of, some of them I disapprove of, and therefore I want a separate vote on each, so as to vote for what I approve, and against what I disapprove. If we disagree to the action of the House in a bunch, the committee of conference makes the bill, as has been usual in our legislative history for the last six or eight years.

Mr. HUNTER. If we agree to the action of the House at once, there will be no conference at all, but the bill will be passed.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know that, but some of these provisions I do not want to pass.

Mr. MALLORY. It seems to me to be a very extraordinary proposition on the part of the chairman of the Committee on Finance, to propose a departure from the usual course of asking for a committee of conference at this stage of the bill. I suppose it is made in view of the agreement to adjourn on Monday. I have voted uniformly against adjourning on so early a day as Monday, because I foresaw that towards the end of the session we should be hurried into voting for measures about which we really knew nothing. Now we are called upon to vote on these amendments in gross. I am totally opposed to such a course. I have no idea that it will be advantageous to the country. I mean to act on these questions without reference to the adjournment at all; I think the day fixed for adjournment is premature. I desire to have a conference in this case, because, on hearing the reasons which the House of Representatives may assign on some of these amendments, I may be willing to recede, or may be more determined to adhere to them. I should not feel myself bound by the action of a committee of conference, but I should like to have that investigation in the usual form.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senate will not concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives, one of which is to strike out all appropriations for fortifications, which I consider the most important feature in the bill. I would rather abandon the whole bill than lose that item. They have sent us no fortification bill; and unless we provide for the fortifications in this bill, the consequence will be that works will be arrested which cannot be arrested without serious injury and future increased expense.

Mr. HUNTER. Will my friend from Mississippi allow me to suggest—and I suppose that would probably be the sentiment of the Senate—that he ask for a committee of conference. I do not believe I sympathize with the action of the Senate in regard to most of the amendments to the Army bill. I moved to concur in the action of the House, because I thought in the main it was right. I suggest to the Senator from Mississippi that he may move for a committee of conference.

Mr. DAVIS. I do move for a committee of conference.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I will suggest to gentlemen whether we might not take a vote on some of these amendments, recede from some, and send a message to that effect to the House of Representatives; and perhaps they may recede from their action on others; and in that way close the bill without a conference. We may perhaps give way on some of these amendments; and if the House of Representatives find that, they may be willing to give way on others.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not believe you will ever settle it in that way. You must either agree to what the House of Representatives has done, or have a committee of conference. I agree myself to what the House has done in taking off three millions, and I think it is taken off in but a single instance where I would not concur with them.

Mr. BENJAMIN. That is for fortifications?

Mr. HUNTER. No. I concur with them in that. I think they have taken off in one instance where they ought to have left the appropriation; but that can be provided for.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the vote will be taken separately on the amendments, so that we may say whether we shall recede from each one or not. There may be some which the Senate may not sustain by a decided vote, and some on which they may yield. There are others that the Senate, by a decisive vote, may show their determination to insist upon. If, however, we insist on all the amendments in a lump, and leave the matter to a committee of conference, they have not the distinct judgment of the Senate to guide them on each point. My friend from Virginia was opposed, as we all know, to what I consider the most important amendment made by the Senate—the appropriations for fortifications. Of course, if we insist on all our amendments, in a lump, we leave them to a committee of conference, and those that they think of less importance they will recede from and take others.

Mr. HUNTER. I said that I did not intend to be connected with the committee at all. The Senator from Mississippi, who represents the feelings of the Senate on this question, has moved for a committee of conference.

Mr. BAYARD. I place that aside. Still it comes to this: the sense of the Senate ought to be expressed on these several amendments, so that the committee of conference may know what it is that we really desire to insist upon. I think it is better to take the vote separately.

Mr. HAYNE. This bill has been fully discussed in the Senate, every item in it, and after a great waste of time we came to the conclusion that the bill ought to pass as it is. In my humble opinion, the only mode of carrying our point is to face the question, send the bill back to the House, and say we adhere to it as it is. It has been debated fully; and if we go on discussing it, we shall never adjourn.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I am adverse to testing the sense of the Senate on all the amendments together. I concur with the Senator from Mississippi, that the provision for fortifications is of more real importance to the country than all the rest of the bill; and I trust that the course proposed by him will be pursued, and that we shall insist on our amendments, and ask for a committee of conference in the usual course.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state the position of the question. The Senator from Mississippi moves that the Senate insist on its amendments, disagree to those of the House of Representatives, and ask for a committee of conference. Several Senators have asked for a division of the question, and the vote will be taken on the amendments separately.

Mr. HUNTER. I suppose if I withdraw my motion to enable the Senator from Mississippi to make his, which I do, the Senate will be willing to take the question at once on his motion, as that is the usual way to settle such things.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is that of the Senator from Mississippi, but still a Senator may ask for a division on each amendment.

Mr. STUART. I desire to move that the Senate recede from its amendments. I agree with the Senator from Georgia, that the time has arrived when we ought to legislate for ourselves and not legislate by committees of conference. I stated yesterday, in the discussion, that it was time to stop the system of putting the whole legislation of the country into the hands of five or six members of the two Houses. I therefore move that the Senate recede from its amendments to this bill. That will bring us to the question, and it can be taken separately.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is inclined to think that the motion of the Senator from Michigan is first in order.

Mr. STUART. Certainly.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved and seconded that the Senate recede from its amendments.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I demand a division of the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the vote must be taken on each amendment separately. The Secretary has already read the first amendment of the Senate, which has been disagreed to by the House of Representatives. The question is on receding from that amendment.

The motion to recede was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not know whether the Senate understood the question; if so, I have nothing to say.

Mr. MALLORY. I move a reconsideration. No one understood the question.

Mr. SEWARD. I move a reconsideration.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to; and the question recurred, "Will the Senate recede from its amendment?"

Mr. DAVIS. I will merely state to the Senate—I shall not detain them by going into a full explanation—that this amendment involves a very small amount of money, and no additional appropriation; the appropriation being adequate to the whole want. It effects a very great improvement in the organization of the Military Academy, which has been recommended from time to time for the last twenty years, and for the want of which it has been twice necessary to brevet the superintendent, so that he might take the brevet rank of colonel to the Army when he left the academy. This is a proposition not to confer a brevet, not to confer rank temporarily, but permanently. It is believed it will benefit the academy. I hope the Senate will not recede from, but will insist on, this amendment.

The question being taken, the Senate refused to recede from the amendment.

The Secretary read the next amendments to which the House of Representatives disagreed, (the third and fourth,) which were to strike out the following clause:

"For the alteration of old arms, so as to make them breech-loading guns, in accordance with the recommendation of the Secretary of War, $100,000;"

and in lieu of it, to insert:

For the purchase of breech-loading carbines, of the best model, to be selected and approved by a board of ordnance officers, $45,000.

For the alteration of old arms, so as to make them breech-loading arms, upon a model to be selected and approved by a board of ordnance officers, $25,000: Provided, any portion of said sum, not exceeding $5,000, may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War, in applying to the old or new arms the recent improvement of Captain J. N. Ward in the mode of applying Maynard's primer.

Mr. DAVIS. If we recede from these amendments, we leave the Secretary of War no money with which to purchase the improved arms that are made from time to time in the country, but he will have $100,000 to convert the old muskets into breech-loading arms. I think the amendments of the Senate greatly improve the mode of applying the money. They allow him to purchase, from time to time, as ingenuity devises something which promises to be useful, a small number for actual test in the field; and I think we should do no more upon any plan which is new until that actual test has been applied to it, and we have thus been able to determine this point in a manner which will not render us liable to ruin the arms we have, and introduce something which will have to be thrown away, as we have done on several former occasions.

Mr. PUGH. I would suggest to the Senate that these amendments call for a less amount of money than the provision of the House bill for which they are a substitute. I think we had better adhere to these amendments.

The Senate refused to recede from the amendments.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. If we desire to economize time, I suggest that we had better resort to the usual course of insisting on our amendments and asking for a committee of conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] insisted on a separate vote upon each amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I withdraw my demand for a division, as it appears to be the sense of the Senate to insist on all its amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If the Senator from Louisiana withdraws his demand for a division, the motion of the Senator from Mississippi stands.

Mr. STUART. But that does not dispose of my motion to recede.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair begs pardon; it does not. If there be no further demand for a division, the question will be on the motion of the Senator from Michigan that the Senate recede from its remaining amendments.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I desire to inquire whether the House of Representatives has added any amendments on which the Senate has not passed. If not, I have no objection to passing on our other amendments in gross.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The other House has made an amendment to one amendment of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I should like to hear it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The forty-first amendment of the Senate was to add to the bill:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That it shall be lawful for any commissioned officer of the Army to administer the prescribed oath of enlistment to recruits, provided there be no civil magistrate authorized to administer the same within reach.

The amendment of the House is to strike out the words "within reach" and insert:

Where the services of a civil magistrate authorized to administer the same cannot be obtained.

The Chair supposes this amendment not to be included in the motion of the Senator from Michigan, as the House has concurred in it, with an amendment. The motion of the Senator from Michigan is, that the Senate recede from its remaining amendments in which the House non-concurred.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the amendments will be read, so that we may know what we are voting on.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the next amendment disagreed to by the House.

The Secretary read the sixteenth amendment, as follows:

To enable the Secretary of War to examine and report upon suitable sites for an armory and foundry in the West and on the Pacific coast, $10,000.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Will the Senate recede from the amendment?

Mr. ALLEN. I only desired to know what the amendments were. I do not ask for a separate vote on each.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read the amendments which have been disagreed to by the House.

The Secretary read:

Seventeenth amendment:

To enable the Secretary of War to compensate F. W. Lunder for services performed, and expenses incurred by him in making reconnoissances for a railroad from Puget Sound via the South Pass, to the Mississippi river, in 1854-55, $4,750, or so much thereof as the said Secretary may consider reasonable and proper in consideration of said services and expenses.

Eighteenth amendment:

For payment of volunteers operating in Florida during the year 1857, $385,000.

Nineteenth amendment;

For continuing the construction of the following works of defense—

Mr. PUGH. It is not necessary to read that. We all understand it. It is the fortification amendment.

Mr. ALLEN. I propose that we suspend the further reading of the amendments.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the further reading of the amendments will be dispensed with, and the Chair will put the question on the motion made by the Senator from Michigan that the Senate recede from its remaining amendments, which have been disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

The motion was not agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will now put the question on the motion of the Senator from Mississippi, that the Senate insist on its amendments disagreed to by the House of Representatives, disagree to the House amendment to its forty-first amendment, and ask for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. DAVIS, COLLAMER, and SLIDELL, were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House insisted upon its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th June, 1859, and upon its amendment to the forty-first amendment of the Senate to the said bill; agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN A. QUITMAN, Mr. MARTIN J. CRAWFORD, and Mr. BENJAMIN STANTON, managers at the same, on its part.

THE DROMEDARY.

Mr. DAVIS. I wish to present to the Senate a manuscript in regard to the dromedary. I will state that my official connection as a Senator, and as Secretary of War, with the introduction of camels into this country, and the personal interest I took in the subject, have kept me more or less in correspondence in regard to it for some years. Our consul general at Alexandria, Mr. De Leon, has obtained very valuable additions to the knowledge which we have in relation to this animal heretofore, from William Reekyan Bey. It is very interesting, and very instructive; and if we are to use this animal in the service of the United States, it must be very beneficial to the Government, both in regard to the introduction and management of the animal after it has been brought here. This manuscript treats of its characteristics, its history, its diseases, its use in war, and is an addition to the information we have heretofore received, which, I think, will be very useful to the country and quite essential to the military arm of our service, if the further introduction of this animal is to be continued. It has been sent to me in a complimentary way, and I present it to the Senate, in order that it may be printed for the public good, if the Senate choose to print it. If, however, it should be decided not to be of sufficient value to justify its printing, I shall, of course, claim it again as my private property, and make such disposition of it as I please. I move that it be printed for the use of the Senate, and that two thousand extra copies be printed for the use of the War Department; which motion, I suppose, will go to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will go, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JONES, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Mary Walbach, widow of General J. B. Walbach, reported a bill (S. No. 453) for the relief of Mary Walbach, widow of the late Brevet Brigadier General John B. Walbach, of the United States Army; which was read, and passed to a second reading.

Mr. MALLORY, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of George B. Bacon, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 454) for the relief of George B. Bacon, late acting purser of the sloop-of-war Portsmouth. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 648) for the relief of Gottlieb Scheerer, reported it with an amendment.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom were referred three petitions of citizens of the city of Tampa, Florida, praying that the military reservation and garrison grounds at Fort Brooke, be granted to that city for the purpose of establishing a seminary of learning, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SIMMONS, from the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office, to whom was recommended the bill (S. No. 274) for the relief of Randall Pegg, reported it with an amendment, and submitted a report on the subject; which was ordered to be printed.

Mr. FITCH, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Stone and Isaac H. Marks, praying compensation for property taken by an Indian agent, under an agreement of arbitration, for Government purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. YULEE, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the memorial of Marshall O. Roberts and others, trustees of A. G. Sloo, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 455) for the relief of the trustees of A. G. Sloo. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

Mr. DURKEE, from the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the legal representatives of William Bond and William Douglas, officers in the war of the Revolution, praying to be allowed interest on the half pay paid under the act of June 30, 1834, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

POST OFFICE REGULATIONS.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the following resolution; yesterday submitted by him, was taken up and passed:

Resolved, That the Postmaster General be directed to inform the Senate by what authority the books referred to in his answer to the Senate's resolution of the 27th ultimo, "relative to the list of post offices, regulations," &c., "prepared and published on private account," and not recognized by the Department as official, have been purchased by the Post Office Department, and distributed to its agents and postmasters, the amount paid for such publications, and out of what fund; also, that he communicate to the Senate a printed copy of "the last official edition" of the regulations of the Department, together with a copy of such official regulations as have since been adopted and furnished by means of printed circulars, and which are now in use for the guide and government of postmasters in the discharge of their duties.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had rejected the bill of the Senate (No. 203) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Porterfield, deceased.

Also, that the House had passed the following bills of the Senate:

An act (No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of the revolutionary war; and

An act (No. 277) for the relief of Albert G. Allen.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following bills, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

An act (H. R. No. 340) providing an increase of pension to Peter Van Buskirk, of Washington city, District of Columbia; and

An act (H. R. No. 650) granting an invalid pension to William Randolph.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

An act for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of Illinois;

An act for the relief of John Sawyer, a soldier of the war of the Revolution;

An act for the relief of certain purchasers of lands within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830;

An act for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of the revolutionary war; and

An act for the relief of Albert G. Allen.

MAJOR GENERAL TOWSON.

Mr. BELL. The Committee on Naval Affairs to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 26) for the benefit of the nearest male heir of the late Major General Towson of the United States Army, deceased, have instructed me to report it back without amendment, and to ask that the Senate will now consider it. Justice has been long delayed, and the committee are unanimous in the recommendation of this resolution, which proposes to give a mark of distinction for gallant services in the last war with England for a particular act; such mark of distinction as has been given to others who had no greater share of honor and distinction than General Towson; but, by some accident or other, he has been omitted.

By unanimous consent the resolution was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It is a request to the President to cause a sword to be prepared with suitable emblems and devices, and presented to Nathan Towson Caldwell, grandson of the late Major General Nathan Towson, of the United States Army, for his gallant conduct in the capture of the British brig Caledonia on the Niagara river, near Fort Erie.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the question of privilege which was set for to-day at twelve o'clock.

Mr. SEWARD. I ask the Senate to take up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Gaines. There will now be no opposition to the measure, as I understand, inasmuch as I have agreed to the amendments that were suggested.

Mr. PUGH. I cannot consent to take up that bill now, though I am in favor of it. I think the question of privilege ought to be disposed of.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to postpone the special order, and take up the bill which I have indicated.

Mr. BENJAMIN. My vote will be governed entirely by the wish of the Senators who are interested in the question of privilege. If they agree to give up their time, I have no objection.

Mr. SEWARD. It will take no time.

Mr. BRIGHT. I have given up day after day, and week after week, until I have reached this hour, which has been specially fixed for the consideration of the case. I am unwilling to yield any further. All I ask is for a vote on the report of the Judiciary Committee.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. MASON. I have the permission of the honorable Senator from Ohio, and the honorable Senators from Indiana, to ask that the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations in relation to the recent proceedings in the Gulf be taken up for the purpose of making them the order of the day for to-morrow at twelve o'clock.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the resolutions will be taken up.

Mr. HALE. I object.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The Senate proceeded to consider the following report of the Judiciary Committee, which was made by Mr. PUGH on the 24th of May:

The Committee on the Judiciary, to whom were referred the credentials of GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators from the State of Indiana, together with the documents and testimony relative to that subject, have had the same under consideration, and report, by resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators returned and admitted from the State of Indiana, are entitled to the seats which they now hold in the Senate as such Senators aforesaid, the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863, according to the tenor of their respective credentials.

Mr. PUGH. Mr President, when the Committee on the Judiciary decided in favor of this resolution, I was instructed, at the same time, to submit a written report to the Senate; but afterwards, fearing that the session was about to close prematurely, it was judged most expedient simply to report the resolution, and let members of the committee individually express the views which they entertained as to the matters of fact involved. I had at that time prepared a narrative connectedly, of the facts, as I understand them, and as I believe the majority of the committee understands them, on which the validity of this election depends, and that statement I will now proceed to make.

The Legislature of Indiana consists of a Senate and a House of Representatives. The Senators are fifty in number, and the Representatives one hundred; the Senators chosen for a term of four years (one half biennially) and the Representatives for a term of two years. The Legislature holds its regular sessions at Indianapolis, commencing the Thursday next after the first Monday in January of the alternate year.

On the second Tuesday (14th) of October, 1856, twenty-five Senators and one hundred Representatives were elected in the several districts or counties of Indiana; and these were to assemble at Indianapolis on the 8th of January, 1857, in order to be inducted into office, and, with twenty-five Senators elected in October, 1854, to compose the Legislature of the State.

On that day, January 8th, the Representatives convened, and the House was duly organized, and at once, for the transaction of public business. The Senate, however, became a scene of disorder and turbulence. By the constitution of Indiana, article fifth and section twenty-first, the Lieutenant Governor is, "by virtue of his office," the President of the Senate, and, as such, the person to call that body to order, receive the credentials of Senators newly elected, and direct the administration to them of an appropriate oath of office. On this occasion, at the usual hour, Ashbel P. Willard, Lieutenant Governor, took the chair, and called the Senate to order, requesting the Senators elect to produce their credentials, and receive the prescribed oath. Immediately several of the Senators elected in October, 1854, commenced a disorderly and factious course of proceeding out of which all the present difficulties have arisen. One of their number, Lewis Burk, took a chair by the side of the Lieutenant Governor, and assumed to be the President of the Senate; appointed a clerk; called the roll of the Senators in office; required those newly elected to deliver him their credentials, and be sworn under his direction. Several of the Senators elected in October, 1856, recognized Mr. Burk as President, delivered their credentials to him, and, by his direction, were sworn or affirmed. The aisles of the Senate chamber, as well as the galleries, seem to have been crowded, for the occasion, by violent men, some of them armed, and all acting in concert. The object of such a violation of order and public peace, at variance with the duty of the Senators by whom it was instigated or countenanced, is proven to have been that the organization of the Senate of Indiana should be seized by mere tumult, and the Lieutenant Governor deposed from his constitutional authority, with a view to secure the admission of three persons assuming to be Senators (respectively) for the counties of Rush, Marion, and Fountain, and, by means of their admission, to obtain a majority of the Senate, and prevent any election at that session of the Legislature of Senators to represent the State of Indiana in the Congress of the United States. For one of the prominent duties of the Legislature, so required to convene on the 8th of January, 1857, was the election of two Senators in Congress; the first to fill a vacancy at the time, and the second to succeed Hon. Jesse D. BRIGHT on the 4th of March thereafter.

In the disorder and confusion thus induced, the Senate of Indiana took a recess until two o'clock in the afternoon; at which time, fortunately, better counsels prevailed. Mr. Burk and his supporters abandoned their factious course; recognized the Lieutenant Governor as rightful President of the Senate; caused the credentials of such of the newly-elected Senators as had acted with them to be again presented, and the oath of office duly administered. Stanley Cooper, who had been sworn as a Senator from Rush county, under the direction of Mr. Burk, could furnish no credentials of his election; but he was admitted, and again sworn in the afternoon, pursuant to a special order of the Senate. With this addition, the Senators present numbered forty-nine; one of those elected in October, 1854, Mr. Alexander, being absent.

It appears that in three senatorial districts, namely: the counties of Rush, Marion, and Fountain, Stanley Cooper, John S. Bobbs, and Isaac A. Rice were returned as Senators elect, in October, 1856, by bare pluralities, and in such circumstances as to induce a suspicion that they had not been elected by the qualified voters, but by the aid of persons non-resident and others not qualified. I do not here assume to say that these suspicions were well founded; inasmuch as the decision of each House of the Indiana Legislature (whether a decision wrongfully or rightfully made) must be taken as conclusive on all questions touching the election of its own members. But the fact that Messrs. Cooper, Bobbs, and Rice, as well as those who sympathized with them, resorted to such conduct on the 8th of January, 1857, shows that they had little confidence in the truth of their own claim to be Senators elect.

The statute of Indiana "regulating general elections and prescribing the duties of officers in relation thereto," approved June 7, 1852, provides (section thirty-eight) that:

"When any person is elected to an office by the voters of a county, not to be commissioned by the Governor, and such election is not contested, the clerk of the circuit court shall, after ten and within twenty days from the time the board of canvassers have made their return, make out and deliver, on demand, to such person a certificate of his election;" &c.

The election of Messrs. Cooper, Bobbs, and Rice had been contested; and hence a question would properly arise, upon the meeting of the Senate, whether they had any credentials; and if so, whether their credentials had been issued before or after the notice of contest. Such a question must needs have been decided by the Lieutenant Governor in the first instance, and until the Senate had become an organized body and competent for the transaction of business. To usurp this right of the Lieutenant Governor, and, through Mr. Burk's agency, foist Messrs. Cooper, Bobbs, and Rice into the Senate, with or without credentials, appears to have been a scheme premeditated, attempted, and fortunately at length abandoned. The illegal character of such proceedings has been repeatedly decided. I refer to the case of Field vs. Field, (9 Wendell, 394,) which arose upon a division of the religious society commonly called Quakers; and to the case of the Commonwealth vs. Green, (4 Wharton, 531,) which arose upon the celebrated division in the General Assembly of the Presbyterian Church.

On the 14th of October, 1856, a Governor and a Lieutenant Governor of Indiana had likewise been elected. The present constitution of the State, which took effect November 1, 1851, provides in its fifth article:

"SEC. 4." * * * * * "The returns of every election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of Government, directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall open and publish them in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly.

"SEC. 5. The person, respectively, having the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be elected; but in case two, or more, persons shall have an equal, and the highest, number of votes for either office, the General Assembly shall, by joint vote, forthwith proceed to elect one of the said persons Governor or Lieutenant Governor, as the case may be."

The constitution required also, in the ninth section of the same article, that "the official term" of the Governor and the Lieutenant Governor should commence on the second Monday in January after their election; which, in the present case, would be Monday, January 12, 1857. On that day accordingly, the House of Representatives sent a message inviting the Senate "to attend in the hall of the House of Representatives, at half past two o'clock this afternoon, to open and publish the returns of the election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, as required by the fourth section of the fifth article of the constitution of the State of Indiana."

It seems that previously, on the 9th, a message had been sent from the House "inviting the Senate into the hall of the House of Representatives to hear the annual message of his Excellency Governor Wright," to which the Senate had not paid the least attention.

The message of January 12 shared no better fate; it became the subject of discussion and attempted amendment in the Senate, protracted until almost or quite the time appointed for the Speaker of the House to discharge the duty enjoined on him by the constitution of the State. One amendment proposed was the addition of these words, inappropriately enough, to the invitation sent to the House:

"That, in said joint convention, no other business shall be transacted except that of opening, counting, and publishing the returns of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, witnessing the inauguration, and the administration of the oaths of office; and when that is done, such joint convention shall stand adjourned sine die, without motion."

In this emergency, the Senate refusing to act on the invitation of its coördinate branch, and thus effectually disorganizing the whole State government, the Speaker of the House of Representatives (as the officer upon whom, by name, the constitution of Indiana had devolved a specific duty in the premises) caused a formal summons to be served upon the Senators in session:

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
INDIANAPOLIS, January 12, 1857.

SIR: Please lay before the Senate, over which you preside, the following communication.

BALLARD SMITH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.
Hon. A. P. WILLARD, President of the Senate of Indiana.

HALL OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
INDIANAPOLIS, January 12, 1857.

GENTLEMEN OF THE SENATE OF INDIANA: The constitution of the State devolves upon the undersigned the duty of "opening and publishing the election returns for Governor and Lieutenant Governor" of the State in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly.

As the terms of office of those functionaries begin on this day, by appointment of the constitution, I intend to perform that duty in the hall of the House of Representatives instantler, and respectfully invite you to be present with the House of Representatives now in session.

BALLARD SMITH,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

It appears in this connection that the Speaker acted in pursuance of the order of the House of Representatives. From the journal of the House of that day, it appears—I read from the journal, as set forth on pages 48 and 49 of the report of the committee—that the Speaker made the following announcement from the chair:

"Gentlemen of the House of Representatives:

"The constitution of the State of Indiana requires that the Speaker shall open and publish the returns of the election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly; and as the official term of the Governor and Lieutenant Governor elect commences this day, I have communicated an invitation to the Senate to meet the House in this hall, and, in obedience to the constitution, I shall, so soon as the Senate appear, proceed to publish the returns for Governor and Lieutenant Governor."

"Mr. Kerr offered the following preamble and resolution: 'Whereas, the Speaker of this House has announced his intention to proceed forthwith in this hall to open and publish the election returns for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, in pursuance of the requisitions of the constitution, and has given the Senate notice thereof;

"Resolved, That the House will attend upon the appointment of the Speaker in the discharge of the duties devolved upon them by the constitution, and that seats be provided for the members of the Senate on the right of the Speaker's seat."

"Resolved further, That the Senate be informed of the same, and that the House is now ready to proceed to said business."

"Which was agreed to."

Upon the receipt of this summons from the Speaker of the House, Lieutenant Governor Willard announced to the Senate that his term of office was about to expire, and required the Senators to proceed with him to the hall of the House of Representatives, in order to discharge the last duty imposed on him, and one of the most important duties enjoined on them, by the constitution of the State. Twenty-six Senators followed him; and a convention of the two Houses was thereupon duly organized, the Lieutenant Governor, as President, in the chair. The Speaker of the House proceeded, as appears by the journal, to count the votes for Governor. The journal of the House of Representatives says:

"The Speaker of the House of Representatives, then, in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly, proceeded to open the returns of the votes cast for Governor and Lieutenant Governor of the State of Indiana, on the 14th day of October, 1856; and, on counting all the votes returned, it appeared therefrom that, for the office of Governor, Ashbel P. Willard had received 117,981 votes; Oliver P. Morton had received 112,139 votes."

"Ashbel P. Willard, having received a majority of all the votes cast, was, by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly of the State of Indiana, declared duly elected Governor of the State of Indiana, to serve as such for the term of four years, from and after the second Monday in January, A. D. 1857."

That announcement having been made, Governor Willard resigned the chair of the joint convention to one of the Senators, Mr. Tarkington, and thereupon was sworn into office by one of the judges of the supreme court, and delivered his inaugural address. The Speaker of the House proceeded further to count the votes for Lieutenant Governor; and the journal says:

"For the office of Lieutenant Governor it appeared, from the returns aforesaid, that

Abram A. Hammond had received 116,717
Conrad Baker had received 111,620

"Abram A. Hammond, having received a majority of all the votes cast, was, by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly, declared duly elected Lieutenant Governor of the State of Indiana, for the term of four years, from and after the second Monday of January, A. D. 1857."

"Abram A. Hammond was then sworn into office by the Hon. Samuel E. Perkins, one of the judges of the supreme court."

The presiding officer of the joint convention, Senator Tarkington, then adjourned the convention until the 2d day of February, 1857. In the afternoon, Lieutenant Governor Hammond, who was thus inducted into office, returned with the twenty-six Senators into the Senate Chamber, and took his seat as President of the body in the presence of all the members, and delivered his inaugural address. He continued to preside, without dispute as to his title, to the end of the session, and is at present in office.

On the 2d of February, 1857, when the time arrived for the adjourned session of the joint convention, Lieutenant Governor Hammond required the Senators to repair with him to the hall of the House of Representatives pursuant to the adjournment. On this occasion, twenty-four Senators accompanied him. The convention was then, by the order of its presiding officer, again adjourned until the 4th of February, 1857, at nine o'clock in the morning. When that hour arrived, Lieutenant Governor Hammond required the Senate to repair to the House of Representatives, in pursuance of the adjournment. But twenty-four Senators attended on that occasion. Being assembled, I read from the journal of the House:

"WEDNESDAY MORNING, 9 O'CLOCK, February 4, 1857."

"The hour for the meeting of the joint convention of the two Houses of the General Assembly having arrived, the Senate, preceded by the Lieutenant Governor, appeared within the hall of the House, where seats were provided for them on the right of the Speaker's chair."

"Upon calling the convention to order, the President, with the consent of the joint convention, appointed Solon Turman, secretary thereof, who was duly sworn in as such by the Hon. Samuel Perkins, one of the judges of the supreme court, and entered upon the discharge of his duties."

"The chairman addressed the convention as follows: 'GENTLEMEN: Pursuant to adjournment on Monday, February 2, 1857, we are assembled in joint convention, under a provision of the constitution of the State of Indiana, and you will now proceed to choose a United States Senator by a viva voce vote, to serve as such until the 4th of March, 1861.'"

They proceeded to vote; and it appears that GRAHAM N. FITCH received eighty-three votes, and George G. Dunn two votes. Mr. Fitch was thereupon declared elected by the President of the convention. They then proceeded to choose a Senator for the term ending March 4, 1863; and JESSE D. BRIGHT received eighty-three votes, and Richard W. Thompson two votes; whereupon Mr. BRIGHT was declared elected.

The question occurs, in these proceedings, whether here was a sufficient legal election under the Constitution of the United States, and under the constitution of the State of Indiana. I will remark, in this connection, that at the time of the election there was no law in force in the State of Indiana prescribing the time, place, and manner of electing Senators of the United States, except that the General Assembly should meet at the seat of Government. There was a statute, approved January 7, 1831, which was superseded by the act of June 18, 1852, repealing all former acts not therein excepted; but this repealing act did not take effect until after the election of the last Senator from that State, Mr. Pettit, for this reason: the constitution of Indiana has a provision that—

"No act shall take effect until the same shall have been published and circulated in the several counties of this State, by authority, except in case of emergency; which emergency shall be declared in the preamble, or in the body of the law."

This general revision of the statutes was not circulated, as the supreme court of the State has decided in a case arising under this section, until a period subsequent to Mr. Pettit's election, so that this was the first case in which there was no statute regulating the election of Senators in the State of Indiana.

The question recurs, what is the constitutional method of electing United States Senators, in the absence of any law or usage, for there was no law at this time, nor had there ever been any usage in the State on the subject of electing Senators, separate from what the former statute imposed? It is not necessary that the Legislatures of the States should provide by law the time, and place, and manner, of electing Senators; but it is necessary that Congress shall proceed by law, if it attempts to interfere; and this distinction is quite remarkable in the language of the Constitution of the United States. The provision of the fourth section of the first article is:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the place of choosing Senators."

And, accordingly, in the State which I have the honor to represent, there never has been any law on the subject from the time she was admitted into the Union; and I assume, from a variety of cases which have been decided by the Senate, that it is competent for the Legislature, in the absence of any constitutional provision in the State, or of any law, to fix the time, place, and manner of election by a joint resolution, or by separate concurrent resolutions, or by a consent given at the time. In fact, we can stand on no other basis. Let me invite the attention of Senators to the case of California. Up to the time of the admission of California, in September, 1850, there was not, legally, any Legislature in that State; there could be none. There might be a de facto Legislature, good as among the people living there; but it was not a State Legislature within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States, for no such State was in the Union until the passage of the act of admission; and yet, upon a solemn discussion in the Senate, the two Senators elect from that State, chosen by a body which was not legally a State Legislature, were admitted to their seats, and qualified. So in the case of Minnesota, and so in the case of most of the new States.

This uniform course of action must have proceeded upon this proposition, that the persons constituting the State Legislature being the body qualified to elect Senators, the time, the place, and the manner of such elections are left wholly to their own discretion in the absence of an act of Congress; and, therefore, I conclude—and that is the proposition which I shall endeavor to demonstrate to the Senate—that an election of Senators of the United States can be made in any reasonable method which a majority of the qualified electors choose to adopt at the time on due notice to all the rest. Observe, sir, that I specify, first, that the method must be reasonable. Second, that all the electors, if they choose, can attend and vote, for this gives us the substance of the election; and form is only material to guard against fraud, and to insure the substance. If there be no law, if there be no usage, if there be no authority to prescribe the form, it is impossible to say that the act is irregular, for you can predicate irregularity of nothing which is not prescribed according to some form, and I say, that in all cases of election, and, in fact, in all transactions, we look to the substance, and the form is only useful as establishing the truth of the substance. There is no principle known to the law, there is no principle in any affair of life, on which a minority of the electors can be favored for mere faction and disorganization.

Now, I ask, who are the qualified electors of a Senator in Congress? and that, in my judgment, is the most important question concerned. Are the qualified electors—the two Houses of the Legislature, as two separate corporate bodies, or all the members of the Legislature collectively? That is the real question involved. It has been stated several times, on former occasions, that, according to the Constitution of the United States, the original, the well-understood method of electing Senators was by a separate vote of the Houses; and that the practice which has lately been established of bringing the members of the two Houses together was a corruption, but one which had been established so long that it could not be dispensed with. Let us see.

The Constitution of the United States, article first, section third, provides:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof, for six years, and each Senator shall have one vote."

When the Constitution was ordained, September 17, 1787, the Legislature of every State, except Pennsylvania and Georgia, consisted of two branches; the more numerous called the Assembly, the House of Deputies, the House of Delegates, the House of Commons, or the House of Representatives, and the other called the Council, the House of Assistants, or the Senate. In several of the States, also, the Governor had a negative, more or less qualified, upon every act of legislation requiring the assent of both branches. A question must have arisen, therefore, immediately after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, as to the meaning of the term "Legislature" in the section just quoted. Did it contemplate the choice of Senators as an act of legislation? If so, manifestly, the Governor would be entitled, in many States, to a negative on whatever choice the Legislature might make; and yet, as Mr. Justice Story observes, it has been "silently and universally settled" otherwise. (Commentaries, vol. 2, page 184.)

The election of Senators, in truth, seems to have been a mere continuation of the system by which delegates were chosen under the Articles of Confederation, adopted in Congress November 15, 1777, and signed, after ratification by the State Legislatures, July 9, 1778. Mr. Justice Story declares "the only difference" to be that in one the vote was by States, and in the other it is by individuals. (Commentaries, vol. 2, ch. 10.) The fifth of the Articles of Confederation provided:

"For the more convenient management of the general interests of the United States, delegates shall be annually appointed, in such manner as the Legislature of each State shall direct, to meet in Congress on the first Monday in November in every year, with a power reserved to each State to recall its delegates, or any of them, at any time within the year, and to send others in their stead for the remainder of the year."

All of the States, except Connecticut and Rhode Island, had formed constitutions for themselves previous to the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, and most of them had therein provided for the manner of choosing delegates to Congress.

The Legislature of Pennsylvania originally consisted of a single House; and therefore, the first constitution, adopted on the 28th September, 1776, provided that delegates to Congress should be "chosen by ballot by the General Assembly, annually, at their first meeting, &c." Pennsylvania adopted another constitution September 2, 1790, after the adoption of the Constitution of the United States.

The Legislature of Georgia also consisted of one House until May 30, 1798. The first constitution of that State was adopted April 20, 1776; and afterwards, more formally, February 5, 1777. It provided that delegates to Congress should be "annually appointed by the House of Assembly by ballot," and "deemed a part of that House, and have the right to sit, debate, and vote there."

In all the other States, as I have said, the Legislature consisted of two branches.

The first constitution of New Hampshire, adopted January 5, 1776, provided that all public officers should be chosen "by the two Houses," without any further specification. That was superseded by the constitution of February, 1792, which declares that "the Secretary, treasurer, and commissary general, shall be chosen by joint ballot of the Senators and Representatives assembled in one room."

The first constitution of South Carolina was adopted March 26, 1776, and the second March 19, 1778. The latter provided that delegates should be "annually chosen by joint ballot of the Senate and House of Representatives," &c. It was superseded by another constitution, June 3, 1790.

The first constitution of Virginia was adopted June 29, 1776, and remained in force until 1830. "The delegates for Virginia to the Continental Congress," it declares, "shall be chosen annually, or superseded in the mean time, by joint ballot of both Houses of Assembly."

The first constitution of New Jersey was adopted July 2, 1776, and remained in force until 1820. It provides for the choice of a Governor by "the Council and Assembly, jointly, at their first meeting after each annual election," and "by a majority of votes," &c.

The first constitution of Maryland was adopted August 14, 1776, and its twenty-seventh section provides, "that the delegates to Congress from this State shall be chosen annually, or superseded in the mean time by the joint ballot of both Houses of Assembly," &c.

The first constitution of Delaware was adopted September 20, 1776, and superseded June 12, 1792. It provided that delegates to Congress should be chosen "by joint ballot of both Houses of the Legislature," &c.

The first constitution of North Carolina was adopted December 18, 1776, and remained in force until 1835. Its thirty-seventh article provided: "That the delegates for this State to the Continental Congress, while necessary, shall be chosen annually by the General Assembly, by ballot, but may be superseded, in the mean time, in the same manner," &c.

The same constitution, articles thirteen, fifteen, and sixteen, specifies in what manner the General Assembly must ballot for officers:

"ART. 13. That the General Assembly shall, by joint ballot of both Houses, appoint judges of the supreme courts of law and equity, judges of admiralty, and attorney general," &c.

"ART. 15. That the Senate and House of Commons, jointly, at their first meeting after each annual election, shall, by ballot, elect a Governor for one year," &c.

"ART. 16. That the Senate and House of Commons, jointly, at their first meeting after each annual election, shall, by ballot, elect seven persons to be a Council of State for one year," &c.

The first constitution of New York was adopted April 20, 1777, and remained in force until 1822. Its thirtieth article provided:

"That delegates to represent this State in the general

Congress of the United States of America, be annually appointed as follows, to wit: The Senate and Assembly shall each openly nominate as many persons as shall be equal to the whole number of delegates to be appointed; after which nomination they shall meet together, and those persons named in both lists shall be delegates; and out of those persons whose names are not in both lists, one half shall be chosen by the joint ballot of the Senators and members of Assembly so met together as aforesaid."

The first constitution of Massachusetts was adopted March 2, 1780, and remained in force until 1821. Its fourth chapter provided:

"The delegates of this Commonwealth to the Congress of the United States shall, some time in the month of June, annually, be elected by joint ballot of the Senate and House of Representatives, assembled together in one room, to serve in Congress for one year, to commence on the first Monday in November next ensuing. They shall have commissions under the hand of the Governor and the great seal of the Commonwealth; but may be recalled at any time with the year, and others chosen and commissioned in the same manner in their stead."

Connecticut remained under the charter of Charles II., April, 1662, until 1818; and Rhode Island, under a charter from the same monarch, April, 1663, until, I think, 1845. It is evident, from this recital, that the established, uniform, notorious method of election, by "the Legislature" of a State, at the time when the Constitution of the United States took effect, was by a joint meeting of the members of the two Houses, (wherever there were two,) and a majority vote of the number of electors so convened. The States merely pursued, in the election of Senators, after the Constitution of the United States, an ancient form, theretofore well understood, for the choice of delegates to Congress; and that form still prevails in more than three fourths of the States.

Certainly, therefore, it was not intended that the "Legislature" of a State should act legislatively under the first article, section third, of the Constitution of the United States; forasmuch as no choice of Senators has ever been made by bill, or joint resolution, read three times, and then submitted to the Governor for his approval. The "Legislature" is specified, in that section, as a word of multitude, nomen collectivum, to signify the members of both branches. When those members have, to use the language of the constitution of Massachusetts, "assembled together in one room," they are not as two corporations which act by the will of a majority in each. They emerge into a college of electors, and act by the will of a majority of the whole number.

I do not say that no other method of electing Senators than by joint ballot, and the majority of a quorum of all the members of the Legislature duly convened, is admissible under the Constitution of the United States; but only that such is the ancient method, coeval with the adoption of the Constitution and of universal acceptance at that time. Accordingly, when the people of Indiana, by their delegates, assembled at Corydon, June 29, 1816, to form the first constitution of the State, they adopted it as the method for electing State officers. The fourth article of that constitution provides:

"SEC. 21. A Secretary of State shall be chosen by the joint ballot of both Houses of the General Assembly, &c."

"SEC. 24. There shall be elected, by joint ballot of both Houses of the General Assembly, a Treasurer and Auditor," &c.

And at the first session of the first Legislature of Indiana, January 3, 1817, an act was passed to provide for the election of Senators in Congress by a joint ballot of the members of the two Houses assembled in convention. That was reenacted January 7, 1831, in a general revision of the statutes, but was superseded under the act of January 18, 1852, as already mentioned.

I ought to say, furthermore, that in the convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, at Philadelphia, the first plan for the election of Senators was by the House of Representatives, and the second by a college of electors, in each State, chosen by the people in districts. Finally, the Legislature of each State was made the college of electors; not with any view of introducing another principle, but of interesting the members of the several Legislatures in the organization of Congress, and thus uniting more thoroughly the Federal and the State Governments. This will appear from the Federalist, No. 62, as well as from the reported debates of the convention.

At the previous session of the Legislature of Indiana, in January, 1855, the Senate of that State attempted, by resolution, to change the method of election from a joint ballot to separate votes, but that proposition was rejected by the House of Representatives.

Now, sir, having established, as I think, the proposition that the qualified electors of a Senator of the United States are the members of the Legislature as an electoral college assembled together for the purpose; that that was the universal practice of the States, so far as I can find, without one exception, I say that the other methods are all departures from the original design, and that, in the contemplation of the Constitution of the United States, all the members of the Legislature, without reference to their membership in this House or that House, are the qualified electors for a Senator of the United States. Therefore, the true test of all this transaction is, whether the first joint convention, which assembled at Indianapolis, on the 12th of January, 1857, could elect a Senator? If it could, in my judgment there is an end of the question; for the adjournments are immaterial. They are immaterial because, even if they were done by the presiding officer as his own individual act, no objection was made to them at the time. Like questions that are put here, when no Senator votes on either side the presumption is that silence means the affirmative. No objection was made to the adjournments at the time, and if they were irregular, the time to make the objection was then. Once passed over, it can no longer be brought up in judgment. But, sir, I need not stand even there. It is a settled original right of a body corporate or an electoral body, in the absence of a prohibition, to adjourn from day to day until it can complete its business. I find that that was decided in the State of Vermont, contrary to the opinion of my friend, the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] when he presided in that State as a judge. I refer to the case of Warner vs. Mower, (11 Vermont Reports, 391,) where the court say:

"It is too well settled to require comment, that all corporations, whether municipal or private, may transact any business at an adjourned meeting which they could have done at the original meeting. It is but a continuation of the same meeting. Whether the meeting is continued without interruption for many days, or by adjournment from day to day, or from time to time, many days intervening, it is evident it must be considered the same meeting, without any loss or accumulation of powers."

I have two or three decisions from the State of New York to the same effect. In the matter of the Mohawk and Hudson Railroad Company, (19 Wendell, 147,) a controversy arose as to an election of directors. The resolution of the board of directors under which the election was held, fixed the hours of election; and yet, the trustees or inspectors, or judges—whatever they were called—went on to receive votes after the hour when it was declared by resolution the election should be held. What did the court say?

"The trustees acted properly in taking the requisite time, notwithstanding they were called on to close the poll at one o'clock. I much doubt whether the time could, in virtue of a by-law, be tied up to a certain hour of the day; but, in this case of actual necessity, the business might have been extended even to the next day. Every principle of construction is in favor of full time, otherwise business may be badly done by being hurried or embarrassed, and defeated by the raising of dilatory objections, and protracted examination and discussion."

The same principle was decided in the matter of the Chenango Mutual Insurance Company, in the same book. (19 Wendell, pages 636 and 637.)

I say, then, the question of the adjournment of the convention is wholly immaterial. If they had the power to elect the first day, they had the power to adjourn to another day; and I recur, therefore, to the question, had this convention, assembled at Indianapolis, on the 12th of January, 1857, the power to elect a United States Senator; and, first, was it a convention of the two Houses?

The act of Indiana, of June 9, 1852, after defining the oath to be taken by all the officers of the State of Indiana, provides:

"SEC. 3. Members of the General Assembly shall take such oaths, before taking their seats, which shall be entered on the journals; and the Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall each take such oath in presence of both Houses of the General Assembly, in convention, and the same shall be entered on the journals thereof."

The fifth section of the fifth article of the constitution of Indiana provides that if two of the candidates for Governor or Lieutenant Governor have an equal and the highest number of votes, then there shall be an election by the members of the Legislature.

Thus, by the express terms of the statute law of that State, when once conveyed conformably to the constitution of the State; it was a joint convention of the two Houses. It was a joint convention of the two Houses of the Legislature of Indiana, called in pursuance of the constitution of that State; for I presume it cannot be disputed that under the language of the constitution which I have quoted, the Speaker of the House of Representatives had a right to summon the members of both branches of the joint convention; and if the constitution authorized him to summon them there, they had no right to be anywhere else; and their being anywhere else made them no body of legislation at all. That was decided in the case in the New York Reports, to which I referred, (Field vs. Field, 9 Wendell, 394,) with regard to the division of the society called Quakers. By the usage of the society, the clerk was to call the preparatory meeting to order, was to receive all the suggestions and put the questions. Upon that occasion the clerk took his usual place, but a majority—nine tenths of all the members of the meeting—were opposed to him, and claimed that they had excommunicated him from the church, and offered to put another clerk in his place; whereupon this clerk, yielding to the tumult, went into the open air, followed by a small minority of the members, and proceeded to organize the preparatory meeting. The supreme court of New York said that was the legal meeting; and the meeting which remained in the house, although it consisted of a majority, was a tumultuous and irregular organization, having no legal character.

I say the Speaker of the House of Representatives had a right to summon the members of the Legislature on the 12th of January; for that was the last day on which the duty could be performed, and it was the duty of the Senate to attend, and a majority of them did actually attend on that day. When thus convened, a majority of the Senate and a majority of the House, they were, under the statute of Indiana, as well as under the constitution, a joint convention of the two Houses, the body which, according to the original acceptance of the Constitution of the United States, was to choose Senators; the body which, according to the acceptance and settled practice of the State of Indiana, had always chosen Senators of the United States. That body of electors, being the legal and qualified body, there assembled together in due form, pursuant to their constitution, there being no law to fix any time, or to fix any other manner, or to fix any other place, they, by the consent of the majority, had a right to proceed instantly to the election of Senators; for the will of the majority is the will of all according to every principle of law, unless the contrary is provided in the organic act. I say again, a majority of the Senators were present on the 12th of January, 1857. That appears by several of the affidavits. I will read from one; the affidavit of Senator Drew, to be found at page 17 of the committee's report:

"This affiant further states that three or four Republican Senators who did not respond to their names, and whose names, consequently, are not recorded as participating in the proceedings, were, nevertheless, present in the hall of the House of Representatives at the session of the joint convention at which United States Senators were chosen, and at the previous sessions thereof. And this affiant further states that the two first sessions of the joint convention adjourned to a day certain, by unanimous consent, and with a full knowledge upon the part of every Senator and Representative that, at the last adjourned session, United States Senators were to be elected."

The only thing to the contrary of all this is a very singular affidavit made by three of the Senators, John T. Freeland, P. S. Sage, and John Weston, to be found at page 39 of the report:

State of Indiana, Marion county, ss.

Be it remembered, that, on this 14th day of February, A. D. 1857, personally appeared before me, R. M. Hall, a notary public of the county aforesaid, John T. Freeland, P. S. Sage, and John Weston, who, being duly sworn, depose and say: that they now are, and have been during the present session, Senators of the State of Indiana, and holding their seats as such; that on the 12th day of January last past, at the time a pretended joint convention was being held in the hall of the House of Representatives, they were present in the House, having gone there out of mere curiosity to witness the ceremonies of inauguration; that they were not there in the capacity of Senators, for the purpose of participating, in any way, in said convention, nor did they in any manner take part in the action thereof.

They further depose and say: that they did not then, nor do they now, recognize the legality of said joint convention; that they never have, at any time or in any way, given their assent as Senators to go into a joint convention of the two Houses of the General Assembly during the present session of the Legislature.

And further they say not.

JOHN T. FREELAND.

P. S. SAGE.

JOHN WESTON.

Subscribed and sworn to before me, this 14th day of February, A. D. 1857.

In witness whereof, I hereunto set my hand and [L. s.] notarial seal, at the city of Indianapolis.

RICHARD M. HALL,

Notary Public.

That is one of the ex parte affidavits which were before the committee. What a case do these gentlemen make for themselves! It is not denied that they went to this convention when the Lieutenant Governor of the State called on the Senators to follow him to the appointed place, that they were in company, that they were at the joint convention. They did as much as anybody else; for no Senator was called upon to perform any duty on that occasion, except the one who was called to the chair; because the only business transacted at that meeting was for the Speaker of the House to open the returns and publish them. There was nothing to distinguish these gentlemen from any other three Senators; and yet they come here with a species of mental reservation that out-Herods anything I have ever heard attributed even to the Jesuits. They were there as all others were there; they did all that any others did; and yet they come forward with an ex parte affidavit long afterwards, and say to be sure they were there, to be sure they did as much as anybody else, but they were there in some other character than as Senators. It reminds me of a story about one of the German princes, who had both a secular and an ecclesiastical character, who was both an archbishop and a count; and I am sorry, to the scandal of the church, he was given to habits of profane swearing and many other vices. Finally, some of the dignitaries of the church thought fit to remonstrate that such in an archbishop was a scandal to the whole religious fraternity. "Ah," said he in reply, "I am a count as well as an archbishop, and when I swear I swear as a count." "But," said the objector in reply, "when the devil catches the count where will be the archbishop?" [Laughter.] So I say of these gentlemen. They were there as all other Senators were; they did all that could be done; they made no dissent, no disclaimer at the time; but they come forward afterwards and say that there was a mental reservation about the business; that although they were corporally present they were mentally absent. Did any court, will any deliberative assembly, tolerate such a pretext as that? Why, sir, if they had not been present so as to have made apparently a quorum of that joint convention, the joint convention would not have proceeded, it would not have gone on to open and publish the returns; it would have seen first that it had a quorum before it proceeded to the transaction of any business. They go there to make part of a quorum, and deceive the other members of the Legislature, and then pretend, at a subsequent time, by an ex parte affidavit produced here, that they did not intend to be there as Senators, but intended to be there as spectators.

In the Iowa case, the two Senators who were present and did not vote, behaved much better when they were called in. When they were brought into the convention by the sergeant-at-arms, they, upon the record at the time, gave notice that they were brought there against their will, under duress, that they refused to attend the convention. That was one of the points upon which I recollect my honored friend, the late Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Butler,) dwelt as material in that case. This case is widely different. These mental protests and mental reservations amount to nothing; they would have amounted to nothing had they been made openly, provided the convention was once duly convened. In this connection I cite the attention of the Senate to a case decided by Lord Mansfield. Oldknow vs. Wainwright, 2 Burrows, 1017. This was a feigned action to decide certain questions of law and fact as to the right of electors to the office of town clerk of Nottingham. The issues of fact were tried by a jury. One of them was:

"Fourth issue: Supposing the mayor, aldermen, and common council, have the right, then, 'whether Thomas Seagrave was duly elected by them.' As to the fourth issue, there was a special verdict to the following effect: it sets out the constitution of the borough, and that the voices were all equal votes; then it sets out the vacancy of the office of town clerk, and a regular summons to elect another; that the whole number of electors was twenty-five; and that, out of that number, twenty-one assembled on the 26th of May, pursuant to said summons; that the mayor put Thomas Seagrave in nomination, and that no other person was put in nomination; that nine of the twenty-one voted for him; but twelve of them did not vote at all; but eleven of them protested against any election at that time, because the office was already full (as they alleged) by a Foxcroft, whose right was then under litigation in this court; that there was a written protest against any election at all, either of Seagrave or any other person, by four aldermen and six common councillors, because a suit was then depending in the court of King's Bench concerning the right of Foxcroft. These ten signed the written protest; another (Hollins) did not sign, nor vote, but declared that he suspended doing anything."

He was the most comprehensive of all.

"However, at the same court of assembly, the mayor declared the said Thomas Seagrave duly elected, and he took the oath of office, and other requisite oaths, in due manner and form.

"Mr. Caldecott, on behalf of the plaintiff, argued (on Tuesday, the 6th of May last) that Seagrave was not duly elected; for twenty-five had a right of voting; all had equal voices; and, of twenty-one that met, eleven protested against any election at that time; therefore, these eleven were all negative voices and against Seagrave, and only nine were for him.

"Besides, this was no corporate act.

"All the twenty-five were summoned, and twenty-one appeared. The voice of the majority of those who were present, was the voice of the whole twenty-five; and Mr. Seagrave had not a majority of them.

"Therefore, the issue is found for the plaintiff; and we pray that the postea be delivered to him.

"Mr. Sergeant Hewitt, contra, for the defendant:

"The substantial matter in question was, 'whether the right of appointing the town clerk was in the mayor, or in the mayor, aldermen, and common council?' The mayor, aldermen, and common councillors make twenty-five, who are a corporate body.

"Here was a regular summons of the whole body, and a corporate meeting of twenty-one of them, for the business of this election, and they entered upon the election; therefore, they could not desert it unfinished.

"At this meeting the mayor nominated Mr. Seagrave, which no one then opposed. A vote was taken; and nine voted for Mr. Seagrave. After which ten, or (as it is said) eleven, protested against any election at all at that time. But mere silence is not a negative, either expressed or implied; and, as no other person was proposed, and nine voted for him, and none against him, he was well elected."

"Lord Mansfield saw no doubt in the case. Here was an assembly duly summoned; one candidate was named; no other was named; the poll was taken; they had no right to stop in the middle of the election; the Mayor did not put any question for adjournment; nor was there any.

"But Mr. Caldecott prayed another argument; because Mr. Sergeant Poole was retained to argue it on the same side with him, for the plaintiff.

"Whereupon, the court gave leave that it should be argued again; and ordered an ultimus concilius."

On a subsequent occasion Mr. Sergeant Poole came up, and after further controversy Lord Mansfield said it was a clear case:

"Whenever electors are present, and do not vote at all, (as they have done here,) they virtually acquiesce in the election made by those who do."

So that when these parties were present without any express dissent, they consented to what was done.

There is but one other question in this controversy: was it necessary that two thirds of the members of each House should be present at that convention? It is undoubtedly true that one provision of the constitution of Indiana says, that "two thirds of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business." Does that refer to the branches of the Legislature for purposes of legislation, or does it refer to the joint convention for the election of officers, whether State officers or United States Senators? Certainly it can have no application to the election of a Senator in Congress, because, as I have shown, the established method of election to which the Constitution of the United States referred in September, 1787, was wholly independent of any question as to what might be the specified quorum in each House of a Legislature for any purpose of legislation, and we have the best evidence that that was the interpretation put on the constitution of Indiana by all the people of that State, by all the departments of our Government; and I certainly need not say that it is a proposition here, and in all other Departments of the Federal Government, that each State shall construe her own peculiar constitution and laws.

I have stated that a majority of the Senators were present at the first meeting of the joint convention. What followed? Ashbel P. Willard was declared to have been elected Governor upon the opening and publication of the returns of the election; and he was inducted into office by that convention; for the act of the Legislature required that he should be inducted into office by the two Houses assembled in convention. If that was no convention, he was never legally inducted into his office of Governor. He is in office; he has been in office ever since. His title has never been disputed. He has exercised the whole executive power of the State. The Legislature has sent him its acts to be approved or disapproved—the Senate as well as the House. He has granted commissions to the judges, and to all the subordinate officers. The fact that he has been thus inducted into office without any protest from any quarter, that he has proceeded to discharge the duties of the office without any protest from that time to this, is the most complete and universal acquiescence in the validity of his title. Is that a good mode of ascertaining? Let us see what the Senate has decided on that point. Here is the famous case of Potter vs. Robbins, the case of a contested election of Senator from the State of Rhode Island, to be found in the volume of Contested Elections, page 911. The question was whether a certain body, which claimed to be the Council or Senate of Rhode Island, was in fact a branch of the Legislature. It was claimed on the one hand that those members held over after their terms had expired, and, therefore, they were no Legislature. What did the Senate of the United States say then? The report of the committee uses this language:

"When, therefore, we find that, during the existence of the General Assembly, one branch of which was continued and held their seats by virtue of the law of January, 1832, this Legislature passed fourteen laws of a general nature, and twenty-eight private acts, many of them acts of incorporation, besides numerous resolutions on various subjects falling within the range of legislative power, a schedule of which is herewith annexed, marked C; and when these laws and resolutions remain on the statute-book of Rhode Island in full force and effect, sanctioned by judicial decisions, and tacitly submitted to by the people over whom they operate, it would seem to your committee a very dangerous assumption of power in one branch of Congress, or even in every department of the General Government combined, to interfere with the internal regulations of the State, and to denounce the body by which these laws and resolutions were passed as a mere assemblage of citizens without any public authority whatever, and not the Legislature of the State. Such a power does not belong to the Federal Government, and would, if claimed and carried out to its full extent, annihilate all the reserved rights of the States. It is a general principle of national law, applicable to all distinct and independent Governments, that if there arise any disputes in a State on the fundamental laws and public administration, or on the prerogatives of the different powers of which it is composed, it is the business of the State alone to judge and determine them in conformity to its political constitution. No Government has a right to intrude into the domestic affairs of another State, and attempt to influence its deliberations or to control its action. This principle is recognized in the Constitution of the United States, by which the respective States united and formed themselves into a Federal Republic. Conceding, as we feel bound to do, to the State of Rhode Island, in common with all the other States of the Union, the power to decide for itself all questions relating to its domestic policy, there would seem to be no ground on which to rest a doubt that she has decided in the most solemn manner the character and powers of the body by which Mr. Robbins was chosen a Senator to Congress. They passed numerous laws which are in full force. They elected judges of the supreme court of the State who have taken a new engagement or oath of office, and accepted new commissions from the Governor, entered on their official duties, and condemned to death a citizen found guilty of a capital offense against the laws of the State. They received compensation out of the treasury of the State for their services, and disbursed the public money necessary for the support of the Government. No question has arisen touching or impugning the validity of any one of these acts, because they were passed or performed by an incompetent body, with the single exception of the attempt made by a succeeding Legislature to vacate the election of Mr. Robbins."

"Your committee advert to these acts as conclusive in reference to the character of the body of men who elected Mr. Robbins. If they were competent to bind the people of the State by general laws, which is nowhere contested, they could only exercise such a power in their capacity as the Legislature of the State, and as such, it was their constitutional right and incumbent duty to choose a Senator to Congress."

I repeat, Governor Willard was inducted into office as Governor by a convention, or what claimed to be a convention; he has been accepted by all the citizens of the State of Indiana, by both branches of her Legislature, and by every department of her government; he is in office; his title has never been disputed; and yet he cannot legally be in office if it required that two thirds of the Senate should be present at that convention. What follows? As the committee said in the Rhode Island case—and their report was confirmed by the Senate—the fact that he is in office with an undisputed title is the best evidence of what the meaning of the constitution of Indiana is, that it was not necessary to have two thirds present; that the construction put by them on their constitution is, that the requisition as to two thirds applies only to their legislative duties, not to their assembling in joint convention for the purpose of opening and counting the votes for Governor. But the case is worse than that. I have shown you that at the same convention, immediately following the inaugural address of Governor Willard, Abram A. Hammond was declared elected Lieutenant Governor; he was inducted into office at the same convention, took the oath, and immediately upon the adjournment of the convention returned at the head of twenty-six Senators to the Senate chamber, took the chair, delivered his address, and presided until the end of the session without any Senator calling his right in question. If it were necessary that two thirds of the Senators should be present at that meeting, why did they permit him to take the chair of their own body, to deliver them an address, to remain Lieutenant Governor until the end of the session, and until this hour, without a word of complaint? That shows the construction put by the Senate of Indiana on the constitution of the State on a matter peculiarly affecting their own rights.

I go further. It appears from the evidence that while twenty-four Senators were present in joint convention on one occasion, (I think on the day of this election,) the other twenty-six proceeded to take up, to consider, and to pass a resolution vacating the seat of one of the absent Senators. They then claimed the right as a body to pass upon every question concerning the election and qualifications of their own members, with a bare majority present. They voted the man out; they struck his name from the roll, and they did not permit it to be restored. Whether you call it an expulsion from the Senate, which would have required a formal vote of two thirds, or whether you call it sitting in judgment on the right of a member, it is certain that they assumed the power at that very session, at that very time, by a bare majority of the Senate, to do any business except the passing of bills and joint resolutions. As I said before, having established the proposition that the members of the two Houses are an electoral college under the Constitution of the United States, the question of what number is required for the peculiar business of the State, for its peculiar internal affairs or internal administration, becomes wholly unimportant.

This being a joint convention, duly constituted, sufficient for all purposes, being met on due notice to all, formal summons to all, called by the respective presiding officers to attend at a reasonable time and a reasonable place, and a majority of each of the Houses having come in pursuance of that summons, and being there the electoral body appointed and designated by the Constitution of the United States to make the election of Senators, at such time, in such manner, and at such place as they themselves might prescribe, there being no law prescribed, there being no usage separate from a law, it being a matter left entirely to their own will, these electors, duly assembled on due notice, proceed to make an election. Is their election good? The language that covers the case of Senators covers the case of Representatives; the same clause of the constitution applies to both. Now let me put a case. In the State of Ohio the law provides that the trustees of every township—three in number—shall, so many days before the election, appoint a place at which the electors shall come to vote; and that they themselves shall be present to receive the votes as judges or inspectors of the election. Suppose they refuse to do it from corrupt motives, from factious motives, or for any reason they will not give the notice; they will not appoint the place; they will not attend at any place to receive the votes. The time of election comes; or if you please, there being no time fixed, a majority of the persons authorized to vote give notice to all to come to a given place at a given time, being reasonable as to both place and time. A majority of the whole number come there, appoint officers of their own, and hold an election; if there be no fraud; if there be no question; if it be reduced to an absolute certainty that A B had an actual majority of the votes of all the qualified electors, is not that a good election? The question is answered by the decisions that have been made in the old country and in this country, in the courts, and in Congress, and in the Legislatures. Can the people be disfranchised by a ministerial officer? Can a township trustee say "I will give no notice of an election for the express purpose of disfranchising the voter?" Can a minority of the qualified electors say "we will attend at no time and no place; for if we attend at any time and at any place, our fellow-citizens, being in the majority, will exercise their undoubted right of choosing public officers; our absence shall be more potent than our presence; if we were present, and discharged our duty, we could not defeat their choice; so we will absent ourselves?" Is there a more monstrous proposition? What is your free Government worth, what is your representative Government worth, under such a state of things? Talk no more about elections by the people; it is an end of all elections.

I say, what would be a good election of a Representative, is a good election of a Senator. The language of the Constitution of the United States applies to both in the very same clause and the same words. When a minority of the qualified electors of a Senator choose to persist, in pursuance of a conspiracy entered into beforehand, from the beginning of the session, persisted in at every step, to defeat their own duty and the duty and the rights of the majority, then that majority, falling back on the broad principles which govern all popular elections, come together duly and legally in joint convention, and give notice to all the rest, and then the person who has a clear, undoubted, indisputable majority of the qualified voters is elected; otherwise, you offer a premium to anarchy.

Was there any prohibition on the convention? If there had been, it might be material. I have shown you that the Senate attempted to impose a prohibition, but they failed. They knew that the joint convention, once assembled, would have the power, and they attempted to limit it. Their limitation was not carried. A similar attempt was made in the other House, and there it was rejected. What is more material than all, there never was a subsequent attempt made during the whole session, in either House, to proceed to the election of a Senator in any other method. The election occurred on the 4th of February. Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. FITCH received their credentials, and one of those Senators came here and presented them. The Legislature sat thirty days, perhaps sixty days, more—a long period—but never was an attempt made, nor did either House propose to the other any other election of Senator, either by joint convention or by separate resolution. It was acquiesced in; it was settled, insofar as that no attempt was made to disturb it. If it was not a good election, if it was void, there was no obstacle to the two Houses proceeding to another; and the fact that neither of them attempted any other, shows that they were both conscious that it was an election duly made under the constitution of Indiana. I said that was the rule. Let me read a few words from a very eminent judge.

Mr. Justice Bayley, in the case of the King vs. Hill, (4 Barnewall & Cresswell, 441,) says:

"Where the election of burgesses is fixed, either by charter or custom, to take place on any specific day, there it is the duty of every person entitled to vote to take notice that there is to be an election on that day. But when no specific day is fixed, and the election may take place at a meeting holden at any time, it is essential that notice of the meeting and of the business to be transacted there should be given to all persons resident within the limits of the borough who are entitled to vote; and that should be a reasonable notice, and at a reasonable time before the election actually takes place."

That it need not be a written notice or a formal notice, if actual notice was given, was decided in the case of The People vs. Peck, (11 Wendell, 611;) and in Willcock, on Municipal Corporations, (page 46,) a book of very high authority, it is said that notice may be given by the ringing of a bell, if that has been the usage by which meetings of the borough are called. In the case of Jones vs. Van Zandt, (5 Howard, 215,) where the statute imposed a penalty for any person who harbored a fugitive slave after notice—and it was claimed that the notice must be a formal one or a written one—the court said: "If he have actual knowledge, that is enough. It need not be formal; it need not be written." Did the recusant Indiana Senators know what was to be done in the convention? I have shown you that, on the eve of the convention, they attempted to put in a prohibition to prevent this very election; and the records will show that, between the day of the first convention and the adjourned session, they themselves expressed the fact that they knew Senators were to be elected.

We have, therefore, in the absence of all law or regulation or form prescribed, a due legal meeting of all the qualified electors, or a majority of them, convened after notice to all. What follows? Once duly organized for that purpose, as Lord Mansfield said, nobody had authority to stop them. They become a body of themselves. It is an electoral college assembled. Certainly it cannot be dissolved by the mere faction of individuals. I think some members here believed in the Iowa case—that inasmuch as the Senate of Iowa had by a formal, separate vote, dissolved the joint assembly, it could not continue longer; but there was nothing of that sort done here. There were the mere faction and disorder of individuals. The electors were assembled. They had the right to adjourn from day to day, or from time to time; it was their right, their common-law right, until they had transacted all their business, all the business that any joint convention could transact under the constitution and laws of that State; and thus being assembled on notice to all, Mr. BRIGHT and Mr. FITCH received, not merely a majority of the votes of those present, not merely a majority of a quorum, but an actual majority of all the members of both branches of the Legislature. That is the substance of an election. That is the equity of the case; that is its justice and its honesty between man and man. Every court, and the Senate, when it sits as a court, will require, before the substantial justice and truth of the matter can be overthrown, that it shall be shown wherein a law was violated. I have shown that here there was no law to be violated. I am supported in the principle I have just stated by the language of one of the books—Angell and Ames on Corporations, section one hundred and thirty-eight:

“If no particular form is prescribed for the election of officers, and the election has been conducted in good faith, it will not be set aside.”

I have detained the Senate longer than I expected, and I leave the case with those of my colleagues on the Judiciary Committee who concurred with me in opinion. For myself individually, Mr. President, when the case of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] was before the Senate; when those who had belonged to my own political faith had been guilty of what I believed to be an act of disorganization, I expressed my opinion boldly and distinctly, as the recorded debates will show; and if I did not spare my own household, why should I spare the Opposition? No man can read this testimony without being satisfied that after the qualified electors of the State of Indiana, in due form, had chosen members of the Legislature, with a view to the election of United States Senators of a given political persuasion, a majority of one branch of the Legislature—and a meager minority of the whole—attempted to betray their own trust, and to violate the rights of all the rest, as well as of the people of the State. If, with two such cases occurring here within so short a period, we are not admonished to go back to the good old rule that, what ought to be done shall be considered as done, but hold out a premium to anarchy, what is to be the result? Is this course of things to go on from year to year? When the last Legislature met, the State of Indiana had been with but a single Senator in this body for some time; she was about to be wholly misrepresented. I say the evidence shows that there was a deliberate conspiracy before the Legislature convened to prevent an election. For the Senate of the United States to allow it to be successful over the head of the truth, the justice, and the equity of the case, is to permit mere faction, without even the excuse of violated form, to prevail over justice and over right. I am persuaded the Senate will make no such determination.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. President, that I have been surprised, that the whole country has been astonished at the report that has been made from the Judiciary Committee in this case, I need hardly say. Why it has been made it is not my purpose now to inquire; why it has been presented in this manner is the point for which I have risen. I say, sir, that I have been astonished, and the country will be astonished, at the report which has been made by the Judiciary Committee, and I should like very well indeed to know why, when the previous policy of the country is to be subverted and changed, we have not a written and deliberate opinion drawn out by the committee, showing us the grounds and the law upon which it is to be done?

Mr. PUGH. I will say to the Senator that there has been no such written report ever made from the committee, since I have been a member of it, in any contested case. There was not in the Iowa case or in the Illinois case.

Mr. HAMLIN. I can only say that it has been usual with the Judiciary Committee to submit written reports. There may have been exceptions; but this is the first time, I think, in the history of the Government, where you have attempted to establish the policy that a minority of a coordinate branch of a Legislature is to control its proceedings. The Senator from Ohio has been very glib in the language he uses in talking about “recusants.” Now, sir, who are the recusants in this matter? A minority of the Senate of Indiana, who ran away from their duty—a minority who undertook to control a majority of the Senate. A minority of the Senate of Indiana undertook to collude with a majority of the House of Representatives of that State, and to deprive that branch of the government, which, by the constitution of the State, was entitled to a negative in all matters of legislation, and in all business, of what was their constitutional right. Is not that so? Was there ever a question submitted to the Senate of Indiana by the House of Representatives of that State, as to the time or the manner when this election should take place? Was there any time or manner agreed to by the Senate? In other words, did the Senate ever have secured to it its right as a coordinate branch of the Legislature, to determine the manner in which this election should take place, whether by negatives, whether by concurrent votes, or by a joint resolution? Certainly there is no evidence of an election at all except that a minority of the Senate, a number less than a majority, and much less than a quorum, for it takes two thirds of that body to make a quorum, undertook to leave their seats, and to go in with a majority of the House of Representatives, and attempt to elect Senators to this body. Under such a state of things, with a majority of that Senate here, under their own hands, protesting against it, I ask that we may have a report from our committee setting forth the law and the ground upon which their opinion is founded. I move, therefore, to amend the resolution by striking out all after the word “resolved,” and inserting:

That the case of JESSE D. BRIGHT and GRAHAM N. FITCH be recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report specially the grounds on which the resolution is based declaring said BRIGHT and FITCH elected.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Mr. President, I shall not speak directly to the amendment offered by the Senator from Maine, because it does not appear to me that it is possible he can seriously entertain the notion that the Senate is going to leave this election still undecided. His proposition astonishes me the more, because, from the origin of this dispute, the majority of the Senate of the United States has been continually taunted by gentlemen of the Opposition with a desire to postpone the matter, to keep the Senators here whose seats were contested, to defer a decision of the case in order to leave them in the enjoyment of an office to which they were not entitled. We have heard that again and again, although it has been repeatedly demonstrated by the Judiciary Committee, that any delay which has hitherto arisen has arisen from the fault of those who represent the contestants, who have pertinaciously persisted in an endeavor to prevent us from taking the evidence in the cause, and who succeeded in their opposition until about sixty days ago, when the Senate finally determined that evidence should be taken, and allowed a term of sixty days for it.

Mr. HALE. Ninety.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It may have been ninety; but whatever the term was, it is not important to the argument. I say, when the matter has been thus constantly before the Senate, with the taunts of gentlemen in the Opposition made against the Judiciary Committee that they were unwilling to bring this case to trial, although they themselves had been the cause of the delay, now, when for the first time in a number of years, it has been ascertained that Congress is about, at the long session, to adjourn some months earlier than usual, and the gentlemen whose seats are contested have finished taking their evidence, and the contestants have taken their evidence, and it is proposed now to settle the matter, on the last day but one of the session, a proposition is offered by the minority to recommit the matter to the Committee on the Judiciary, in order that the case may still remain undecided. This is most extraordinary. I state the facts, and leave them to the judgment of the Senate, and to the country. I make no comment on them. I shall not speak to the amendment.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know by whom the proposition has been made to recommit; but if it be recommitted we can hardly consider it at this session.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I take it for granted that can by no possibility be the judgment of the Senate. I doubt whether the proposition can be serious; but I am sure the majority of the Senate cannot be brought to leave this matter undecided. If the question shall be referred again to the Committee on the Judiciary, I, for one, shall desire to wash my hands of it, and I promise never to make another report on it. I have had enough to do with it already.

When this question was first referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, on an examination of the papers then before us, I came to the conclusion that the contest was well founded; I considered that the Senators had been irregularly and illegally elected, and, on the papers then before me, I should have so voted. I made no secret of my opinion. The evidence which has been gathered by the sitting members, the evidence which is now before us in the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, has changed my opinion; and without entering at length into the case, which has been so fully and thoroughly discussed by the Senator from Ohio, I desire to state the grounds upon which I assented to the resolution offered by the majority of the committee.

Mr. President, taking up the subject chronologically, the first question that would present itself to the mind of every Senator is this: was the first joint convention of the Indiana Legislature, held at that session at which these gentlemen were elected Senators, a legal, a constitutional convention? Upon that there seems to me to be no room for a doubt. The constitution of the State required that convention to be held; it left it not to the option of either branch. It did not require the vote of either branch to hold the convention. It provided in terms that both Houses should be there in joint convention on the day on which the convention was held. Here is its language:

“The returns of every election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall open and publish them in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly.”

And by another clause of the constitution, the official term commenced on the second Monday of January, in the year 1853, “and on the same day every fourth year thereafter.” The same day on the fourth year thereafter in this case was the second Monday of January, 1857. By the constitution of the State of Indiana, the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor were on that day to be counted by the Speaker of the House of Representatives, in the presence of both Houses of the Legislature. What is the official journal then of the meeting of both Houses? The journal of the House of Representatives, not the journal of the Senate. The journal of the House is the official journal of the convention. What does it say? After the invitation had been given:

“Resolved further, That the Senate be informed of the same, and that the House is now ready to proceed to said business.

“Which was agreed to.

“The Senate, then, in pursuance of the invitation of the House, communicated through the Speaker, came into the hall of the House, preceded by the President of the Senate.”

That is the record. The constitution required a joint convention, the House in whose hall the joint convention was to be held, preserving the record of the proceedings, and that record stating that the Senate appeared in the hall of the House of Representatives, preceded by its President. Now, sir, what are we asked to do? We are asked to go behind that record; we are told it is not true. Who asks us to go behind it? Certain members of the Senate of Indiana. What is it they ask us to do? They ask us to declare, in defiance of the Constitution and of the record, that they were not present at the place where the constitution required them to be present, at the only place where they legally could be at the hour when the House said they were assembled with it in its hall. In other words, here are parties calling upon the Senate of the United States to take testimony to prove that they violated their official oaths, calling upon us to go behind the constitution and laws of the State in order to satisfy ourselves that they did an illegal and unconstitutional act—kept away from the only place where they could legally and constitutionally be on the day this convention was held.

Now, sir, I say, in the first place, that I will not listen to any such evidence on the familiar principle, known to every one, that no man shall be allowed to come into a court of justice or equity or law, and allege his own wrong as the basis of a right. They say, "we violated the constitution, and by virtue of that violation we claim a right to contest the election of these members." I say, first, then, if we are to go on technical grounds, that I will not listen to them; that they cannot be listened to; that it would be in violation of public order, in violation of the first principles which govern courts of law or equity, to permit parties to come and declare their own turpitude. But, sir, if I were willing to go behind this record, how stands the evidence as now before us? It was not before us when I formed my first impressions of this case. I take the evidence offered by the contestants themselves, and I take the evidence of the Governor of the State, whom they examined as their witness, and what does he say? He says that upon the day upon which this joint convention was to be held, he, as President of the Senate at the time, called upon the Senate to follow him into the hall of the House, and he did go to the hall of the House, at the head of a number of Senators, who constituted a majority of the body. That is their evidence; that is what they prove. Here is the testimony of Governor Willard:

"The Speaker of the House sent, through me, to the Senate, an invitation to the Senate to appear in the hall of the House of Representatives, and I read said invitation to the Senate; then adjourned the Senate to meet in the hall of the House at the hour specified by the Speaker, and a majority of the Senate attended in the hall of the House to witness the counting of said votes; all the Democrats—twenty-three—were present, and Veir, Sage, and Freeland, and all within the bar of the House of Representatives."

Twenty-six members out of fifty; and yet we are told that that was not a legal or regular convention because the Senate did not pass a resolution to go into the hall of the House. What necessity was there for the Senate to pass any such resolution? If they had passed a resolution not to go in, it would have been simply null and void, because in violation of the constitution. To pass a resolution to go in would have been a simple work of supererogation, because the order of the constitution was there in advance; they must go in. There was no necessity for their declaring their assent to go in. They had sworn to obey the constitution which ordered them to go in. They had no power to pass a resolution that they would not go in, because a resolution not to go in would have been simply null and void.

It is plain, therefore, that this first convention was a legal and constitutional convention of both branches of the Legislature of Indiana. It has been well put by the Senator from Ohio, if this was no legal, no constitutional convention, then Indiana has no Governor now, she has no Lieutenant Governor, because neither has yet been legally inducted into office. Either that convention thus held was competent to the performance of certain acts, or it was not. If it was not competent to the performance of any act, then there is now no Governor, no Lieutenant Governor of the State of Indiana; yet the entire population of the State, without a dissenting voice, recognize the Governor and Lieutenant Governor now in office in the State of Indiana as legally inducted into office, and they could only be so if this convention was legally convened. They are in undisputed office. Then they were inducted into office by a convention legally assembled.

If that point be once admitted, the next question that occurs is, had the convention a right to adjourn to another day? I do not intend to detain the Senate by any reference to law-books for the purpose of showing the inherent right of every convention of this kind to adjourn until it has closed all the business that it thinks proper to do as a convention; but I would refer again to the evidence in the report of the Judiciary Committee; and first, let us look at the law of the State, which was repealed, and under which these elections had been held for the space of seventeen or eighteen years. By that law an express provision was made, authorizing the adjournment of a joint convention in certain cases. The second section of that law provided that, when the Legislature had assembled in joint convention to elect a Senator, if, after five ballottings, there should be no election, the President of the Senate might adjourn such election to some future day during the session, not leaving it to the body, but leaving it to the President of the body, to adjourn it to some future day, after five ineffectual ballotts. We must remember that, at the time this election took place, there was no law, there existed no law; the Legislature was acting by virtue of the inherent power conferred upon it by the Constitution of the United States. What was to be done? what else could it do, except to follow the well-established usage of the State? What was that usage? Here, again, I refer to the evidence of the Governor of the State, who is the witness of the contestants. In answer to their questions, he says:

"I have attended several joint conventions; the Lieutenant Governor in person, acting as President of the Senate, becomes the President of the joint convention; he calls the same to order; no motion to adjourn is ever entertained by him; he adjourns it himself, without motion, either sine die or to a given day; I have not been able to find in the record of the proceedings of joint conventions in this State any instance varying with the custom as aforesaid."

Here is a legal convention constitutionally assembled, and the President of that convention adjourns it, adjourns it in accordance with the established usage of the State, and in the absence of a law. How was it as regarded the members of the convention in relation to this adjournment? Mr. Drew says that he was a member of the Senate:

"That the two first sessions of the joint convention adjourned to a day certain, by unanimous consent, and with a full knowledge upon the part of every Senator and Representative that, at the last adjourned session, United States Senators were to be elected."

Mr. Drew is not the only one; there are other affidavits to the same effect. Then, sir, we have a constitutional convention duly convened and duly adjourned, adjourned from day to day until the Senators now holding their seats here received a certificate of their election, having obtained the votes of a number of electors far exceeding a majority of the entire numbers of both branches of the Legislature. They sit here as representing the State of Indiana, and we are called upon to send them away, and leave the State without a representative. Men who have avowedly received a majority of the votes of all the persons entitled to vote at the election, holding their seats here under a certificate signed by the President of the Senate and Speaker of the House, and the Governor of the State, with the broad seal of the State attached to it, are to be turned out of the Senate, and their places not given to contestants, for nobody claims them, but made vacant, and the State deprived of representation upon this floor.

In all cases like this it is incumbent on us to look at the character and position of the parties contestant, as well as at the character and position of those whose seats are sought to be vacated. If the first convention was not a legal or constitutional convention, because two thirds of the Senators were not present at it, we reach this result which is inevitable: that a minority of one third of either branch of the Legislature of the State of Indiana can forever prevent the organization of a government in the State. By the constitution of the State, two thirds of each body form a quorum to do business; but surely this provision of the constitution is to be construed with that other provision which provides that both Houses shall be present on the day when the Governor is to be inducted into office. Shall it be within the power of a portion, or even all the members of one or the other House, to prevent the organization of a State government by simply absenting themselves? Can they be listened to when they allege that they have done such a thing? If it be necessary, according to the theory of the contestants, that this joint convention should be composed of two thirds of each body, what is the inevitable result? That a minority consisting of over one third of either body keeps the State in a continual condition of anarchy.

Here is the Senate of the State of Indiana convened on the 12th day of January. They are to go into the hall of the House in joint convention. Suppose on that day, before the meeting of the Senate, an armed minority had taken possession of the Senate hall, and prevented the members coming into the hall by violence; and suppose the members thus prevented from doing a constitutional duty had done it as nearly as it was possible for them to do—that is, without first convening in the Senate chamber, had gone as Senators to the hall of the House, and there presented themselves as Senators in the performance of their constitutional duty: can any one imagine for a moment that any court of justice on earth would decree that the action of the armed minority, in defiance of the law, should prevail; and that because the action of the majority had been irregular by reason of this violence of the minority, the minority could complain of the irregularity they had themselves caused, and been the authors of?

Now, sir, I want to call the attention of the Senate and of the country to some of the proceedings which were the origin of the irregularities that took place in this election. There were irregularities, and looking on those irregularities on their face, as I said before, when this question was first presented, I said this election is irregular; the parties claiming seats cannot hold them; but when I found that the irregularities had been produced by the armed violence of the very men who maintained that they could base a right on the irregularities, I could not for an instant listen to their protest. No one in the whole State of Indiana complains of these irregularities except the men who committed them. Sir, the Senate will be shocked, the country will be shocked, to hear some of the evidence which has been taken in this case. The notorious General Lane, of Kansas, was on the floor of the Senate of Indiana, at the head of a body of armed retainers, overawing the Senators of a State of which he was not a citizen. He came from a distant land, there to overawe the Senators of a sovereign State, and by force and violence prevent their doing their constitutional duty, which they had sworn to perform when assuming their senatorial robes but two or three days previous. The proof is complete. What says Governor Willard in relation to this action?

"I was present at the organization of the Senate on the first day of the session of 1837. I took the chair, as presiding officer of the Senate, at the usual hour of the meeting of said body, and called the Senate to order. While I was calling the Senate to order, D. Beavers (a Senator holding over) called Lewis Burk (a Senator holding over) to take the chair, and preside. Said Burk took a chair upon my right; who placed it there, I do not know."

It is afterwards proved that it was placed there by Jim Lane, who took this Senator who held over by the arm and inducted him into the seat of the President of the Senate of Indiana.

"I directed the Secretary of the Senate to call the roll of the Senators holding over; all those who were classed as Democrats answered to their names; those who were classed as Republicans or Know Nothings did not."

They would not answer to their names.

"I then directed the call for those Senators who claimed to be elected who had not been sworn into office; all those classed as Democrats came forward and were sworn by me; the Republicans did not. The Senators who had called Mr. Burk to preside over them?"

they divided the Senate into two parties, and each had its president and secretary—

"elected, on motion, a Secretary—J. R. Cravens—(a Senator holding over.) He called the names of the Republican and Know Nothing Senators who held over, and they responded to their names. The Republican Senators claiming seats who had not been sworn in were then called, and, by Judge Gookins, under the order of said Burk, took the oath. From the time the Senate opened until the final motion for adjournment, the Republican Senators refused to recognize me as the presiding officer. Every motion made by them was to Burk; a scene of confusion existed for about three or four hours, until finally a motion to adjourn prevailed. On the Senate's reassembling, Burk abandoned his position, and the Senate came to order."

In the mean time the convention had been held, and the charge now is that that convention was irregular by reason of these very proceedings.

Mr. COLLAMER. Allow me to correct the gentleman. The convention was not held in the mean time. The confusion was on the first day of the meeting, the 8th of January. The first so-called convention was on January 12, and the election on February 4.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I may be mistaken in that. On the Senate reassembling, Burk abandoned his position, and the State Senate came to order. The testimony of Governor Willard proceeds:

"As to who was present, I cannot say; there was a large crowd in the Hall, many inside the bar; all efforts to maintain order among them were ineffectual; James H. Lane, of Kansas, was among those inside the bar; so was O. P. Morton, and many of the prominent Republicans of the State; after the Republican Senators were sworn in, under the order of Burk, they elected J. Harney as their Secretary; in the afternoon, when Burk had abandoned his place, the said Harney, after the Senators had been all sworn in, either by me or my order, was elected Secretary of the Senate; Stanley Cooper was sworn by me, in obedience to the resolution of the Senate."

Now, let us take the evidence of the other witnesses in relation to the presence of Lane. The next witness who speaks on this subject, is Mr. Murray. He says:

"General Lane was, I believe, in the Senate Chamber, in the space, to the right of the President, for visitors. I do not know that he was armed; the only conversation I had with him was during our discussion of the power of the President to organize the Senate, and, on my coming to him, he stated to me that I was right in my position."

This witness was one of the disorganizers. Mr. Slater, who was a Senator from Dearborn county, after referring to the election of the Republican Senator who was put alongside of the Lieutenant Governor, says:

"Pending this disorganizing movement, the lobbies of the Senate Chamber and the avenues leading to the seats of the Senators, were filled by a noisy, disorderly crowd of persons, who seem to have been selected for that occasion, encouraged and led on by James H. Lane, of Kansas."

The next witness, Mr. Drew, also a Senator in the Indiana Legislature, and present at the time, says:

"While these disorderly and illegal proceedings were being had within the bar of the Senate, the doors and lobbies of the Senate Chamber, and the avenues leading to the seats of Senators, were filled by a boisterous armed mob, who seemed to have come there for the purpose of overawing the Lieutenant Governor and Democratic members of the Senate, and to be acting under the direction of the aforesaid James H. Lane."

In stating the circumstances of Burk taking a seat by the side of the Lieutenant Governor, he says:

"Lewis Burk took a seat by the side of the said Lieutenant Governor, in a chair placed there for that purpose by James H. Lane, of Kansas, who appeared to escort Burk to the seat aforesaid. While Lieutenant Governor Willard was calling or directing a call of the roll, said Burk was attempting to usurp his (Willard's) authority, by making, or causing to be made, a like call through John R. Cravens, another Republican Senator, who was pretending to officiate as clerk, appointed as such in the same illegal manner as Burk; although the regular clerk was at his post in the discharge of his duties."

The proceedings, thus inaugurated, all pointing to an effort to deprive the State of Indiana of a proper representation on this floor, were continued to their final consummation in the protest now before us. They were not satisfied with violence; they resorted to fraud; they resorted to fraud in their public records, and their own witnesses prove it. We have before us the record of the Senate. Not one syllable of these proceedings that their own witnesses testify to, is recorded in the Senate's minutes; and finally, when, for the purpose of bringing this matter before us, they are driven to make a protest and declaration of facts, they file a protest, and call upon the Lieutenant Governor of the State to certify to the verity of the protest, and here is his certificate:

SENATE CHAMBER, INDIANAPOLIS, INDIANA,
February 5, 1857.

I, Abram A. Hammond, Lieutenant Governor of the State of Indiana, and ex officio President of the Senate, do hereby certify that the foregoing is a true and correct copy of the protest, as appears of record on the journal of the Senate of the State of Indiana for the 5th day of February, A. D. 1857; and I would furthermore state, that, in signing this certificate, I do not wish to be understood as certifying to any of the facts contained in said protest.

ABRAM A. HAMMOND.

Here is a body of Senators who proceed to their purposes with such unblushing fraud, that the Lieutenant Governor of the State, who is bound by his official position to sign the certificate of their proceedings, is compelled to enter a reservation on his certificate that he protests he does not certify to the truth of the facts they allege. Now, Mr. President, when we have two records before us—one the record of the House in whose hall the joint meeting was held, which, under the constitution was the proper body to receive the Senate for the purpose of holding the joint meeting; and when that record, upon its face, discloses a fair, just, and regular election; and when the good faith, the verity, the regularity, the legality of that convention is contested upon the ground that the record of the Senate is contrary to the record of the House; and when we find that the record of the Senate has been deliberately falsified, upon what ground shall we be asked to take the record of the Senate as a true statement of the proceedings, and to put aside the official record of the only body that had a right to keep minutes of the proceedings which resulted in this election? And for what purpose? To carry out the objects of the very men who were first guilty of this violence and these frauds, and then come here and ask us to listen to them; the very men who originate the difficulties, and then base their rights upon the difficulties themselves originate. Can we listen to allegations like these, from such a source? When the whole State of Indiana has acknowledged the validity, the regularity, and the legality of the original convention which inducted into office the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of the State; when all admit them to be the Governor and Lieutenant Governor, including these contestants themselves, shall we say that that convention was irregular and illegal, and on evidence such as this now before us? Shall we assist these men in their object of defeating the ascertained will of a majority of the people of the State, and a majority of the electors who had the right to elect United States Senators?

The Senator from Ohio has well said that, in all cases of contested elections, the first point to which the judge's attention is directed is this: has this man been elected by a majority of all the legal electors? If he has been, then, unless there is some special provision of law, some statute, some rule, from whose binding force he cannot escape, which declares that election null and void for want of form, the election is good. Now, there is no law in the State of Indiana on the subject of this election. By some mistake, by some oversight of their lawgivers, they repealed the only law under which, previously, the rules of proceeding had been prescribed. The Legislature, therefore, were driven to the exercise of this inherent right in the way they best might. They gave notice of the holding of this election; they called the bodies together; they notified them to be present; but a portion of one of the bodies chose to be absent, and chose to be absent under circumstances which I have just developed. Shall we assist them in their object? For what purpose? For the purpose of depriving a State of the Union of representation here. The State of Indiana has sent us no contest of the right of her Senators on this floor. No one of her public bodies, either executive, legislative, or judicial, has asked us to inquire into the fact of their election. Certain men in the State have asked us to investigate it, and we ought to investigate it when complaint is made by men who themselves come here with clean hands and pure lips; but when they come here, after having themselves been guilty of the very violence and the very fraud which produced the irregularities of which they complain, I, for one, say that I know of no rule of justice, of no provision of law, that compels us to give ear to their complaints; and, for one, I am not willing to do it.

It is for these reasons, on account of the facts developed in the testimony taken by the gentlemen who now hold their seats in the Senate, and which have changed the whole aspect of the case, that I cheerfully give my vote in favor of the resolution offered by the majority of the committee.

Mr. COLLAMER. Mr. President, although it has become my duty, as a member of the Judiciary Committee, to follow the gentlemen who have preceded me, who have occupied, I believe, about two hours and a half, I hope I may not be regarded as having neglected to answer those gentlemen because I may not reply to each and every position which they may have taken. Some of the positions taken by the gentlemen may, in my humble estimation, not be worthy of a reply, however much of importance they may have attached to them; and such as I think are of that character I shall pass by without attempting to notice, though I may, perhaps, attend even to some of these; because others may not regard them in the light I do, especially as the honorable gentlemen who made the arguments have attached importance to them.

In the first place, Mr. President, it is insisted that there is lying at the foundation of the case before us a great question like this: by whom must the election of United States Senators be made? It is insisted by the honorable Senator from Ohio that the election is to be made by the members of the State Legislature as electors. The Constitution of the United States provides that the election of Senators to Congress shall be made by the Legislatures of the several States; and that the time and manner and place of the election shall be prescribed by the Legislature. I think these two requisitions are of equal importance, and both necessary to be observed to make a legal election. The Senator must be elected by the Legislature, and he must be elected in pursuance of a law prescribed by the Legislature. If not, it is an irregular and illegal election.

The Senator from Ohio has read extracts from a number of State constitutions, formed before the adoption of the Constitution of the United States, to show how they regulated the manner of electing delegates to the Congress of the Confederation. To my mind that has really nothing in the world to do with the case. It is no guide of light; neither does it furnish any aid whatever. The Constitution of the United States completely changed the form of our Government, superseded the Articles of Confederation, and made an entirely new system. The construction of the Constitution, in relation to the formation of the Senate for which it provides, cannot be aided by a reference to the provisions of the State constitutions for electing delegates to the Congress of the Confederation. You might as well say that, as the State Legislatures then had and exercised the right to recall their delegates to Congress, it followed that inasmuch as the State Legislatures elect Senators under the Constitution, they have a right to recall them. Non sequitur. There are no analogies between them at all.

If it be true that the election must be made by the members of the State Legislatures merely as electors, if that be the constitutional principle, then any system existing in a State, by the laws of a State so arranged that a minority of the members of the Legislature can defeat an election, is an unconstitutional provision, defeats and nullifies, and destroys that constitutional principle. That principle is the great one on which this whole argument is attempted to be founded. It is not simply assumed, but it is made the basis, the substratum, the corner-stone of the whole argument, that the members of the State Legislatures are simply electors of United States Senators, and that the other provision of the Constitution which relates to the time, manner, and place of the election, is only a means of regulating the arrangement of the business so as to effect this great purpose first declared. It follows, then, as a matter of course, if it be true, that they are electors all alike, each with the same power, that any provisions which would allow a minority to defeat an election must be unconstitutional. Now, sir, a large part of the States, especially of the older States, the old thirteen, have exactly that state of things and always have had. In the State of Connecticut the Senate and the House vote separately, and never come together by any law. That Senate being comparatively the minority of the whole body of electors as they are called here, can defeat the majority all the time. Massachusetts is in the same condition, and so is New Hampshire. That is their standing law. I have not looked through the provisions in all the States; I know that the new States have taken a somewhat different course, and how many of the old ones I know not; but clear it is, that, from the beginning, that has been the practical construction put on the Constitution by the States that made it. The three States I have mentioned were three of the old thirteen, and from the beginning, under the Constitution, they have always had and preserved the right of their Senate and House of Representatives to vote separately in the election of a Senator to Congress.

Mr. PUGH. It was not the original practice in Massachusetts, as I have shown.

Mr. COLLAMER. What you have shown is a provision of their old constitution for sending delegates to Congress under the Articles of Confederation.

Mr. PUGH. That remained in force thirty years after the Constitution of the United States was adopted.

Mr. COLLAMER. I know their constitution did; but, if the gentleman will look to their regulations and laws made under the United States Constitution for the election of Senators, he will find that they have always had them just the same way as now.

Mr. PUGH. Can the Senator show that to me?

Mr. COLLAMER. That is the practice and the law in Massachusetts. I have known it to be so for forty years. It is so in New Hampshire and Connecticut—States in my own neighborhood. Mine is a new State; it did not help to make the Constitution, and is not a guide on this point; but these three States have had uniform practice from the beginning. I have always supposed that each State, under the power given to its Legislature to regulate the time, manner, and place of the election, had unlimited power in these respects. If the States have not unlimited power, their authority is to be limited certainly in some such way as the Senator suggests; and they must only exercise their power; so that, after all, a majority of the electors must govern.

Mr. PUGH. Not at all. The same clause that refers to the election of Senators includes the election of Representatives; and some of the States allow a plurality to elect Representatives, and others require a majority. I acknowledge that the method may be changed; but I say that was the established and understood method. It may be changed by legislation.

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know that I apprehend the gentleman's argument now. I thought I was giving full force to his argument; I meant to do it with all candor.

Mr. PUGH. I do not deny that; but I think the Senator misunderstood me. I expressly said that I did not deny the right of the States to change it, but that that was the method established and understood at the time—the common law of the case.

Mr. COLLAMER. That argument is attempted to be derived from the collating of the constitutions in relation to the choice of delegates to the Congress of the Confederation.

Mr. PUGH. Certainly.

Mr. COLLAMER. You cannot get at it in that way. I have just disposed of that ground. I say that when our Constitution framed the new system of government, it had nothing in the world to do with that. Whether all the States which had a method pointed out for choosing delegates to the old Congress pursued the same method of choosing Senators, I do not know; but under the new Constitution they made their own regulations in their own way, and they have preserved them in the States with which I have been acquainted—the older States—to this day, and they have done it in such manner as to show that the hypothesis that the majority of the members of the two Houses of the Legislature should and must have the right to make an election at all events is unfounded and untrue. If that hypothesis be true, some of the old States that helped to make the Constitution have been mistaken from the beginning, and their whole operations have been wrong from the foundation of the Government, because they allow a minority to defeat a majority of the two Houses in making an election. I am aware that a man is not a very good judge of his own arguments, but I think I have now entirely and utterly prostrated the whole argument on the other side, and I have shown that it is a hypothesis, an assumption which is utterly unfounded.

Again, Mr. President, much is said on the point that the election of a Senator is not an act of legislation. I do not view the choice of a member of the Senate of the United States by a State Legislature as an act of legislation at all. I know that view is attempted to be thrust on the side with which my opinion is in this case. I do not know but that some gentlemen may entertain that view. I do not. It is not an act of legislation; it is an act of election; but I say that, under the provision of the Constitution, that the election shall be made in a manner and at a place and time prescribed by the Legislature; it requires an act of legislation to prescribe the time, place, and manner. The Senator from Ohio, I am sure, is too good a lawyer to say that he does not apprehend that distinction.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator mean, to say that that must be done by an act?

Mr. COLLAMER. I say it must be done by some action that is an act of the Legislature.

Mr. PUGH. Suppose there is no law?

Mr. COLLAMER. I am not talking of any law.

Mr. PUGH. Suppose there is no joint resolution?

Mr. COLLAMER. Then you cannot make an election.

Mr. PUGH. Then the Senator had better expel my colleague and myself.

Mr. WADE. The Ohio Legislature elects by joint resolution, agreeing to go into election on a given day.

Mr. PUGH. But no manner is prescribed.

Mr. COLLAMER. The Constitution says that the prescription of the time, place, and manner, shall be made by the Legislature, and I say that it requires an act of the Legislature, and if the Legislature is composed of two bodies, it must be the separate action of both of those bodies. I know that a construction long continued, though not, perhaps, of very great age, has settled that such an act need not be passed upon by the Governor, because the Constitution requires the prescription to be by the Legislature. Now, I undertake to say that there never was a man who had a seat in this body, who was elected to it, unless the Legislature itself had prescribed the time and place and manner of the election. I do not say that that prescription must be a year old, or ten years old, or ten minutes old; that is totally immaterial, if so be that it is done by the act of the Legislature, if each body has done it. The joint resolution by which they agree to come jointly together may be passed five minutes before the election. When the bodies have passed a resolution of that kind, whether passed years before, or a day before, or a month before, is immaterial; they then agree to come together, and they, by their own act, as separate bodies of the Legislature, agree that the Senator may be elected in that way, and the smaller body give themselves up to the danger of being out-voted by the more numerous branch. Neither is it material whether they vote in separate Houses and count the votes all together, or whether they all meet in one body; so that what is done is by the consent of the two branches, it is the act of the Legislature. That is to say, one body cannot be out-voted by the other without its consent, and that consent is the very thing that gives it force. In those States where they have no law consenting to come together, the Legislature may consent by joint resolution which would, perhaps, amount to a law. If they have a law prescribed beforehand, they may conform to it or repeal it. What I am insisting upon is, that the election must be made pursuant to some act of the Legislature prescribing it.

There is one mode in which I think an election might be made, perhaps, without going through the forms of that prescription. If each House should agree to ballot, and they should each ballot, and a majority of each body should vote for the same man, I think that man would be elected by the Legislature. There must be something, however, to show the act of the two bodies which compose the Legislature, if there be two—and I believe there is no State now that has not two. The election must be the act of the bodies separately or the act of the bodies jointly, by the consent of them severally. I need not repeat this any more. It is perfectly clear, so far as I am capable of making it so.

Now, sir, the question is, is the election in this case within any of these principles? If not, it is not a good election. Much is said about there having been a convention. Some States have been so long accustomed to elections by the separate bodies of the Legislature, that when you talk to their members about a convention of the Legislature, they hardly understand what it means. Talk to a man from Connecticut, or New Hampshire, or Massachusetts, about a joint convention to elect a Senator, and he never saw one; he may have read of it somewhere; but he never saw an exemplification of such a practice, and he does not know what it is. Such a convention may, however, take place wherever the two Houses of the Legislature consent to it; not otherwise. It is said that in this case there was a convention; and I cannot but remark that the honorable Senator from Louisiana goes over the point again and again about there having been a convention. Why, sir, what was it, and what was it for? The constitution of the State of Indiana provides that the votes of the people for Governor shall be transmitted to the capitol, and delivered to the Speaker of their House of Representatives, who shall on a certain day open them, not naming any particular day; but of course it must be a day before the Governor takes his office. The language of the constitution is:

"The returns of every election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall open and publish them in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly; and the person having the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, shall be elected; but in case two or more persons shall have an equal number, and the highest number of votes for either office, then the General Assembly shall, by joint vote, forthwith proceed to elect one of such persons Governor or Lieutenant Governor, as the case may be."

Does that make a convention? The word is not used at all. It makes no convention for any purpose—certainly not by name. It provides that the Speaker of the House of Representatives is to open and count the votes for Governor in the presence of the two Houses of the Legislature. Does that require the action of the two bodies? Neither of them. To be sure, he should, of course, give them notice that he will count the votes at such a time, and at such a place, that they may be there for the purpose of witnessing it. He did it; and the House undertook to get up a resolution with the Senate to agree upon a convention for the purpose of counting the votes. It got over to the Senate; and the Senate, believing that the intention was to push it further than the constitutional purpose, sought to qualify it by providing that no other business should be done than to see the counting of the votes. While they were at work upon that, the Speaker wanted to count the votes—I suppose the time had come; and he sent to the Senate an invitation to attend; he sent it to their presiding officer, who was the Governor elect. That officer got up and told the Senate that he was going to the hall of the House to see the counting of the votes. He went over, and a number of the Senators went with him—I think twenty-six in all; three of the twenty-six saying that they had no participation in it, but merely went to see what was done. I do not know that anybody went there for anything else, honestly. It will be observed that no action was required of this body, except in one contingency; and that was, in case it should chance to happen that two men should be voted for for Governor who should have an equal number of votes—a contingency that probably would not happen in a State so large as Indiana once in a hundred thousand years. I believe they cast more than two hundred thousand votes; and, according to the rule of chances, it could not happen oftener than once in several thousand years that two men would get the same number of votes. Such a possible contingency was provided for. What then? They should proceed, by a vote of the two Houses, which were supposed to be present on the occasion, to make an election between those two persons. The provision is that they "shall, by a joint vote, forthwith proceed to elect one of said persons Governor or Lieutenant Governor, as the case may be." It was an assemblage of men composing the two bodies of the Legislature, to sit before the Speaker for a certain purpose, and in a certain contingency to take action; but not otherwise.

I have not a word to say, and the case does not require me to say a word, as to what would have been the effect on the election of Governor if there had not been a majority of the two Houses present on that occasion. I do not believe it would have affected the election in any way; the Speaker would have counted the votes and declared the result. Gentlemen talk about that convention having inducted the Governor into office. Why, sir, they had nothing to do about it; they did not do anything about it; they simply assembled there to witness the counting of the votes and to act in a certain contingency, which never happened. The votes were counted, and the election declared all right enough. Did any man ever find fault about that? Never to my knowledge. Then, why is it argued over here, a whole hour spent upon it, and we told that we are going to disturb that Governor and Lieutenant Governor whose election nobody ever questioned? I do not know whether it is intended to escape the true point, but the great time spent about that looks to me like an attempt to divert attention from the true question. The question is not whether that man was properly declared elected Governor, and delivered his address to the proper people; not whether he is Governor or is not Governor; but whether those men, thus assembled together, had a right to make an election of United States Senators? That is the point.

Mr. PUGH. Allow me to ask the question, was that Governor rightly sworn?

Mr. COLLAMER. I was not there; I did not hear the oath, or see him take it.

Mr. PUGH. The record says he was rightly sworn. Was that the right place to take the oath?

Mr. COLLAMER. I do not know but that he could take it in any justice's office.

Mr. PUGH. The law says he shall take it in the convention.

Mr. COLLAMER. No, it does not.

Mr. PUGH. I read the law.

Mr. COLLAMER. What law?

Mr. PUGH. The statute.

Mr. COLLAMER. I mean to say that I shall not be diverted from the question of the election of these Senators by getting up a controversy about the election of that Governor. They have no relationship to each other at all. When did the counting of the votes for Governor take place? On the 12th of January. Was not that enough? Nobody ever complained of the election of Governor that I heard of. Have we anything in the world to do with that? Not at all.

But, gentlemen are mightily distressed and troubled, it seems, in relation to a certain Jim Lane; I am sure I care nothing about Mr. Jim Lane. He was once, I believe, Lieutenant Governor of Indiana, and presided in their State Senate, and it appears by the testimony that he was there on the occasion when the Senate organized at this last session. What he was doing exactly at that juncture, I would not undertake to be responsible for. I do not know where he is now. I cannot say whether he is a murderer or not; I have heard stories about it, and read the papers about it; but that has nothing to do with the case. Is it true that Jim Lane did conduct himself wrongfully there? Whether he was armed or not nobody knows. It seems a number of the witnesses were asked whether Lane was armed. They did not know. They were asked, did you hear anything of him? No; but one of them says, he came to me, and when I insisted that the Lieutenant Governor was the presiding officer of the body when the body was organized and not before, and that such had been the usage of the Senate, Lane came and told me I was right, for he had been Lieutenant Governor, and he knew that was the only way he ever took his seat as presiding officer when the body was organized. Lane told that witness that he was right in taking that position, and the witness added, "whether he was armed or not I did not know and did not care." The pains taken on this point seems to me very extraordinary. Is it expected that an election of Senator, taking place on the 4th day of February, could, by any possibility, be affected in its legality by the fact whether Mr. Jim Lane and his associates conducted themselves improperly on the 8th of January before? Or is it supposed that the members of this body are so exceedingly obtuse that they are to be influenced by an argument like that which is sometimes used before a justice's jury, on the idea that if you can get up a prejudice in relation to a transaction that occurred a month or two before, you can persuade the jury, by rubbing their ears very hard, to give a verdict in relation to this transaction, by reference to that with which it had nothing to do? It is not worth while to undertake to answer a thing of that kind, but it is well enough to refer to it, and give the dates.

Governor Willard, who was Lieutenant Governor at the opening of the session, and was inaugurated as Governor elect on the 12th of January, says, in his deposition, that in the forepart of the day of the organization of the Senate, there were irregularities; that is, a part of the members of the Senate, then about being organized, considered that they had a right to select a presiding officer. Another witness states the reason of that. He says that the usage of the State had been to organize the Senate first, and then have the Lieutenant Governor take his seat. The majority of the Senate tried to pursue that course which they thought they had a right to do, and they put a Senator into the chair by the side of the Lieutenant Governor. There were irregularities; but they came to no conclusion; they produced no organization; the Senate did not get into a condition to begin a record; the clerk began no record; and they did not get organized so that he could have anything to record, and he did not record anything, and they adjourned in some confusion. In the afternoon, when the Senate assembled again, Governor Willard says that Senator Burk, who had been called to the chair in the morning, did not take it again; no more was done about it. They then began their business. The Lieutenant Governor called upon the newly-elected Senators, all of whom had certificates of election, and swore them in. There was one of them who had no certificate of his election, and the Senate took a vote upon that question, voted him his seat, and the Lieutenant Governor had him sworn as the others. They were then organized; they went on with their business, and made their record from that time forward.

The honorable Senator from Louisiana complains that they did not record that violence in the morning, and he undertakes to say that the record of the Senate's proceedings is here to be entitled to no credit, and is to receive no currency with this body because they did not record that. I should like to see the gentleman draw up a record of those proceedings, and what they resulted in. I think he would be as much troubled as the man was who was writing a letter for another as he dictated it to him. By and by he was asked, "can you write anything I tell you?" "Oh, yes," said he. Presently the man whistled, and he said, "write that whistle." [Laughter.] I think it would be quite as troublesome to make a record of that morning's proceedings as it would be to write the whistle, and put it in the letter. The truth is there was nothing done to record.

Mr. President, from that day, the 8th of January, all went on quietly; there was no disturbance. Now, what took place? Did the House of Representatives ever pass any resolution for the election of a Senator? Was there any law providing for a joint meeting to elect a Senator? No. The constitution of the State, which directed the Speaker of the House to count the votes for Governor, provided for a meeting of the two Houses, to which meeting it only gave the power to vote for Governor in a certain contingency; but did it give that meeting any right to elect a Senator? No; but a long argument is made that inasmuch as they adjourned two or three times, until they finally elected a Senator, everything is all right; and the Senator from Ohio reads cases here to show that an adjourned meeting can do anything which could have been done at the primal meeting. I do not deny that. The gentleman seems to think that because my name is put down as dissenting from a certain decision in the Vermont courts, I dissented from that principle. Not at all. If the gentleman will examine that case a little more carefully, I think he will find why I dissented. The court undertook to say that a manufacturing corporation, at an adjourned meeting, could do anything they could at the principal meeting, and that the principal meeting could do anything they had a mind to do, without any warning. That was the trouble, and that was the ground on which I dissented; and that is exactly the trouble here. That court made that decision in relation to the annual meeting of a corporation. It began in this way: In my State we have town meetings fixed by law, which regulate the general affairs of the town and its officers. They sometimes get into some trouble about a certain piece of business which it was said had not been in the warning. The court, on the whole, concluded that an annual town meeting could do anything it wanted to do. That was a pretty hard decision; but when they got to this private corporation—the case the gentleman read was a manufacturing corporation—they undertook to apply to it the other rule in relation to municipal corporations, and to that application I dissented. I think I should have dissented from the first decision, if I had been present; I certainly did from the last, and I think I can read enough out of the gentleman's own books to support me in that.

I grant that if the convention (if gentlemen prefer that name) which met to see the votes counted for Governor, had a right to elect a Senator, then they had a right to elect a Senator at an adjourned meeting. I have no doubt of that; and I go a little further and say, that if they had a right to do that, and keep the joint meeting along by adjournments, the Senate, by its own adjournments, could not defeat it. But I say, in the case of the honorable Senator from Iowa, [Mr. HARLAN,] this body decided that very point the other way. In the State of Iowa there was a fixed law which regulated the forming of a convention by the two Houses of the Legislature, and provided that that convention should appoint its own officers, and should sit upon its own adjournments. In the election of the honorable Senator from Iowa, the two Houses of the Iowa Legislature met pursuant to that law; they did elect their own officers, and they did sit on their own adjournments. When they could not elect on the first day, they came to a meeting on a second day, and then a majority of each House was present. Failing to elect, they adjourned to meet on a subsequent day, but then a majority of the Senate, instead of going to meet the House in joint convention according to the adjournment, adjourned and did not go there. The minority of the Senate went there, and they, with the House of Representatives, elected the Senator. This Senate, however, decided that that election was not good; and they, therefore, decided that, because a majority of the Senate of the State refused, by their act of adjournment, to go into the convention, they had the power, after the convention was formed by law, to defeat it. They did defeat it; and this body sustained them in it upon the broad principle that the rule was imperative, the requirement indispensable; that in the election of a Senator you must have a majority of both Houses present at the time. That was the decision in that case, the facts of which were as I have just stated; and no man will dispute them. It was decided on that very principle that, because the Senate of Iowa, by a majority, adjourned, they defeated the joint convention already formed by law.

In this case, as I was saying, if it be true that those men collected in that body to see the vote for Governor counted, had the legal right then to go on and make an election of Senators of the United States, their adjournments did not deprive them of that right. I know those adjournments were made in an extraordinary way; that is to say, no vote was taken on adjourning the meeting; but when the votes for Governor had been counted, the Governor elect took his seat, delivered his message, and then the Lieutenant Governor was declared elected, who was of course, ex officio presiding officer of the Senate, and he adjourned that convention by his own act, and not by a vote of the body at all. Governor Willard was asked in his testimony, "whether that was not the way conventions in Indiana, of the Legislature, had been usually adjourned?" He said "yes, so far as he knew, and he had presided in them." They then asked him, "Did you ever know of a convention, if you call it such, a meeting which came to see the votes for Governor counted, being adjourned for any other business?" "Never," said he. He was asked, "Did you ever know of any convention being adjourned for any other business?" "I do not know that," said he, "I have adjourned them;" but the fact is, as he says in his testimony, he never presided at one of those meetings, nor at any joint convention, except one that was created by a joint resolution, and that he adjourned them without day, when they finished the work for which they met. That is his testimony.

Now, Mr. President, I ask where is the authority, where is the law by which this body (assembled for a purpose declared by the constitution, and to be ended with the completion of that purpose declared by the constitution) could remain in existence for any other purpose? Their adjournments could not give them that power. If they had the power to go on and make an election of Senator at the time they were first assembled, that is another thing; but where did they get that power? Was there any such mode as that prescribed in their constitution for the election of Senator? No. Was there anything of that kind in their law? No. Was there any joint resolution of the two Houses ever passed that they would make an election by joint resolution? Never; and no such resolution was passed by either House. The House of Representatives never passed such a resolution; the Senate never did so; the House of Representatives never asked the Senate to pass it. The difficulty of the argument consists in this: it is not shown that the so-called convention had any power to elect a Senator, either at the time they first met or afterwards, and therefore all the argument about the continuance of their power by adjournments amounts to nothing. As the Senator from Ohio says, those adjournments, though irregular, if not objected to, were well enough. The trouble is not with the adjournments; the trouble is, that the first meeting had no such power as was attempted to be exercised at an adjourned meeting.

Mr. President, I might here perhaps conclude pretty much what I have to say about this case, but there are some few things I wish to notice. The honorable gentleman from Louisiana, deems the election irregular, but he states a history of it to show its excuse. Well, what history does he show? He begins back, and lays great stress, and exercises his genius in undertaking to make a picture addressed to the prejudices of the community against Mr. Lane, and the irregularities there on the 8th of January, which, he says, form the excuse for the irregular election of these Senators. How? Where is the relationship? Find me the sequitur. Show me how it formed any sort of excuse for it. It would have been well enough if the honorable Senator, in going into this history, had stated what the testimony shows to have been the usage there. The testimony shows that in every instance of a senatorial election in that State, it was always made by a joint resolution, agreeing to go into convention. There never was one made in any other way. The gentleman says there was a law for that. So there was, passed in 1831. The Senator from Ohio thinks that law was repealed in 1833.

Mr. PUGH. Undoubtedly.

Mr. COLLAMER. I say it was repealed earlier than that by several years. In 1843, I think there was a revision of the laws of Indiana, just as there was in 1853; and, in that revision, they repealed all laws not therein excepted, as they did in 1853; and they excepted two provisions in relation to the election of Senator of the United States, and preserved them in their publication; but they are provisions which merely regulated the mode of voting—the viva voce form—nothing else.

Mr. PUGH. The constitution provides for that.

Mr. COLLAMER. The constitution was made since; but, by the revision of 1843, the former law as to the election of Senators of the United States was repealed, except to change the mode of voting from the ballot to viva voce, and the other was a short statute of comparatively no importance.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The first statute provides for viva voce elections in all cases, including United States Senators; and the next statute repealed that, except as to United States Senators.

Mr. COLLAMER. Earlier than that revision there was a statute that all officers chosen by the Legislature should be chosen by viva voce vote. They repealed that in the second law except in relation to United States Senators. These two short statutes were not repealed in the revision of 1843. The other statute of 1831 was repealed by that revision. So, as early as 1843, the act of 1831 ceased to be operative, and yet election after election has been made since 1843, every one of which, according to the testimony, was made by a joint vote of the two Houses after they had agreed by resolution to meet together. On one occasion they failed, and how did they fail? A majority of the House of Representatives was Whig, and the Senate was equally divided. The time came for making an election of United States Senator, and it appears in the testimony, which I do not care to read—I can state it and Senators can correct me if I do not state it correctly—that one of the present sitting Senators from Indiana [Mr. BRIGHT] was the Lieutenant Governor and presiding officer of the Senate, and on two or three occasions, when a resolution was sent into the Senate from the other House to go into a joint convention, he, by his casting vote, outvoted it in the Senate, and when the next year came round the majority was the other way, and he was elected Senator by a joint vote, agreed upon by both Houses. That would be like a little better history of how this came, and furnish some sort of excuse, if any is wanted, why the majority of the Senate of Indiana, last year, were not willing to be outvoted. The other side had always done so when they could, and insisted on it, and they only did the same thing. It was nothing new. They practiced the lesson which the opposite party had taught them; but now it is awfully factious. Then it was all right, especially as it resulted on the right side.

So much in relation to this history. The usage of the State, even when there was no law, was always to bring about a convention by a joint resolution. It so fully appears in the testimony in the case. Some of the witnesses say they were present at every one of the elections; and that they were held in that way. Therefore, nothing can be made out of that; but the usage, in the absence of law, was all agreeable to the constitution, and agreeable to the principles I have stated, sometimes resulting in an election, and sometimes failing, but all satisfactory and right.

Now, sir, it may be said that everything is well enough when you come to any proceeding of this kind, if you do not exactly follow the law, provided no objection is made at the time. Sir, there was objection made. The majority of the Senate believed that even if they went to the meeting to see the votes counted, there would be a snap judgment taken on them by attempting to make an election of United States Senators, or attempting to fix a day to do it; and that is the reason they did not go there, because that unlawful proceeding was contemplated. When the adjournment took place, they, of course, heard that it was proposed to go into an election of Senators. It is said to be presumed to be all right; but the Senate of Indiana, by a majority, protested against that proceeding, before it took place, by a formal protest, which was entered on record. What more could they do? Must they go there and commit themselves, and be outvoted? Were they placed in that condition, as between two stools, that they must fall? Were only these two horns of the dilemma presented: "If you do not come, we will make an election; if you come and enter your protest, we shall have an advantage by that; if you do come, we can get along, because we have a majority?" The proceeding was protested against in all solemnity, and in due form; and the protest is here on the table. What more could the Senate do?

This is about the history of the transaction; at least it is as much of it as I regard of any importance. The whole question at last resolves itself into this: does the fact that the sitting members had a majority of the aggregate number of the two bodies; that they had a number of votes which would have made a majority of the two Houses if they had been together, make an election? If that makes a legal election, they have got it. If that fact alone will not make a legal election; if it must have the requisites of a law; if it must have any requisites of this kind; if it is true that the minority body may, under the constitution, in the absence of law to the contrary, insist upon their right of deferring and defeating an election; the sitting members are not entitled to their seats. If the minority body have that constitutional right, these people were entitled to use it, and have used it. If they have not that right, Massachusetts, Connecticut, New Hampshire, and many other States, have elected their members under laws utterly unconstitutional. I shall say no more on the subject.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Mr. President, it is proper, as one of the members of the Judiciary Committee who reported this resolution in favor of the right of the sitting Senators from the State of Indiana to their seats, that I shall say something on the question. I had at first intended to make more extended remarks than I shall now indulge in, for the ground has been fully preoccupied by the Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Ohio, to whose remarks, always accurate, logical, and eloquent, I listened with both interest and benefit. I shall, without attempting to go over the ground which they have occupied, and in which I can add nothing of novelty to the question, merely state the conclusions which a rather close investigation of the subject has led me to, without giving at length the argument. That task has been so completely and perfectly performed to my hand that I shall not attempt to repeat it.

The points that are involved in this case are, I think, extremely few and simple, though the facts are diffuse, and the illustrations of course are many. The power of electing United States Senators is confided by the Constitution of the United States to the State Legislatures, and the power is also conferred on the State Legislatures to prescribe the time, the mode, and the place of the election, reserving, however, the right to Congress to interfere and change these regulations, except as to the place. This power, under the Federal Constitution, has never been exercised by Congress, and therefore remains where it was originally granted—with the State Legislatures, to determine the time and manner of the elections. In the practice of the different Legislatures, almost every variety of form of the exercise of this power has occurred. In some States it has been interpreted to be, though not a legislative act, yet an act deliberative in its character, and requiring the joint and separate consent of both Houses of the Legislature to consummate the performance of this high constitutional duty. In others again this constitutional function is performed by a joint convention, which, I take it, is nothing more than another form of the Legislature—sometimes brought together by concurrent resolutions of the two Houses, at other times in pursuance or under the behests of a law. There are many differences in the form of the exercise of this power, all of which, however, only go to prove that the law of the State, at last, is to prescribe the form in which the Legislature shall carry out this constitutional power. The time was, in the State of Indiana, when the manner of making elections of United States Senators was prescribed by a law of that State; but at the time when the election of the present Senators took place that law had expired, or rather, by some omission, had been left out of the revised code. I think the Senator from Vermont was not exactly accurate in stating the status of the law on that question, at the time when this election took place. I will stop now, in passing, merely to correct that error, and then proceed with the general course of the argument. The law of 1831 was not repealed by the law of 1843. The whole body of the act of 1831 was then preserved, except the solitary and isolated feature as to the manner of voting. Previously to that, a different form of voting had been pursued. That act changed it, and required them to pursue the viva voce form.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume the Senator from Arkansas intends to be entirely accurate. I have the revision of 1843 in my hands, and can refer him to the section, which, it seems to me, repeals, without question, the law of 1831.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I shall be pleased to hear it. Mr. TRUMBULL. If the Senator has examined it, and draws a different opinion from the examination, I will argue that point with him; but I think there can be only one opinion.

Mr. BRIGHT. With the permission of the Senator from Arkansas, I beg leave to say a word. I intend to take no part in this discussion except to correct either a misunderstanding of law or a misstatement of facts from a want of knowledge of them. I will correct a remark made by the Senator from Vermont as to the law of 1831. The law of 1831, the first we had in the State of Indiana regulating the election of Senators to Congress, remained unchanged until the 7th day of May, 1853, except that in 1843 the words "by ballot" were stricken out, and "viva voce" inserted. That is the fact. On the 7th day of May, 1853, all laws not reenacted under the operation of our new constitution, by the schedule that was affixed to the new constitution, were repealed, and this law regulating the election of Senators was within that category. This is fully illustrated by the fact that, a year before the election of my colleague and myself took place, the Legislature attempted to pass a law on that subject; but the act that the House of Representatives passed, the Senate refused to pass, and the one the Senate passed, the House refused to pass; and in that way we were left without any statute on the subject.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will merely state, if the Senator from Arkansas will allow me, that Judge Pettit, a member from Indiana in the other House, stated the fact to me, and referred me to the statutes. The statute of 1843 does repeal the prior act, if I can understand it, and I think there will be no doubt about it, if Senators will look at it. Mr. Pettit was formerly a judge in that State, and is pretty familiar with its laws. He told me it was so, and gave me the statute to show it.

Mr. BRIGHT. The statute will not show it. Elections took place after that under that law. I was elected myself under it, and so was my former colleague, Mr. Pettit.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am glad that the controversy has arisen about the construction of this law, because it has had the effect of fixing me more firmly and securely in the opinion I expressed that the original body of law prescribing the manner of electing United States Senators in the State of Indiana continued until 1853, with the exception of a solitary innovation which was introduced by the revision of 1843. That the rest of that law should continue becomes almost a necessary implication when the Legislature interfered merely to change one part of it, the form of its exercise, by substituting the viva voce vote instead of the ballot. By simply making the change, it follows that the rest of the law is continued in full force and virtue, else a repeal of the law would not have been left as a mere matter of conjecture or judicial construction, especially when the repeal of laws according to ordinary practice is placed beyond all question by language embraced in affirmative and unmistakable terms. The fact to which the Senator from Indiana adverted, illustrates the view which Indiana herself took on the question of the law. Before the election of the sitting Senators from Indiana, it appears that this very defect in the law was attempted to be obviated, this omission to be supplied, by the reenactment of the law which had expired in 1853, or rather was omitted in the compilation of the new code.

That, however, Mr. President, in the view which I take of the case, becomes of but small importance, since if there was no law from 1843 to 1853, that Legislature was acting precisely within the exercise of the same sovereign right as the subsequent Legislature did in the election of the sitting members; and it only illustrates the force of that saying founded in justice, and truth and reason, that where a body is exercising a right without law, the body is a law to itself. I believe it is said that those who have no law are a law unto themselves. This maxim has the highest sanction of justice and common sense.

I have said that, at the time this election was made, there was no law of Indiana prescribing the time and mode of accomplishing this constitutional function. In the exercise of this high right, they were left entirely without restriction, untrammelled, without fetters, without prescribed forms, and subject to no limitation, except, as the Senator from Ohio justly said, such as the principles of common sense and right reason would impose. That Senator said he recognized one limitation—that the proceeding must be just, must be fair, must be of a kind to give notice to all parties, and afford every qualified elector an opportunity of exercising his constitutional right. Being thus without any prescribed statute governing the election as to time and manner, it was left for Indiana herself to determine, under the exigencies of the occasion, the mode in which she would discharge this constitutional duty. She did so, and a convenient form, a constitutional institution, was found adapted to her hands, and exactly answering the purpose. It was that of a joint convention, a constitutional creature, invested with certain powers, and, in exercising these powers, performing the duty of electing a United States Senator. This joint convention, created by the constitution of Indiana, and recognized in the practice of other States, I have said, is but another form of the Legislature. It is not both Houses acting as coordinate branches, in separate chambers, with separate organizations; but it is a joint convention, in which the distinct existence of each House is lost in the unity of the joint body. It is, after all, the Legislature under a different name; it is one form in which the Legislature elects United States Senators in pursuance of the Federal Constitution.

This joint convention, therefore, met for the purpose of performing a duty enjoined on it by the constitution of Indiana, was a deliberative body called together in pursuance of the constitution, acting in pursuance of prescribed form; and if no form was prescribed for the government of its proceedings, it was left, like every other deliberative assembly, to adopt its own forms of procedure, to meet at its own motion, and to adjourn at its own will. This convention, when it met for one constitutional purpose, was authorized to perpetuate itself until its full constitutional duty was performed and discharged; else the constitution would have enjoined upon it a duty without adequate power to discharge it. It would have required a duty to be discharged at its hands, and deprived it of the means of performing it. This, of course, could not have been intended. Although the law which formerly regulated the election of United States Senators was repealed in 1853, there was a usage of the old conventions which was preserved. It was the right of the presiding officer of the joint convention to adjourn it and to call it together again on his own motion. It was not a right which he usurped, for long usage had established it, and the Houses of the Legislature had always acquiesced in this exercise. It became, therefore, prescribed law; not written, but having all the force and obligation of law, as if it had been written in the statutes of the Legislature. This, however, was no part of the law under which these gentlemen were elected. It was simply a law which determined the authority of the presiding officer, and shows that in exercising the power of adjourning the convention and calling it together of his own will, he acted not in the exercise of usurped authority, but as the oracle, the constituted mouth-piece of the convention. When, therefore, the President of the joint convention adjourned it, and called it together again, that was the act of the convention; it was the act of their oracle, their authoritative mouth-piece, acquiesced in by the convention. Not a voice was heard to murmur or complain of it, either to dispute his authority or to deny the fact, which is unquestioned, as the proclamation of adjournment and the meeting together again would infer.

Coming next to the powers of this convention, I say it was a constitutional institution, formed under the constitution of Indiana, with certain duties and functions imposed on it, having the ordinary powers of deliberative bodies, speaking and acting through its presiding officer, in pursuance of a usage which had the force of law, and having all powers which like deliberative bodies possessed. It mattered not whether the power to elect Senators was previously conferred on it by statute or not. It derived its power from as high a source—the usage of previous Legislatures and the unanimous acquiescence of the members. With what higher sanction could power be conferred than this? I will not now go into a detail of the facts and incidents of this election. It is sufficient to say that the joint convention thus organized, unrestrained by law, governing itself according to its constitutional usages, proceeded to the discharge of this constitutional duty and consummated the election of United States Senators. It was done by the action of a majority of the qualified electors of the two Houses. It is not necessary, according to the view which I take, that there should be a majority of each House concurring in making the election. It so happens, however, that in this case, there was a majority of the qualified electors of each House. There is no question made as to the fact that there was a large majority of the House of Representatives, and the only point of dispute is as to the majority of the Senate. I have said that I do not regard this point as material; but inasmuch as the facts in regard to it answer, to a considerable extent, the arguments of the Senator from Vermont, I will notice it here.

The Senate of Indiana consists of fifty members. One legally-elected member did not appear. This left forty-nine seats. Three of these seats were occupied by persons who, by the laws of Indiana, could not take their seats, except by mere usurpation, until the elections by which they claimed seats were determined. One appeared there without credentials at all; and his admission appeared to me to be unprovoked and gratuitous. Two others had the form of a certificate of election; but, according to the law of Indiana, a legal contest had been instituted, and the effect of that contest was to suspend whatever rights they had acquired—to vacate and void the seats until the contest was determined. That provision of law was made to avoid the very mischief which arose out of the usurpation of the Senate of Indiana in this case by the admission of improper persons. It was intended to prevent contests between a sitting member on the one side and a contestant on the other, and for that purpose it arrests and suspends at once the election, and holds it up until the result of the contest is determined. I take it for granted, therefore, as a proposition which cannot be successfully contested, that these three seats were void because not legally filled; and, if filled, they were filled by members who were such de facto only; they were filled by a proceeding which was revolutionary and disorganizing; they were filled by persons voted in contrary to the forms of law, and in violation of its prescribed provisions. I take it, then, that they formed no part of the qualified electors of that select college of suffragans, to use the language of the Senator from New York [Mr. SEWARD] on another occasion, upon whom devolves the duty, and whose right it is to elect United States Senators. Subtracting from fifty the three members whose admission to seats was a naked usurpation, the legal Senate of Indiana consisted of forty-seven. On the occasion of the election of the sitting members, there were twenty-four members of the Senate who attended, who followed the presiding officer, who admitted themselves to be an organized convention, and as such complied with the invitation of the House of Representatives. Those twenty-four were a majority of forty-seven. Thus, Mr. President, there was the concurring choice in favor of the sitting members of both Houses of the Indiana Legislature—the act of the majority concurring in the election within the meaning of the Constitution of the United States.

The Senator from Vermont seems to indulge in a kind of technical objection in his attempt to construe the provision of the Constitution which gives the State Legislatures power to prescribe the manner of the election. He is, however, frank enough to admit that the prescription of the mode need not be by a statute. It may be five years; it may be one year; it may be five minutes; it may be the moment before the Legislature makes the election. This point I have already illustrated. I have shown that there was a joint convention of the Indiana Legislature called by the constitution of the State. The Speaker of the House of Representatives, regarding himself impelled to this duty by constitutional obligation, sent an invitation to the members of the Senate to appear in the convention, and take part in the election of the United States Senators. They did appear: consequently the election was the act of each House of the Indiana Legislature, acquiesced in by the members; and no one controverted the propriety of the mode adopted. It needed no statute; it needed no form of a joint resolution; it only needed some plain and unmistakable act, which showed the consent of the two Houses of the Legislature to the act. Against this, and against the proposition that the Senate acquiesced as a body, what has been arrayed here? The resolutions of a factious minority of the Legislature, denouncing it as a usurpation, and declaring that they would have nothing to do with it; and that at a time when they were not in organized session as a Senate; when the presiding officer, the clerk, the sergeant-at-arms, and all the paraphernalia which constitute the external insignia of parliamentary representation, were absent. They resolved themselves into a Senate, without a head, without a clerk, and without a constitutional majority, and decided that those who complied with the constitution, and availed themselves of the invitation of the Speaker of the House to perform a constitutional duty, were not the Senate of Indiana.

This revolutionary and irregular act is the only evidence which has been appealed to as showing that the Senate, as a distinct body, was not a party to this organization; but the Senator from Louisiana well put the case when he said if they complied with the invitation of the House of Representatives, they performed their duty under the constitution; and if they resisted or failed to notice it, they neglected their constitutional duty; so that in either case there was a higher law than a mere resolution obligatory on them—as obligatory on them to perform the duty of electing United States Senators as it was to come together and see the votes counted for Governor and Lieutenant Governor. There can be no distinction in the character of the obligation on them. The only distinction is in the character of the acts. Both were constitutional; both were of an elevated nature; both were required to be done by both Houses of the Legislature; and that no factious minority, no rebellious proceeding, no irregularity might prevent the discharge of these high duties of the Legislature, their constitution commanded it. It mattered but little how they complied or when they complied, so that both Houses of the Legislature were there. It formed that college of electors denominated by the Senator from New York a college of suffragans, who vote per capita, and a majority of whose votes constituted an election. It has not been pretended here that it is necessary to have a majority of each, and that shows that the distinctive character of the two Houses is lost in the unity of the joint convention. They resolve themselves into different elements. The distinct character of each House is gone, and they act together in the form of a joint convention. Hence the question is never made as to what part of the members of either body vote for the successful competitor so that he receives a majority of the whole.

There is only one other point to which I will advert, and that is the bearing which the decision of the Senate in the case of the Senator from Iowa is supposed to have on this case. We are often pointed to that as a decision of the Senate which ascertained the rule to be different from that which coincides with the views of the majority of the Judiciary Committee in this case. I find no difficulty in reconciling the two cases together. The proposition with which I set out was, that in the election of United States Senators, Congress having failed to prescribe any manner for the exercise of the power, it was left as an unrestricted and unrestrained right to the State Legislature; and the consequence is, that the law of the Legislature becomes the supreme law of the case; and it is because Indiana had no law to violate that I find my conscience easy to vote for the sitting members here. It was because Iowa had a law which was violated that I could not find it consistent with my duty to vote for the retention of the seat by the then occupant of the Iowa seat in this body. Indiana had no law. Iowa had one which required that the election of United States Senators should be by a joint convention of both Houses of the Legislature, brought together by a concurrent resolution of each House, acting as separate Houses and as coordinate branches of the Legislature. Well, sir, they did come together. The origin of the convention was, in pursuance of that law, the result of the separate action of each House, and the separate consent of each House was necessary to its continuance and to the consummation of the act.

When, therefore, the convention of Iowa, constituted by concurrent resolutions of the separate bodies of the Legislature, came together, they were a constitutional convention, and were invested with the power of electing United States Senators; and, had that Senator been elected by that body thus brought together, in conformity with the law of Iowa, I would not have found a word to say against his retaining his seat; but the Senate of the State of Iowa, whose voice was necessary to constitute that convention, whose continuing assent was necessary to its continued existence, withdrew as a Senate from the body, and destroyed the entity of the joint convention. The withdrawal of its assent by a branch of the Legislature was a resolution of the joint convention into its original elements. They then constituted, as they did before, the House of Representatives and Senate of Iowa; the joint convention was gone; it had been destroyed by the act of the Senate, whose continued assent was as necessary to its continued vitality, as its original agreement was to the constitution of the convention. I will not say when one House has tied its hands by concurrent resolution, whether it is exactly legitimate, whether it is precisely regular, for it to withdraw; but that is not the question here. The question is not whether they did right or wrong in that case; but how was the fact? They did withdraw, the Senate was gone, and the joint convention was dissolved. The Senator from Iowa was elected, therefore, by the House of Representatives of his State contrary to the express action of the Senate in a case where, by the law of the State, the Senate had a right to say that it would partake in it. The cases, then, are very different. Iowa had a law to be respected; Indiana had none to be violated. Iowa violated her law in the election of her Senators; Indiana could violate no law, and be guilty of no irregularity, for she made the law for herself, according to the exigency of the case, and did so in the exercise of a right expressly referred to her by the Constitution of the United States. That she did so legally, constitutionally, and fairly, I think has been placed beyond all question by the Senator from Ohio in his learned and logical remarks in this case.

But this is peculiarly an Indiana question. It is a question whether the law of Indiana has been violated, the provisions of her constitution invaded; and what says the constituted authority of Indiana herself? I understand the fact to be, and I believe it is not questioned here, that when an appeal was taken to the highest judicial powers of that State, the highest law officers of the Federal Government and of the State, the opinion was unanimous, decided, conclusive, in favor of the power of the Legislature to elect under the circumstances they did. I believe it was the fair and honest desire of those who sympathized in the success of the sitting members to obtain the unbiased expression of the highest judicial opinion in the State in favor of the power that produced the last adjournment of the joint convention three or four days preceding the election. It was fair; it was honest; it was a feast to which all were invited; it was the exercise of a right which every one who was qualified had a fair opportunity to exercise. There was no setting a trap in which to catch the unwary. It was no trick by which to cut off those who were entitled to the right of suffrage from the fair opportunity of its exercise. On the contrary, the fact was notorious, although not proclaimed in the form of a proclamation, that when the convention met the last time, it was for the very purpose of electing United States Senators. Still those who willfully absented themselves, failed to go forward and avail themselves of their fair and equal opportunity to exercise those high rights which they, by sleeping upon, have lost; and by failing to exercise which, they have lost the right to complain.

Mr. President, I have gone further than I intended when I first rose. I have not accomplished my original purpose of merely stating my conclusions, but I have indulged in arguments more than I anticipated. I submit the case.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER, (MR. CLAY.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Maine, [MR. HAMLIN.]

Mr. GREEN. I suggest the propriety of voting down the amendment, as we shall discuss the merits of the case anyhow, and not the propriety of recommending it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the amendment by adding to it:

And that, in the opinion of the Senate, no election of a member of this body, made by the Legislature of a State, consisting of two branches, is valid when made in a meeting of individual members of both, unless such meeting for that purpose was prescribed by law, or had been previously agreed to by each House acting separately in its organized capacity, or is participated in by a majority of the members of each House, or is subsequently ratified in some form by each House in its organized capacity.

Mr. MASON. I shall vote against the amendment that was offered in the first instance, because I take it for granted that a committee of this body is competent to report as it thinks fit, either by a report at length, or by resolution expressing the judgment to which it has arrived. But this amendment, offered by the Senator from Illinois, is one that would commit the Senate to a series of abstract propositions, when we are here passing upon an individual case. I do not see that it can recommend itself to the vote of any one.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will state my object in offering the substitute, which is, to show distinctly the principle involved in the decision to be made. The Senator from Virginia will observe that the committee have made no report, and there is some dispute as to the principle on which the Iowa case was decided. If we knew on what principle that case was decided, it would form a precedent for other cases. Is it not desirable, I would ask the honorable Senator from Virginia, that, in deciding these questions, which are eminently judicial, and about which there ought to be no other feeling than to give a proper construction to the Constitution of the United States as applied to the action of the State Legislatures—is it not highly important that we should settle them upon principles that will form precedents and relieve us of these constant difficulties? I presume no Senator would settle this case upon a different principle from that established in the Iowa case, unless, perchance, he should be satisfied that the decision then made was wrong; and is it not important that the principle on which this class of cases is to be decided should be clearly defined? If there was a report, that would help us to do it; but in this particular case there is no report. I have drawn up the amendment with some care, and if the gentleman will look at it closely, I think he will find that he cannot vote against it consistently with the decision in the Iowa case.

Mr. GREEN. Will the Senator give way for a moment?

Mr. TRUMBULL. Certainly.

Mr. GREEN. It is so near the close of the session that I should not like to engage in the discussion of abstract questions. There is a practical question before us that has but two sides to it. The Senators from Indiana are either legally elected or not elected. Let us take it in its simplest form, and discuss this abstraction at the next session, or some subsequent period. I think economy of time ought to have some regard. The present question, of course, must be attended to. I make that suggestion to the Senator and request him to follow it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I presume the Senator from Missouri agrees with me, that we are to decide this as a judicial question. He must regard himself as acting in the capacity of a judge in settling it. Will he not admit at once that, in the decision of a judicial question, care should be taken that it be decided carefully, and that the principle upon which it is decided should be clearly and distinctly established? He would be as far, I trust, as I am, or any one else, from allowing the judicial opinions of the Senate to be varied by cases one way to-day and another to-morrow.

I have drawn up the amendment with great care, and have provided that an election of a United States Senator, in a meeting of individual members of a Legislature consisting of two branches, is not valid; unless, first, that meeting is in pursuance of some law for that purpose; or, second, has been agreed to by each branch of the Legislature, in its separate capacity as such; or, third, unless the meeting consists of a majority of each branch of the Legislature, or is subsequently acquiesced in and ratified by each branch. That covers this case. These gentlemen were elected by a meeting of individual members of the Legislature—not in pursuance of any law of the Legislature; not in pursuance of any resolution of the two branches of the Legislature, acting as such; not by a majority of the members of each branch of the Legislature; nor is there any subsequent ratification, in any form, by each or either branch of the Legislature acting in its separate capacity.

That being so, let us settle in this decision the principle whether an election made under such circumstances is a valid election or not. It seems to me that this is exactly the place, and the proper place, for the consideration of these principles, because they are necessarily involved in the decision to be made. The Senator from Missouri says, "let us take up these abstract questions and decide them hereafter." Why, sir, we should not, as judges, be engaged in laying down abstract principles of law not applicable to the case in hand. Principles thus declared would be mere dicta and without authority. This amendment, in my judgment, covers the present case, and, therefore, I have offered the proposition; and upon it, I may as well say at this time what I have to say in regard to the case; and I regret that on so important a question the chairman of the Judiciary Committee, [Mr. BAYARD,] who, I understand, agrees with me, that the gentlemen claiming seats are not legally elected, does not participate in this debate. He could present, much better than I can expect to do, the reasons for such a conclusion, and I regret that he does not think proper to do it. I remember very well, Mr. President, that when a case somewhat similar to this was pending, he opened his remarks with this declaration. I quote it as applicable to this case:

"Mr. BAYARD. If I did not consider the principle involved in the decision to be made by the Senate in regard to the right of the gentleman from Iowa to a seat in this body, as the gravest and most important, in reference to the organization of the Senate, that has ever come before us, I should not trouble the body with a single remark."

He regarded a similar question as one of the gravest and most important that could come before this body; and now, as chairman of the Judiciary Committee, I know the Senate would feel an interest in having his views upon this case. I regret not to see him in his seat to-day, and presenting them to the Senate.

I have another regret in regard to this matter; which is, that so important a question as this is to be argued before so thin a Senate. Our arguments on this question are not, as is sometimes said of discussions on other subjects, for Buncombe; they are for ourselves; and here, upon this important question which you and I, sir, are to decide as judges, and every individual member is to decide as a judge, how few do we see in the Senate to listen to the case and examine its facts. I could wish that Senators would examine it. What the Senator from Delaware said in the Iowa case is eminently true: this is a case which goes to the organization of this body; and though you may refuse to declare the principle upon which you decide it in a clear and a tangible form, yet the fact that you have decided it, and the fact that the persons hold seats, or are refused seats, under the circumstances, will be an important one to the country. Although I have paid particular attention to this case from the fact that the papers were originally intrusted to me by the Senate of Indiana, I am almost discouraged from attempting to argue it, when I see how little possible effect any examination of the facts or any views I may present, can have on the Senate when so many of its members are absent; yet, sir, I feel that I have a duty to discharge in connection with it. I wish to say here that I have no other feeling about it than to decide it rightly. I am glad that we are coming to a decision of the case upon its merits, not to cavil about disputed points; and I trust we may decide it upon principle. If the gentlemen holding seats are entitled to them, I shall cheerfully so vote. If not, if the best consideration I have been able to give their case from the time it was first presented, satisfies me that they are not entitled to their seats, of course they cannot expect, and I cannot give, a vote in their favor.

Now, sir, what are the facts? We must have a clear idea of the facts of a case before we can properly decide it. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] has gone over them. He has not misstated any material fact that I am aware of, but at the same time has stated many facts which, I think, are calculated rather to confuse than give a clear idea of the case. For instance, the Senator, in his statement of facts, occupied a good deal of time to show that there was a great disorder on the day the Senate of Indiana first met, before it was organized. Sir, have we anything to do with that? It was at one time sought to be made an important question by an assumption that the Senate consisted of only forty-seven members. That was the chief ground on which one of the claimants originally placed his right to a seat, in a written statement filed for the purpose of taking testimony in regard to the organization of the Senate and the joint meeting by which he was elected, wherein he alleged that "he was elected whilst in such joint convention by a majority of the legally qualified members of the Senate of the State, and of the legally qualified members of the House of Representatives respectively." He made that statement, and it was on that statement that testimony was sought to be obtained.

Well, sir, the testimony has been taken, and it has swept away the points then made. It matters not what was done in the organization of the Senate of Indiana on the morning of the day when it met. If there were disorder, confusion, and irregularity, they were all cured by the regular organization which was subsequently effected. Can the irregularity on the morning that the Senate met, the 8th of January, 1857, have, by possibility, anything to do with the legality of the election which occurred on the 4th of February following, if, in the mean time, the Senate was regularly organized? If not, why dwell upon such facts? To bring the facts distinctly before the Senate as to what did occur in the organization of the State Senate on the day it first met, I will read from the testimony of Governor Willard. In answer to this question:

"State what Senators held over, and what persons were sworn into office on that day as Senators, and by whom." Governor Willard said:

"The Senators who held over were: Samuel L. Rugg, W. C. Tarkington, Le Roy Woods, Richard D. Slater, A. R. McCleary, John Mathes, A. J. Hostetter, William Mansfield, W. B. Richardson, C. K. Drew, George W. Brown, James F. Sutt, David Crane, G. W. Chapman, John R. Gravens, J. T. Freeland, David R. Beers, Algernon S. Griggs, John Weston, P. S. Sage, S. T. Ensey, D. H. Crouse, Lewis Burk, James F. Parker, and J. J. Alexander, who was not present on that day—in all twenty-five. The Senators who were sworn in on that day were: James E. Wilson, Archibald Johnson, David Saunders Gooding, Lewis Wallace, David McClure, Robert W. Fisk, Hugh Miller, John Slater, Horace Heffner, William E. McLean, John Hargrove—all these were sworn in by me as presiding officer of the Senate. Charles D. Murray, Walter March, Alanson W. Kendry, John F. Stevens, Isaac Kinley, John Green, Morgan H. Weir, Solomon Blair, Daniel Hill, John Yarrow, John S. Bobbs, Isaac A. Rice, Stanley Cooper, and John Thompson, were sworn in by Samuel B. Cookins, a judge of the supreme court, under the direction of Lewis Burk, in the forenoon of that day."

"In the afternoon of the same day all the last-named Senators, who had sworn under the order of Senator Burk, with the exception of Mr. Stanley Cooper, were, under my order, sworn in by Judge Cookins, as Senators. Afterwards, under the order of the Senate, I administered the oath to Stanley Cooper; making in all, including the Senators holding over, fifty."

In answer to another question, he said:

"I was at the time Lieutenant Governor of the State, and, as such, presiding officer of the Senate, and was present all the time on that day when any business was done."

Again:

"All the men above named acted as Senators during that session, as far as I am informed, at least I never heard of the death of any of them; no resignation of any of them was filed with me, and no expulsion of any of them was certified to me."

This evidence makes out forty-nine Senators. The Senator who was absent, and was one of the Senators holding over, Mr. Alexander, as appears by the journal which I have here, appeared a day or two afterwards in his seat.

Now, sir, we have got so far in the investigation, that the Senate of Indiana was regularly organized on the afternoon of the day when it convened, the 8th of January, 1857. There is no doubt of that. It consisted of fifty Senators. The Senator from Arkansas, [Mr. SEBASTIAN,]—and, lest I should forget it, I will mention it right here, as it is in this connection—says, that three persons were not qualified as Senators. How is that? The constitution of the State of Indiana declares that—

"Each House shall judge the election, qualifications, and returns of its own members."

Each House decides it. That is the constitution. I shall not inquire whether all the Senators had certificates of election or not; it is wholly immaterial. Surely no Senator of the United States will undertake to revise the decisions of the Senate of Indiana as to the qualification of its own members. Why, sir, during the short period that I have held a seat in this body, I have seen Senators sworn in without the presentation of any credentials, the Senate being satisfied of their election, notwithstanding the omission to file a certificate of the fact. Does that invalidate the title of the Senator to a seat? But, sir, each of the three Indiana Senators whose seats were contested were, at a subsequent period of the Legislature, declared, by majorities of six or eight, to be entitled to their seats, and were confirmed in them, after investigation, by distinct and separate votes in each case. It was not before the election of United States Senators that that decision was made; but I suppose that is a matter of no sort of importance. They were regularly qualified on the afternoon of the first day of the session. I take it it is so manifest to every candid and impartial mind that any irregularity in the morning of the day when the Senate met could not affect the legality of the organization of the Senate regularly in the afternoon of the same day, that I will be pardoned for not dwelling on that point further. The three State Senators whose seats were contested were admitted like the Senators from Indiana in this body, who have been acting with us for more than a year. Does anybody contend that their action as Senators has been illegal here, even if the Senate should now decide, on an examination of the case, that they were not entitled to their seats? Such is not the law, and will not be contended for by any one. They are Senators in fact, and their acts are binding, whatever may be our decision to-day when we come to take a vote on their ultimate right to retain seats in this body.

Then the Senate of Indiana consisted of fifty members, and the House of Representatives, as all admit, consisted of one hundred. The sitting Senators were elected in this wise. By the constitution of Indiana, it is declared that:

"In voting for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, the electors shall designate for whom they vote as Governor, and for whom as Lieutenant Governor. The returns of every election for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be sealed up and transmitted to the seat of government, directed to the Speaker of the House of Representatives, who shall open and publish them in the presence of both Houses of the General Assembly."

The presence of the two Houses to witness the opening of the votes for Governor, &c., is called by the Senator from Ohio a joint convention. The constitution does not so term it. It merely declares the duty of the presiding officer, which is to open and publish the votes in the presence of the members of both Houses. The next section provides that:

"The persons respectively having the highest number of votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall be elected; but in case two or more persons shall have an equal, and the highest, number of votes for either office, the General Assembly shall, by joint vote, forthwith proceed to elect one of the said persons Governor or Lieutenant Governor, as the case may be."

In this particular case the contingency did not arise. The canvass of votes showed that Mr. Willard was elected Governor, and Mr. Hammond Lieutenant Governor, and they were so declared. There was an end of the meeting. It was functus officio. It had discharged its duty. It could be adjourned for no other purpose under heaven, either by its presiding officer, or by a majority of its members. The "summons," as it was termed by the Senator from Ohio, under which a portion of the Senate went to the House of Representatives, was an invitation on the part of the Speaker, or a notice to the President of the Senate, that at such a time he would open these votes, and inviting the Senate, with their presiding officer, to be present—not to do any business—not to adjourn the convention—not to do anything under heaven but to see him open these votes. Suppose all the Senate went there: when the votes were opened, and some one individual had a majority for each place, the duties for which they had assembled were ended.

Now, sir, this meeting on the 12th of January had nothing to do with the election of Senators, and I trust that the few Senators who give me their attention will remember the date when it took place, the 12th of January, while the election of Senators took place on the 4th of February following. The two meetings had no connection with each other, and it is not very material how many Senators followed the Lieutenant Governor to witness the opening of the votes for Governor. In point of fact the number of Senators who went into the House of Representatives at that time was twenty-six. Three of these, however, went in as mere spectators, taking no part in the proceedings, as they have testified on oath. Their being there as spectators did not by any means commit them to the action of that body, and as a clear exposition of this point of the case, acquiesced in at the time by the Senator from Georgia and others, I refer to the debate in Mr. HARRIS's case, from Iowa. The Senator from Vermont, [Mr. Foor,] interrupting the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. Toombs,] said:

"The Senator from Georgia has seemed to assume a fact that does not exist, against himself and against his argument. In point of fact, the record of the proceedings does show the presence of a majority of the Senate in that joint convention. Fifteen Senators actually voted. It required sixteen to constitute a majority; and Mr. Ramsey and Mr. Thurston, of the other party, were present, but requested not to be considered members of the joint convention; so that there was present an absolute majority of the Senate."

"Mr. Toombs. I saw that they were present, but not assenting to these proceedings; and therefore I did not make any point on their mere corporeal presence."

"Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Georgia should recollect they were called in by the sergeant-at-arms."

"Mr. Toombs. I make no point on that."

In the Iowa case, a majority of the House and a majority of the Senate were actually present when the election took place, but two of the Senators desired to be considered as taking no part in the proceedings, and were so regarded in this body. Three of the Senators in Indiana went in as spectators, and had nothing to do with the proceedings at the time the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor were counted on the 12th of January. So, sir, I suppose it was not a matter of any importance how many members of the Senate may have been actually present when the votes for Governor were opened by the Speaker of the House, who took no part in the proceedings. This meeting, after the Speaker had published the vote for Governor and Lieutenant Governor, was by a Senator declared adjourned to a subsequent day—not the day when the election took place, but to the 2d of February, without stating for what purpose. It was not declared adjourned by the Lieutenant Governor, but by some Senator called to the chair.

Mr. PUGH. Does the Senator from Illinois mean to say that that Senator was not the presiding officer?

Mr. TRUMBULL. I mean to say that he was only presiding officer by being called at that moment to the chair.

Mr. PUGH. When Governor Willard rose to take the oath of office, Mr. Gerry, at that time presiding officer, gave the chair, as is very common, to one of the Senators, and that Senator filled the chair at the adjournment by the appointment of Governor Willard, who was, at the time he made the appointment, Lieutenant Governor and presiding officer of the Senate.

Mr. TRUMBULL. A Senator was called to the chair, as the Senator from Ohio remarks, probably correctly, by Governor Willard. I do not recollect whether the journal shows that or not; it is not material. A Senator was called to the chair, and he declared the meeting adjourned to some subsequent day, without stating any purpose for which it was adjourned. When that subsequent day arrived, a portion of the Senate, with the new Lieutenant Governor, again repaired to the hall of the House, and there again this meeting was declared adjourned to the 4th of February. Before the 4th of February arrived the Senate of Indiana took action upon this subject, and not, as the Senator from Arkansas seems to suppose, in an irregular way. On the 29th day of January, before either of these adjourned meetings of the members of both branches took place, in what was called a joint convention, a preamble and resolution were offered in the Senate of Indiana in regular session. That preamble, after setting out the irregularities under which a portion of the Senators had repaired to the House of Representatives on the 12th of January, and after reciting that it was reported there was an adjourned meeting to be held, declared:

"That this Senate does disclaim any knowledge of, or participation in, any meeting or so styled joint convention for the above or any other purpose; and if, at any adjourned meeting of said body, it is proposed to have any election for United States Senators, or other officers, or to transact any other business which it might be competent for, or the duty of, this General Assembly to elect or perform, this Senate does hereby most solemnly and earnestly protest against any such action as wholly unauthorized by this House, without its knowledge, consent, or concurrence, and that we will here, as elsewhere, now and forever, repudiate and disown such act or action as flagrantly illegal, and a fraud upon the sovereignty of the people and the State of Indiana."

"Mr. Tarkington moved to refer the preamble and resolution to the Committee on the Judiciary."

"Ayes 20, noes 27."

"The question recurred upon the adoption of the preamble and resolutions."

"Those who voted in the affirmative were—Messrs. Beards, Blair, Bobbs, Burk, Chapman, Cooper, Crane, Cravens, Crouse, Ensey, Freeland, Green, Griggs, Hendry, Hill, Kinley, March, Murray, Parker, Rice, Sage, Stevens, Sull, Thompson, Weir, Weston, and Varyan—27."

"Those who voted in the negative were—Messrs. Drew, Fisk, Hargrove, Heffren, Hostetler, Johnson, Mansfield, Mathes, Miller, McCleary, McClure, McLean, Richardson, Rugg, Slater of Dearborn, Slater of Johnston, Tarkington, Wallace, Wilson, and Woods—20."

So the resolution and preamble were adopted in a Senate of forty-seven members, at a regular meeting of the Senate, on the 29th day of January.

Mr. PUGH. I want to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that neither that preamble and resolution, nor any others, were ever notified to the House.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I do not know that they were ever notified to the House, nor do I suppose it was at all material that they should be notified to the House. I take it the House could not get the Senate into a joint convention without the Senate's knowledge and consent, and if the meeting assembled to count the votes for Governor was by a Senator declared adjourned to a subsequent day, here was the action of the Senate in advance of that day, and nearly a week before the election of Senators took place, repudiating and disowning whatever might be done at such adjourned meetings. At a subsequent day, on the 4th of February, another of these adjourned meetings took place; and who were present at the time? Twenty-four Senators and sixty-two Representatives, a majority of the House and a minority of the Senate. Of those twenty-four Senators one voted blank—that is on the election of Mr. Fitch; on the election of Mr. Bright but twenty-three Senators voted; the other Senator refused to vote at all; so that even if the Senate consisted of only forty-seven members, twenty-three would not be a majority, and the one refusing to vote, on the principle decided in the Iowa case, could not be considered as present for any purpose. These elections, then, were made by a minority of the Senate and a majority of the House, but less than a quorum of either. However, I shall not dwell upon that point, because it is not necessary in this case. The constitution of Indiana requires two thirds of each branch to be present to constitute a quorum to do business. It is immaterial here, because a majority of one branch was not present at the time these supposed elections took place.

Now, sir, we have before us all the facts about this election. I have said but little about the organization of the Senate of Indiana at the beginning of the session, because it has nothing to do with the case. I have shown how and by whom the sitting Senators were elected. But the Senator from Louisiana makes this point: that the House journal containing the proceedings of the so-called joint convention, is conclusive to show that the Senate of Indiana attended and participated in the election. I do not suppose that I shall be able to say anything that will enlighten the Senator from Louisiana on this subject, but my reply to that point is, that one House cannot bind the other by incorporating in its journal what purports to be the action of both in a joint convention. The constitution of Indiana requires each House to keep a journal of its own proceedings. The House can keep a journal of its own proceedings, and show that its members went into a joint meeting to elect a Senator, but the House cannot make up its journal of what the Senate did, and bind the Senate by the record. You must look to the journal of each House for the record of its own proceedings. There is no such thing known to the constitution of Indiana as a journal of a joint convention.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, I only meant by that what is known to every Senator as the universal rule—at least it is so in my State, and I never heard of it being otherwise elsewhere—that is, that where a joint convention is called in the hall of one of the bodies, the record is kept in the body where the convention meets. In Louisiana, when we have an election of Senator, both bodies meet in the hall of the House, and the record of the convention in the hall of the House is not made by the Secretary of the Senate, but by the Clerk of the House. It is part of the House record kept by the Clerk of the House. I think it is put in the House record, with us, invariably.

Mr. TRUMBULL. That is not the practice in my own State. Each House keeps a journal of its proceedings, when they meet together to make these joint elections, and if my recollection serves me—the Senator from Ohio will, probably, recollect and correct me, if in error—each of the thirty-two States, by its constitution, requires each House of its Legislature to keep a journal of its proceedings.

Mr. PUGH. And to provide a Secretary for the convention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. For a joint convention; and not to keep the journal of each House. I do not so understand.

Mr. PUGH. But if the Senator will permit me I presume the point the Senator from Louisiana had in his mind is that there was no other record at all. The Senate journal is simply a blank.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I will turn to the act of Indiana, of 1831, and see what the former practice was in that State in making up the record of a joint convention.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It will be found on pages 18 and 19.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In the second section of that act I find the following:

"And when voting, it shall be the duty of the Secretary of the Senate, and Clerk of the House of Representatives to attend and take down the name of each person voting; also, a tally of the votes received by each person voted for as the tellers read the tickets; which tally papers they shall compare after the votes are counted out, and if they agree, they shall jointly sign each of them, and hand them to the President of the Senate, who, together with the Speaker of the House of Representatives, shall examine them; and if any one person is elected, he shall, by the President of the Senate, be proclaimed duly elected to serve as a Senator of this State in the Senate of the United States."

Mr. BENJAMIN. That was done.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Oh, no; the Secretary of the Senate was not present.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Yes, he was.

Mr. TRUMBULL. This election did not take place under this law at all. It is admitted, on all hands, that the law of 1831 was repealed before this election took place. I merely referred to it as an illustration of the point I was making in reply to the Senator from Louisiana, that the journal of the House could be no evidence of the proceedings of the Senate.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator will permit me to interrupt him a moment. The first convention counted the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor. Where is the record of that? That is in the House journal, not in the Senate journal at all.

Mr. TRUMBULL. We disagree as to that being a convention, or that anything could be done by it. The Speaker simply opens the vote, and publishes it in the presence of the two Houses. They take no action except in the contingency of a tie vote, and then they proceed immediately to elect between the persons having the same number of votes. The opening and publishing the votes for Governor is simply a ministerial act on the part of the Speaker of the House of Representatives, which is required by the constitution of Indiana to be performed in the presence of the two Houses. The Senate journal contains no record, as the Senator from Ohio truly remarks, of the proceedings of any election of Senator, and that very fact is conclusive; it is the end of this case. The very fact that the Senate journal of Indiana which, by the constitution, the Senate was required to keep, does not show any election of Senators, is conclusive that no election has been made, unless you assume that an election can be made without the Senate, and that is the point to which I am coming. So in regard to the journal of the joint convention, to which the Senator from Louisiana appeals, as stating upon its face that the Senate, preceded by their presiding officer, appeared, cannot commit the Senate. Surely he will not contend that it would be competent for a House of Representatives, in any State, itself to elect a United States Senator, and by entering on its journal that the Senate participated in such election, bind that body by the record; when, in fact, the Senate was not present, and took no part in the election.

Mr. BENJAMIN. If the Senator will permit me, I will state to him my proposition. I consider that that first meeting of the two Houses in the hall of the House of Representatives for the purpose of counting the votes was a joint convention, and considering it a joint convention, I considered the record properly kept by the clerk of the House, where the joint convention was held. The Senator says that first meeting was not a joint convention. The statute of the State of Indiana, which my friend from Ohio read, expressly states that the two Houses shall meet in joint convention and induct the Governor into office; and that is what is done. The statute of the State calls it a joint convention, and I therefore termed it so.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I have before me the statute touching official oaths, which I understood the Senator from Ohio to refer to. That merely declares that—

"The members of the General Assembly shall take such oath before taking their seats, and the Governor and Lieutenant Governor shall take such oath, in presence of both Houses of the General Assembly in convention, and the same shall be entered on the journals thereof."

That is the statute which I understand the Senator from Ohio to allude to, and it will be seen that the oath is required to be entered on the journal of each House.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The two Houses of the General Assembly in convention.

Mr. TRUMBULL. In one sense it is a convention. The two Houses convene together to see the oath administered. That no more makes them a joint convention for the transaction of business than does the requirement of the constitution, which declares that the Speaker shall open the votes in the presence of both branches.

Then, I take it, there being no record in the Senate journal of any joint convention, or of any meeting in which the Senate of Indiana has participated for the election of a United States Senator, no Senators have been elected by the concurrence of the Senate. Not only is this proven negatively by an examination of the Senate journal, but we have the affirmative action of the Senate disavowing any intention to go into an election. Then this case comes simply to this, and here is all there is of it: is an election of United States Senators valid, as has been contended by some, and in one part of his argument was insisted upon by the Senator from Ohio, when made by a majority of individuals composing the Legislature of a State, meeting together, as he says, after due notice of the time and place of meeting, and when such meeting for that purpose is not in pursuance of any law of the State, or agreement of the two branches of its Legislature, or either of them acting in its organized capacity, but in defiance of the action of one branch, and not participated in by a quorum of either House, or a majority of one House? If it is, then this election is valid, and the Senators from Indiana are justly entitled to their seats. But, sir, I cannot bring my mind to such a conclusion; and, now, why? The Constitution of the United States declares:

"The Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, chosen by the Legislature thereof."

The fourth section of the same article declares:

"The times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof; but the Congress may, at any time, by law, make or alter such regulations, except as to the places of choosing Senators."

Congress has not acted on the subject, and therefore in this case the election, under the Constitution of the United States, is to be by the Legislature of the State of Indiana in the time, place, and manner prescribed by the Legislature. Has such an election been held? The constitution of Indiana declares what shall be the Legislature of that State:

"The legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a General Assembly, which shall consist of a Senate and House of Representatives."

By another provision the number of Senators is limited to fifty, and the number of Representatives to one hundred. That was the number composing the Legislature of Indiana in 1857, when this election took place. By another clause it requires two thirds of each House to constitute a quorum to do business.

Now, sir, having ascertained what the Constitution of the United States requires, and what a Legislature in Indiana is by its constitution, we have only to inquire whether that Legislature has made an election. If so, it must be in some way by the consent of what constitutes the Legislature; and what is that? The Senate and the House. The Constitution does not read that the members of the Legislature may elect a Senator, but the Senator is to be chosen in the time, place, and manner prescribed by the Legislature. The Legislature of Indiana, it is admitted, has prescribed no time, no place, no manner of electing a Senator. All agree to that. Then, sir, how did this election take place? By the individual members getting together; but that is not a Legislature. They must get together in their organized form to constitute a Legislature, and prescribe the manner; they may do it by joint resolution; they may do it in any way by manifesting their assent to the election, and go into an election and elect as individuals per capita. We all admit that; but there must be some action of the Legislature in each branch to bring about this meeting. That is what we insist upon. That is what we insisted upon in the case of the Senator from Iowa. There is nothing of the kind here. The House of Representatives might just as well have made this election of itself. It was not necessary that there should be a single Senator present. The whole Legislature, Senators and Representatives, consisted of one hundred and fifty members. Seventy-six members of the House of Representatives could have made the election, if this election is valid. Would that be an election by the Legislature of Indiana? Surely not. We do not contend, or at least I do not contend, that it must be a legislative act to elect a Senator; but it must be a legislative act in the form of legislation to initiate the proceeding to elect a Senator; and such had been the practice in Indiana. I have the journals of Indiana here to show what has been the practice for many years in that State, but it will take too long to refer to them; and as a concise statement of what the practice in Indiana has been from the beginning, I will read to the Senate from the deposition of Mr. Smith, who at one time served in this body as a Senator from that State. He says:

"I have been acquainted with the custom of electing United States Senators in Indiana since the first election of William Hendricks, in 1825; the custom has been, I call the elections of Senators since that election, inclusive, up to 1857, to elect by joint vote of the Senate and House of Representatives, met in joint convention in pursuance of a joint resolution, or a resolution of one body, sitting as such, with a concurrence of the other body, sitting as such. Such, I understand, has been the custom from the organization of the State government and the first senatorial election, up to the year 1857, without an exception. The act of 1831 expressly provides 'that, when the term of any Senator in Congress is about to expire, it shall be the duty of the General Assembly, at their session last preceding the term of service of such Senator, to elect by joint ballot of both Houses, on such day and at such place as they may agree upon, a suitable person to serve as a Senator from this State to the Congress of the United States for the next succeeding six years.'"

That is the act referred to by the Senator from Ohio. Further on, in answer to this question:

"State your means of knowing the custom of the Legislature aforesaid," he said:

"I was a member of the Legislature of the State in the year 1822-23; have been something of a politician in my day; was present at every senatorial election from 1825 till 1837, and every senatorial election from that time to 1857, except the election of Mr. Hannegan over myself and General Howard, in 1843, when I was at Washington city. I have been a candidate for United States Senator three times; once elected and twice defeated—once by General Tipton and once by Mr. Hannegan; during all which time I never knew or heard of any other custom or usage of electing a United States Senator but by a joint vote of the two bodies, the Senate and House of Representatives, met in joint convention, in pursuance of a concurring resolution, passed separately, fixing the time and place. I am satisfied that this has been the usage, custom, and understanding of all parties, and has been conformed to, without objection or deviation, up to 1857. I state this the more confidently from the fact that on one or more occasions, when one of the political parties has had a majority in one House and the opposite party would have a majority on joint ballot, the House having the majority would refuse to pass the resolution of the other House to go into the election, and thereby postpone the election to the next Legislature; as was the case when Lieutenant Governor Jesse D. Bright repeatedly gave the casting vote, laying a resolution to go into the election on the table, when the opposite party had the majority on joint ballot."

In answer to this question:

"State whether you have known of an election of Senators of the United States, in Indiana, without the concurrence of both Houses of the Legislature in advance, by resolution, to go into the election?"

he said:

"I have never known or heard of such an election, or an attempt to elect, in such a manner, except in the case of Messrs. Bright and Fitch, in 1857."

He is then inquired of in regard to the postponement of elections, and he answered:

"At the time I referred to, the Senate of the State was, politically, equally divided. The House of Representatives was largely anti-Democratic, giving a large majority on joint ballot against the Democratic party. The House passed resolutions fixing the time of the election, by joint ballot, of a United States Senator. The Senate was a tie, and Mr. Bright, the Lieutenant Governor and President of the Senate, repeatedly voted to lay the resolutions on the table, declaring, as I understood him, without any concealment, that there should be no United States Senator elected at that session; the result was, that the election was postponed until the next session of the Legislature, when it took place, by joint vote of the two Houses, met in convention, jointly, in pursuance of a concurring resolution of both Houses, and Mr. Bright was elected United States Senator at that election."

I will state the further fact, that the very vacancy which one of the sitting Senators from Indiana now claims the right to fill was occasioned by the refusal of his political friends in the Legislature, in 1855, to go into an election. At that time the so-called Democratic party were in a minority of the whole Legislature, but had control of one of its branches; that branch refused to meet the other for the purpose of electing a United States Senator, and left the State for two years with but one Representative in this body. In 1857 the tables were turned, and the so-called Democratic members, constituting a majority of the whole Legislature, but a minority in one of its branches, proceeded, against the protest of that branch, to make an election. The Senator from Louisiana and the Senator from Ohio are loud in their denunciation of faction, are loud in denunciation of those who will not perform the constitutional duty to go into the election of United States Senators. I call their attention to the fact that one of these very individuals holds his election in consequence of the refusal of their own friends to go into an election in 1855.

Mr. PUGH. What has that got to do with this question? When the case of the Senator from Iowa was up, I used the very same language precisely that I used to-day, and the Globe will show it; and from the position I took in that debate, if any election involving that matter should again come here, the Senator knew beforehand, from what I said in the Iowa case, precisely what I would say. I say there is no justification for any of them.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It has nothing under heaven to do with the case, and I am glad to have the assent of the Senator from Ohio in saying so.

Mr. PUGH. I say that the proceedings of a former Legislature have nothing to do with this case. I do not know what they were, because they do not appear in evidence.

Mr. TRUMBULL. They show how the political friends of the sitting Senators understood the law in 1855, and have just as much to do with the decision of this case as similar factious proceedings by their political opponents in 1857. I do not think that this denunciation of factious opposition, whether in 1855 or 1857, has anything to do with the decision of a judicial question, such as we have under consideration. I only refer to what took place in 1855, in reply to what has been said by others about factious in 1857. I admit it has nothing to do with the case. I care not whether—

Mr. PUGH. Do not admit me while you admit yourself. I say the proceedings of a former Legislature had nothing to do with it. This being so, while you may admit anything for yourself, do not admit me. I say that those proceedings have nothing to do with it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I say they have nothing to do with it under heaven; nor have the motives which governed the Senate of Indiana, in 1857, anything to do with the decision of this case; neither has the Senator from Ohio any right, nor have I, to judge of the motives of either the Senators of 1855 or those of 1857, in refusing to go into an election. That is for them. I do not presume to condemn either the presiding officer of the Senate in Indiana, who repeatedly, by his casting vote, prevented the election of United States Senator, nor do I presume to condemn the present or a former Senate of Indiana, which refused to go into an election. It cannot change the legal right of these gentlemen to retain their seats one way or the other. I have nothing to do with it. I only show what had been repeatedly done in Indiana, and that this very election was brought about by the political friends of the sitting Senators, in contempt and defiance of the example which they themselves had set at a previous session of the Legislature of Indiana; and that they are entitled to a full share of that denunciation which is so freely poured out in this debate on the heads of legislators who have refused, at the proper time, to go into an election of United States Senator.

This was not, as has been supposed, the first election of a United States Senator under the new constitution of Indiana. The present constitution was adopted in 1851. Two years afterward, in 1853, an election took place under it, and Mr. Pettit was elected. How was that election brought about? By joint resolution adopted in each House, agreeing to go into an election. What was the course adopted in 1855? Resolution after resolution for a joint convention to elect a Senator was sent from one House to the other, where it was voted down, and no election took place at that session. In 1857, however, one branch of the Legislature proceeds to make an election. Is that the Legislature? We are told this was not done in defiance of any law; and we are called upon to show the law that is violated. There was no law in Indiana, in 1857, on the subject of electing United States Senators, and therefore we are told that this election took place in the absence of any law, and is good. Sir, the election of the sitting Senators was in violation of law. The highest and paramount law of the country declares that members of this body shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the respective States. The gentlemen whose seats are in controversy were not elected by the Legislature of Indiana, but by one of its branches. The supreme law, the Constitution of the United States, declares that the time, the place, and the manner of election shall be prescribed by the Legislature. This election was not prescribed by the Legislature. Then it is an election without law; it is contrary to all law and all precedent, and is establishing a principle which enables a minority to control a majority, and gives effect to the revolutionary action of a minority of the Senate of Indiana, against the declared intention and action of a constitutional majority.

But, sir, this is no new case. The case of the Senator from Iowa [Mr. HARLAN] involved principles analogous in some respects to this; and as I think the arguments made upon that case, when applied to this, are unanswerable, I wish to call the attention of the Senate, for a few moments, to some of them. Mr. HARLAN was elected in pursuance of a regulation of the Legislature of Iowa. That Legislature, in both its branches, agreed to go into an election on a certain day, in joint convention. Both branches met at the time agreed upon, several unsuccessful votes were had, and the convention was regularly adjourned from time to time in accordance with law. At the adjourned meeting, when Mr. HARLAN was elected, he received the votes of more than fifty of the one hundred members composing the Legislature of Iowa; but there was not voting upon that occasion a majority of the Senate. A majority of the Senate were present—thirty Senators constituted the body, and seventeen were in the room; fifteen voted for Mr. HARLAN. A majority were there, but two refused to act, and this body decided that it being necessary that a Senator should be elected by the Legislature, an election by a body when a majority of each branch of the Legislature was not present was invalid, and the Senator was denied his seat.

Now, I want to call the attention of the Senate and Senators on the other side who are here, to some remarks made upon that occasion. Mr. Butler, who was chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary at that time, stated in his remarks:

"According to the ground taken on the other side, not only if there had been less than a quorum, but if there had not been a single Senator there, the House of Representatives, by the original organization of this convention, could have gone on and exercised all the authority of a Legislature to make an election under this act.

"I cannot agree to this position, for two reasons: in the first place, although it was a joint convention, the import of the act was that it must be a convention of the Senate and House of Representatives; and if it was not a convention of the Senate and House of Representatives, it was not the Legislature, but it was a mere fusion of such members of the Senate as would attend (in contradistinction to the Senate itself) in the House of Representatives, and carry on this election. They were not the Senate, nor were they there as Senators in colore officii."

That was the language of the chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary at that time. But, sir, as a conclusive argument upon this point, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the remarks of the then Senator from Connecticut, (Mr. Toucey,) who was also a member of the Judiciary Committee at that time, which, I think, placed this case in so clear a light that if Senators will examine them, it will be impossible to arrive at but one conclusion in regard to the decision they are now called upon to make. Mr. Toucey said:

"Mr. President, the question involved in this discussion is simply this—none other, neither less nor more: was the Senate of Iowa present in the hall of the House of Representatives when this alleged election took place? After the construction to which allusion has been made was early put upon the constitution, that is the only question which can arise if we acquiesce in that construction."

Omitting a portion of his argument, I proceed to another part of what he said on that occasion:

"Now, sir, has the Legislature of Iowa the power, directly or indirectly, to dispense with the attendance of either branch? Can the Legislature of Iowa alter the Constitution of the United States or the constitution of Iowa? The whole question must be determined by an examination of these two instruments, and then by ascertaining the fact whether the Senate of Iowa was present and participating in the alleged election.

"The question here is, whether you can dispense with the action of the Senate? and in every other case, whether you can dispense with the action of either body?

"The honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS] has put a construction on the Constitution which would relieve us from any difficulty in this case; for he says that the Constitution of the United States means that the election shall be by the members of the Legislatures of the States. If that were the Constitution, there would be no difficulty in this instance. His is the only position which has been taken that solves the difficulty. But is that a construction of the Constitution, or is it an alteration of the Constitution of the United States? If the Constitution of the United States is to be so construed, then it is to be so read—that Senators shall be chosen by the members of the Legislatures of the respective States. If that were the construction, I agree it would not be necessary that the Legislature should be in session; but a majority of the members, all being notified, might meet together, at any time and in any place, and the vote of the majority of those present, a quorum being assembled, could elect. There would be no Senate and no House of Representatives there; but the members of the Legislature would be there. There would be no legislative body; but the members of the Legislature would be there, and a majority could elect. If that be the true construction of the Constitution, there is no difficulty in the case; but that would be a total alteration of the present arrangement. The answer I have given to that position, I think, is entirely conclusive.

"Then, could the Legislature of Iowa, by any law, dispense with the attendance of either body? Suppose the law had been, for example, that on the 1st of January both branches shall meet in the hall of the House at one o'clock, and shall choose a Senator; but the House of Representatives determined, on a previous day, that they would not meet there, and accordingly they did not meet; but the Senate met, together with a minority of the members of the House: it is obvious there would be no power in the persons thus assembled to elect."

In speaking of the adjournment of the Iowa convention, Mr. Toucey said:

"The effect in this case of the order of adjournment made by both branches, as a joint convention, no matter who voted for that adjournment, was to fix a time and place for another joint meeting—nothing more. Had that vote any greater effect than a law fixing that time for another joint meeting would have had? Certainly not; and neither the joint body nor the Legislature itself can make it apparent that the Senate was there if the Senate was not there."

I commend this to the Senator from Louisiana, who insists that we must look to the House journal to find when the Senate was there. Mr. Toucey said:

"Neither the joint body nor the Legislature of the State can dispense with the necessity of both branches being present, because otherwise the Legislature is not there."

In reply to a question from the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] Mr. Toucey said:

"The Senate is incapable of acting in the capacity of individual members; it must act as a body. It is a distinct branch of the Legislature; it is a political existence, and that political existence must be in conjunction with the other political existence, the House of Representatives, before they can produce the result required by the Constitution. Otherwise, you resolve the Constitution into the interpretation of the honorable Senator from Georgia, and say the election is to be by the persons who constitute the Legislature, and not by the Legislature itself. There is no mid-way. I deny that it would be competent for the members of the two branches to come together as individuals, and make a choice of a person to serve as Senator. It would be contrary to the nature of a legislative act, and it would be contrary to the very law under which they were professing to act, because that law required that the Senate should be there in pursuance of its own action; that its teller should be there; that its Secretary should be there, for the purpose of keeping a record; that that record should be entered on the journal of the Senate, and whatever they may have done, can only be proved by the record. They can act in no other way. I say, then, sir, that unless you dispense with the Constitution of the United States, and the constitution of Iowa, and every principle which is applicable to legislative bodies, it cannot be said that the Legislature of Iowa was present in joint convention, on the 6th of January, 1855, when this election was purported to be made."

The Senator from Pennsylvania, [Mr. BIGLER,] whom I do not now see in his seat, on that occasion put a question to the Senator from Georgia in this language:

"Now another point, if the Senator pleases. If I understand him correctly, he argues that the convention having been regularly constituted originally, the Senate having convened with the House, and constituted a convention, a majority of the convention so constituted could continue its proceedings from day to day, although the Senate might meet in its organized capacity.

"Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly I do.

"Mr. BIGLER. The Senator's position is, that the House of Representatives being a majority of the members of the convention, could control the coordinate branch of the Legislature to any extent, and for any length of time; and that although the Senate, which makes part of the Legislature, might have convened and remained in session, and proceeded with business, the House of Representatives could go on and elect a United States Senator. I understand the Senator to contend for this.

"Mr. TOOMBS. Certainly I do.

"Mr. BIGLER. There we differ."

Why, sir, that is this case. There is the answer of the Senator from Pennsylvania to much of the argument of the Senator from Ohio to-day. Mr. BAYARD asked a question in that connection:

"Mr. BAYARD. Perhaps I had better put my question in a different form. The point involved in it is, in my judgment, the point which this case turns. My inquiry was, whether any Senator ever took his seat in this body where a question was made, and it appeared that, at the time and place of election, a quorum of both branches of the Legislature was not present?

"Mr. BUTLER. There has never been such a case."

This is what Mr. Butler, then chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary, said, that there never had been such a case. Sir, we will establish one if we adopt the resolution of the Judiciary Committee.

The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. BENJAMIN] said upon that occasion:

"When that convention fails to be a convention of the Senate and House of Representatives, it no longer has the legislative power of the State of Iowa, and is, therefore, not such a body as, under the terms of the Constitution of the United States, can elect a Senator. That is the difficulty."

The Senator from Florida, [Mr. MALLORY,] not now in his seat, took identically the same ground. The Congressional Globe containing the debate upon that case, is full of argument upon the very point involved in this, and it seemed to me, the case being changed as it is here, that the remarks made upon that occasion are much more applicable to the case of the members from Indiana than they were to the Iowa case, because in the Iowa case, a regular convention had been assembled. We all agreed about that, that there had been a regular convention, and we all agreed that that convention had authority to adjourn from time to time. Now, the most that is contended for here by the Senators from Ohio and Louisiana is, that there was a regular convention to count the votes for Governor, which had authority to adjourn. That is the most they contend for as to the regularity of the convention, and—

Mr. PUGH. I claim that the convention, for all purposes, was exactly such a convention as met in Iowa. I see no difference between the cases in that regard.

Mr. TRUMBULL. It might be just as good as the convention in Iowa, but it could not be better; for we all agreed the convention in Iowa did assemble in pursuance of a joint resolution. There was never any objection made to that. That convention got together in a legitimate way, as all admitted. Now, we deny this in Indiana. The Senator from Ohio assumes it. Grant, for the sake of the argument, that he is right; he certainly has got no better convention than that in Iowa. I do not think he has as good a one, and I therefore think the case is different; but apply the remarks made upon that occasion, and the argument of the Senator from Louisiana to this very case, and what is the answer to it? I will read a portion of his argument, for I think it directly applicable. I will adopt it as my own, as applicable to this case. He says:

"I think we may the more readily get a clear view of the true principles which govern the subject, if we take the provisions of the Constitution of the United States and the provisions of the constitution of the State of Iowa, and read them as if they were all one instrument. They are all to be obeyed and observed. Let us read them in sequence, as if they were but one instrument. Without referring to their precise language, the case is this: the constitution of the State of Iowa has the exclusive power of organizing a Legislature; that Legislature has the power to choose a Senator; that Legislature has the power to determine the time and place and manner in which it shall exercise its choice. Reading the constitution of the State of Iowa, let me see how that Legislature is constituted, and I will interpolate in it, collecting the sentences in different order, those provisions of the Constitution of the United States which have reference to the subject, and which are equally binding.

"The legislative authority of this State shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives, which shall be designated the General Assembly of the State of Iowa. The business of this legislative authority is to pass laws and to elect a United States Senator. A majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business."

"Read these sentences thus collected, and where is the doubt? The Legislature of the State of Iowa has the right to choose a Senator. The legislative authority is vested in a Senate and House of Representatives. Its business shall be (this I interpolate) to pass laws and elect a Senator of the United States, and a majority of each House shall constitute a quorum to do business."

It takes two thirds to make a quorum in Indiana. In that respect the case of the Indiana Senator is not as good as was Mr. HARLAN's.

Mr. BENJAMIN proceeded:

"Now, sir, if it be in part the business of the Legislature of Iowa to elect a Senator to the Congress of the United States, then it cannot elect that Senator under the terms of the constitution of the State, unless there be present a quorum of the two Houses. In the case at bar, it is admitted on all hands that there was no quorum of the two Houses. This really seems conclusive of the question on its face. How is this argument met? We are referred to a law of the Legislature of Iowa, passed in the year 1847, ordering the Legislature of Iowa that sat in 1854 to proceed, at a certain time and place, in a certain manner, to elect a Senator. The first thing that strikes my mind on this statement of the case is, whence did the Legislature of 1847 derive the power to lay down rules and give laws to the Legislature of 1854? Of what validity is the act of the Legislature of 1847 in controlling the action of the Legislature of 1854? Law is a solemn expression of legislative will. By its very nature, it emanates from a superior, and is addressed to the inferior. It commands; it ordains; or it prohibits. For the purpose of doing any one of these acts, it must emanate from some power superior to that to which it is addressed. What right, then, had the Legislature of 1847 to lay down the law and give orders to the Legislature of 1854? Was it superior? Not so, sir; for the Legislature of 1854 is to this extent its superior, that it had the right to overthrow all that it had done, and to say that just the reverse should be the law to that which the Legislature of 1847 determined should be the law. We might as well say that because the House of Representatives of the United States has power to pass rules for its own government, the House of Representatives now in existence can declare what shall be the rules of that House for all time to come.

"When the Constitution of the United States vested in the State Legislature the right of choosing a Senator, and the right of naming the time and place and manner of holding the election, it created a jurisdiction which had exclusive authority over the whole subject matter; and that jurisdiction is the Legislature, not of to-day, nor of yesterday, nor of to-morrow, but it is the Legislature for the time being which elects the Senator; and it is for that reason that, with the greatest deference for the judgment of the honorable Senator from Illinois, [Mr. DOUGLAS,] I cannot concur with his argument as far as it is based on the disregard of this law by the Legislature of 1854. I look upon that law as nothing more than an agreement, between the two Houses of the Iowa Legislature in 1847, for the establishment of a joint rule, just as the two bodies of this Congress have made joint rules for regulating the manner in which they will discharge the functions in which the action of both is required. But suppose at any one moment either body declines to act in conformity with the joint rules: will legislation passed in open violation of them thereby be the less valid? If the two bodies of the Legislature of Iowa in 1854 had chosen by joint resolution to declare that each House would deposit ballots in a box in each House, and would then order those ballots thus deposited in separate boxes to be counted together, it would have been in direct violation of every provision of the law of 1847; and yet who will stand up and declare that a legislative election in that mode would be invalid?"

The whole argument of the Senator from Louisiana, which I will not weary the Senate with reading, however, although it puts the case in much better language than I can express, is directly applicable to this case. There was not a quorum of either House present when these Senators were elected—not a majority of one House. That is now settled by the evidence. It can no longer be a disputed fact as to how many constituted the Legislature of Indiana. How, then, can this election be sustained except upon the broad ground argued by the Senator from Ohio, and which was assumed by the Senator from Georgia when the Iowa case was under consideration, but which ground, as the then Senator from Connecticut demonstrated, was in direct violation of the Constitution of the United States? The argument of the Senator from Delaware [Mr. BAYARD] on that occasion is also very conclusive. He refers to the opinion of Silas Wright upon the same subject, which he had called for in relation to a case which arose in his own State, and so firmly was he convinced at the time of the correctness of the opinion of Mr. Wright, that an election which was not participated in by a majority of each branch of the Legislature would be invalid, that although it would have operated to his own advantage to have had such an election, he abandoned the idea.

With this reference to the arguments presented on the occasion of the contest in regard to Mr. HARLAN's right to a seat, which fully sustain the views I have presented as applicable to the facts of this case, I take leave of the subject, alluding for a moment to the Revised Statutes of Indiana of 1843, by which the act of 1831, regulating the election of United States Senators, was repealed. It is admitted on all hands that the law of 1831 was not in force when the sitting Senators were elected, but it is a disputed point as to when it was repealed.

Chapter fifty-nine, section four, of the Revised Statutes of 1843, declares that:

"All acts and parts of acts, the subjects whereof are revised and reenacted in the Revised Statutes, or which are repugnant to the provisions therein contained, together with the provisions of such acts as are not revised"— the statute of 1831 is not—

"shall be repealed from and after publication as aforesaid, with the exceptions and limitations expressed in this chapter."

The exceptions and limitations on the subject of electing United States Senators are:

"An act to provide for the election of United States Senators and other officers by viva voce vote of the Legislature, approved 1837; and

"An act to repeal an act providing for the election of United States Senators, approved December 3, 1837."

Those two acts are incorporated into the revision of 1843, as part of the same, and they simply provide (without taking up the time of the Senate by reading them) that the election of United States Senators shall be by viva voce vote. I attach no importance to the time when the law of 1831 was repealed; but if there is any importance in it, it was repealed in 1843.

Mr. GREEN. I was anxious that the Senator from Illinois should withdraw his amendment, because this case must of necessity be determined upon its merits, and not upon any mere abstract opinion; and I think it would be well for the Senator from Maine to withdraw his proposition to recommit. There can be no necessity to recommit. We have no time to discuss anything but the practical point to be decided, and that is whether the sitting members from Indiana are entitled to their seats under this election or not. This is the conclusion. The proposition which the Senator from Illinois makes as an amendment has an argument, and I am not willing to vote an argument. The argument may be right or wrong, and yet may not apply to this case; may not be conclusive as to this case. In the minds of some Senators it may be, in the minds of other Senators it would not be; and hence the impropriety of undertaking to vote an argument when a question is to be determined that may involve that argument or may not involve it. The whole of this matter must rest upon its merits; and while the Senator may act upon the positions assumed in his amendment, and acting upon those positions may come to any conclusion to which his mind will necessarily lead him, I may take other reasons and arrive at the same conclusion, or take the same reasons and arrive at a different conclusion, in consequence of my view of their influence connected with this whole transaction.

Is this election legal? Has it been conducted in accordance with the Federal Constitution? I answer yes; and in a very few words, for an extended argument is not now required, the whole ground having been occupied so well, I will show why I answer it in the affirmative. Each State is entitled to two Senators, to be chosen by the Legislature. The manner of choosing is to be by an election; for, in a subsequent part of the Constitution, it says, the times, place, and manner of electing Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by the Legislature. In the exercise of the power to choose, it must be through a method of election, and the same term "election" is applied to the choosing of Senators that is applied to the choosing of Representatives. Hence, it results, of necessity, under the Constitution, that the electors vote per capita. Do they vote per capita in the election of a member of the House of Representatives? They must, of necessity, do it. The same term is applied to the Legislature; and therefore, if the Constitution is to have the same construction to the two classes, to the members of the House and to the members of the Senate, the legislators must vote per capita for Senators. The clause of the Constitution pointing out the Legislature to choose, and saying, that their mode of choosing shall be by election, simply designates the electors. It designates those persons who shall exercise the power of electing. It does not impose upon the Legislature the performance of a legislative duty, the execution of a legislative trust, but it designates a power, an authority that has the right to elect.

That power, those persons thus designated, may elect. Who are they? Why, as was well said by the Senator from Ohio, they need not of necessity be two Houses; there may be three Houses; the Legislature may embrace five separate Houses, or one House. In Pennsylvania, as he remarked, there was originally but one House, and that was the Legislature. I remember reading a circumstance that transpired when the proposition was made in Pennsylvania to change their Legislature to two Houses. The great Dr. Franklin remarked that separating the legislative authority into two Houses reminded him of hitching two horses to a cart, one before and the other behind. But at this day, with our present experience, seeing the impulsive nature of our Congress, we see the necessity of having checks to hasty legislation; we see the necessity of having the approval of the Executive separated from both of the bodies, and for it to be separated into two bodies, for greater deliberation, for one to operate as a check upon the other in legislation, the reason of which separation does not apply to the election of Senators.

Every argument that has ever been brought to bear in favor of separate Houses constituting the legislative authority ceases the moment the question of electing a United States Senator is brought up for consideration; and hence, as I before remarked, the term "Legislature" is simply a designation of the persons who are invested with the authority to elect, and that election must be per capita. I know it is said that the common custom has been either by law to provide a mode by which the two bodies come together, or by joint resolution to agree when they will come together. That is true, and it is true from the necessity of the case. Whenever two bodies or two objects are separated, they can never get together except by the motion or the action of one or the other, or both; but whenever they do come together legally, they may then exercise any legal power. In the absence of a constitutional provision requiring the two Houses to come together; in the absence of a law requiring them to come together; in the absence of a joint resolution agreeing to come together, you never can get them together except by their own voluntary consent, each House consenting for itself; but if there be a law setting a day for them to come together, it requires no resolution to bring them together. If there be a constitutional provision requiring them to come together, it requires no joint resolution to bring them together. If, in the discharge of a constitutional duty, they must of necessity come together, then whatever right they have to exercise in joint convention they may then and there exercise.

It is worthy of remark also, that when these two bodies get together legally, they are not then separate bodies sitting in the same hall; they coalesce; as Cowper says,

"Like kindred drops they mingle into one;"

and they are then and there but one body called a joint convention. The constitution of the State of Indiana in existence and in force at the time this election took place made it the duty of the two bodies of the Legislature thus to coalesce on a given day. They did meet; and as the Senator from Vermont has properly admitted—and I shall not therefore stop to make still more clear that which is susceptible of demonstration—every subsequent adjournment of the convention had all the powers and all the rights that the first convention had which met on the 12th day of January. Whatever right that convention then and there had to elect Senators was continued up to the period of time at which the election did in fact take place. The whole case, therefore, is all narrowed down to this single point, whether the joint convention on the 12th day of January could elect United States Senators. I take the position that it was not two Houses as assumed by the Senator from Illinois and the Senator from Vermont; for if I had the constitution and the law under which they assembled before me, I could prove that it was a joint convention; that the two Houses had then and there coalesced, and lost their separate identity. It will be remembered—I will not take time to read it—that while the constitution says the Speaker shall open the votes in the presence of both Houses of the Legislature it goes on to say that if no candidate has a majority they shall, by joint vote, proceed to elect a Governor. There cannot be a joint act without a joint association. They are in a condition competent to perform a joint act under the constitution, and if they have the constitutional power, and are in the condition to perform a joint act if the necessity should exist, then their relation is a joint relation. How would it be possible for two Houses not having a joint relation to perform a joint act? The constitution says they shall, by joint vote, elect a Governor, if none of the candidates has a majority. The nature of the act, or the vote, results from the relation of the parties performing it; and if the act or vote is a joint act or joint vote, then the relation of the bodies is a joint relation.

It will not be pretended, I hope, by any one that it would be impossible to elect a Senator prior to the passage of any law, Congress never having touched the subject by providing for the time and manner of the election. There are instruments to enable them to come together to perform their work; but, if by any legal method they could get together without making use of these instrumentalities, it is just as perfect and complete as if they had them all in force.

It has been assumed by the Senator from Illinois, that a majority of the Senate of the State of Indiana never went into the House of Representatives in joint convention; and he has said, I believe frequently during this debate, that we have no power to go behind the record and see who was legally elected to the State Senate in Indiana. I shall not touch on that subject further than to show what the Senator from Illinois thought of that subject when another matter was pending in this body. He then used this language, in relation to poor bleeding Kansas:

"As a member of this body, I freely say to the Senator from Delaware that, if the time shall come while I hold a seat here that a Legislature should thus be imposed upon my State, and should send a person here as Senator, I certainly would not vote to give him his seat; but I would vote to give the seat to the Senator chosen by the Legislature whose members were elected by the citizens of Illinois authorized to vote by her organic act."

Mr. TRUMBULL. I think that is very good doctrine, and I will do the same thing now. If the government of Indiana had been subverted by a foreign power, and a Legislature imposed on her, I certainly would not recognize it.

Mr. GREEN. The Senator denies our right to go behind the record to inquire into the legality of their election, saying that the election, returns, and qualifications of the members are matters to be adjudged of by the body of which they are members; but if this position here taken by him be true, you would have to inquire into the fact whether a Legislature was imposed upon them by force; and that very inquiry opens up the consideration of the legality of their elections. Open up that question, and he knows that three or four Senators who held seats in Indiana were elected by fraud; and I know of no difference between fraud and force, except that fraud has a moral turpitude attached to it that force has not, for there is a boldness and manliness about it. In the three districts from which these three Senators were returned, these questions have been judicially determined against their election. I only throw out that—not as material in this investigation, for it is clear enough in my mind without any reference to that—simply to show the position of the Senator from Illinois at that time and his position at this time: then claiming to inquire whether they were properly elected or not; now closing his lips and seeking to close ours, because he fears the cat will be pulled from under the blanket.

To come back to the real argument affecting this case: the two Houses of the Indiana Legislature legally assembled under the constitution. As the Senator from Louisiana properly remarked, it is not to be presumed that they violated their oath of office. They were compelled to meet. In pursuance of law, they did meet; and the Governor was inducted into office. The law said he should only be inducted into office in the presence of the joint convention. Every presumption, therefore, is in favor of that first joint meeting. It, then, was a joint meeting of the two Houses. The two Houses lost their personal identity. They coalesced; they became one body. Since all points as to the adjournments have been given up and abandoned; it being now conceded that each subsequent step in this proceeding was as valid, and each subsequent meeting clothed with all the power the first meeting had; the only real question to be determined is: as the constitution brought them together for the execution of a purpose, could they, after the execution of that purpose, do anything else? That is the only question to debate in this case. They were legally assembled; they legally constituted a joint convention; they were compelled, of necessity, to do it under the law; they did it. When the necessity that brought them together ceased, could they resolve themselves into their native elements, or into their native characters, and become two separate bodies again without the consent of the joint convention? That brings up the very point to which I called attention before, to wit: that the choice of Senators, under the Constitution, must, in the first place, be an election; that the right of voting attaches to each member of the Legislature as perfectly and as fully as it does to the electors for members of the other House as individuals; and that, when the Constitution of the United States was formed, it was contemplated that there would be one small House and the other large; not only contemplated, but clearly set forth; for it states that the qualifications for electors of members of the House of Representatives of the United States shall be the same as for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature.

We thus see in the mind of the convention that framed the Federal Constitution this additional idea, not only that the Legislature is a body selected by name as the electors of Senators; not only that that body must vote per capita; but that it was supposed one House would be more numerous than the other. With these three leading ideas, passing over the necessity of having some means of bringing them together in joint convention, when they do get in convention there is a constitutional duty to perform. The constitution imposes it on them to elect a Senator. They meet for one purpose. Can a majority of that convention do anything else? I answer, yes; because being now a unit—being a body that has lost its separate existence—it is not a House of Representatives, is not a Senate, but a joint body. Whatever a majority of that joint body can do, what the constitution authorizes them to do, they may do. The constitution does authorize them to elect a Senator. They are now all together in contemplation of law. There is no mode pointed out for the election of Senator. In the absence of any mode, it ought to be of necessity by joint convention of the two bodies. I cannot say that in passing a law to regulate the manner of election, it would not be competent to vest one body with the right to vote by itself and the other body to concur or non-concur. I need not go that far for the purposes of this case; and I have generally found it best in making any argument, to confine myself to the real points necessary to bear upon the particular case. It will not be denied, however, by any Senator present, that an election in joint convention is a valid election.

Now, does a previous consent to meet in joint convention for a specific purpose add any additional power to a convention legally met, thus coalesced, becoming a joint body? Their power is derived from the constitution. There is no joint resolution authorizing them to elect; there is no law authorizing them to elect. Consent is to be drawn from the act, as they have legally met if they act. I am supposing, for the purposes of this argument, that, on the 12th day of January, they acted; all questions as to the adjournment having been given up, and it being conceded that what they did was as valid as if done on the 12th of January. The very act is evidence of consent, and the only consent that is required. It is not necessary to pass a previous determination to do the thing, if the constitution gives you the power, and you have the right to do it. As I before remarked, it saves trouble, and provides a means of accomplishing a constitutional end, to have a law regulating this subject; and I think it very much to be regretted that any State should be without a law in regard to it. Yet, if a State be without law, and the members of the Legislature do constitutionally assemble together and exercise a constitutional power, the very act of exercising it is consent enough. This idea about a majority of the Senate being required to be present in every joint convention in order to constitute that convention legally, is not correct. The bodies never can coalesce unless they meet as bodies, and as they come together they become one. Having become one, parts of it may slough off, as the Republicans did in the convention in Indiana, and still the entirety, the unity, the essence of the joint convention remains; and if in that sloughing process a majority of one branch should slough off, it leaves the convention still a legal body. Then in my teeth will be thrown the decision in the Iowa case. Not so. There was a specific law in the State of Iowa requiring each House to consent in order to constitute a joint convention. That consent was first given, but it was afterwards taken away; and when it was taken away, it was contended in this body—whether truly or untruly, whether rightlly or wrongfully, I shall not stop to inquire—that the unity of the convention was destroyed because the consent of one body was withdrawn. But in the case of Indiana, no consent was required; the constitution compelled them to come together. They did come together; and it was not competent for them to withdraw consent.

Mr. President, I shall not consume any more time. This case is in a nut-shell. The voting is to be an election. Election implies equality among the electors. It cannot be anything else. The persons to elect are designated as the Legislature. The Legislature may consist of one, two, three, or five Houses, and each member of each House is a unit in the election, for equality among the electors is the fundamental principle of election. Propriety requires ordinarily some process to get them together. Here there being no law to prohibit their coming together, and there being a constitution to command it, they can execute the end and discharge that trust. Such was the case in the State of Indiana, and I hold it to be a legal election, legal under the constitution of the State, and under the Constitution of the United States. There was no other law. I need not stop to talk about usage; I care nothing about usage in this instance. I need refer to no precedents, because the precedents of elections of Senators of the United States are as varied as the phases of the moon; there is no uniformity. From Maine to Georgia, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, you find them dissimilar in almost every locality.

To strengthen and make conclusive the position I take about their power, in the absence of any law, I need but incorporate the overwhelming argument made by the Senator from Ohio, when he referred to the cases of those States which elect Senators before they are actually admitted as States, and before they can legally have State Legislatures, and yet their Senators are always admitted as legally elected. But I have said enough, and I will waive anything further.

Mr. WADE. Mr. President, at this time it is not my purpose to detain the Senate very long on this subject, and indeed it has been so ably argued by the members of the Committee on the Judiciary, that I cannot hope to add anything to what has been said; but in my judgment the question is one of such transcendent importance, that I ought not to suffer it to go by without very briefly stating the views I entertain. It is an important question, because the Senators of the United States are the peculiar representatives of the sovereignty of the States, and we should guard with great care the representations of the States, and see that in all instances they truly and properly represent those sovereignties. It seems to me from what little investigation I have given to this subject, and I confess it is not very great, that the case now before us is one of the first impression. I believe in the history of this Government no precedent can be found to sustain the report of the Committee on the Judiciary in this case. I believe it is an entire innovation upon the usages of every State of the Union, from the foundation of the Government, in electing Senators to this body. More than that, I believe it involves a question of constitutional power of great importance.

The Constitution of the United States declares that Senators shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the States, and that is the supreme law on the subject. It needs no State regulation; but at all events nothing less than the transcendent power of the sovereignty of a State properly invoked can create a Senator of the United States. No fraction of that power, no department of the State government, nothing less than the legislative power of the State can elect a Senator of the United States. That power I admit may be exercised in just such way and manner as the State may see fit to prescribe, inasmuch as the Congress of the United States though having the constitutional right to do it, have not prescribed a time and manner of election.

In my judgment, there may be a great variety of methods by which a Senator may be chosen conformable to the Constitution of the United States; but in every instance, and whatever be the mode, it must be by the legislative power of the State invoked fairly upon the subject. I know that the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS,] on a former occasion, contended that the election might be made by Senators and Representatives at large composing the different Houses of the State Legislature, however they might have a mind to convene, however they might assemble themselves together, whether they had the assent of two bodies sitting as legislative bodies to meet, or whether they assembled casually anywhere for any purpose. I do not so understand. The members of a legislative body are not the Legislature unless when convened in conformity to the law and the constitution of the State, no more than Tom, Dick, and Harry, in the streets, are the Legislature. We are not a Senate of the United States when we disperse from here; we cannot assemble at other places informally to conduct the business of legislation as the Senate of the United States; but we must assemble here in conformity to the constitution and the laws of the body to transact business.

The question in this case lies in a very narrow compass, and a great deal has been said that does not seem to me necessary to be touched in order to come to a decision. The point is, whether the Senators from Indiana have been elected in conformity to the Constitution of the United States. A great variety of reasons have been given to show that they were legally elected. Some suppose it to be important to travel back, and inquire into the qualification of some Senators in the State Legislature of Indiana, to know whether they had a right to participate in this election or not. I do not suppose we can go into that. If they sat there by color of office, recognized by the body as members, we cannot go behind that to canvass the question whether they were really elected or not. That is immaterial; it is out of the case, because the only evidence we can have on such a fact is here on the record attesting the legal qualification of all the members of the Indiana Senate. Whether any question of that kind might at any former stage of the proceedings have been raised or not, there is now no such question before us at all. In my judgment, there never was any such question legitimately, nor could there be, because, as I understand, whatever a legislative body may do is to be done by those holding seats, whether de facto or de jure makes no difference. Would it not be singular, if, when we have passed a law, you should go back and canvass the votes, and then try the question whether the gentlemen who voted for it were all entitled to their seats or not? It would be absurd and ridiculous, and no such argument as that can prevail anywhere.

The Senator from Louisiana has stated that his first impressions of this case were strongly against the right of the sitting members to their seats, that he at first believed that their title could not be maintained. His first impressions were lawyer-like, and cannot be overthrown; and yet he thinks he has discovered new light upon the subject that has entirely overturned the ideas he at first entertained. I hardly could see exactly what the strength of this newly-discovered testimony was that had changed his position. It certainly was not that some three or four weeks before this election took place, Jim Lane and his crew were figuring there in the Legislature; but I believe that was the reason he assigned—that the evidence had disclosed the fact that the notorious Jim Lane, who has since figured in Kansas, was there in that legislative body, and he thought he was armed! The evidence, perhaps, does not exactly sustain that; but I do not see how it could be material whether he was armed or unarmed. Armed or unarmed, he had not the potency to overthrow the law and constitution of the State; nor could it make the least difference in the world on the question now before us. All these are outside make-weights that might be thrown in to confuse a jury, but it seems to me can weigh little among lawyers in the Senate of the United States. Why, sir, suppose by any means a legislative body is wrongfully prevented from doing that which it has a constitutional right to do, nay, which it is its duty to do; suppose it is wrongfully prevented from exercising power: you cannot construe the wrongful prevention into a real exercise and say the power has been exercised. If Jim Lane and his myrmidons had interposed there to prevent votes being cast for a Senator; could any man say that a Senator was elected on the ground that the Legislature was wrongfully deprived of the privilege of making an election? I think not.

The Senator from Missouri says that the Indiana Legislature did meet for this purpose, exercising their legislative power properly and fairly under the constitution, and therefore they did elect a Senator. How do you make that out? The constitution and laws of Indiana prescribe the mode in which the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor should be canvassed before a joint meeting of both branches of the General Assembly. It was a mere ministerial act. It was the duty of the Speaker of the House of Representatives to count the votes; and it was the province of the members of the two Houses to assemble there and see that the votes were fairly counted if they saw fit to attend to it; but it made no difference whether a quorum was present or not. It was sufficient that fair notice was given that the votes were about to be opened; and it would have been very singular if the whole number of members of the two Houses had been patient enough to go and witness it. We know it is not so here in similar cases. You would not get ten members of this body to be present to witness the performance of any such ministerial act, when they all knew beforehand what the result of the election was. It was rather their privilege to be present than a duty to be enjoined on them. It was the Speaker's business to count and canvass the votes, and it was the privilege of the representatives of the people to be present to see that everything was conducted fairly. Do you call that a joint meeting where legislative acts might be performed, and can you, from such miserable beginnings, draw a power to legislate and to adjourn? It appears to me that no lawyer can contend for any such thing. It was an assembly for a transient purpose: to meet on one day for a specific purpose, going no further than that, contemplating no legislation. Never in the history of the world was any legislative act performed by such a body. Here was a mere attempt to do indirectly that which everybody knew they could not do directly, but which it would have been infinitely more manly to do directly, and to say, "we, the members of the Democratic party of each branch of the Legislature, intend to meet at such a time in the hall of the House of Representatives, or somewhere else, and go into the election of United States Senators." That would have been infinitely better notice than was the going into this so-called joint convention for the particular purpose of counting the votes for Governor, and when they had got there, with men off their guard, supposing nothing else would be done, then to undertake to do a thing entirely and utterly disconnected with the object of the meeting. That was not acting in the frank and open manner in which a legislative body should act. It would have been better to serve notice that you intended to go into an election. I would do that before I would skulk under this thing you call a joint convention. Sir, I am astonished that any lawyer should contend that a meeting called for the purpose of witnessing the counting of the votes for Governor and Lieutenant Governor had the power to do acts of a legislative character entirely disconnected with the object for which the meeting was convened.

In my judgment, the whole case turns upon that point. Is it in the power of those who have a majority in one branch, and a minority in the other, to form a joint convention, consisting of a majority of the whole number, against the will, and without the consent of one branch? That is all there is in the case. That is the point.

As I said, it is without precedent. No precedent for it can be found from the foundation of the Government. That stands confessed. There is no such case to be found. This shows what has been the general sense of the people of the United States on the subject in the several States of the Union, for I hardly know of one which has not given a strong construction to this very principle. There is nothing more tempting to politicians than to feel themselves strong enough in one branch to overpower the other, and elect these high officers in that way. No greater temptation could ever be placed before a politician than to do this very act, if it could constitutionally be done; and is it not a little remarkable, that in all the strong contests for political power under this Government for more than sixty years, no party, until now, has had the presumption to suppose that the deed could be done? Why, sir, in almost every State in the Union the wishes of a dominant majority have sometimes been baffled in regard to the election of members to this body. The majority has constantly been defeated whenever it was the will of the minority having the control of one branch to resist going into an election. I always held it to be wrong; I always held it to be incompatible with the duty of a legislator to place himself in this attitude to prevent and throw back the legislation of the country for mere party purposes; but it has been done by all parties, and much oftener by the Democratic party than by any other. It has, however, been done in every State, and nowhere so often and in so marked a manner as in the very State from which these claimants come. That, to be sure, is a matter of no consequence, except so far as it shows the settled opinions of the whole country upon this subject. If, at any time, it had been supposed that, in defiance of one branch of the Legislature, a majority of the other could meet under the pretense of counting gubernatorial votes, or under any other pretense, and could go into a senatorial election, would a dominant majority ever have been baffled in their grasp for political power? No, sir; and this furnishes the strongest evidence of the sense and understanding of the whole nation, because it has never been done before under the most powerful temptations constantly to do it.

This was so plain that it required a little hardihood to attempt the undertaking for the first time. How could those who assembled in defiance of a coordinate branch of their Legislature say that they had the assent of the Legislature, or that the election was made by the Legislature, when one branch protested against the act to be done? I know that the majority of that branch have been censured in unmeasured terms for defeating, as you say, the will of the majority of the whole number, and preventing an election. That will not do. It has been too often practiced by all parties who call themselves high and respectable men to justify you in denouncing the act now. I think it was a stretch of political power that should never have been indulged; but nevertheless it was a constitutional right, because the power to elect Senators was vested in the State Legislature, and it could not be done without their assent. Can you steal the assent of a body? can you defraud them of it? can you get them together slyly for one purpose, and then attempt to perform another, and that, too, against the known will and open protest of one body? The idea, in my judgment, is ridiculous. Have you the assent of the Legislature to adjourn your joint convention when one branch stand off protesting that they will not take part in it, saying "we are not of you; we will not join you in this election; we protest against your doing it?" Yet we are to be told that because Jim Lane was there, that because some of the members, perchance, were not legally elected, or because of something else, you could get over this constitutional provision! Sir, I do not care how you were baffled; the fact stands out glaringly before the world that you elected these Senators without the assent of the Legislature. No argument can make it good. No ingenious man will contend that there is evidence here to show the assent of the Legislature. Indeed, you do not contend for it. You say you stole it in a sort of a way, somehow, in that convention, met for another purpose. That is not the way a legislative act can be done. It must be by the assent of both branches of the Legislature fairly obtained, and then I do not care how the election is made.

I know that, at an early period of our history, it was held that it was unconstitutional to elect by a joint convention, called by the assent of both branches, because a convention was not the Legislature and could not make laws. That point, however, has been yielded. Some of the States, more strict constructionists than others, have always elected by a separate vote of each branch, and many of our best men and greatest jurists have doubted whether the common mode, in the West, of electing Senators by joint convention, is constitutional, even when that convention has been brought together by the fair and free consent of both branches of the Legislature. The late chairman of the Committee on the Judiciary of this body, (Mr. Butler, of South Carolina,) declared, in Mr. HARLAN's case, that, if it was a question of first impression he would hold an election by joint convention to be unconstitutional, because the convention was not the Legislature; but he gave up that point because of the common practice and understanding that the two Houses might go into joint ballot when they had each agreed to do so. That, however, was the extent to which anybody pretended that the Legislature could go, in this respect, under their power to prescribe the manner of election; but all admitted that two legislative branches must agree as to that manner, and in the present case one branch was never consulted at all in reference to it.

If the resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee prevails, you work a revolution in the manner of electing Senators; the most numerous branch of the State Legislatures will hereafter meet by themselves and elect Senators without the concurrence of the other branch. It is cutting loose entirely from the Constitution, which declares that the election shall be by the Legislature. You are now saying practically that it may be done by one branch if they have the numerical majority. That is how it will be understood and acted upon if this precedent shall be set.

This whole question was so lately and so fully canvassed in this body in the case of the Senator from Iowa, that I am astonished at some of the positions now assumed. The question in that case was, whether the Senator from Iowa was elected by joint action of both the Senate and House of Representatives of Iowa. Nobody denied that the two Houses in Iowa had agreed to meet in joint convention for the purpose of electing a Senator, and that, failing to elect, they adjourned over from time to time. It was said at first, that the joint convention had no power to adjourn; but, on looking into the law of Iowa, we found that they not only had the power to adjourn from time to time, but that it was made their duty to do so until an election was had. That point being given up, it was next said that in the joint convention the members of the different branches did not lose their identity, but remained separate bodies. On the last day of its session a majority of the Iowa Senators were bodily present, but two of them protested that they did not intend to be considered as present, and even on that slight ground you said the Constitution would be violated by sustaining the title of the Senator from Iowa, and he was sent home to pass in review before his own State again upon that very trifling want of concurrence. I believed then that that was an over-nice construction, and I think so now. I think that when both branches have agreed to go into joint meeting, and a quorum of the whole body is present, the Constitution and the laws require no more. It seemed to me that a Senator and a Representative became peers, and had exactly the same political power on the floor of the joint convention, and being assembled there for this purpose in pursuance of law, they so lost their identity as to become one homogeneous body of peers for this very purpose—certainly not to go further; though, according to the arguments of my colleague, they might, when they got together, do anything that they might have done when they were in separate bodies. I cannot suppose that to be possible; but having assembled in joint convention for the purpose of electing a Senator, having agreed upon a mode and time for the election, I supposed that there was no necessity for the presence of more than a quorum of the whole body. On that ground I voted in favor of the Senator from Iowa keeping his seat; but the Judiciary Committee and a large majority on this floor held otherwise. If you could turn one Senator out upon such slight grounds, how can you overcome the mountain of objection that now intervenes between these men and their election? They have no color of right. When I say this, I say it in no hostility to these gentlemen, for my intercourse with them upon this floor is as agreeable and as pleasant as with any others, and I would as soon see any members of this body depart as them; but what can such considerations weigh against the plain provisions of the Constitution of the United States? What weight can such considerations have against that great charter which we are all sworn to support? I see a want of constitutional power in what has been done, and I see nothing in this whole case to relieve it from the mountain of objection which intervenes. I would that it were otherwise. I differ from these gentlemen in politics, but I know them to be patriotic, and, as I said before, my intercourse with them has been agreeable and pleasant to me, and I would as soon have them here as any one else, if they could invoke the power of the Constitution justly in behalf of their title; but I feel that they cannot.

The whole question lies in so narrow a compass that it would be wrong for me to travel through those shadows, for they really do not amount to substantial objections, thrown in by my colleague in the precedents which he has brought before us after great labor and research. They seem to me to vanish, and not even to have any relation to the trial of the question before us. Can you find any precedent establishing that one branch of a legislative body constitutes the legislative power of the State, against the protest of the other branch? If a thousand such precedents could be found, you and I, sir, would know that they were false, and ought not to be followed. They cannot be found, however, because an American Senate was never so lost to all sense of constitutional law as to determine so plain a question in that way. The case is sought to be eked out by precedents of school districts or church trials, and all those little make-weights that lawyers may throw in to help out a bad case. But, sir, we are here in the capacity of judges, not as advocates. We are here to judge fairly between the persons claiming these seats and their constitutional power to hold them; and we are greatly astray from our duty if we swerve to the right or to the left, any more than a judge upon the bench would, in determining the rights of individuals. Show me that you have invoked the legislative power of the sovereign State of Indiana to maintain these men's titles, and, my word for it, you shall cheerfully have my vote. I cannot find any such thing in your proceedings. I find that one branch of the Legislature proceeded to make an election against the solemn protest of the other. It will not do to say as the Senator from Louisiana said, that the majority of the Senate of Indiana were endeavoring to take advantage of their own wrong; that they ought to have gone into the election; that they knew the other side had a majority to make the election, and that they ought to have yielded and gone into it. That may be, but it cannot help out your want of constitutional power. He says that his mind has changed because he finds that we are proceeding to take advantage of our own wrong in defeating these men. Sir, that is a poor answer to an objection of the want of constitutional power. The power has not been constitutionally exercised, I care not for what reason. Those who have interposed to prevent it may have been right, or they may have been wrong; but I will say, in justification of them, that they were not singular, for they had a high and honorable example before them. This had been repeatedly done; it had become the common law of the State of Indiana, and therefore there was no wrong in it; or if there was, it applied to one party as much as to the other. That point, however, should not weigh a straw against either, nor can it help out a want of constitutional power which is most flagrant, in my judgment, in this case.

Mr. TOOMBS. Mr. President, having been a member of the Judiciary Committee at the time this question was committed to that committee, it received as much of my attention as my other duties would permit, and therefore I deem it not inappropriate, if, indeed, it may not be regarded as my duty, to give as briefly as possible the result of the investigations it became my duty to make with reference to this subject. I do not consider it a plain question. I deem it to be a question of real and of serious difficulty, and I think that difficulty has been much aggravated by contrary practices in the different States of the Union, and by contrary constitutional constructions. In my opinion, however, upon principle and upon the great majority of the precedents, there is no difficulty in arriving at a true, a just, a safe, and a constitutional ground upon which to decide this question.

The seats of these two gentlemen are a matter of the extremest insignificance to any of us, in comparison to the great principle upon which their right rests. So far as they are personally concerned, it is a matter of no concern. The merest accident may deprive them of their seats. Death, that has come among us so rapidly, thins our numbers and changes our relations. Men change party relations oftener, probably, than God Almighty interposes to interfere with them. I find all around me here men whom I have opposed, and with whom I have acted in the last eight or ten years. Such is human life, such is politics. On the great question of ascertaining the right of a member to a seat in this august assembly, there should be no rule of action but the Constitution of the country and the highest good of the Commonwealth.

The question is in a much narrower compass than I apprehend it has been generally imagined to be. When this Government was formed there was great difficulty in the convention that framed the Constitution about what should be the relations of the States to the General Government. They were entirely equal under the old Confederation. Many of the lesser States struggled to retain their equality, but finally they yielded it in one branch of the National Legislature and maintained it in the other. That was the result of the struggle. They agreed that numbers, that population throughout the United States, should govern in one branch of Congress, but that the other branch should represent the sovereignty of the States. I am quite sure my friend from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] who has very fairly argued this question on his side, cannot place a higher estimate, it is impossible for any man to place a higher estimate, on the importance of the absolute sovereignty of the States of this Union than I do. I have maintained it throughout my political life in good fortune and in evil fortune, that they were sovereign, that they were judges of the infraction of the compact and of the mode and measure of redress, and I take it that he would be too afraid of the term nullifier to extend his devotion to the sovereignty of the States as far as I claim that my own goes.

Mr. WADE. I am as good a nullifier as you are.

Mr. TOOMBS. I am glad to hear it. It is good doctrine. I think it is a good sign to hear the Senator make that declaration, especially after our troubles for the last eight or ten years. I have seen the time when I could not find a man in either branch of Congress to admit that he was one.

Mr. WADE. I was not here then.

Mr. TOOMBS. In settling the controversy in regard to representation between the States, the framers of the Constitution declared that the members of the House of Representatives should be elected by the people of the different States, according to federal population (which itself was a compromise) and that Senators should be elected as their late Representatives to the Congress of the Confederation had been, by the States; that they should represent the sovereignty of the States. I will do no act to weaken, in the slightest degree, every right maintained there, that this body shall forever represent the sovereign States of this Union; but I do not intend to be defeated by majorities of the United States, nor by minorities at home; and that was no part of the scheme of Government. While we protected ourselves against a majority in the Federal Government, we stood by the principle that the majority of our separate States represented their sovereignty, and that is the principle to which I wish to lead the Senate in the consideration of this question. The House of Representatives were to be elected according to the first article of the Constitution, and I call the minds of those gentlemen who consider what I have to say worthy of attention, to the fact that the provision as to both Houses is in the same clause of the Constitution. Immediately after declaring that Senators should be elected by the Legislature, the same clause goes on to declare that the time, place, and manner, of electing Representatives, as well as Senators, should be determined by the local Legislature—by the State sovereignty; provided, at the same time, that Congress might alter their regulations in all respects except as to the place of choosing Senators; but in all other respects the election of Senator and Representative depends on the same constitutional power.

In Indiana the legislative power is vested in two branches; but it is important to remark that the Constitution of the United States pays no regard to the number of branches of which a State Legislature may be composed. As the Senator from Ohio [Mr. PUGH] said, my State had but one branch when the constitution was formed; others had two. All might have had three, or a dozen, if they chose. The great National Assembly of France, in 1789, had three: the Peers, the Commons, and the Priests—the three great estates. The Constitution declares that members of the House of Representatives shall be elected by the people. Who are the people? All those entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature. What did that mean? This is important to gentlemen who wish to follow the Constitution. To the hands of all persons entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the State Legislature was committed the right to elect members of the House of Representatives. How many of them? How many of these people were to elect? According to the doctrine of my friend from Ohio, [Mr. WADE,] it would require every man of them. It does not say a majority shall elect; it does not say two thirds shall do it; but these electors are to elect the members of the House of Representatives; and therefore, according to his construction given to the other clause, it would require the concurrence of every man legally qualified to vote to send a member of the other House; and if they differed, you never could get one.

Mr. WADE. I do not say any such thing; but it is in the power of the Legislature, in prescribing the manner, to attend to that.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not intend to misrepresent my friend; but I will show him that that is the result of his argument. One clause says the people shall elect members of the House of Representatives, and another that the Legislature shall elect Senators. If it requires all the Legislature to elect a Senator, it must require all the people to elect a Representative.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a non sequitur.

Mr. TOOMBS. I should have great pleasure in hearing my esteemed friend from Maine on that point. I do not believe in that doctrine, but I say one is as true as the other; but our fathers were too wise to leave it there, and therefore they prescribed who the electors should be, and they said: "The House of Representatives shall be composed of members chosen every second year by the people of the several States, and the electors in each State shall have the qualifications requisite for electors of the most numerous branch of the State Legislature." It says that the electors shall elect the House, and simply defines who the electors shall be. In the other case, it says the Legislature shall elect a Senator. What part of them? Does it say a majority? No. Two thirds? No. Seven eighths? No. The only place from which you get any guide on this point is to be found in the other clause of the Constitution, saying that the time, the place, and the manner, may be determined by the Legislature.

Mr. FESSENDEN. "Shall be prescribed," not "may be."

Mr. TOOMBS. That only makes it stronger; and yet Congress may alter their regulation, except as to the place of electing Senators. That grew out of a popular temporary prejudice that crept into our Constitution; and the way it got there was from the fact that the King had, by his Governors, convened the colonial Legislatures at unusual and uncomfortable places, remote from the records. It is about the most inconsiderable thing in the whole business, but that was the reason they put it in. They did not intend to be called together by Congress, or by any other power at an inconvenient place, or a place remote from the records. The time, the manner, and the place, are to be fixed by the State Legislature; but if they do not do it, to suit Congress, the power, was reserved in this Government to override the State Legislature in regard to the time, the manner, and the place of electing members of the House of Representatives, and the time and manner of electing Senators, reserving to the States solely the right of determining for themselves where they would elect Senators.

Then I recur to the clause fixing the electors entitled to vote for the most numerous branch of the Legislature, as the electors for members of the other House of Congress. They are the persons to vote for members of the House of Representatives, and I say, by the construction put on the Constitution by gentlemen on this side, it requires every man, unless the Legislature or Congress has acted. I should be glad to hear from my friend from Maine on that point, because I look upon it as an important point, and I see he shakes his head.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not intend to interrupt the Senator now.

Mr. TOOMBS. It will not interrupt me in the least.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I shall, if I have time, say a few words afterwards.

Mr. TOOMBS. When they give it to the whole collective body of the people, it must be exercised by them all, unless the Legislature determine otherwise, according to the gentleman's argument. We know that many of the New England States have adopted a different rule from other States. Many of the States say that a plurality shall elect a member of Congress. Massachusetts said that nothing short of a majority should elect; and since I have been in public life, she has been without a member from one or two of her districts, in the other House, for a whole Congress, because they could never get a majority to agree upon one man.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That law is changed now.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know that; but it only illustrates my idea. When that pestilent faction of abolition first started, they nominated their men, and they were sufficiently powerful until they coalesced, until the Whigs succumbed to them, to prevent an election; and I recollect that, on one occasion, when I served in the House of Representatives, Massachusetts was without two members for an entire Congress. Georgia and Virginia said, "while we give the power to the whole body of electors, our law is, let the devil take the hindmost; whoever gets the most votes shall come to Congress." I believe the law of Massachusetts has been altered to the same thing. I am quite sure it ought to have been, because that rule puts down faction everywhere, and it is wise in itself. I am not complaining of it. When we said a majority may elect, we could have said two thirds, or three fourths, or seven eighths, in the absence of legislation by Congress; and why not say all? The Constitution said all should send them, and that the time and manner of the election should be determined by the States. Massachusetts said it should take a positive majority to elect a member, and we said a plurality. Why had we not a right to say that it should take every man? The argument is irresistible and unanswerable.

Some of the State Legislatures, as I before remarked, consisted of but one body; some of two. In other countries there have been three bodies composing a Legislature. There might have been twenty. It was a mere question of constitutional arrangement at home. The wise men who made our Federal Constitution, knowing the difference of the States and their interests, said it is likely you will manage this matter best; keep your government to suit yourselves, and we will not interfere with it unless it becomes necessary to preserve the nation, and then we simply reserve the right to take care as to the place and manner of electing members of Congress. Congress can override the plurality system of Massachusetts to-day, and say that a majority shall be required to elect members. They can say one branch, if a majority of the whole, can elect Senators. Every State has acted on that principle in the Union now, I believe. In three of the New England States—Connecticut, Vermont, and possibly Maine—although the Houses vote separately, as Virginia does, and each House nominates, yet finally, I think, they came to the rule that they must come together and stand per capita, and not per stirpes. I think that is the rule now in all the thirty-two States of the Republic.

Mr. DIXON. It is not the rule in Connecticut. One branch can defeat an election there.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think that is the case, then, nowhere else but in Connecticut, and Congress not having interfered, I admit you can fix it in that way. The way is indifferent to me, and I say the whole difficulty in this case arises from the contrariety of action in the different States. The principle for which I contend is, that it is for the States alone to determine until Congress determines. My friend from Ohio says the Legislature consists of two branches in Indiana, and therefore it is in violation of the constitution to elect a Senator by a bare majority of the whole number. That is his position.

Mr. WADE. The Senator misunderstands me. I say simply that the State cannot vest the election of a Senator in any less power than the Legislature, whatever that may be. It cannot vest it in one branch when there are two.

Mr. TOOMBS. I admit that. They can give the power to no other people on earth but the designated electors under the Constitution. The Constitution has declared that the power to elect Senators belongs to the Legislature. If the law be as my friend from Ohio interprets it, nothing can answer his ends but that both branches shall concur in the election; that is, that no man can sit in this body who has not got a majority of the Senate and House of Representatives of his State in favor of his election. It must result in that. Is that true?

Mr. WADE. That is not what I mean. It seems I have been unlucky in making myself understood; but I do not want to interrupt the Senator.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is no inconvenience to me, and I will hear the gentleman with pleasure.

Mr. WADE. As to the manner of the election I am indifferent, provided it has the sanction of the Legislature. On that point I differed from the late Senator from South Carolina, (Mr. Butler,) in the Iowa case, and I said that when the Senate and House of Representatives, in whom the legislative power is vested, have consented to meet in joint convention, in my judgment the Constitution is satisfied, because that is the Legislature acting in the mode prescribed by itself, and I am not particular as to the mode, so that it has the assent of the Legislature.

Mr. TOOMBS. The Senator has met my precise point.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator from Georgia allow me to interpose a word?

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. We do not contend, or at least I do not contend, that both branches must concur by separate action in the election. I say, however, that no valid election can be had unless both branches have previously concurred in prescribing the time, manner, and place of holding the election. That is the ground.

Mr. TOOMBS. I understand that; and there, I think, I can satisfy every intelligent mind in the Senate that both my friends are wrong, and I will put in on a constitutional ground. I know the difficulty, and I know it has been run over in the Senate. The Constitution gives this power to the Legislature. I say it means a majority of the persons legally elected to the Legislature, whether there be one branch or forty branches. My friends say it does not require a concurrence of each branch, there being but two—I leave out the question of numbers—but my friends from Maine and Ohio say that if they consent in advance to go into a joint meeting that will cure the defect. I put it to either of them, and to any intelligent man in the Senate, that it cannot. If the Constitution requires that a Senator shall be elected by the Legislature, and "Legislature," as there used, means both branches, no consent of theirs can enlarge the constitutional power. I put the whole case there, and I submit it to the judgment of every gentleman in the Senate. They say it requires the concurrence of both branches to consent to go into joint convention to make the election. That is not the Constitution. It requires that the Legislature shall elect, and if it means both branches, their agreeing to be overruled, the lesser by the greater, is unconstitutional. You tell me that to elect a Senator requires the action of the two branches and nothing less, and yet you say that a branch of the Legislature can consent to part with its constitutional power. When the power is deposited in both branches to elect, you say that one branch can agree to deposit it with a majority of the other. I say there is no principle in it; and no lawyer, no statesman, can maintain it for a moment. Their assent is a matter of total indifference. They may prescribe the mode just as they please. They may say it shall require two thirds, in the absence of any action on your part; but if it requires the concurrence of both Houses, they cannot agree that a majority of one, if sufficient to overcome the majority of the other, shall satisfy the constitutional requirement.

Mr. WADE. If both together could not do it, certainly one could not.

Mr. TOOMBS. That is true; neither can I stand there. If I am right, if the true theory of the Constitution is that the majority of the members of the Legislature are electors, I do not care whether they are in the Senate or House, the Constitution is satisfied; and I say every State in this Union but Connecticut has acted on it. The election of United States Senators is not a legislative act; it does not require the concurrence of both bodies. That is admitted by every man in the Senate. Adopt the opposite idea, and this Senate would be vacated to-morrow; not a man could sit here; it would be an unconstitutional body. It does not require the concurrence of the Senate and House of Representatives in any State of the Union to elect a Senator to this body. Why? Simply because the Constitution does not require it; not because they agree that it shall not, for they can make no such agreement. Does any man hold that the Senate or House of Representatives of any State can part with a great constitutional right of election? Can they enlarge the power or diminish it? Where do we stand? Is it in the Senate or in the rostrum, before the multitude? If the Constitution means, by using the term "Legislature," as many bodies as the State fixes for its legislative power, no agreement among themselves can enlarge or restrain that constitutional requirement; and when Virginia said that her Legislature should consist of a House of Delegates and a Senate, and a majority of the whole should elect a United States Senator, she decided that it did not require the action of the two bodies. I admit that Virginia, in prescribing the manner of election, may say that both Houses shall come together, and that it may require a majority of both, until Congress acts. Does any man deny that? If she has that power, and it is constitutional, what becomes of the opposite argument? Connecticut exercises it, unless my friend before me [Mr. Dixon] was illegally elected. Though three fourths of the whole number of the Legislature may be in the most numerous branch, a State may allow a majority of one in the other branch to prevent an election. That must be the result of the position of the other side. I say you can neither enlarge nor diminish your powers by your own legislation. You can prescribe the mode, the time, and the place. If the concurrence of both branches is necessary, you are right. If it is not necessary, every other State in the Union is wrong. Such has been the custom. Some of the New England States, (I think the State of New Hampshire,) after one or two trials and a nomination by one branch and the other, finally come together into joint convention.

Mr. HALE. Never.

Mr. TOOMBS. Vermont does, after various trials, according to my recollection. I know there are three New England States peculiar in this respect, and they are the only States where a majority of the whole number does not elect at all events. By what right does Vermont say that she requires the concurrence of both Houses? and by what right does Virginia say she does not require it, but is satisfied with a majority of all the members? The same law of the Constitution applies to both; and the Constitution requires the Legislature to elect. Can the Legislature dispense with it? Have they a right to say that one body shall elect against the other? I believe my two honorable friends from Virginia were elected by a minority of one House and a majority of the other. I know it has been frequently done. I have sat with many gentlemen who were elected in the same way. In my own State, when the Legislature meets in joint convention, we care not whether a man has a majority of one House or of the other, so that he gets a majority of the whole. It does not require the assent of a majority of each. If the construction is right, that it requires both, it can never be waived. If the Constitution does not require it, it never existed, and it need not be waived.

I hold, in the first place, that the election of a Senator is not a legislative act; it does not require the sanction of the Governor; in the second place, there can be no power in a State Senate, as my friend from Maine contends, to part with its constitutional right. If it requires the assent of both, neither can agree to yield. If it takes two branches to make the Legislature to elect a member of this body, according to the meaning of the Constitution, all your assent to meet together in joint convention is unconstitutional. I take the true meaning of the clause to be as it has been practiced upon from the foundation of the Government. There is some wisdom in looking back to the contemporaneous interpretations of the men who made the Constitution. In every State, except a few in New England, the practical interpretation has been that the electors of a Senator were the members who composed the Legislature, whether one branch, two branches, three branches, or twenty branches, if such an absurdity could be presumed. They are the electors; they are the representatives of the State sovereignties. The Legislature may stand in some States on the basis of numbers; in others, as in Virginia, upon freehold property. It may stand, as it did in South Carolina, upon taxation and population combined; or, as it did in my State, upon the Federal basis—three fifths of all other people besides whites. That is a matter for the States alone to determine; and they may elect a Legislature of such qualifications as they themselves prescribe. In my State we at first required a State Senator to hold a thousand acres of land, and own a great deal of money above his debts. A member of the Legislature, in the earlier days, was required to own five hundred acres of land, free from his debts. Our forefathers acted on the old-fogyish idea that men who did not pay taxes should not lay them. We have departed from that principle; whether wisely or unwisely is in the womb of time. I think, myself, there is a great deal in the old idea. There is much safety in having the security that the people who lay burdens shall be those that bear them. Proverbial wisdom would vindicate that idea. We, however, are making a broader experiment in this day. Some of us may live to see the end of it; but I hope not.

I say, then, it does not require a concurrence of the two bodies of the Legislature to elect a Senator. Congress may determine how it shall be done; but they have not exercised the power, and Indiana has not done so. She has not determined the time, the place, or the manner; nor has Congress done so. Shall Indiana, then, be unrepresented? It is admitted there is no time, no place, no manner, fixed by the law of Congress, none by the constitution, and none by the law of Indiana. Is she disfranchised? It is a very serious question. This identical question has been determined in the other branch of Congress, upon the same basis, and I call the attention of every man that hears me to it. Unless the question was settled wrongfully, the precedents which I shall cite are unanswerable; and on them I shall rest this case. The first decision to which I call attention was a very early one, and I admit that I am enough of an old fogey to have great regard for the wisdom of the forefathers. In 1796, a few years after the Government went into operation, the case of Lyman S. Smith arose in the House of Representatives, which was very ably debated. The case was this:

The sheriff had failed to give notice of the time and place of holding the election at two inconsiderable towns included in the election district; but as fraud was not imputed, and it did not appear from the evidence that the votes of all the freemen of the said town, if duly given, could have changed the result of the election, it was therefore held that the want of notice to these towns was not a sufficient cause for setting aside the election.

This proceeded upon the idea that the right of election was vested in the majority of electors, notwithstanding it was given equally to all. Although it was admitted that notice was not given to all, and therefore some of them were deprived of their legal rights, yet, inasmuch as if they had voted they could not have changed the result, it made no difference, and Mr. Smith was declared entitled to his seat from the State of Massachusetts. In the case of Indiana the recusant Senators might have come; they had notice. The great question for you to determine is whether a minority, in defiance of the Constitution of the United States, in defiance of the sovereignty of their own State, can defeat the will of a majority in the performance of a constitutional duty? The question is, whether there is a power in this Government to enable a minority to defeat the Government of the Union and the sovereignty of their own State? I do not care who does it, whether Whig, Democrat, or Free-Soiler, or by whatever name he may call himself. I say the American Senate are to determine to-night whether there is a power anywhere by which a factious minority in this country can not only overturn the Government of the United States, but overturn the sovereignty of their own State. I say there is not.

I come next to a case more precisely in point, and it is a very important one. It is a case which occurred in the very State from which this controversy comes—the case of Thomas Randolph vs. Jennings. Congress had divided the Territory of Indiana into two, and the act of Congress did not authorize the election of any Delegate. It was a mistake in the law, and it was remedied some two or three years afterwards. I will not fatigue the Senate by quoting from the statement of the case. The resolution that was reported by the committee was:

"Resolved, That the election held for a Delegate for Congress for the Indiana Territory on the 23d of May, 1809, being without authority of law, is void; and, consequently, the seat of Jonathan Jennings, as a Delegate of that Territory, is hereby declared vacant."

A motion was made to strike out the words "being without authority of law," which was negatived, 45 to 51; thus holding that it was illegal and without authority. This was in Committee of the Whole; but what was the action of the House after argument?

"The subject was diffusely debated this day as well as yesterday; and on the main question being put, the House refused to concur with the Committee of Elections and of the Whole House by the following vote: for concurrence 30, against it 83."

The majority against it was fifty-three. That was in 1810. Indiana had not legislated; Congress had not legislated; there was no authority of law for the election; and yet the man held his seat. A subsequent motion to declare him elected was made and withdrawn, it having been considered that the former vote, deciding against the committee who reported that he was not entitled to his seat, was equivalent to a confirmation of it. In looking over the debates on the occasion, which are given more in extenso in the Annals of Congress, you will find that it was held that those people were entitled to a Representative; that, though there was no law of Congress, and no law of Indiana, yet, as no fraud was alleged by Mr. Randolph, who contested the seat, it was all fair except as to two precincts where the sheriff did not appoint the inspectors; and it was proved by Jennings that if every vote in those two precincts were given to his opponent, he would not be elected any way; so that their votes were waived, on the principle of the Massachusetts case. Congress then decided that, although there was no authority of law to hold the election, the people being entitled under the Constitution to representation, and there being no fraud, the legal electors having sent a member, he should hold his seat. I want to know what stronger case there could be than that?

Mr. FESSENDEN. I suggest to the Senator that if that is the case of a Delegate, it does not come under this provision of the Constitution at all.

Mr. TOOMBS. Why not?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Because there is no constitutional provision for the election of Delegates.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is a provision of law that the Delegate shall be elected by a majority of the people of a Territory.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What I say is that this provision of the Constitution does not apply to a Delegate.

Mr. TOOMBS. But the question arose there whether the man who was elected without any authority of law could hold the seat? Whether the election was under a law derived from Congress or under the Constitution, could make no particular difference. Congress having omitted, by mistake, to provide for an election, the people being entitled to representation under our institutions, though there was no law of Indiana, and none of Congress, no law anywhere, yet, inasmuch as there was no fraud alleged, the man whom the people sent here was declared to be entitled to his seat. Both the cases which I have read went to this ground under the Constitution as to the seat of a member of Congress.

Mr. FESSENDEN. They did not come up to that.

Mr. TOOMBS. They came to that distinct principle; and there was a very important case from Pennsylvania on the same ground which I think will cover this case, and I invite attention especially to it. It is the case of ex parte Hoge. The constitution of Pennsylvania said that whenever there should be a vacancy, the Governor should issue his proclamation to call an election; but the provision fixing the time, place, and manner of electing members of Congress in Pennsylvania, and in many of the States, applied only to regular elections, and did not apply to vacancies. The constitution says that the time, place, and manner of electing members may be fixed by the Legislature, or by Congress. Neither Congress nor the Pennsylvania Legislature had fixed it for a vacancy. What was the result? Mr. Hoge was elected it seemed upon two days' notice, and that was a great point. It was very ably argued by some of the ablest men of that time. It was admitted that there was no law of Pennsylvania to fix the time, or manner, or the place of election. The Governor issued his proclamation to have an election. After a full review and able argument, Congress acted on the great principle I am acting on to-day, that a majority of those persons who by the Constitution and the laws were entitled to choose a member of the House of Representatives were to be respected; that although Pennsylvania had not fixed the time, the place, and the manner of the election, yet as there was no fraud, and as the electors had met peaceably, and under some color of authority—the proclamation of the Governor—and elected a Representative, that election should stand. That decision was made under the same clause of the Constitution under which we are to decide this question, for Senators and members of the other House come under the same clause. If the principle does not cover this case, I admit my own obtuseness is unable to see the distinction.

The Constitution provides that the time, the place, and the manner of electing Senators and Representatives shall be fixed by the Legislature, reserving to Congress the right to alter the regulations as to time and manner. There was no law on the point in Indiana. She is entitled to two Senators under the Constitution. They are here. Now, what question are we to determine? Are these men returned by those persons lawfully entitled to return them? That is the only question I intend to meet. It is unnecessary for this case to go to the extent I do; but that is the only question I want to know, as I held here in the case of Mr. HARLAN; and I am grounded by the precedents of the wise men of the country. There was no party question in regard to the admission of the Territorial Delegate, in 1810, under Mr. Madison's administration. The anti-war party had not then risen, much less been crushed out; but by a great majority of 83 to 30 the House of Representatives then said "these are forms; if the people who had the right to send a Representative here have sent him, he shall stay." Very well; these gentlemen come here from Indiana. What do they bring? They bring the highest evidence from their own State of Indiana, that they are her Senators; as good as I bring, or as you bring, sir. It is a great thing to go behind it. It is not an unimportant thing to a States-rights man to say that you will inquire into it. It is rather a derogation of the State that you do not inquire into Lord Napier's commission, and see whether his Government had a right to send him here; whether he was legally sent here; and it is a great thing to go behind the broad seals of the sovereign States of this Union; but for wise purposes, probably, the Constitution gave this body the right to inquire into the elections, qualifications, and returns of its own members; and therefore this inquiry is before us to-day. It comes here by virtue of that constitutional power. These gentlemen are here with the seal of a sovereign State. They are here with the certificate of the Governor of their State. Will you go behind it? Yes, by virtue of this authority; but tread tenderly upon this sacred ground.

Go to the legislative records of Indiana, and you find that, according to the usage of her sister States, a joint convention of both branches elected Senators without reference to how stood the members of the House, and how stood the members of the Senate of the State. That record says that both branches did meet, and that eighty-three votes out of the one hundred and fifty of which both branches were composed, a large majority, did elect them. Now we have got the substance; we have got two men, elected by the great majority of those, alone, to whom the people of Indiana could commit the right to send Representatives to this Chamber—their Legislature. They are the only persons, under the Constitution of the United States, to whom she could commit this right. She can appear before you in no other way than through a majority of the members of her Legislature. They, unquestionably, received a majority of all the votes. There is no impeachment of that fact. There are but one hundred members of the House, and fifty members of the Senate, making one hundred and fifty altogether; and these gentlemen were elected by the votes of eighty-three clear, undisputed members of this Legislature of one hundred and fifty, in the presence of the Lieutenant Governor, who presides over the Senate, and the Speaker, who presides over the House of Representatives, and all the people; and they gave them certificates.

Then we have the highest evidence of the executive department; we have the highest evidence of the legislative department of Indiana; but we are asked to go behind that. Where shall we go? To a faction? I will not speak of them as I think of them. I have denounced them when they were with me; I spare my opponents the deep indignation which I feel for their traitorous violation of their oaths, and the Constitution of my country. I say I will spare my opponents, though I did not spare my friends on a like occasion. Who comes here? Is there a contestant? None. Is Indiana here protesting against this election through her executive, legislative, or judicial departments? Not at all: these gentlemen speak for her. Not one of her departments contests their authority. Who are the men that do? They are traitorous, perjured wretches, who say, "we have been smart enough to cheat the Government, and cheat our State." You may class it as you please; you may think what I say harsh. I admit I am rude of speech; but I generally speak what I think; and I am just, I trust in God, even in the denunciation I bestow on these men; and I think I am from the fact that I do not denounce them stronger than I did those who opposed this Black Republican behind me [Mr. HARLAN] when his seat was up. I consider them traitors, enemies of the Constitution and the Union, and double traitors for being enemies of the constitution of their own Commonwealth; for I admit that my first allegiance is to my own State, not here. My country is not here only so far as my State wills it. The moment she wills it, this Government may be my enemy. I consider myself an ambassador of my State; and whenever she wills it, my allegiance is due to her. You know now that I am not courting your favor from other parts of the Republic. These are my principles, and my politics, and I shall stand by them.

Here, I say, is the executive and here is the legislative department of Indiana, who tell us that these gentlemen are the ambassadors whom they send to the councils of the Republic. A part of the members of the Legislature come here and say, "we did not participate in the election; the constitution gives the power to elect to the Legislature; we are a part of the Legislature, and we had nothing to do with it because we wanted to defeat the great right of our sovereign State to be represented in the Senate of the United States; we have been without one Senator for two years, and should be without another one for two years, unless an election was made at this time; cannot you honorable Senators of the United States, representatives of sovereign States, help us to perpetrate this iniquity?" It would go hard with me if I could not find some place to cheat such scoundrels and to defeat their schemes. I would lay my hand on the law as long as it stood by me, and then I do not know whether I should not be provoked to stand on the principles of eternal justice before I could submit to it. It is not right. I would not submit to it, I care not who did it.

If you go behind the broad seal of the State, what do you find? My honorable friend from Louisiana told you what you find there. You find traitors, rebels, assassins, men lawlessly acting in that very legislative hall, setting up an imperium in imperio, as negligent and defiant of the laws of their own making as they were of the Constitution of their country, which they had sworn to support. What do they say? They say they have not gone into this business?

Now I come to a point which will delay me but a very few minutes longer. It is very clear that it would not be necessary to my purpose to consider whether they went in or not. I hold that the Constitution means that a majority of the members of a Legislature can elect. I hold that a minority among the people cannot defeat the exercise of this right, nor a minority of legislators. It is a great right secured to the people by the highest fundamental law of the land. It is a right which is secured to the representatives of the people that it is not in the power of minorities to defeat. Senators, it has a stronger and a sterner security. You do injustice to yourselves and to your country when you tell me that the Constitution of your country can be thus torn asunder by these miserable miscreants. It is too strong for them. Do not sacrifice the substance to the shadow. The substance is, shall a sovereign State, through the persons to whose hands she has committed the right of sending her ambassadors to this body, be defeated by a minority? I say that the electors to whom this power is confided shall be allowed to exercise it, so far as I am concerned. The question on which this case rests has been determined in the House of Representatives for sixty years. The substance is a fair election by those who are entitled to make it. The forms are the means by which you arrive at it. I will break down all the forms to get at the substance; but here I say the forms were followed. By the constitution of Indiana she had a joint convention. The joint convention was regularly called by the constitution; it was regularly assembled by the consent of both branches, because a majority of the Senate and a majority of the other House went in. It is true three of the Senators said they went in to look on. Well, sir, when I have got them there, I will keep them for a better purpose. They might have gone in to scoff; I will keep them there for the public good. They were bodily present, and I will use them.

This convention having been called by the constitution, having been constituted of the Senate and House of Representatives, it was a legal body known to the constitution. It was made, it was true, for the purpose of counting the votes for Governor, and for no other purpose under the constitution, for that was the only reason for which they were called together; but there stood the persons to whose hands was committed the right to elect United States Senators. Indiana had been without one for two years, she would be without another, in addition to that one, for two more years. That convention, according to the usage of Indiana, and of every other State in this Union but three, was the proper body to elect Senators. When they discharged the duty of counting the votes for Governor, the President of the convention, according to the usage, said, "I adjourn this body until a subsequent day." It met again, and then he declared, "I adjourn it to a certain day to elect two United States Senators for the State of Indiana." It met. A large majority of those on whom the Constitution of the United States, and of their own State, devolved this duty, assembled and performed the work. They have sent their Senators here. Can you send them away? Those who protest against their election do not complain of want of notice, and they do not say it was done fraudulently; they do not say eighty-three members had not the right to elect; but they say, "we devised a scheme which we thought would defeat an election." Will you, Senators of the United States, maintain it? Will you become particeps to this great fraud—it is nothing more in my idea. I charge it on no other man; but I ask, will you become a party to this iniquity, this violation of the Constitution of the United States, and the constitution of their own State, in order to defeat the will of Indiana. We know nothing of the will of Indiana, so far as the election of Senators is concerned, except from her Legislature, from the majority of the members of the two bodies. I say I will maintain her sovereignty, I will preserve her representation, and thereby I will perpetuate the interests of my country, the Constitution of the Union, the constitutions of the States, the rights and sovereignty of the States, and crush out faction.

Mr. HALE. Mr. President, I do not mean to occupy the time of the Senate a great while; and as to attention, I do not hope for that at all; but as I look upon this as an exceedingly important question, I simply wish to place the grounds on which I shall act before the Senate. It is not for me to say whether they will have any influence. Suffice it that they justify my own conduct.

When I came here at the commencement of the last Congress, the gentleman sitting by my right—and as I am speaking from the Journal I will give the name—the Hon. JAMES HARLAN, from the State of Iowa—was here claiming his seat as a Senator duly elected by the Legislature of that State. The circumstances of that case as they exist in my memory were substantially these: in pursuance of a law of the State of Iowa, there was a joint convention of the two branches of the Legislature for the purpose of choosing a Senator. That convention met, and not being able to effect a choice on the first day, they adjourned in pursuance of an express authority of law to a day certain. I pass over the intermediate adjournments—I believe there were several—and come to the day on which the election was made. Upon that day thus appointed by the convention agreeably to an adjournment, which they not only had authority, but were compelled by law to make, the convention met; but, upon that day, a majority of the Senate of the State, for purposes satisfactory, at least, to themselves, declined to meet; and the remainder of the convention, acting upon the assumption that that convention having once been legally formed, continued to be one body, competent, by the Constitution, to elect a Senator of the United States, in which I believed then, and believe now, they were right, proceeded to elect the Hon. JAMES HARLAN, and gave him his certificate; and he came here and took his seat. I believed then, and I believe now, that he was as well entitled to his seat as any man upon this floor; and I said something then for which I remember I was rebuked by an honorable Senator not now among the living—Hon. Judge Butler, of South Carolina. I said, and I repeat the same thing now, that so clear to my mind was that case that as I weighed the arguments, there had not been anything that came up even to the dignity of sophistry impugning the right of the Hon. Mr. HARLAN, under that election, to a seat on this floor. I believed so then honestly; I have believed so ever since; I believe so now; and I will always act as I acted then.

But, sir, a very decided majority of the Senate of the United States, among which majority was neither the honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. TOOMBS,] nor the honorable Senator from Ohio, [Mr. PUGH,] judged differently, and the ground assumed in the argument was, that a continuing assent in every meeting of the convention on the part of both branches of the Iowa Legislature was wanting, and that if, in any stage of the proceeding, either branch chose to withdraw its assent, it was competent for it to do so, and when it had done so, the power by which the convention was organized ceased, and it ceased to have authority to choose a Senator, and therefore as the case was stated in the argument, as I recollect it—of course I do not pretend to be verbally accurate, for I have not looked at it since—a majority of this body voted, "that JAMES HARLAN is not entitled to his seat as Senator from Iowa;" and the yeas which declared that, under the circumstances, Mr. HARLAN was not entitled to his seat were, according to the Journal, Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Biggs, Butler, Cass, Clay, Comegys, Crittenden, Dodge, Evans, Fitzpatrick, Geyer, Hunter, Iverson, Jones of Iowa, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Pratt, Reid, Rusk, Sebastian, Stuart, Toucey, Weller, and Wright.

That is history. That was less than two years ago. The honorable Mr. HARLAN, on that vote vacated his seat here and went home, and that stands as the judgment of the Senate upon that case. I thought then, I have thought ever since, I think still, the Senate were wrong, but my individual opinion had to yield to the deliberate judgment of this body.

Mr. TOOMBS. What was the majority?

Mr. HALE. The yeas were 28, and the nays 18; the majority was ten. Well, sir, a case somewhat similar, not parallel, presents itself now from the State of Indiana. I have not listened to all the arguments that have been adduced upon this subject; and, therefore, in the few remarks I shall make, I may not follow the train of argument that has been suggested by any Senator who has addressed the Senate. I did hear a considerable part of the statement that was made by the honorable Senator from Ohio, in opening the case. The case from Indiana is different from the case in Iowa; but similar to it in one particular, and in that particular which, in the Iowa case, was supposed to be controlling, and that is, that at the time when the purported election was made, there was not the assent of a majority of each House to the convention. In other respects it is different from the Iowa case, as I understand the matter, and I will thank any Senator to correct me if I misstate the facts. A good deal has been said about a convention being formed of the two Houses of the Indiana Legislature, for the purpose of receiving and counting the votes for Governor. I do not so understand the history of the case. I do not understand that there was a convention of the two Houses in any sense of the word; but that, by the requirements of the organic law, the constitution of Indiana, the two Houses were required to be present when the Speaker of the House of Representatives should open and count the votes. The constitution required them to be present, and they, or a portion of them, were present at that time; and after completing the business for which they were assembled, adjourned to a subsequent day.

The Constitution of the United States says—and it is hardly worth while to repeat the language—that Senators shall be chosen by the Legislatures of the States. That word "Legislature" has some meaning; but it has been argued, if I have understood the argument, that, when it comes to the choice of Senators, it cannot mean the Legislature in its legislative character, because there is no assent of the Governor required; and hence it is said to be manifest that the Constitution could not have meant the Legislature in its legislative capacity.

Mr. TOOMBS. If the Senator alludes to my argument, I will say that I gave a different reason. It was, that all the States but three have held that though the majority of one branch may be one way, if a greater majority of the other is the other way, that election is good. That is the principle at the bottom of it.

Mr. HALE. I did not refer particularly to the Senator from Georgia, for I do not mean, as I said in the opening, to follow the train of any particular gentleman, but as I understand the scope of the argument, it has certainly been presented in that way more than once. The honorable Senator from Ohio nods assent. Then the argument is urged that the election of a Senator cannot be a legislative act, because it does not need the assent of the Governor. Now, sir, the Legislature is entirely independent of the veto of the Executive; and because some constitutions give to the Governor a qualified veto upon an act of the Legislature, that does not make him any part of the Legislature. "The supreme legislative power in this State," says the constitution of my own State, "shall be vested in a Senate and House of Representatives." They are the Legislature; they are the supreme legislative power; and yet, by the same constitution, the Governor has a qualified veto upon the acts of the two Houses, but that does not make him a part of the Legislature.

Mr. PUGH. Will the Senator allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. HALE. Certainly.

Mr. PUGH. In some of the constitutions of the States in force at the time the Constitution of the United States was adopted, the language is, that the legislative power shall be vested in the Governor, Council, and House of Representatives; and yet, in none of these States, was the Governor allowed to have anything to do with the choice of Senators?

Mr. HALE. That may be very true; but in some other States it is different. It is different in the one with which I am most familiar; the constitution of my own State which declares that the supreme legislative power shall be vested in two Houses, and still the Governor has a qualified veto. But, sir, I apprehend it makes no sort of odds whether you say it is to be done in one capacity or another; so long as the Constitution says that the choice shall be made by the Legislature—that means some body; it does not mean a certain set of individuals, but it means a body known to the Constitution as the Legislature, and to that it has reference, and not to the individual members who compose it. Now, let me take this simple doctrine of a bare majority. We have lately had an illustration of this in a matter which is considerable interesting to myself in my own State. Our constitution is somewhat peculiar in the formation of the Legislature, the popular branch consisting of a little over three hundred members, and the Senate of only twelve; so that six men in the Senate of New Hampshire at any time have a veto upon the three hundred of the popular branch. Well, sir, the Legislature of New Hampshire, during the present week, undertook to exercise the power of electing a Senator granted by the Constitution of the United States, and one hundred and eighty-five of them upon the first ballot, being a very large and decided majority of the whole number constituting both branches, upon the first ballot threw their votes for one individual; but it never occurred to them by any possibility that, when they had done that they had made an election, although a very large majority of the members of the Legislature had concurred in it; and the pretense was never set up in that State that that was anything but the beginning of an election. I remember a case in the history of that State, when the popular branch by a very decided majority had chosen a gentleman to represent the State in this body, and the Senate upon the question of concurring in his election were divided six to six. Six men held between two and three hundred at bay, and the election went over; and the State of New Hampshire remained unrepresented in this body until another year came round, when the people expressed their will through the medium of a popular election, and another gentleman was chosen.

Again, sir, in this very State of Indiana, if the history comes to me aright, the Senate of the State, two years before this election, stood out against an election; but the eloquent Senator from Georgia, in all his denunciations against those traitorous wretches who have violated their constitutional oaths, and their duty, and who are ready to bring anarchy upon the Government, has no word of censure, no word of condemnation, for the men that kept the Legislature of Indiana from choosing Senators at the preceding meeting, when, if they had gone into a convention and chosen, it is very possible, not to say probable, that gentlemen of another political character would have been elected. I regret exceedingly that when the honorable Senator means, as he says he means, and as I believe he means, to be just—though he admits he is a little coarse—he did not, in that honest indignation which denounced traitors and factionists, find a little indignation to pour out upon those men who kept the State of Indiana partially unrepresented on this floor during nearly the whole of the last Congress, by refusing to go into a convention for the purpose of choosing a Senator. I should have liked the justice, coarse as it was, if it had come in equal showers upon the traitors and factionists that helped to keep Republicans out, as well as upon those who tried to keep Democrats out, but could not do it.

Well, now, sir, what is this case? I have looked at the precedents that have been presented in the senatorial history of the contests there have been for seats on this floor, and they have not been very many, nor have the points that have been presented been very complicated; and I believe that up to the time of the election of my honorable friend from Iowa, there never had been an occasion when one branch of the Legislature of any State came to the Senate, and made proclamation that by the usurpation of a coordinate branch of the Legislature, it had been defrauded of the prerogative which the Constitution of the United States conferred upon it; that the rights, the immunities, and the privileges which had been confided to it by the Constitution and by the vote of its constituents, had by a usurpation been wrested from it, and it had been nullified and its voice silenced by a usurpation. I believe that up to the time the Senate of Iowa made that complaint, it was never heard on the floor of the Senate of the United States. It was heard then, I believed then, and believe now, unjustly so; I believed the Senate of Iowa had no right to complain; that the forms, and the spirit, and intent of the constitution had been complied with, and everything had been done which they had a right to ask, and it was mere contumacy, mere factious opposition, which induced a majority of them to withhold their presence. But, sir, this body, acting upon the high functions which the Constitution devolves upon it, as the judge of the elections of its own members, had so tender a regard for State rights and State sovereignty, and for the relations due from one coordinate branch of a Legislature to another, that upon that complaint, unfounded as I believed it was, a majority of ten of this House solemnly recorded upon the enduring Journals of the Senate their judgment, in their high capacity as judges under the Constitution, that my honorable friend from Iowa was not entitled to his seat. Now, I ask sophistry—I do not ask justice, coarse or fine, but I ask sophistry—to point out a reason that can justify the expulsion of the Senator from Iowa from his seat, and can give seats to those gentlemen who are claiming them from the State of Indiana?

I agree with the Senator from Georgia that the question, so far as it relates to the individuals who are holding the seats, sinks into utter insignificance; it is not worthy of being weighed in the balance for a moment. If I know my own heart—and I appeal to the Searcher of hearts to bear witness to my integrity when I say it—if I could do it consistently with the obligations which I have assumed by taking a seat on this floor, it would afford me pleasure to record my vote in favor of the sitting members. The intercourse which I have had with them has been such that I certainly have no disposition to do anything towards them or either of them but what is dictated by the kindest considerations of personal regard; but, sir, I stand here on the same ground that the honorable Senator from Georgia stands, and I agree that considerations relating merely to the persons or individuals that are to occupy these places sink into utter insignificance.

Mr. President, the doctrine of majorities which has been so much dwelt upon seems to me to be a doctrine which I have heard qualified upon this floor, and qualified by no man more eloquently, more lucidly, and to my mind more satisfactorily, than by the honorable Senator from Georgia. I remember, not long ago, to have heard him declare that the world made a great stride when it discovered that minorities had rights, and that majorities should not always rule over them. And, sir, what is the idea of constitutional government? What mean parchment, and paper, and ink? What mean the conclaves of the patriot fathers who founded this family of Commonwealths, and incorporated into written instruments the provisions by which Government was to be carried on and its administration made progressive? Simply to protect the rights of minorities. Majorities can take care of themselves. Majorities can always, unrestrained and untrammelled by constitutional prohibitions, carry their point. But, sir, the idea, the commencement, the continuation, and the consummation of the great idea upon which rests republican and constitutional government, is the protection of minorities. When the honorable Senator from Georgia says to-night that minorities cannot defeat and shall not defeat the operation of Government, he utters a sentiment, which, pushed to its extremity, would overturn and trample under foot all constitutional government. Sir, what are your rules here for? For the protection of minorities. Why does the President of the Senate, why does any gentleman sitting in his chair, day after day, and every day, state a proposition and say that it requires the unanimous consent of the Senate? Simply because the wisdom of our fathers has provided in the Constitution, and in our rules, constant and continually recurring provisions for the protection of the rights of the minorities. And, sir, if we may look into the policy which dictated, and the wisdom which formed, the constitution of the State of Indiana, we may see that with a conservative spirit they were careful to preserve in their Senate a check upon the popular impulse, which was to be preserved, and was to make the machinery of government move on more harmoniously, more equitably, and more justly, carrying out the great idea of the popular will, and at the same time securing the individual rights of minorities; and therefore they have made their Senate a perpetual body elected for four years, half going out alternately every two years. Because a majority of that body thus constituted for the express purpose of checking and controlling the popular branch, have, in the discharge of their constitutional duties, seen fit to exercise the prerogative which the constitution has devolved upon them, are they to be denounced upon this floor and in this Hall as perjured traitors and factionists, who are fighting against the very government which protects them, the very constitution which creates them, the very State which shields them? No, sir; I do not so read it. I believe that when the Constitution of the United States says Senators shall be elected by the Legislature, it means that they shall be elected by a body, a political body known to the laws, known to the Constitution, recognized in the common sense of mankind, not as a congregation of individuals, but as a political entity created by the constitution, and recognized as such.

The Senator from Georgia asked, if this power is conferred upon the two branches of the Legislature, may they yield it, or give it up? No, sir, not at all; they may not. It is not competent for the House of Representatives, or for the Senate, to yield up one jot, one iota, of the power which has been conferred upon them; but they may prescribe the form and manner in which that power shall be exercised. Let me illustrate this. For certain purposes in the constitution of my own State, the two Houses are required to meet in convention. If the people should fail to choose a Governor by a majority of all the votes, although one candidate might have a very large plurality, the constitution devolves upon the Legislature the duty of meeting in joint convention, and counting the votes, and making a choice. I concede that when the three hundred members of the popular branch and the twelve members of the Senate assemble, they are merged; they are no longer separate bodies; they are a convention, and if every one of the twelve Senators should walk out; if not one of them should be personally present, yet within the purview of the constitution, and within the meaning of its provisions, they would every one of them be present; and our journals never ask in the elections whether any particular Senator voted or did not vote. When they have come into the convention they are merged; they are no longer Senators; they are members of the convention, and if, individually, the whole twelve should go out, that would not effect the legal constitutional organization of the body any more than if twelve Representatives should go out. They are constitutionally present, although, in fact, they may personally be absent. It was upon that ground that I based the election of the Senator from Iowa, because the Senate of Iowa, having gone into the convention; having consented to its organization, were, within the meaning and purview of the constitution, present; and the vote was just as good, whether they were absent or present, if a majority of the whole number were there. But, sir, as I understand the history of this election in Indiana, the Senate of that State never consented, and I believe it is conceded that they never consented; but it is contended that their consent was not necessary; that all that was to be done was to notify them that they might come if they saw fit, and if they did not come, it was their own fault. It is admitted, as I understand now—though it seems to me that this case takes a different ground and rests on different positions from those on which it was first presented—that prior to the meeting of the so-called convention, for the purpose of counting the votes for Governor, the whole Senate was legally qualified by the officer constitutionally empowered so to do, to wit: the Lieutenant Governor. A different question, as I understand, was raised at the commencement of this controversy, and it was then contended that three out of the fifty were not legally members of the Senate; and that twenty-four having concurred in this election, they were a majority of the Senate. That point seems now to be abandoned, and it is admitted that all the fifty members of the Senate were qualified by the officer constitutionally authorized to do it, and that being thus qualified, there was a Senate consisting of fifty members. I lay out of the case altogether the provision of the Indiana constitution requiring two thirds of each House to make a quorum; but by those fifty Senators thus elected, there was neither the form nor the substance of an assent given to this election. There was a simple notice issued by the presiding officer that he would do so and so, and when they got there they adjourned, and a minority of the Senate usurped the place constitutionally belonging to the majority.

Sir, you may establish this precedent, and I suppose when you have done so it will overrule the precedent that was established here less than two years ago, by the assent of a very decided majority of this body. But, sir, if I may be pardoned the presumption, I appeal to Senators—I do not appeal to the honorable Senator from Georgia, or the honorable Senator from Ohio, for I will do them the justice to say, that the position which they took on the Iowa case fully justifies the position which they take now, and if they have nothing else to commend them to my judgment, in this particular they have at least that of consistency; but I appeal to gentlemen who took a different view; I appeal to gentlemen who recorded their solemn votes less than two years ago against the right of the honorable Senator from Iowa to his seat, to see to it that that solemn, recorded judgment of the Senate on the facts presented in that case, be not overruled by the decision which is to be made on this occasion. I beseech you, if for nothing else, to be careful of the reputation of the Senate. Sir, the great mass of the American people are honest; they are not sophists; they are not casuists; but they are honest, and they will take a common sense view of this matter; and you cannot get it out of their heads. They will ask, and ask, and ask, why is it that less than two years ago, on a case not so strong as this, a decided majority of the Senate of the United States voted that Iowa was not entitled to be represented on this floor by the Senator of her choice; and that in a case somewhat similar, but not so strong in behalf of the sitting members, as was the Iowa case, they come to directly an opposite conclusion? Sir, you cannot hide the fact from the American people. They will ask the question, and they will ask it from one end of this country to the other. They will examine it, and I tell you, sir, it will be a keener intellect than mine that can ever discover any difference than that the Senator from Iowa was what the Senator from Georgia was pleased to term a "Black Republican," and the other two are black Democrats. That is the only difference which men, who have not more astute intellects than I have, can possibly discover in these two cases, and it will require a good deal of argument, a good deal of sophistry, a good deal of casuistry, to make the people believe that there was or is anything else in it.

Mr. President, I must do the subject the justice to say that I believe, if you will read the history of the contested elections which have been decided in this body, from the adoption of the Constitution down to the present time, you will find that the proceedings of the Senate of the United States, sitting in their high capacity of judges, have been characterized by a degree of moderation, of candor, and of impartiality in the highest degree creditable to the American Senate and the American people; but I tell you that, if you lay down the law in one case for a political opponent in Iowa different from the manner in which you lay it down to your political friends in Indiana, you will do more to shake the confidence of the American people in the justice of this great tribunal of the nation than anything and everything that has ever occurred in its history.

I am not going to follow the Senator from Georgia over his road of precedents; I am not going to show what was understood by the term "Legislature," and what has been done in this case and that. I confine myself to the broad, plain, palpable provisions of the Constitution, and the very emphatic action which the Senate has taken upon these provisions in times past. Sir, this is a time eminently favorable to the decision of this question upon high grounds, upon such grounds as become American Senators, occupying the conspicuous and distinguished position which they do. Why do I say so? Because you have an opportunity at this time to follow the precedent which you set in the case of a political opponent, when it applies to your political friends, when by no possibility can it affect in the remotest degree your party supremacy upon this floor. Vacate these two seats, as in my judgment the plainest provisions of the Constitution eminently and absolutely require; send this matter back to the State of Indiana, and in all human probability she will do what the State of Iowa did, send the same gentlemen back; but whether she would or not, is a question that ought to be foreign to the consideration which any gentleman will bring to bear upon the decision of the point before the Senate. Here is an opportunity to be just, not to say magnanimous, for I ask nothing from magnanimity. I simply ask for justice; justice in the name of the Constitution, and in the name of the people whose rights we are all sworn to protect. In behalf of the people of Indiana—and we are all of us Senators of Indiana, because we are Senators of the United States—in behalf of that people, whose rights we are bound to protect, I ask that these seats may be vacated.

It has been said by the Senator from Georgia, that nobody is here asking their dismissal; that Indiana is here, through her Governor, the Speaker of her House of Representatives, and the President of her Senate, through her organized forms, asking that these men may sit here. Sir, I deny it, I deny it absolutely and totally. Indiana is not here, and she cannot come here, except through her forms, and in the manner prescribed by the Constitution of the United States. The State of Indiana is here by the Constitution of the United States, every man of the State is here appealing to every Senator, and asking him by every consideration which can address itself to his mind as a Senator of this great nation, to guard and protect the rights of each and every State, and of each and every individual in the respective States. It is unjust to Indiana to say or to suggest that she is here asking anything else but what the Constitution gives her. If these gentlemen are not here under the Constitution, does Indiana want them? Nay, sir, do they themselves want to occupy these seats, if they cannot occupy them in pursuance of the provisions of the Constitution which they, and you, and I have sworn to protect?

I may be mistaken, I may over-estimate the importance of the consequence attached to the decision of this question; but, sir, I am not one of those who believe that the liberties and privileges of this country are to be preserved by any miraculous interposition of Divine Providence. I believe there will be meted out to us what has been meted out to the nations that have gone before us; and that if, in the hour of madness or of party power we shut our eyes to the clear teachings of the Constitution, and turn a deaf ear to the pleadings of right under the Constitution, and for any purpose undertake to do that which those high considerations will not justify, we strike a fatal blow at the perpetuity of our institutions. Sir, the Constitution of the United States was established, as its framers say, amongst other things, to maintain and preserve justice—justice to ourselves, and to our posterity—and, sir, we shall shake, irreparably shake, the confidence of this whole people in this high tribunal, if, in the discharge of the highest function which the Constitution has devolved upon us, to wit: the decision of the right of our own members to seats here, we depart from the plain teachings, and clear provisions of that organic law which we have all sworn to support.

Mr. DOUGLAS. Mr. President, I do not intend to enter into the discussion of this question, but simply to state the principles by which my vote will be guided; resting the vote upon those principles without going into an argument. My vote in this case will be governed by the same principles that actuated it in the Iowa case, at the last Congress. In that case, the two Houses of the Iowa Legislature had agreed to go into an election; and, when the final day to which they adjourned arrived, a majority of one House was there and a minority of the Senate; but there was a majority of the whole number of both Houses present—not a majority of the Senate, but a large majority of the House of Representatives.

Mr. HARLAN. The record shows that there was a majority of the Senate present, as well as a majority of the other House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I will not go into the controversy. I am stating the case as I understood it. I understood that a minority of the Senate and a majority of the other House were present; making a majority of the whole number constituting the two Houses, although not a majority of each. I held on that occasion, in the speech which I made against the claim of the sitting member, that inasmuch as the Constitution of the United States required that a Senator should be elected by the Legislature, and inasmuch as the constitution of Iowa required the Legislature to be composed of two bodies, there must be a majority of each body present in order to constitute such a Legislature as could elect a Senator; and in Iowa, there not being a majority of each body present, it was not a Legislature authorized to elect a Senator. I will read a paragraph from my remarks on that occasion:

"I have shown, by the language of the constitution of Iowa, that its Legislature consists of two branches—a Senate and a House of Representatives—and that a majority of each constitutes a quorum, and that no less number than a majority of each can perform any other duty than that of compelling the attendance of absent members. Now, let me ask, how was the Senator from Iowa elected? By a Legislature composed of two branches, with a majority of each present, constituting a quorum? If not, he was not elected by the Legislature of the State of Iowa. There could be no Legislature without the presence of a quorum of each branch. So says the constitution of that State, and that constitution is in accordance with the general usage and the constitutions of the other States of this Union."

I shall not stop to discuss the question whether I was right or wrong then. My belief, after a thorough examination at that time, was, that I was right, and I have seen nothing since to change my convictions. Applying these principles to this case in Indiana, I find that there was a majority of the House of Representatives and a minority of the Senate of the State present, making a majority of the whole number constituting the two Houses, but not a majority of each House. In this respect the Iowa case and the Indiana case are identical, and the objection which compelled me to vote against the Iowa Senator, to wit: there not being a majority of each House present, exists in full force in the Indiana case, and hence I am compelled to vote against the admission of the sitting Senators on the same ground. On that point the cases are identical, but there is a difference between them in other respects. In Iowa the two Houses had agreed to go into the election on the day when it was effected, but they did not do it in Indiana. The Senate of Indiana never agreed to go into the election, and did not do it. It was argued that, inasmuch as both branches of the Iowa Legislature had agreed to go into the election on that day, it was the fault of those who staid out that they did not go. My answer to that was, that, under the Constitution of the United States, we are required to come here each day to transact business, and if we stay away it is our own fault; we are in default by staying away; and yet, if our absence reduces the body to less than a quorum; its power to act ceases except to compel the attendance of absent members. I apply that reasoning to this joint convention for the election of Senator; although in Iowa they had agreed to go in, they failed to do it, and there being only a minority of the Senate present, although those who were absent were absent by their own fault, yet their absence reducing the Senate below a quorum deprived them of the power of acting. If I was right in that reasoning, as applicable to Iowa, I am right in it as applicable to Indiana. I will not stop to argue the question; I will only say that now my vote is governed by the identical consideration that controlled it then, and I will allow my vote to stand on the record then made.

Mr. TRUMBULL. After consultation with a few persons who take some interest in this discussion, I wish to suggest to the Senate that we agree to take the vote to-morrow at twelve o'clock without debate. If that be the common understanding, those Senators who desire to vote upon it can all be in their places at that time; and then let whatever debate there is to be go on to-night. ["Agreed!"] The Senator from South Carolina, I think, has consulted some of the parties, and will second the proposition I have made.

Mr. HAMMOND. I believe that proposition will be agreeable to all parties, and carried out in good faith, that to-morrow at twelve o'clock, without debate, the vote shall be taken. At the same time, in response to the Senator from Illinois, I will say a single word. A majority of the Senate was present at the first meeting of the joint convention in Indiana.

Mr. DOUGLAS. That is very true; and so it was in the Iowa case. A majority was present at the first meeting, but not at the time of the election. Hence the two cases are exactly parallel on the point that controls my vote.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask general consent to make a conference report. ["Agreed!"] I see that the Clerk of the other House is waiting. I will defer it until his message is delivered.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. AILEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 200), making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to the respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from the following amendments: ninth, tenth, eleventh, thirteenth, thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth, fifty-sixth, fifty-eighth, fifty-ninth, and sixtieth.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to, and concur in, the following amendments of the Senate: fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, eleventh, nineteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, thirty-fourth, thirty-ninth, fortieth, forty-second, forty-fifth, forty-sixth, forty-seventh, fifty-second, fifty-fourth, and sixty-third.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: strike out all of the said amendment after the word "that," in line one, and insert these words: "The Secretary of the Treasury may make such allowances to the officers and men of the Army and Navy while engaged on coast survey service for subsistence, in addition to their compensation, as he may deem necessary, not exceeding the sum authorized by the Treasury regulation of the 11th of May, 1854."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their second amendment.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their twelfth amendment, with an amendment, as follows: In the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the word "painting" and insert "painting;" and at the end of the amendment, insert as follows: "but this provision shall not be construed as to apply to the execution of the designs heretofore made and accepted from Crawford and Rogers."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: In the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the word "three" and insert, in lieu thereof, the word "two."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the eighteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: In the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the word "three" and insert, in lieu thereof, the word "two."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the twentieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment insert as follows:

Provided, That no part of the sums herein appropriated for the completion of custom houses and marine hospitals, excepting those for Charleston and New Orleans, shall be expended until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the sums respectively appropriated will complete the buildings for which they are intended, and until arrangements shall be made to carry this act into effect.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their twenty-eighth amendment.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the thirty-fifth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows: after the word "items," in the third line of said amendment, strike out the words, "five thousand five," and insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "and paying fees of witnesses before the committees of the Senate, seven thousand seven."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the forty first amendment of the Senate, and that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives as an additional amendment, with an amendment as follows: after the word "that," in the sixth line of said amendment, strike out the words, "they shall receive no fees or commissions," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "their compensation, including fees, shall not exceed $3,000 each, per annum."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the forty third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: after the word "and," in the eighth line of said amendment, strike out the words, "such sum as may be necessary," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "$3,200."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their forty-fourth amendment, with an amendment as follows: strike out the whole of the amendment of the House of Representatives, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"That no part of the appropriations which may be at any time made for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress, shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, unless such clerk, messenger, or other attendant, be so employed by a resolution of one of said Houses."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their forty-eighth amendment.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the fifty fifth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: After the words "United States," in the fourth line of said amendment, insert the words "for expenses and disbursements."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their sixty-second amendment.

Mr. BROWN. I hope, before we concur in the report of the committee, we shall, at least, be allowed the privilege of having these amendments explained to us, and that we shall take them up seriatim, and understand what they are. Nineteen twentieths of all your vicious legislation comes in, in just this way. Here you agree to some things, and disagree to others, upon numbers. You agree to amendments which, under ordinary circumstances, nobody would dream of sanctioning, and you are asked to take it all on trust—not the trust which you give to regular committees of the Senate and House of Representatives, but a committee of conference, who have had three or four hours, not three or four weeks or months—as long as they might choose—to determine what ought to be done, but they have been sitting in a committee room during the sessions of the Senate, when their minds were necessarily distracted with other matters, considering this bill, and important matters of legislation are thus overturned in a moment. You bring in the whole bulk of it here, which nobody understands, except the gentlemen who are on these committees, and we are asked to concur in the whole of it at once. I protest against it. I protest that I have the right, as a Senator, to know what this report means. Upon two or three points of it, and only two or three in which I am interested, I have got an inkling of what it does mean. One item of it is this: I do not know what the number of it is; I could not find it now, without looking over the whole record, an amendment introduced by myself, and passed through the Senate without objection; no living man could make an objection to it, to appropriate $400 to paint the iron and woodwork about a bridge in the District.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say that is in the report.

Mr. BROWN. I understood otherwise.

Mr. HUNTER. It is saved.

Mr. BROWN. What became of the court-house amendment?

Mr. HUNTER. That was not concurred in because a great many appropriations are made for the District, and the other House was opposed to it, and the chairman of the District Committee in the House said it could be well postponed until the next session.

Mr. BROWN. That is not my impression. A great many appropriations for the District! What are they? If this $400 is saved, we have that and $740 for the jail; and that is all that is saved which was asked on the part of the Senate District Committee.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is $3,000 for Pennsylvania avenue.

Mr. BROWN. That was not asked by the committee; it was never before the committee; they had nothing to do with it. We did ask, however, an appropriation for a court-house for the accommodation of the criminal court. I cannot consent to concur in the report.

Mr. HUNTER. I can inform the Senator in regard to any of his amendments on which he desires information. We have saved more than he thinks; we have saved his legislation in regard to streets.

Mr. BROWN. We have none.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes; there are two long sections.

Mr. BROWN. We did not get a single appropriation for a street anywhere.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I suppose this report and all the amendments will appear in the morning papers, so that we may understand them. Let us postpone them until to-morrow morning, and go on with the election case.

Mr. HUNTER. They would only appear in numbers, if at all; and if we want to adjourn on Monday, we should act on this report to-night. Gentlemen, if they are willing to continue the session, can lay it over.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The papers will explain. Mr. HUNTER. I think not. The amendments can now be read, if that be insisted upon.

Several Senators. Read them.

Mr. BROWN. I simply want to say this: I have been here now a long time, and I have voted in the dark about as often as I choose to do it. I want to understand what I am doing; and as we are paid by the year, I know of no pressing necessity for closing the session on Monday. I would rather continue to sit until July, or August, or even December, than be compelled to vote for things that I know nothing about. I do not understand this report. Here you are told that amendment number fifteen is agreed to with an amendment—certain words put in. What does that mean? Then, amendments ten and twenty, and something else, are agreed to with something else to them. I protest against being called upon to vote for things in bulk, after that fashion.

But I was coming to the matter of my District court-house. When the amendment was introduced here, with the unanimous concurrence, I think, of the District Committee, but perhaps there was a single dissident, to provide for the District courts, I explained the matter, and although there was a murmur at first all around the Senate; on explanation, everybody saw it was right, and that it was economy to grant it. You have to-night locked up in your jail not less than eighty, perhaps one hundred persons committed, awaiting trial? Why are they not tried? Because you provide no place in which your courts can be held. Your criminal court cannot sit because it has no house in which to hold its sessions.

Some Senators talk about requiring the people of Washington to provide a court-house. Provide it for whom? For the United States. Is this great Government to demand that a mere municipality shall provide a house in which its judges shall sit, and administer justice under its laws? So far as the municipality is concerned, they do provide their own court-houses; their own police magistrates do have their own houses. But you have a jurisdiction of your own; you have judges of your own; you have courts of your own. Not only your judge, but your marshal, and all who have anything to do with it, are appointed by the authority of the United States; it is under your jurisdiction. But for this criminal court, one of the most important to the Government, you have provided no house of accommodation; and you have one hundred men to-night locked up in your jail here, fed at the public expense, perhaps one half of them innocent, kept there for weeks and months at a time; kept there because the court cannot sit, wanting a house in which to hold its sessions. With this explanation the Senate voted the appropriation. The committee of conference has sacrificed it; given it up, I dare say, without a struggle. It is all wrong, sir. There are other appropriations in the bill sacrificed in the same manner. The Committee on Finance takes particular pains to protect all its amendments, and everybody else's are sacrificed, and given up, surrendered, trodden under foot; and you are asked to sanction it under this general numbering of one, five, fifteen, twenty-five, and so on. You are asked to do it without knowing what you are doing. You never know what is in the appropriation bills until you read them after the President has approved them, and they become the law of the land. I protest against it; I want to know what is in the bill; what I am voting for, and what I am voting against. Therefore, I ask that each of the amendments shall be read in its connection and context; and that we shall have separate votes on each proposition.

Mr. HUNTER. The report of the committee of conference is an entire thing. You cannot divide it; you cannot have separate votes.

Mr. BIGLER. I suggest that the chairman of the committee pass over the amendments rapidly, and state what they are. He can do it in a very few minutes.

Mr. BRODERICK and others. Let us hear them read.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. FOSTER.) The amendments will be read.

Mr. HUNTER. All that it is necessary to read is those amendments from which the Senate recede. There are not a great many of them. Those can be read. The Senator from Mississippi will read that he is very much mistaken; more of his amendments have been saved than have been lost.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The amendments from which the Senate are to recede, according to the report of the conference committee, will be read.

The Secretary read, as follows:

Ninth amendment:

For continuation of the filling up of ravine, and grading of Judiciary Square, $7,000.

Tenth amendment:

For continuing the grading and planting with trees the unimproved portion of the Mall, $10,000.

Fifteenth amendment:

For payment to the Secretary of the Senate of the sums paid by him to the representatives of Senators Bell, Butler, and Rusk, under the resolution of the Senate of the 10th of March, 1853, directing the payment of the same, out of the contingent fund of the Senate, to the representatives of the said Senators respectively, $2,589 64.

Thirtieth amendment:

For the extension of the court-house portion of the City Hall so as to provide necessary and suitable accommodations for the several courts of the District of Columbia, including furniture, heating apparatus, inclosure, and other necessary improvements, $30,000: Provided, That no obligation shall be incurred, or contract entered into, which looks to any increased appropriation by the United States for said purpose.

Thirty-seventh amendment:

For contingent expenses of the Territory of Kansas, $9,003 75, to be distributed under the direction of the Secretary of State, upon the production of satisfactory vouchers.

Thirty-eighth amendment:

For making the surveys of the confirmed private land claims in California, the surveyor general is hereby authorized to pay such sum as he may deem reasonable, according to the circumstances connected with each case, not exceeding at the rate of twenty five dollars for each mile of the boundary lines of any claim, and also for such lines as may necessarily be run and marked or measured, in order to connect the lines of such claim with those of the adjacent public surveys: Provided, That the surveyor or surveyors hereafter executing any such survey of a private claim, shall accompany his or their return of such survey with his affidavit that no compensation has been received by him, directly or indirectly, or agreed to be paid to or received by him for the same, from any quarter other than the Government of the United States: Provided, That it shall be the duty of the surveyor general of California to award each contract to execute such surveys to the lowest responsible bidder, he being a practical surveyor, after reasonable notice, to be published in two newspapers of the largest circulation in the State of California.

Fifty-sixth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That when, in the absence of a secretary of legation at Constantinople, who discharges the duty of dragoman, or in like manner, when there is no dragoman at that mission, the consul, or consul general, of the United States who shall act as dragoman, shall receive the compensation now provided by law for a dragoman, and for such time as he shall act as such.

Fifty-eighth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That to enable the Secretary of the Interior to carry into effect the twenty-fourth section of the civil and diplomatic act of March 3, 1855, by paying the claims on file as ordered for assessment by Messrs. Eaton and Hubley, and Washington and Mason, commissioners under the Cherokee treaty of 1835, $30,000.

Fifty-ninth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That there shall be paid, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to Charles H. Mason, Secretary of the Territory of Washington, the difference between the salary of Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs, and the salary of the Secretary of the Territory of Washington, for the time said Charles H. Mason was acting Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs of said Territory.

Sixtieth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the salary of the surveyor general of Washington Territory shall be $3,500 a year from the commencement of the present fiscal year; and there is hereby appropriated so much as may be required for that purpose.

Mr. STUART. I understand the Secretary has now read all the amendments from which the Senate are to recede.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir. The House of Representatives recede from much more than the Senate does.

Mr. STUART. As the Senator from Mississippi only called for the reading of the amendments from which we recede, it is not necessary to occupy the time of the Senate by reading any more. The Secretary seems, however, about to go on and read all the amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The further reading of the amendments may be dispensed with by unanimous consent. Does any Senator ask for their further reading?

Mr. BROWN. If the reading of the report of the committee was commenced upon my call, I am perfectly willing to withdraw it. I am ready to vote against the report at once. So far as I am concerned, I cannot vote for it at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FOSTER.) The whole of the report has been read. The question is upon concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. IVERSON. Let us have the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAYARD. I shall vote to concur in the report of the committee of conference; for of course we cannot expect that all the action of the Senate should be acceded to by the House. There is one amendment that I feel a deep regret has not been adopted, because I think it a denial of an act of plain justice. The Senate inadvertently, I think, passed a resolution directing the payment of a certain amount to the representatives of deceased Senators who had been in their places and were sworn in and acted as Senators of the United States at the last called session of the Senate. After that resolution was passed, it became very obvious, on inquiry as to the terms of the former act, which at one time were supposed to be merely applied to the year, but in fact was a permanent act, that the order to pay out of the contingent fund of the Senate was not sanctioned by existing law; therefore, there was an amendment placed upon the bill to repay to the Secretary of the Senate what, in obedience to our order, he had paid the representatives of these parties. We leave him in that position when this report is adopted, having paid this amount under our order, and the House refuses to sanction it. I do not think the ground is sufficient to reject the bill, because, strictly, we have no right to make that order; but I think it would have been but an act of justice, on the part of the House, after their own action in reference to a mere gift of money to their employes, to have receded from that amendment. I cannot suffer this report to pass without that comment, though I shall vote for it.

Mr. STUART. I shall vote in favor of adopting this report; but I do it only as a matter of necessity, not because I agree to the items that are given. I think there is no cause of complaint against the committee of conference. I want to say that, and say it distinctly; but I do think that this mode of legislation into which the Congress of the country has fallen is of the most censurable character. It of course rests with ourselves to correct it; but in order that it may be corrected, it must be exposed. I voted to extend this session, confident that time was necessary in order that the business of the country might be fairly considered, and fairly done, until the last proposition. The last proposition for extension I voted against, because I thought I foresaw, as has happened, that we should discuss questions in the most discursive manner down to the last one or two days of the session, and that then the appropriation bills would go into the old mill—conference committees—and as they came out of conference committees they must be adopted. I say again that the fault does not lie with the conference committees. They do the best they can under the circumstances; but we should be under no such necessity at all. It ought to be understood here, and ought to be understood in the country, that there is time enough to consider these bills, and act upon each distinct proposition in both Houses.

Nor do I agree—I mean to speak with perfect respect for the other House on all occasions—in certain maxims they have laid down at all. Take the particular case alluded to by the Senator from Delaware. That is a clear case where payment ought to be made. The justice and the honor of the Senate and the country only were appealed to when we directed the payment. It stood not in conformity with law, it is true, but this bill will be a law. You may as well make a law on an appropriation bill as in any other way. If you pass it, that is the law. Here is a payment made in accordance with justice, with honor, in accordance with the gratitude of the country, and it ought to be made; and for either body to say we will not do this on an appropriation bill, but we will do something else, I say is a maxim that, like all other maxims, ought to have its exceptions. But here we are again, and here we should be if we sat here until November: the appropriation bills would be in the last nights of the session. There is no necessity for it, I say again. I wish to speak with the most perfect respect to everybody, but I state an undeniable fact which ought to go to the country, that the Congress will not correct it. There ought to be an overwhelming public opinion of the country to correct it. These appropriation bills ought to be considered in due time, and with due deliberation in respect to every item; but I say here we are again, as we have been ever since I have been in Congress, and I know not how long before, on the last night of the session; and we have either to agree to the loss of the appropriation bill or agree to the report of the committee of conference, one of the two.

While I think that the objections raised by the Senator from Mississippi, and the suggestion made by the Senator from Delaware, are sound, it is a necessity, and I am not willing to vote against the report of the committee. I shall vote to adopt it; but I do hope to live to see the day when we shall legislate in accordance with the judgment of every member of Congress. There is not a member that does not think this ought to be done. We spend the whole long months of the fore part of the session in talking about things not very consequential, and devote a great deal too much time to them, and do not come to the business of the session down to the very last moments. For my own part, I regret it deeply. I regret that the appropriation alluded to by the honorable Senator from Delaware is not made. Sir, I not only feel it as a matter of business, but I feel it as a matter of gratitude. I regret also that the amendment alluded to by my honorable friend from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown,] to extend the rooms for the accommodation of the courts here has not been agreed to. I have been there once myself, unfortunately, engaged as counsel in a cause. There is not a room in that building that is fit to keep a common school in, that is now subject to the use of the United States for courts—not one. It is a crying injustice, not only an injustice to the people of this District, but injustice to our officers and to the country, that that should remain so. That appropriation ought to have been made, but there is no help for it now. It is a question, will you lose this bill, or will you consent to these things? I must say, sir, that I think our committee, in this instance, has done unusually well. I think they have done better this time, by a great deal, than for the last four or five years, but they have not done anything like what the judgment of the Senate demanded—not because they were not inclined to do so, but because it was not in their power, and therefore it is that I trouble the Senate at all. I shall vote for this report most reluctantly, and I do not wish that my vote should be in any respect misunderstood.

Mr. BROWN. I cannot concur with my friend from Michigan, that there is any sort of necessity to compel us to adopt this report. There is none on earth unless it is the necessity of trying to adjourn on Monday; and, as I said before, I would rather Congress should sit here until the 1st of July or August or September and do things right than run them over and do them, as Senators admit they are doing them, wrong. Let the bill be rejected; introduce a new one; pass it in proper form, in the right manner; sit here and discharge your duties as Senators and Representatives for the pay you get from the national Treasury rather than give up things that you ought to have. I am not for adjourning this Congress under any supposed necessity, and leave the public business undisturbed. There is no necessity for adjourning. There is a necessity for doing the public business, and doing it right.

Now what does your legislation in reference to appropriation bills amount to? Whatever the Committee on Finance in the Senate, and the Committee of Ways and Means in the House say is right is done, and the action of all the balance of your committees is utterly ignored. I call upon the chairmen and members of other committees to rise to-night in their majesty and frown this thing down. Why, sir, so far as your appropriations are concerned you might just as well send out seven members of the Senate and nine members of the House, and tell them to make appropriations, and you give your silent acquiescence, as to allow this thing to go on. Whatever they choose to put into the bill is protected; whatever comes from other committees is trampled under foot without the slightest regard to the feelings, opinions, position, or dignity of other committees.

I have stood by and witnessed this long enough; and I am not willing to see it go on, under a supposed necessity for adjourning. There is no necessity for adjourning. The Government pays you $3,000 a year to sit here, and transact the public business; and you are inexcusable if you do not do it, and do it right. Let the bill be lost. There are one hundred appropriations in that bill, to-night, ten thousand times less meritorious than those that have been stricken down. There is the appropriation for court-rooms, brought in from my own committee: it is important to the Government on the point of economy; it is important to the Government in the point of humanity; it is important to it in every light in which you can consider it; yet it has not had a moment's attention in this committee of conference. It was stricken out without a word. Men, under the authority of the Government—possibly innocent, vast numbers of them shown to be so when brought to trial, poor, without the means of giving bail—are locked up in that miserable concern that you call the Government jail, and are kept there for months, because you do not furnish your own judge the means of trying them, so that they can show their innocence, and go free; and when a proposition is brought here to furnish the accommodations to a judge who is willing to discharge his duty, so that the thing may be done, it is stricken out in committee, and we are to agree to it upon this miserable plea of a necessity—a necessity that does not exist. You are bound to sit here and transact the public business. What Senator can go home to-night, and lay his head upon his pillow, and sleep as an honest man should sleep, while, by his neglect, poor, miserable devils are kept in jail for weeks and months together, because he refuses, by his vote, to provide the means of showing that they are innocent? I am unwilling to give my sanction to any such legislation. If the law arrests a man, the law must give him, under the Constitution, a speedy—yes, sir, a speedy and impartial trial.

Does this great Government discharge its duty to those poor unfortunates who are thrown into prison, whose great misfortune is that they are poor and unable to bail themselves out, by keeping them there for weeks and months together, and refusing them a trial for the simple reason that you have no house in which the court can sit?

Is that giving a man a speedy and impartial trial under the Constitution? Is it not delaying his trial? Is not this report now before us a persistent attempt to keep up that state of things? How does it come that your jail is crowded to-night with one hundred persons, as I have had occasion time and time again to ring in the ears of the Senate? It happens because you have no house in which your criminal court can sit.

Gentlemen say flippantly, let Washington provide a court-house; these are the prisoners of Washington. Sir, they are not the prisoners of the city or the District; they are your prisoners; they are arrested under your law, by your officers, and held in durance by your authority; and the Constitution rings and reverberates in your ears that you shall give them a speedy and impartial trial—a trial which they cannot have unless you provide a place for holding your courts. When the committee charged with the business of this District, whose duty it is to supervise its affairs, bring in a proposition, and have it passed by a unanimous vote in the Senate, it is sacrificed in your committee of conference, because it did not come from the Finance Committee. If it had been one of their amendments it would have been protected; most of their amendments have been.

I choose to say this in vindication and defense of justice and of right—not that I expect the report to be rejected. I know that the temper of the Senate is to sanction it; no word that I can utter here will prevent it; but I choose to speak in defense of the right, and to notify the country how legislation is carried on here. If the chairmen and members of other committees feel as I and the members of the committee of which I am a member feel, we would reject your report and let the bill fall. Let other committees vindicate their rights, and say that when they have brought in amendments which have received the sanction of the Senate, they are not to be sacrificed in these committees of conference.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope, Mr. President, that the report of the committee will be accepted, because I am satisfied, not only that it is the best that can be done under the circumstances, but that on the whole it is quite as well as we had any reason to expect the result would be. I do not agree with the statement that has been made by the Senator from Mississippi, with reference to this matter. What is this bill before us? An appropriation bill, as we call it. It is a bill, not only one law, as it is in form, but containing in it a great many different provisions; different laws, in fact, upon different subjects; each got in there by the course of our legislation. Now, sir, if we pass a single law—take, for instance, the provision alluded to by the honorable Senator from Mississippi, providing for the erection of a court-room in connection with the City Hall; we send it down to the House; they disagree with us; a committee of conference is appointed; they cannot agree, and the bill would necessarily fail, and I take it for granted no Senator would want to sit here until next December, until the House gave way. Why, sir, the House have just as much right to its opinions on that matter when placed in this omnibus bill, as it is called, as if it were in a single bill by itself, and it is not in the nature of things to expect, when a bill contains so many different provisions as this bill does, that both branches should agree upon all the provisions. It is natural to suppose, when the two branches of Congress differ so often upon a single bill making a single provision, that they should find grounds of difference upon a bill which makes one hundred different provisions.

Now, sir, is it right and reasonable to urge the Senate to reject this bill because there are some provisions in it, so multifarious as they are, upon which both Houses cannot agree? Do we take the position that, because we cannot agree upon everything, therefore legislation shall stop upon everything? that because we cannot agree upon certain provisions, therefore we will have no result whatever from the agreement upon those which do satisfy both branches of the Legislature? I hold to no such doctrine as this. I was in favor of this provision of the bill. If I may be allowed to speak of what transpired in committee, I was in favor of it here, and I was in favor of it elsewhere; but there were naturally different opinions. The committee consisted of gentlemen representing both Houses. Those gentlemen know, or think they know, what will be the effect of retaining certain provisions in the bill. What is the object of a committee of conference but to find out what they can agree upon? Must we come to the conclusion, because a series of amendments are offered to a bill of this description which are lost in a committee of conference, that every individual on that committee must vote against the report, and therefore the general bill must fail? Not at all. Sir, I was as much disappointed as any man with reference to the result of the conference on this bill. There was one amendment in which I felt a very strong interest, and yet I was compelled to give it up. I was compelled to yield it for the very reason that it was stated the House was not willing to pass it, and would not pass it; and it had as much right to its opinion on that subject as the Senate has to its opinion. If we adopt as a principle that we will sit here from January to December, or from January to January, simply because we cannot coerce the House to come to our opinions; and the House adopt the same principle that they will sit here because we will not come to their opinions upon all subjects, I should like to know when we would come to any conclusions at all?

I have said thus much, not because I suppose there is any doubt what the result of a vote on the report will be, but it was really surprising to me to hear such doctrines advocated here. I am perfectly willing to yield when I think it can be fairly and candidly done, with the acceptance of all the others who are deputed to settle these disputed matters, notwithstanding my wishes may not be complied with in every particular. I hope, therefore, that the Senate will adopt this report, and not throw away a great deal that is good because they cannot get some other things that they want.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 30, nays 6; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Chandler, Clay, Collamer, Dixon, Douglas, Fessenden, Foster, Gwin, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Sidel, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, and Thomson of New Jersey—30.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Rice, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wilson—6.

So the report of the committee of conference was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report of the Secretary of State, in answer to the resolution of the Senate of the 19th ultimo, respecting the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, with the accompanying documents, together with a letter of the Postmaster General, of the 24th ultimo, to the State Department; which was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by Mr. DOUGLAS to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the fees or charges of the consul general of Canada on goods or articles imported into the United States from Canada; which was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by Mr. STUART to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

He also laid before the Senate a report of the Secretary of the Navy, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate, information in relation to the time at which each vessel in the Navy was built, and the original cost thereof, with the cost of repairs to each, and the time when made; also, the present condition of the vessels in the Navy, as to fitness for service; which was ordered to lie on the table; and a motion by Mr. COLLAMER to print was referred to the Committee on Printing.

VENTILATION OF PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

Mr. SEWARD submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States, if, in his judgment, compatible with the public interest, communicate to the Senate such information as the Executive Departments may afford of the contracts, agreements, and arrangements which have been made, and of proposals which have been received, for heating and ventilating the Capitol extension, the Post Office, and other public buildings in course of construction, under the management of Captain Meigs, and of the action of the Secretary of War and Captain Meigs thereon.

JOHN FORRISTER.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the order directing the petition and papers of John Forrister to be withdrawn from the Court of Claims and referred to the Committee on Pensions be rescinded.

HOUSE BILLS REFERRED.

The following bills from the House of Representatives were read twice by their titles, and referred to the Committee on Pensions:

A bill (No. 650) granting an invalid pension to William Randolph; and

A bill (No. 340) providing an increase of pension to Peter Van Buskirk, of Washington city, in the District of Columbia.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act to repeal the fifth section of an act entitled "An act to authorize the register or enrollment and license to be issued in the name of the president or secretary of any incorporated company owning a steamboat or vessel, approved March 3, 1825; and

An act for the relief of Albert G. Allen.

BERIAH WRIGHT.

On motion of Mr. KING, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the bill (H. R. No. 460) granting an invalid pension to Beriah Wright, of New York.

It directs the Secretary of the Interior to place his name on the roll of invalid pensioners, and pay him a pension of four dollars a month from the 6th of February, 1858, to continue during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MRS. MARY A. M. JONES.

Mr. STUART. I think that we ought, in justice to ourselves certainly, to dispose of the case of Mrs. Jones, which we have talked about for two days. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of that bill.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 42) granting a pension to Mary A. M. Jones.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the following amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the name of Myra Clark Gaines, widow of Major General Edmund P. Gaines, United States Army, be placed on the pension roll; and that she be paid at the rate of half the pay proper per month to which the said Gaines was entitled to at the time of his death; to commence on the 6th day of June, 1849, and to continue during her natural life.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish the Secretary to add to that:

Provided, That this pension shall not exceed fifty dollars per month.

This is the amendment offered by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BENJAMIN. The amendment should be, in the second section, to strike out all about the half pay proper, and insert at the rate of fifty dollars per month.

Mr. SEWARD. Very well, put it in that shape.

Mr. STUART. I understand that by common consent the amendment will be so modified.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, it will be put in that form. The Chair hears none.

The amendment, as modified, was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The following amendment offered by the Senator from Kentucky [Mr. CRITTENDEN] is now pending:

And be it further enacted, that the name of Jane Turnbull, the widow of Lieutenant Colonel William Turnbull, be placed on the pension roll as a pensioner for life, at the rate of fifty dollars per month.

Mr. CLAY. That is liable to several objections. In the first place, I will remark that the Committee on Pensions, to whom the petition of Mrs. Turnbull was referred, reported, if not unanimously, almost unanimously, against granting the prayer of the petitioner, because it did not come within either the spirit or the letter of any general law, and because it was initiating a new system of pensions, unwarranted by any precedents. If there were any, they were certainly very few.

But this is an extraordinary amendment in one respect. It proposes to give to this lady more than the half pay of her husband, at the time of his death. Up to 1835 or 1840 no pensioner of the Government received exceeding thirty dollars per month. There was a general law which fixed thirty dollars per month as the maximum of any pension under the Government. Here was a colonel, whose pay proper did not exceed fifty dollars per month, I believe, and you propose to give his widow, as a pensioner, the full amount of pay proper which her husband would have received, and propose to give to her the same amount of pension which you give to the widow of a major general. Surely the Senate is not prepared to do this. If you are going to establish this arbitrary system of favoritism, wholly regardless of the principles which have governed in all other cases, and which prevail in the general laws, I do not see where it is to stop. This will be quoted hereafter, and will return to plague us whenever a pension bill is before us. I trust that an amendment, which I shall propose, will be adopted, and it will be this: to strike out the words "the rate of fifty dollars per month," and insert "half the pay proper to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death."

Several SENATORS. That is right.

Mr. PUGH. I hope that this amendment for Mrs. Turnbull will not be put on this bill. It is not germane to the bill at all. I hope the Senate will vote it down.

Mr. JONES. It only gives her half pay.

Mr. PUGH. But I do not want it put on the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Alabama to the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It seems to me that this is pressing a good thing too far, and I very much hope whoever has offered this amendment for Mrs. Gaines to the bill will withdraw it.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. This is an amendment for Mrs. Turnbull.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. There was attached to the bill an amendment for Mrs. Gaines. I hope very much whoever offered that amendment will withdraw it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The pending amendment was offered by the Senator from Kentucky, [Mr. CRITTENDEN.] now absent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Very well. When brought in this way I am absolved from any feeling in regard to it, and I, for one, shall vote against it.

Mr. DAVIS. What is the amendment pending? Let it be read.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is an amendment to the amendment, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the amendment to the amendment, which is to strike out the words, "the rate of fifty dollars per month," and insert, "the half pay proper to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death, so that the amendment will read:

And be it further enacted, That the name of Jane Turnbull, widow of Lieutenant Colonel William Turnbull, be placed on the pension roll as a pensioner for life, at half the pay proper to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on that amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. This is a case of great merit, and I hope there will be no opposition to it. This officer served many years with distinction, and also with usefulness. I know not how far his death may be traced to exposure incurred in the service during the war with Mexico, where he certainly rendered very valuable service; but I am sure it may be traced, even at a later day, to the exposure which he annually incurred in the service upon the northern lakes. Whether the seeds of disease were laid in the campaign in Mexico or not, one thing is certain, that every fall he was compelled, under surgeon's certificate, to return from his post of duty on the northern lakes, and remained during the winter; and this having continued for years in succession, he finally came to his death suddenly, as I am informed, by an attack of rheumatism in the heart.

For myself, it is unnecessary that the case should be established that an officer died of disease contracted in the line of his duty. I believe it will be proper to extend this relief to the family of every officer who dies on duty. I believe it is good economy. If otherwise, the obligation certainly rests on us; and every honorable mind must feel it that we should give sufficient pay to enable every officer of the Government to provide for his family while he devotes his whole time to the service of his country. If you do not choose to do that; if it would be too heavy a tax upon the Treasury for any one to propose, the only just mode left is to pension the family that he may leave destitute by having devoted his whole time to his country.

But, sir, this case has the peculiar claim of being a pension for the widow of an officer who died of disease certainly contracted in the performance of his duty; and, resting upon that basis, if it does not come within the letter, it surely comes within the equity of the law; and if the Army stood upon the same footing with the Navy, no question could be made upon it; it would have been allowed by the Department without coming here. I am sorry that objection is made to placing this case as an amendment to the bill under consideration, when it is known that we cannot multiply bills and take particular action on each. If that be the only objection, I hope it will be waived, and the bill allowed to pass.

Mr. TOOMBS. What case is this?

Mr. JONES. Mrs. Turnbull's. I merely wish to make a correction of the statement made by my friend from Alabama, that this bill did not have the sanction of the majority of the Committee on Pensions. It at one time, whilst that honorable gentleman was present, did not have the sanction of the committee, but at a subsequent meeting it did receive the sanction of a majority of the committee. There were but four members of the committee present, and three of them voted for this amendment. After the first meeting, at which the bill was rejected by the committee, Lieutenant General Scott appeared before some of the members of the committee, myself and others, as I well recollect, and stated he had every reason for the belief that Colonel Turnbull came to his death in consequence of disease contracted at Vera Cruz, in Mexico, from which he never recovered. He felt entirely confident that that was the cause of his death. The surgeons who have testified in the case, also testify that he died of disease contracted in the line of duty.

Mr. CLAY. I have but a word to say in reply to my friend from Iowa. I know, during this session, that the committee, when I was present, decided against the prayer of the petitioner.

Mr. JONES. So I said.

Mr. CLAY. And my recollection is, that the Senator from Connecticut was instructed to report against the bill, and, I think, did report against the bill.

Mr. FOSTER. I did so.

Mr. CLAY. I do not know, then, by what rule of the Senate, or by what authority the committee, in my absence, reconsidered the matter and determined to grant the pension.

Mr. HOUSTON. I really do not intend to make any remarks upon these subjects. It is said, however, that these cases do not come within the purview of any general law, and that we have no precedent for them. It is for that very reason, I understand, that we are called upon to legislate. If we had laws and precedents to cover these cases, it would not be necessary to legislate now. We are called upon to supply the deficiencies of law, and to make law; not to follow precedents particularly. If there is anything that I have ever heard of in my life, for which I have always entertained a most ineffable contempt, it is precedent. If a man has done wrong, or the Government has established any wrong principle, that is to be a precedent—an excuse for following it afterwards. The very last thing that a sensible man would ever think of is precedent. It will do for judges to give unjust decisions upon, because a precedent can be found for anything in the world in the law books. I am not very thoroughly read in the law. I once read law and practiced, and I found that you could find a precedent for any absurdity; and I will not rely upon precedent now.

But, sir I can refer to a precedent. I refer to it from its respectability and the reason of it, but not because it is a precedent. It occurred as long as eight or nine years ago. I will remark that it was the case of the widow of Major Waddy Cobb. He had contracted a disease whilst an officer in station on the northern lakes. His health became very much impaired; he continued to linger, under the influence of the disease, for a number of years, unfit for service. The original cause of the disease was traced to exposure, and his wife was pensioned. She received a half-pay pension. There is a precedent for this case—a very sensible one. I advocated it very humbly and feebly, I acknowledge, but it passed by an almost unanimous vote of this body. I recollect there was one negative vote.

I am very sorry to say it is a matter of just complaint that these cases are not promptly considered here, and I cannot permit this occasion to pass by without saying a single word with regard to one particular case. A petition was presented by me at the early part of the session, or rather by the Senator from New York, and I was privy to it, from the widow of Colonel Larnard, of the Army, who was drowned at Puget Sound. He had passed over the sound with a command of men in a boat. On returning, a squall struck the boat and all were drowned. His widow petitioned for a pension. He was as much in the discharge of official and public duty, and in obedience to the commands of the Government, as if he had been shot down in the van of battle, and his widow is as well entitled to a pension, and yet no report has been made upon it, or if there has been a report it has been adverse to the claim. It is the equity and justice of it that we should look to. If a man yields to the slow advancement of disease, and falls a victim in the service of his country, his country is under the same obligations to him as it would have been if his blood had been spilled in the face of the enemy.

I am for none of your technical legislation. You may make it; you may disgrace the Legislature with it, if you will; but it never shall control my principles of legislation. When an act of justice connected with the national honor demands my advocacy, it shall always have it in the face of precedent. If the whole world had condemned a just and righteous act, and I had that imposing precedent before me, I would spurn it, and treat it with that contempt which is always due to such examples, which will only be followed by the servile mind that dare not think for itself.

Mr. IVERSON. I stated in some remarks that I had the honor to submit a few days ago, that I was opposed to the extension of pensions beyond the rules which have been prescribed by Congress. I do not rise to make any extended remarks upon that subject, but I have an amendment to offer if this amendment prevails. I want to offer an amendment making provision for the widow of another very distinguished officer of our Army. I allude to the late General Alexander Macomb. Certainly, if any widow is entitled to a pension on account of the distinguished services of her husband, Mrs. Macomb is entitled to a pension; for no man belonging to our Army during the late war with Great Britain performed greater service than General Macomb—so much so, that he was selected by President Adams to be commander-in-chief of the Army of the United States after the decease of General Brown.

I only give notice that I shall offer the amendment. I, however, think the friends of Mrs. Jones and Mrs. Gaines had better be careful how they put on any additional amendments, because, if one be adopted, a number of others will be offered. Mine, certainly, is entitled to as much consideration as any presented; but, if we commence this system, we shall have to go to the fullest extent, and quarter the widow of every officer who dies in the service upon the bounty of the Government; and we shall then have to extend it to the soldiers, because they are as much entitled as the officers themselves. I give notice that, if the amendment for Mrs. Turnbull prevails, I shall offer an amendment in relation to the widow of General Macomb.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to add a few remarks to what has been stated in regard to the amendment to the amendment granting a pension to the widow of Colonel Turnbull. I was associated with that gentleman for a number of years, and I never knew a better, a more honest, or a more gallant gentleman. I believe his health was never restored after he left Mexico. He was at the head of General Scott's staff. I introduced this bill because I thought it was a meritorious case, if there ever was one. I think it is eminently entitled to the consideration of the Senate, and I shall do all I can to procure the passage of the amendment.

Mr. PUGH. The friends of the case of Mrs. Turnbull gain nothing by putting it on this bill; nor do the friends of Mrs. Gaines's case. They defeat their own cases, and they defeat the meritorious case of Mrs. Jones; for as each of these amendments involves a new appropriation of money, when this bill goes back to the House of Representatives, it must go to a Committee of the Whole House, and be put at the foot of the Calendar. The original bill came to us from the House proposing a pension to the widow of General Jones. It has passed the ordeal of the House, and is here where a single vote will pass it. That case to which no objection is made, that case which passed the Senate unanimously at the last Congress, is to be sent back to the House, not on anything connected with itself, but under the vain idea that it will facilitate the passage of the bills for the benefit of Mrs. Gaines and Mrs. Turnbull. It will do no such thing. The bill with those amendments will go to the Committee of the Whole House, and be put at the foot of the Calendar, because it will contain a new appropriation of money which has never been considered in the Committee of the Whole, and thus neither of these cases advances a single stage, while they defeat the case of Mrs. Jones. Now I appeal to the Senate to take these amendments off the bill. Let us defeat this one, and then reconsider the vote by which the amendment for Mrs. Gaines was adopted, and let Mrs. Jones's case be passed as it came from the House.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I desire to give notice that I shall introduce an amendment to this bill, providing a pension for Mrs. Ann Smith, the widow of General Persifer Smith.

Mr. PUGH. I was about to say that the bill for Mrs. Gaines will not receive attention one moment sooner as an amendment to this bill, than if it were separate, for it must go back to the House, and pass the ordeal there. We had this question discussed during the last Congress, in a similar instance, which was the first case I ever knew where a meritorious claim was made to retrace its steps through both branches, in order to carry a second claim. I hope the Senate, in justice to itself, will allow Mrs. Jones's bill to pass. The pension given under the bill will not be as much as the Senator from Georgia has named in the amendment. The full pay of an adjutant general is ninety dollars, the half pay forty-five dollars, and the Senator proposes to give her fifty dollars. I would rather have the original bill than any further difficulty about it.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I simply rise to state that my friend from Ohio is entirely mistaken in supposing that this bill must go to the Committee of the Whole in the House. It is a misapprehension of the rule. Any bill having an appropriation in it, must go to the Committee of the Whole; but a bill which has been returned from the Senate, with an amendment making an increased appropriation, does not go there at all in consequence of the increase. But it so happens that in this bill there is no appropriation at all. It simply puts on an additional pension, but contains no appropriation of money; but having passed the House, if we increase the appropriation, when it is returned to the House it does not go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PUGH. The same question has been decided. When the bill for enlarging the Cleveland custom-house was under consideration, a proposition was made, as an amendment to it, to carry on the Milwaukee custom-house. I went down and conversed with honorable members of the House, and ascertained that, if we added any additional sum for a new building, the bill would have to go to a Committee of the Whole House.

Mr. DOUGLAS. They were very successful in making the Senator believe that that was the rule.

Mr. PUGH. I ask, as a test question, that the yeas and nays be taken on the amendment adding Mrs. Turnbull's case, because I consider it a defeat of the original bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now is on the amendment to the amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. What is it?

Mr. CLAY. It is to strike out "fifty dollars," and insert "half pay."

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary again read it.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. PUGH. On that I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. Is the amendment still open to amendment?

The VICE PRESIDENT. An amendment to the amendment is now in order.

Mr. MALLORY. Then I offer the following:

And that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Jane Perry, widow of the late Commodore Matthew C. Perry, on the pension roll at the rate of fifty dollars per month, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1858.

I listened to the remarks of the honorable Senator from Ohio with a great deal of pleasure. I think there is a great deal of justice in what he says. I think that loading the bill down with amendments will probably defeat the pension which we seek to give Mrs. Jones, but I cannot withhold this amendment when I see others attempted to be placed on the bill. I therefore offer it and allow it to take its chance with the rest. I shall not regret if all are voted down together; but certainly no case has been presented to the Senate which deserves higher consideration than that of Mrs. Perry. Commodore Perry himself died from disease contracted in the service of the country, and his widow is as much entitled to a pension as any presented here. I offer that as an amendment, and I hope it will be adopted.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I desire to offer an amendment, if it is in order:

And that the name of Ann Smith, of Louisiana, be, and the same is hereby, placed upon the pension list of the United States; and that the Secretary of the Interior pay, or cause to be paid, to the said Ann Smith the sum of fifty dollars per month, commencing from the date of the death of her husband, the late General Persifer F. Smith, of the United States Army.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. IVERSON. I have an amendment to offer:

And that Mrs. Macomb, the widow of General Alexander Macomb, deceased, shall also be entitled to a pension during her life, at the rate of fifty dollars per month, to commence from the date of her said husband's death.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question now recurs on the amendment as amended.

Mr. TOOMBS. I shall vote with great pleasure for the amendment as amended; and I shall endeavor, before the question is taken, to put such other cases upon the bill as stand upon an equal ground of merit. Although Senators occupy a high position, although they are exempt from responsibility for six years, still they are very much dependent upon the people, and I think that the substratum, the "mud-sills," ought to be considered in this pension business. They are the foundation after all—the substratum of society. "They toil not, neither do they spin; and yet I say unto you, that even Solomon, in all his glory, was not arrayed like one of these." [Laughter.] That is the truth.

Mr. FESSENDEN. You do not say that they are lawless?

Mr. TOOMBS. No; I do not, by any means. Now, the appropriation of public money against the settled principles of the Government, and against public justice, is a mockery and a jest in the Senate of the United States. It is a mockery and a jest with the representatives of thirty-two sovereignties. You have established certain principles upon which you have put the pay and emoluments, and all the advantages of coming into the service of the United States. You have put those of the Army of the United States upon a basis that makes a universal rush from one end of the Republic to the other to get there. It is a huge magnet that attracts from the remotest parts of the Republic all the loose stuff—the young men that can do nothing else, in the remotest parish and upon the remotest backwoods in all the Republic, as well as the respectable people. They go into your service upon the idea that you will give them certain compensations while they are in it. They hold those advantages upon no other principle, except that they shall do nothing so disgraceful as will turn them out; and even if they should be, if they happen to be kin to Senators and members, they will bring them back again. It is done. I speak what you all know. I would much prefer to say pleasant things than rough things, though I prefer doing my duty rather than to please this august assembly of which I am a member.

Some of these gentlemen entered the service forty years ago. You tell them that you will give them a certain compensation for life, with all the chance of promotion, and that if they should fall in battle you would give a pension for a limited time to their wives and children. They entered into it. They have gone on through this routine. Here we have four cases for pensions, notwithstanding that contract. I had the pleasure of knowing many of these gentlemen. A more accomplished officer than Colonel Turnbull I never knew, of his rank. I considered him one of the most distinguished officers of his rank in the American service—an honor to the service. He did his duty everywhere. He was frank, liberal, brave, and generous; and I knew no man that I honored more in his calling. I had the pleasure of his acquaintance, not intimately, but such as it was it was all to his favor and to my advantage. But such were not the terms upon which he went into your service; it was not your contract. He did nothing more than he bargained for. He was an eminent example of an intelligent, brave, educated, honorable officer. It is exactly what he bargained for. His life was blameless. He did not die of wounds received in the service. All this talk about giving pensions on account of wounds is mere stuff. If a man dies in his bed they trace it back possibly to some exposure thirty or forty years ago. People imagine that they get sickness in a particular way, and get an excuse for a pension. Many of these people lived longer than the time appointed for all men. If they had died from disease or wounds contracted in the service, they could get a pension by proving it.

As for bringing up General Scott before the committee, I suppose what General Scott swears to would be regarded at the Pension Office, but I expect what he swears about people's diseases, he not being an adept, would be of no more concern than one of your pages. General Scott knows a great deal about his business, but not a great deal about anything else. I believe that is the general judgment of the country, and there is no better friend of his in the country than I am, but I choose to speak the truth about him. He does not know much about business. He may know something about the sovereign'st thing on earth for a green wound, but I do not think that he will profess to decide whether or not a man who dies ten years afterwards, died from disease contracted in the service of the country. I know the old General would not profess to have any such skill in pharmacy or medicine, as to pretend that Colonel Turnbull died from any such cause, and he did not do it. I do not think there is anything in it. I think it would take a gentleman to be of very peculiar temperament to persuade himself that he was not violating the general principles upon which the laws of this land stand, by voting on such ground. I do not think anybody believes it. I have no idea that even my friend from Iowa [Mr. Jones] believes it. I never asked him for a thing in my life that he would not grant. Whatever you ask him he says, "certainly," and as for a woman, he could not refuse anything in the world that she might ask. You have made him chairman of the Committee on Pensions, and he says, "come from all the ends of the earth and take what I can give you: all ye that are thirsty, come and drink!" I never knew him to refuse anybody anything, and as for pensions, of course he would give them out of his own money or anybody else's to whoever asked him. [Laughter.] He is an exception to the general rule. We sometimes find that those who are very liberal with the people's money are very close with their own dimes. That is not the case with him. He would spend his last cent, and throw in the public Treasury to make it up. He cannot stand a woman's tears. Everybody that knows him, knows that he cannot. [Laughter.] He gives everybody just what they ask him; everybody that knows him, knows that that is true. But I do not think that he is a safe depository of those stern, rigid principles that ought to govern in the management of the affairs of a great empire.

Now, sir, these people get a compensation, as I state, beyond that of any class of people of the same rank in the world—a greater amount of compensation than any people of the same capacity in this country, or in any other, because the capacity of these people is very limited; exceedingly limited. All admit that they are fit for nothing else, except some particular services, like my friend from Mississippi, [Mr. Davis.] He thinks they are fit for everything else. The general judgment of the country is that they are fit for very little or nothing else. They are very good soldiers, and they are very brave. I believe that is the fault of our people. They are ready to "put in," in their own fights or the fights of anybody. In the judgment of our country it is some disgrace not to be brave, and they volunteer in anybody's fights. We agree to pay these people so much, a handsome compensation, a great compensation, and that when they died, as encouragement to stand by their colors, under those circumstances we agreed to take care of their families for a limited time, by law. I agree to that. I think that is a sound principle. I would give good pay. I would pay a man as liberally as any man on this continent for doing his duty in the deadly breach; but I would fix it by law. I would fix it beforehand, at whatever the nation thought was wise and just to its brave defenders, and make it a contract. Do not degrade him by a gratuity.

"A pensioner" is a term of reproach. It was despised by the men of the Revolution—those men who were real men, who were sure enough men, who were not shams, who fought for the liberties of this country. You had to let the race die out before you even put a pauper on your pension roll. There is not a human being that got one dollar for his services in American independence from 1785 to 1818, that he did not bargain for when he joined your Army—not a man. No such rule was adopted. What he bargained for he got. You did not give him three hundred and twenty acres of land until he had served three years and completed it. If he lacked thirty days of it, he lost it, and his children lost it. Go back to your history, and you will find it. When I first came into Congress, they put me into examining these small matters; and I find this to be the state of facts. Your soldier of the Revolution, who may have been present when the first gun was fired at Lexington, and been present when the last gun was fired at Yorktown, if he had survived through poverty, rags, and distress, until 1818, you never gave him one dime unless he swore he was not worth $200. That is the very way you treated the defenders of the country. Was it poverty? It was not.

In 1818, your revenues, according to the population of the country, were greater than they have ever been from that day to this. They were then disturbed, as we were three years ago, how to get rid of them. Mr. Jefferson proposed various modes to change the Constitution. We did not know how to get rid of them. We had too much money. We had the greatest revenue, according to population, that we have had from that day to this. We had so much revenue that we did not know what to do with it. Poverty, then, was not the reason. The men who fought the battles of the Revolution, to their honor, scorned your gratuities. It was their degenerate sons that started this principle. It was the cowardly rabble, that did not spring from their loins, when they were dead and in their graves, that inaugurated the system of pensions for past services. It was not the people of the Revolution; it was not their descendants.

I recollect in the State that I represent where every man was a soldier, beleaguered by Indians, by Tories, and by the British, on the very soil on which I first saw the light, where every sod I trod upon had been a freeman's sepulcher, not one delegate from Georgia dared to vote for the act of 1818. One of the most eminent and distinguished men in the country voted for it, and he was driven ignominiously from the county in which I live. Every spot but that in my own State was conquered and under British dominion. There the flag of England never floated an hour, except in battle, when it trailed in the dust. Every man was a soldier. There was no neutrality. All were on the one side or the other. It was the only place from here to there (unless you went west of the mountains) in which at some time British ascendancy did not rule. Notwithstanding all that, in 1818 a proposition to pension even the old soldiers of the Revolution and Indian wars received the condemnation of that entire people, and they drove from Congress the man who dared to vote for it.

Those were the days of the men who won independence. Those were the days in which they were living and voting, before they had died. Many of them had died. But for thirty-five years after the war, no man dared scarcely in this country to move it, and no majority could pass it. But after awhile, in the degeneracy of the times, when men found it cheaper to praise courage than to be brave, when it was cheaper to profess devotion than to serve the people, when it became cheaper to praise the virtues of their ancestors than to do deeds worthy of the remembrance of the people, then you commenced your pension system, and in 1832 was the first time you ever pensioned a person. Independence was acknowledged in 1783, and from the Revolution to 1832 there was an interval of forty-nine years. Forty-nine years is a long time. That generation has gone. Of all the dead that lie buried on every battle-field in your country, those who did not survive forty-nine years slept in their mother earth, and their spirits went to their long account without any of this noble charity which is now given—to whom? Why, some time during the last war, some young lieutenants on the Canada frontier, amid the general disgrace of the American Army, behaved well. The disgrace was general with these exceptions. In the fullness of years, perhaps of honors, they were gathered to their fathers as Abraham, and Isaac, and Jacob were before them. They paid the debt of nature. Nobody hurt them. They were harmless, never having hurt anybody during the whole course of their lives.

Senators, however, say that this man is an old soldier. They get kind-hearted gentlemen like my friend from Texas, who being a soldier himself has a good deal of the esprit du corps, and who seems to think that everybody who ever saw a musket ought to have a pension, to speak in their behalf. I do not condemn this esprit du corps, but I want to guard the country against it, because whenever you make the rule as general as we are making it, and have the revolutionary soldiers, and all who fought for the country pensioned, you will have the wonderful example of a whole nation pensioning itself. So the sons of the men of the Revolution are called upon to-day to pay for these grand services about which there is a struggle every day to get the opportunity of rendering.

Take the case of Colonel Turnbull, whom I have spoken of. He was as able, as distinguished, and as honorable a man as there was in the Army, but he would not have taken $50,000 for his commission. He was right; too. It was worth that amount in the market. The commission of a colonel in the Army is worth more than fifty thousand dollars. For at six per cent., if you went to shaving, it would bring more. Ten per cent. is a pretty good shave, and at that, on good security, it would bring $5,000. Look at your Blue Book, and find what they get. Whatever it is, you have agreed that that is good compensation; and you tell them, if you fall in battle we will take care of your widow, but if you do not, we will not. Are you going to change the policy? Do you not give them enough? Is it right that every officer in the Army of the United States should have his widow pensioned by the Government?

My friend from Ohio seems to have a strong single idea. He wants but one case—the pension to Mrs. Jones. If he can get Mrs. Jones he will give up all the rest of the heroes. My friend from Mississippi wants a pension for the widow of Colonel Turnbull. I think he has got as good a case as the Senator from Ohio. They are both good cases. They were both excellent men; both good soldiers; both accomplished people; but that is not enough. There are a great many good people, a great many honest people, a great many accomplished people, a great many patriotic people who have served the country well, and in the course of nature, have died. Now, I want the rule put down to everybody. There is where I stand, and I put it to every Senator if it is not a good rule? If the present pay is not sufficient without this allowance to their families, put it below it; strike out everything but the preamble, and say that the widows of all the officers of the Army of the United States shall have a pension equal to the half pay of a lieutenant colonel whether they die in battle or anywhere else. Then I will put in the soldiers, for, after all, I never knew of many battles being won by the officers alone. They generally get most of the credit; but, as far as I have seen, somebody has got to do the fighting and somebody the directing. I think great credit belongs to the man who directs it well; but after all, when it comes to cold steel, you want real and good men behind the muskets; and I know of no battles where the fighting was not done by the brave, courageous, and humble poor. I am almost afraid to mention them here, because I expect a great many people here will think it demagogism. That is the way they talk about it sometimes, but still I choose to stand by my own race. I sprang from them, and I am of them; and, if I have got no better reason for my task, I stand by them for that reason. I think the soldier who does his duty has as much right to a pension for his widow as an officer. Why is he not included? You may call him a general, or a colonel, or a major, but "A man's a man for a' that."

Then I think if anybody's pay wants raising, it is the soldier's. I never heard of a soldier getting rich on his pay in the whole history of the world. Take all the wars, from the creation of the world down to this moment, and you will never find such a case. I have known officers whom evil-disposed people said did get rich on it, and there are a great many of them in the United States who have done so; but I never heard or knew of a soldier who got rich on his pay, or left his widow rich by what the Government paid him. The difficulty with him is, he spends all he gets, and dies in debt. You put him in a charity hospital—that is what you do with him; but you give an officer a great pension. All of them are distinguished gentlemen. When one of their cases comes here, if he was a general, and outlived his confederates, and therefore got rank, that is all that will be necessary. If a man dodges bullets, and can manage to outlive other people, he can get at the head of the Army, and when he dies you may give his widow a good pension; but let a bullet strike a poor devil of a soldier, let poverty overtake him, and you send him up here on the hill. That is not just; that is not right. Why should you do it? Who sent you here but the people? Who fought your battles? Washington commanded and did his duty, but the humblest man that did not turn his back on the enemy did his duty too; and they moistened the soil of every battle-field from Massachusetts to Georgia. Where are their widows? You cannot even gather them up. There is no officer, no pay roll, to tell where they are. I never yet knew of an officer of the Revolution, of the last war, or of the Indian wars, that you could not trace, but you have great difficulty in tracing soldiers. They are the million; they have hardly got any name. Many of them were the sons of nobody, and have nobody to look after them. They are generally people whom the world has gone ill with. With many of them the world's law has not been their friend. Nobody cares to trust them. They are outcasts. When their time is up, they wander over your country, houseless, homeless, with every sun setting upon them with no change, and every day dawning upon new misery until they reach their final resting place in the poor-house. I believe more of them get pensions from getting in the poor-house than any other way, because the overseers have got a habit in some parts of the country, of looking up and getting them a pension, in order to get them out of the poor-house; and from being a charge on the town they get them on the Treasury. If they are so unlucky as not to get in the poor-house, nobody will look after them.

I think the widow of a man who died in your service is very illy provided for. The widow of the man who died in battle, the widow of a man who dies even in your service, is much worse provided for than the officer. The officer gets ample remuneration, not only in money, but in rank and position—general position—the desire and honorable ambition of every honorable mind. The soldiers have nothing but hard work and cold steel; and therefore the difference, I think, is in their favor. I shall vote for Colonel Turnbull, because I believe him to be the most meritorious man in the bunch of the whole lot. I think he is more so than General Jones; more so than General Gaines; more so than any man put upon this bill. As for Commodore Perry, I suppose he may as well go on as another. He went to Japan, and I believe we only gave him $20,000 for the operation. We ought to do something for him, I suppose. He was a very honorable gentleman, and a good officer, I believe. I never knew of anything special that he did. In the Gulf of Mexico he did his duty. I do not choose to disparage any of these men. I do not go off into heroics about what they have done. I am giving history, and I am endeavoring to give justice, without resentment to anybody. I do not intend to be run away with by senatorial speeches about every man being the greatest and grandest and bravest man that the world ever saw. It is not so—not a bit of it. They were very common people when they were living; they were very respectable and very honorable, but as for being marked above their fellow men, the fact with most of them is that their distinction grew out of their rank, which they attained by longevity, and the pay the Government gave them. That was the greatest distinction they had.

Therefore, I say, include every officer that is named on this bill, and then, when Senators get through with the favored class, when you get through with the officers, I will try you with the men, and see if they have got any friends here, like the widows of gentlemen of eminence I admit, of purity I admit, of great services I admit, of great wants I admit, because I believe a man's wants increase with his means. Give a man $5,000 a year, and he will manage to spend $7,000. That is my experience, and I believe that is the case with everybody. The more you give him the worse it is. I could live, fifteen years ago, better on $1,500 a year than I can now on $15,000. That is the history of our race.

This whole thing of pensions had been fixed by law before men entered into the service, and every one of these men, no matter how great his merits, ought to stand upon the law of the land, and there is not one of these cases within that law. I would make this exception: whenever you have got a case within the principle, I would vote for a pension. I do not object to every man being pensioned; but I shall never vote for another pension on a new principle as long as I live and keep my present opinions; but when you establish a certain principle of law beforehand, and you show me an exceptional case, where a man is fairly within its equity, or where, from some difficulty, he cannot show the proof, and I believe he has got a case, I will put him on, but upon the avowed principle that he is within the equity and principle of the law. None of these cases are. I believe that nobody pretends that General Gaines, who died at a ripe old age—eighty or one hundred, I do not know which—died from any wounds. I do not believe that General Jones did. I do not believe that General Jones was in active service since he was engaged on the Canada frontier, about the year 1814. He was a most excellent, brave, and honorable gentleman. He lived in quiet for over forty years before death claimed its own, as it does from all of us; and that is a good long lease. He lived for about forty years after the last war. I think there is nothing in all these.

Then, I say, these cases not being exceptional, or within the principle, they are naked gratuities which I cannot support or vote for. I shall vote to put everybody in as good position as they are, both officers and men, and then vote against the whole.

Mr. STUART. The honorable Senator from Georgia, I am happy to say, has spoken in remarkably good humor himself, and has necessarily induced equal good humor on the part of the Senate. But for that, I should not have ventured to say a word in reply. I will say now, if my honorable friend—if he thinks half as much of me as I do of him, he will not object to my calling him friend—

Mr. TOOMBS. I acknowledge the relation.

Mr. STUART. I only want to inquire whether the honorable Senator ever has considered, in the whole course of his argument, the very great difference of opinion that Senators entertain? No man can reason more logically than the honorable Senator from Georgia does on his premises; but the difficulty is, that very many Senators do not agree with his premises.

Mr. TOOMBS. I will tell my honorable friend I am quite certain of that. I would be a fool if it had not been beaten into me by this time.

Mr. STUART. Take the comparisons the Senator has instituted. He says no pensions were asked in the days of the Revolution, while those heroes lived; that they themselves were opposed to it; and that at the present day the great mass of the officers who get into the Army get into it by favoritism, and are utterly worthless, and therefore want pensions. Now, sir, there is the reason that answers the proposition. There were other concomitant circumstances undoubtedly. There was a time when the country was, or was supposed to be, poor. It is true that there are many in the Army who ought not to be in the Army. That, let me say to my honorable friend, is the very reason why I am opposed to his proposition for a general law. I know of no general law by which you can exclude those under our system. If you had an arbitrary Government, where the Emperor was often upon the field, where, observing the man, he has unlimited power to promote him, then having no officers but those of merit, you might adopt a general law which would pay them alike. But here, as my honorable friend says, the system is one of grade; and the man who lives the longest gets the highest grade and the most pay, and it would never do to adopt that principle.

I was in the position upon another subject that my honorable friend is with this. When we had all this senatorial eulogium upon the Navy, I was on the other side. I thought we had done a thing which was meritorious to the country. My honorable friend disagreed with me. He was of a different opinion. He entertained his opinion as conscientiously as I did mine.

Mr. TOOMBS. I want to put the gentleman right. I will state the difference between you and me. I held that no freeman should be tried for a crime in this country, without being brought face to face with his accuser. That is the point I made, and I shall stand there as long as I live.

Mr. STUART. I disagreed with my honorable friend on that question.

Mr. TOOMBS. I know you did.

Mr. STUART. I did not think any such contingency had arisen; he thought it had. That is the very question I am discussing, that men differ, and necessarily differ, in opinion. I have all the feeling that the Senator has so eloquently portrayed for those who spring from the mass of the country, and I can say everything he has said in regard to my own associations with them. I subscribe fully to his maxim that "A prince can make a belted knight,

A marquis, duke, and a't that;
But an honest man's aboon his might,
Gude faith he mauna fa' that."

I was saying that on that occasion I differed with the honorable Senator. I thought an essential service had been done to the country, and no injury to the officers of the Navy. The consequence of the whole action has been that having traveled up the hill and then traveled down again, we are vastly worse off than when we started, and beyond a remedy. We have talked about courts-martial. We have had them, and they have ended in a farce. Each time the President and Secretary have sent to us returns, they state that they could not examine the reports of the courts, and had not done so, but just indorsed what they did, and here we are.

Now, sir, here is a question upon which gentlemen differ. I am among those who believe it is better to select the cases where great merit is attached to the officer in his lifetime, and do that thing which would lie nearest his heart, if he could utter a voice from the grave. Sir, if there is any feeling of an earthly character which, more than all others, is paramount in the bosom of an honest and honorable man, it is to provide for the family that he leaves behind him—his wife and his children. They have been his companions in life; they are those from whom he departs most reluctantly when he goes to visit his Maker.

Entertaining these opinions, believing that it is better to discriminate, to make these selections in regard to meritorious officers, and to make this distinction in this way rather than by a general law, I vote for cases which come, in my judgment, within that class. The Senator differs with me. No man argues his side of the case more ably. If I thought with him, I certainly should vote with him; but differing with him in the premises he assumes, necessarily I differ from him in my votes.

Now, a single word in regard to the suggestion made about amending this bill. The Senator from Illinois [Mr. DOUGLAS] was correct in the statement he made. No appropriations are put upon this bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is the same thing.

Mr. STUART. Not at all, I beg my friend's pardon. It simply places them on the pension roll.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask my friend, if we put them on the pension roll, and give them money, is that an honest getting around of the rule?

Mr. STUART. No, sir. I make it with regard to that suggestion. The objection made by the Senator from Ohio is, if the bill has these amendments put upon it, that necessarily, by the rules of the House, it must go to the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. TOOMBS. So it will.

Mr. STUART. But I say this class of cases does not involve that necessity. It is simply a question, after the Senate make the amendments, whether the House will agree to them. I wish, in this connection, to remark—I say it with all respect—that I do not agree with those gentlemen who think that we ought to leave all legislation just as the House makes it. I think it is just as much within our power and our duty to amend any bill we choose, and as we choose, as to originate one here and pass it. I do not agree to the argument, so often resorted to, that because a bill comes from the House we must not amend it. We should amend it, if the judgment of the Senate says it ought to be amended. I could say much more on this subject; but I confess I am rather anxious to pass this bill, and I hope we are drawing near the vote.

Mr. PUGH. Let us have a vote on the amendment. The yeas and nays were demanded on adding these amendments to the bill.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that they have been ordered.

Mr. TOOMBS. Is another amendment now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. An amendment to the amendment is now in order.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have one to offer.

Mr. MALLORY. I have a report to make from a committee of conference.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. If there be no objection the Chair will receive the report from the committee of conference.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 460) granting an invalid pension to Beriah Wright, of New York; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. MALLORY presented the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, report, that after full and free conference, they have agreed to recommend and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate do recede from its first and fifth amendments.

That the House do recede from its disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate.

That the House do recede from its disagreement to the tenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to said amendment with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out "1st day of July, 1856," and insert the words "passage of this act."

That the Senate do agree to the amendment of the House to its fourteenth amendment.

S. R. MALLORY,
SOLOMON FOOT,
J. P. BENJAMIN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
• THOMAS S. BOCKOCK,
JOHN KELLY,
F. H. MORSE,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. MALLORY. I ask the concurrence of the Senate in the report, and I will explain it in a very few words. The first amendment receded from by the Senate is in these words:

That, hereafter, medical officers and engineers of the Navy shall be entitled to the pay of their several grades from the date of their appointments or commissions therein, respectively.

From that amendment the Senate recedes. Then the House has receded from its non-concurrent votes to two amendments which I will not read, making an addition of $50,000 to the appropriation bill for filling up lands and marine barracks in the Brooklyn navy-yard at New York. The House receded from that, and the amendment stands as it originally did. The next amendment of the Senate is in these words:

For the completion of the coal depot at Key West, Florida, $20,000.

From that amendment the Senate has receded. The next amendment was in these words:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st of July, 1856, the clerks, messengers, and watchmen at the navy-yard and marine barracks at Washington, shall be entitled to receive the compensation authorized by the acts of April 23, 1854, and August 5, 1854, for the payment of which such sum as may be necessary be, and the same is hereby, appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The House has receded from its non-concurrent vote in that amendment, putting in an amendment so as to make the provision prospective instead of retrospective. It will then read:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the passage of this act, the clerks, messengers, &c.

The committee recommends that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House, by which five sloops-of-war have been added, so as to make it ten sloops-of-war instead of five. The Senate placed five on; the House has made it ten.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PUGH. We passed the five sloops-of-war by the yeas and nays. I think we may as well take the yeas and nays on the ten sloops. I certainly cannot go for it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have no idea of defeating anything fixed up by this legislation; but, in future, when these questions come up, I want to enter my protest against them. Committees of three cannot force such legislation, unless gentlemen want to do it. I desire to record my testimony perpetually against it. There was no judgment of the two Houses when we voted on these sloops. We declared we would not have them. Our committee go into a conference, and give up $20,000 at this place and $2,000 at that, and take the House provision for ten sloops-of-war, and I suppose were very sorry that it was not for fifty. So far as I am concerned, I will have no such thing put upon me. As a Senator, I think my judgment ought to be given on this proposition. I am opposed to all this thing. I do not blame gentlemen connected with this business. I do not know whether the country will get an account of these things. Upon these general bills there will be some sixty or seventy amendments. Then Senators will go to the Vice President, or the Speaker of the House, to get the friends of certain measures on the committee. I have been asked if I were for this or that, and would go on a committee; but I have told them nothing. I have determined to go on no more committees of conference so long as I live. I do not want to go for this particular thing.

We get committees of conference who do the legislation of the country, and sell you out regularly. I want the country to understand it. That is not legislation. The real business of a conference is to act where both Houses want the same thing, but differ how to do it. There is the place, and then you take the bill in a free conference.

But when there is a bill with a hundred other provisions, as different as a negro from a white man, and the committee of conference give up this and that, and get other things for which there is no particular necessity, legislation is fixed up for Senators, and the power of the majority destroyed. I call upon all of those who have got any independence, who believe that this is wrong legislation, to vote against this report, and vote against the ten sloops. The House will not make any great fuss about the sloops. I do not suppose they are any more warlike than we are. The truth is, they only wanted to get up war enough to increase the Army and Navy. That is all the war we shall ever have. At the last moment, in spite of all you told the Mormons to fight, they would not fight, and we had to give them up; and, in spite of all we have said, the British say they had not intended to insult us; that it was done under orders given ten years ago, and was all a mistake. You know they have kicked us all over the seas entirely in a mistake, [laughter,] and we shall get an apology after a while. I did not vote for these sloops, and do not intend to do so, and I call for the yeas and nays on the report. I do not intend to be inveigled into any such legislation.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate adjourn. I think we ought to take this vote in a full Senate. Such legislation ought not to be acted upon except in full Senate.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. Foot.) The question is on concurring in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PUGH. I made a motion to adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair was about to put the question on concurring in the report on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. STUART. I ask my friend from Ohio to withdraw his motion.

Mr. PUGH. If you want to make a speech I have no objection.

Mr. STUART. I do.

Mr. PUGH. Then I withdraw it.

Mr. STUART. I want to make a point with my honorable friend from Georgia. I agree with him, and I wish to bring the Senate to reject this whole concern.

Mr. TOOMBS. So do I.

Mr. STUART. I think it best to give a little history on this subject. The proposition for increasing the Navy by the building of sloops, according to the recommendation of the committee, was fully discussed and voted down twice by decisive majorities on the yeas and nays; but, late at night, when there was a bare quorum here—just a quorum on the yeas and nays by one majority—an amendment to build five sloops was inserted in the bill. That is the history of it; and it has come to a time, I think, when the Senate should make itself heard. If we reject this bill, we can make another in four hours, and give all the appropriations necessary to continue the naval service of the country, and pass it through both Houses. The sense of the Senate was fully taken on the proposition, and it was voted down twice; we declared that we would not have it; but being persisted in, at a late hour of the night, when Senators had gone home, and there were just enough here to make a quorum by one majority, it was put on. Then it went to the House, and it came back bigger yet, and the committee of conference representing us, representing the sense of the Senate, against its will when fully expressed, have agreed to the enlargement made by the House.

Now, sir, I was one among the number who voted against the measure in all its shapes, and who believe it ought not to be done. If the sense of the Senate is changed, no Senator will acquiesce more cheerfully than I will; but if the sense of the Senate remains as it was expressed, let it stand by it, and do not let us have a dozen sloops foisted upon us against the will of the majority of the Senate. I am glad that the yeas and nays have been ordered, and I hope the Senate will reject this proposition. I say in four hours we can have an appropriation bill, making all the appropriations for carrying on the Navy. It is true, as the Senator says, this mode of doing things gets us in the hands of about two men.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir, that is true.

Mr. STUART. What they want we have got to take, or take nothing. Now, sir, let us vote it down. Let us see if the sense of the Senate, upon a question so plainly and palpably taken, cannot be carried out, or, if it is changed, let us change our action.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Several SENATORS. Oh, no; let us take the question.

Mr. DAVIS. I hope the Senate will not adjourn. I wish to make a report from a committee of conference.

Mr. SEWARD. I will waive the motion for the Senator—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. It will be necessary to suspend action for the time being, in order to receive the report of the Senator from Mississippi. By common consent the Chair will receive the report.

Mr. STUART. I hope the Senator from Mississippi will make his report.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I object. Let us close up one bill before we take up another.

Mr. MALLORY. I object to any report until we get through the present business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Objection being made, another question cannot be interposed until the pending one is disposed of.

Mr. PUGH. Then I renew the motion to adjourn. I understood the Senator from Michigan was going to make it at the end of his speech.

Mr. BAYARD and others called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 10, nays 15; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Brown, Fessenden, Harlan, Kennedy, Mallory, Pugh, Silldell, Toombs, and Wilson—10.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Collamer, Davis, Foot, Gwin, Houston, Johnson of Arkansas, Reid, Sebastian, Simmons, Stuart, and Thomson of New Jersey—15.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The motion to adjourn is lost; but the vote shows the want of a quorum.

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate adjourn.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. It is not in order to repeat one motion for adjournment after another.

Mr. SEWARD. There cannot be any other motion now except a motion to adjourn.

Mr. MALLORY. We can do no business.

Mr. BAYARD. I move that the Sergeant-at-Arms be sent after the absent members.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I second that motion. I think it is fair that those who are absent at this time of the session ought to be published to the world, and I see no other way but by making a call, and inviting absent members to attend.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that there is a quorum here, if they will vote.

Mr. HOUSTON. The very moment there is a call ordered I shall—

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair is not aware of any practice authorizing a call.

Mr. HOUSTON. If gentlemen would not occupy the time they do on trivial matters, all the business we have transacted in the last two weeks could have been gotten through in a day, and these night sessions avoided.

Mr. SEWARD. Is a motion to adjourn now in order?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair would regard the motion in order in the present state of the Senate. A quorum not being present, no business could be done.

Mr. SEWARD. I make that motion.

Mr. STUART. We can send for absent members. That motion was made by the Senator from Delaware.

Mr. SEWARD. There have been speeches and debates. I move that the Senate adjourn.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will entertain the motion to adjourn.

Mr. SEWARD. I make that motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I ask for the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall not call for the yeas and nays. We have not a quorum. The only effect of sitting here to force the attendance of absent members, will be to disqualify us for business to-morrow.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Those who attend to-night will not, perhaps, be able to attend to-morrow. Yet we ought to make an effort to do business.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 12, nays 11; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Benjamin, Broderick, Brown, Fessenden, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, King, Mallory, Pugh, Reid, and Toombs—12.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Collamer, Davis, Foot, Gwin, Johnson of Arkansas, Sebastian, Simmons, Stuart, and Wilson—11.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned at ten o'clock and forty-five minutes, p. m.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, June 11, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

CHARLES PORTERFIELD, DECEASED.

The SPEAKER stated the first business in order to be a motion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of Senate bill (No. 203) for the relief of the legal representatives of Charles Porterfield, deceased.

Mr. LETCHER. Let the bill and report be read.

The bill and report were read.

The bill requires the Secretary of the Interior to issue to William Kinney and Thomas J. Michie, executors of the last will and testament of Robert Porterfield, deceased, a number of warrants, equal to six thousand one hundred and thirty-three acres of land, according to the usual subdivisions of the public surveys, in quantity not less than forty acres, to be by them located on any of the public lands subject to private entry, at $1 25 per acre, which have been, or may be, surveyed, and which have not been otherwise appropriated at the time of such location, within any of the States or Territories of the United States, where the minimum price for the same shall not exceed the sum of $1 25 per acre, to be selected and located in conformity with the legal subdivisions of such surveys, and appropriated according to the directions contained in the last will and testament of the said Robert Porterfield, deceased, in the same manner and for the purposes directed in regard to the lands which were lost by the said legal representatives in the action with Clark and others, as decided by the Supreme Court of the United States.

It appears from the report, that in May, 1779, the Legislature of Virginia passed an act establishing a land office for ascertaining the terms and manner of granting waste and unappropriated lands. Under this act, any person might procure from the Treasury, on paying a certain price, a warrant to locate and obtain a patent for any waste or unappropriated land, with a proviso that no entry or location of land shall be admitted within the country and limits of the Cherokee Indians, or on the north side of the Ohio river, or on lands reserved for any particular nation or tribe of Indians, &c. The warrants under this act were called Treasury warrants. It having been ascertained, by an extension of the dividing line between Virginia and North Carolina, that a considerable part of the land previously set apart by Virginia for the discharge of her promises to the officers and soldiers of her State and continental line, lay within the State of North Carolina, Virginia, by an act passed in November, 1781, enacted that all that tract of land included within the rivers Mississippi, Ohio, and Tennessee, and the North Carolina line, shall be, and the same is hereby, substituted in lieu of such land so fallen into the State of North Carolina, to be in the same manner subject to the claims of said officers and soldiers. Colonel Charles Porterfield, of the Virginia State line, was mortally wounded at Gates's defeat, near Camden, in August, 1780, and soon after died of the wounds, leaving neither wife nor children. His brother, Robert Porterfield, as his heir-at-law, received from the State of Virginia, under the laws of that State, a warrant for six thousand acres, (for three years' service,) in December, 1782. He also was entitled, by purchase, to a warrant issued to Thomas Quarles, for three years' service as lieutenant in the State line, for two thousand six hundred and sixty-six and two thirds acres, dated the 12th of June, 1783.

In pursuance of these warrants, and under the authority of laws subsequently passed, appointing a surveyor and a board of officers, the said Robert Porterfield, in August, 1784, made, within the district above described, five entries, amounting in all to six thousand one hundred and thirty-three and one third acres; but the country was in the possession of the Indians, who were so much dissatisfied with the inroads into their country, and the location of so large an amount of these warrants, that an Indian war was apprehended. The Governor of Virginia, on the 6th of January, 1785, under the direction of the Legislature, issued a proclamation, prohibiting those who had made entries of land within the said territory from proceeding further in taking possession or surveying the land, and commanding the commissioners, surveyors, and all persons, to withdraw from the said land. In consequence of this proclamation, the said Robert Porterfield was prevented from perfecting his entry by survey and patent. This proclamation continued in force until the United States, by treaties made subsequently in 1794 and 1795 with the Cherokee and Chickasaw Indians, guaranteed to them the country lying to the south of the Tennessee river as a hunting ground, and all persons were prohibited from entering on, or taking possession of, the said territory. The country remained in this situation until 1819, when the obstruction of the Indian title was removed by treaty; and in convenient time afterwards, to wit: in 1854, the said Robert Porterfield procured his entries to be perfected by survey, and a patent issued to him from the Governor of Kentucky, (which had, in the mean time, become a State,) in pursuance of certain stipulations between Virginia and Kentucky, when the latter became a separate State. After having thus perfected his title, the said Robert Porterfield took possession of his said land, and by an agent granted leases to several persons whom he found living on the land; but these tenants were subsequently evicted and turned out of possession, under indictments of forcible entry and detainer, by persons claiming title to the same land, under a grant to George R. Clark, of an older date. To the understanding of this claim it is necessary to state some facts.

Under certain Treasury land warrants, the said George R. Clark made entries of two tracts of land—one for thirty-six thousand nine hundred and sixty-two acres, and another for thirty-seven thousand acres—within the district of country which the Legislature of Virginia had set apart for military land warrants, by the act of November, 1781. These entries were made in 1780 and 1781, prior to the passage of the act of November, 1781. The surveys were made in 1794, before the date of the proclamation of the Governor of Virginia, and patents were issued in September, 1795. The said patents being the oldest, the said Robert Porterfield was disposed to give up his claim, and to ask Congress to give him other lands in lieu of that of which he had been deprived. He accordingly presented a petition to the Twenty-Fourth Congress; but, as is alleged in this petition, he was advised by the late B. Watkins Leigh, then a Senator of Virginia in Congress, that his claim would be likely to be refused until it had been decided by the courts that Clark's title was paramount; and the said Leigh expressed the opinion, as did other eminent lawyers, that the entry and patent of the said Clark were void, being within "the country and limits of the Cherokee Indians," which were excepted from the entry by act of May, 1778. Under this advice, he filed a bill in the circuit court of the United States for the Kentucky district, against Meriwether L. Clark and others, who claimed under the said grants to George R. Clark, on the 18th of July, 1836. In the prosecution of this suit, much time and money were expended. Many witnesses were examined, and a large amount of testimony as to the right of the Indians to this tract of country was procured from the colonial office in England. After various continuances, the case was finally brought to a hearing on the 13th November, 1841, when the bill was dismissed with costs. An appeal was taken to the Supreme Court, where the appeal was dismissed.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand from the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. JACKSON,] who reported this bill, that it was agreed to unanimously by the Committee on Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. COBB. Does the Committee on Revolutionary Claims propose to grant lands?

Mr. JACKSON. If the gentlemen will allow me, I will state the action of the Committee on Revolutionary Claims on that bill. The matter was submitted to the committee in the early part of the session, and the committee agreed unanimously, while rejecting any appropriation of money for losses in the revolutionary war, that the party was entitled to the land, and I was authorized to report a bill for that purpose. Not being here when that committee was called, I did not report the bill. The Senate passed a similar bill, which came here and was referred to the Committee on Revolutionary Claims, and I was authorized by the committee, unanimously, to report it back, with the recommendation that it should pass. We adopted the able report made by Senator WILSON, and which has been read to the House. I think that the facts therein set forth are true. I investigated the facts fully myself, and believe that the party is fully entitled to the land.

Mr. JEWETT. If I understand the object of that bill, (and I have been somewhat conversant with the history of like cases,) I would just say that if it is the intention of Congress to make good all the Virginia military land warrants which were issued and attempted to be located and carried into perfect grants in the Commonwealth of Kentucky, this bill then will be a fine precedent. This bill shows nothing more nor less than this: that there was a controversy between the heirs of Porterfield and Clark, concerning their respective rights to land at the mouth of the Tennessee river. The matter was fully litigated, and decided against Porterfield's heirs, and they now come here and ask to be reinstated in rights which they never had, and so declared by the Supreme Court of the United States.

Mr. COBB. This is a case concerning lands, which properly belongs to the Committee on Public Lands. I will say in explanation of it—

Mr. CHAFFEE. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. COBB. So it is always when light is attempted to be thrown on these cases.

[A message was here received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had passed a resolution suspending the 16th and 17th joint rules for the remainder of the session, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. The question is on a suspension of the rules.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 92, noes 42.

Mr. SAVAGE demanded tellers.

Mr. COBB demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIG of North Carolina, and CLEMENS, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 91, noes 39.

Mr. SAVAGE. I demand the yeas and nays. I want to know who will vote to take up such a bill as this at this period of the session.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays have been refused.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. LETCHER demanded the previous question on ordering the bill to be read a third time.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. SAVAGE. Is it in order to call now for the reading of the bill and report?

The SPEAKER. The report has been read.

Mr. SAVAGE. But not since the rules were suspended. It could not have been read before, by the rules of the House. I believe I called for the reading of the ocean mail steamer bill yesterday, and it was then decided that it was not in order to read until the rules had been suspended.

The SPEAKER. If there is no objection, the report will be read.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I object.

Mr. SAVAGE. Have I not a right to have it read?

The SPEAKER. It is not in order now, because the House is acting under the previous question.

Mr. SAVAGE. Was it in order to read it before the rules were suspended?

The SPEAKER. It was permitted by unanimous consent.

The bill was then ordered to be read a third time, and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. LETCHER moved the previous question on the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded; there being, on a division—yeas 84, noes 48; and the main question was ordered.

Mr. COBB. I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CLEMENS. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion. The bill establishes a new principle. It will take about six million acres to carry out this principle.

Mr. COBB. Will the gentleman take the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill? I could not express my dissent to the bill in a more forcible manner than by moving to lay it upon the table, but I now withdraw the motion.

Mr. CLEMENS. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 78, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Blair, Bowie, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Caskey, Cavanaugh, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Corning, Cox, Cragin, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Eustis, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Garnett, Gillis, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Gregg, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Landy, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, McKibbin, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Morrill, Oliver A. Morse, Nichols, Parker, Pendleton, William W. Phelps, Potter, Purviance, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Tappan, Tompkins, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Woodson, and Wortendyke—78.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Boyce, Branch, Brayton, Burnett, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Cobb, Covode, Burton Craig, Crawford, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Farnsworth, Foley, Foster, Garrett, Giddings, Gilman, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, Keitt, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Maclay, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Moore, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Isaac N. Morris, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Peyton, Pottle, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Singleton, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, William Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Trippe, Wade, Walbridge, Whiteley, Winslow, John V. Wright, and Zollieffer—88.

So the bill was rejected.

Pending the vote,

Mr. BARKSDALE stated that Mr. Bishop had been compelled to leave for home, and had paired off with Mr. PETTIT.

Mr. BOCKOCK stated that if he had been in the Hall when his name was called, he would have voted "no."

Mr. STANTON stated that as he had not had time to consider the bill he would have to vote "no."

Mr. COBB moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

An act (No. 466) making appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs;
An act (No. 556) making appropriation for the service of the Post Office Department for the year ending June 30, 1859; and

An act (No. 365) to confirm the land claims of certain pueblos and towns in the Territory of New Mexico; severally with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

Also, that the Senate had passed, without amendment, bills of this House of the following titles:

An act (No. 619) for the relief of John Sawyer, a soldier of the war of the Revolution;

An act (No. 399) for the relief of certain purchasers of land within the limits of the Choctaw cession, of 1830; and

An act for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of Illinois.

CLAIMS OF REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

Mr. FENTON. I ask leave to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of House bill (No. 234) to settle the claims of the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a question of privilege. I desire to call up the Maryland contested-election case.

Mr. FENTON. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois rises to a privileged question.

Mr. FENTON. I appeal to the gentleman from Illinois to allow my motion to be entertained, and then I will give way.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the gentleman from Illinois to allow me to have two appropriation bills referred to the Committee of Ways and Means. It will not occupy a moment.

The SPEAKER. If the motion to suspend the rules be entertained, the Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Illinois will not have the right to take the floor from the gentleman from New York.

Mr. GROW. The gentleman from New York had the floor before the gentleman from Illinois.

The SPEAKER. That is true; but the gentleman from Illinois stated, before the motion of the gentleman from New York was entertained, that he rose to a question of privilege, which entitled him to be recognized.

Mr. GROW. Cannot the motion of the gentleman from New York be entered now with the consent of the gentleman from Illinois?

The SPEAKER. By general consent it can be done.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have no objection.

Mr. FENTON. I move to suspend the rules. Mr. MAYNARD. Would not a motion to suspend the rules and go into Committee of the Whole House take precedence of both motions?

The SPEAKER. It would not take precedence of a question of privilege. If there be no objection, the motion of the gentleman from New York will be received.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. It will be time enough to make the motion when we can dispose of it.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL, ETC.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I believe I have the consent of the gentleman from Illinois to have two appropriation bills referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. SAVAGE. Have I a right to object?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has.

Mr. SAVAGE. Then I exercise that right.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask to refer to the Committee of Ways and Means the Senate amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill and to the bill for the collection of revenue.

Mr. SAVAGE. I object, for the simple fact that I do not recollect that the gentleman ever extended a courtesy to anybody.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. For the purpose of enabling the gentleman from Pennsylvania to refer his bills, I withdraw my motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules, in order to allow me to have the Senate amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill and the revenue bill referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The rules were suspended; and the amendments to the bills so referred.

MARYLAND CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire now to call up the Maryland contested-election case, that the House may dispose of it to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I object to its consideration. I think the House has not time to proceed to the consideration of the case as it deserves to be considered.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. How does the gentleman from Maine get the floor?

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I call the gentleman from Maine to order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I suppose that neither the gentleman from Maine nor any other member has the right to object. Whenever a question of privilege is presented, it is before the House; and then the House can dispose of it as it thinks proper.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands the gentleman from Maine to object to the House proceeding to the consideration of the question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Yes, sir. The SPEAKER. Under the 5th rule of the House?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Yes. The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the rule. The rule was read, as follows:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker."

Mr. HOUSTON. That rule does not apply to a privileged question. It applies to any ordinary matter of business which comes in under the ordinary rules of the House. This is a question which is taken up because it is a matter of high privilege.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. My idea was this—that we might just as well decide now, as at any other time, whether this question shall be taken up. It will lead to a good deal of discussion, and occupy time that is very necessary for the transaction of the business of the country.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. That may be so; but the gentleman can hardly rise to take the floor from me except he rises to a question of order.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. That is a point of order.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I must say that I cannot consider it a point of order at all. When the question is presented, it becomes a question of privilege, and cannot be evaded except by a motion to postpone to a day certain, or to dispose of it by some of the ordinary motions by which business is laid aside.

Mr. GROW. I suppose the House may decide whether it will consider any subject that is brought before it, at the time it is presented.

The SPEAKER. The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Maine is entitled to have the question put to the House.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Then I hope it will be put.

The SPEAKER. The particular question before the House derives its dignity exclusively from the rules themselves and the Manual; and the Chair does not perceive any reason why the 5th rule should not apply as well to this question as to any other.

Mr. HOUSTON. Will the Chair allow me to propound a question? Suppose that any question, whether privileged or not, was set over as a matter to be taken up to-day, and is then called up, is that proposition in a condition where the question is put: "Will the House consider it?"

If I call up a bill from the table, or any such thing, then it is the duty of the Chair, if required, to put the question: "Will the House consider it?" But we have agreed to consider this question. We have, to some extent, considered it, because we have received the report of the committee, and it has been postponed to this day or to some future day, and comes up as a matter of course, because we were in consideration of the question at the time it was postponed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I rise to a question of order. Is this question debatable?

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order. Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call the attention of the Chair and of the House to this passage on page 100 of the Manual:

"A matter of privilege arising out of any question, or from a quarrel between two members, or any other cause, supersedes the consideration of the original question, and must be first disposed of."

My opinion is, that, if you have a bill under consideration, and a question of privilege, recognized as such by the Chair, comes before the House or is called for, the business under consideration must be suspended until that question is disposed of.

Mr. DEAN. Unless debate is in order, I object to it.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If it is competent for the House—

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I desire to know if this question is debatable?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Then I ask the Chair to enforce the rule.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair. I presume that it will be debatable.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks not. The question is to be put, "Will the House now consider this question?" without debate, and, under the rules of the House, where a question of order arises upon a question which is not debatable, the question of order is not debatable.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. Does the Chair hold that the 5th rule applies to a question of this sort—to all questions that may be presented to the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks so.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. A question of privilege, affecting the organization of the House, does not come under the rules that govern ordinary legislation. It is a question of higher dignity.

Mr. RITCHIE. If the question is to be debated on one side, I shall insist on debating it on the other.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. A question of privilege cannot be overridden and destroyed by the general rules made to apply to the ordinary business of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will perceive that if the House had taken up the subject without objection, it would have been perfectly competent for the House to have postponed its consideration; and if it be competent for the House to relieve itself from the immediate consideration of a question of privilege by postponement to a day certain, or till next session, or by an indefinite postponement, why may not the House, under this rule, have the privilege of saying that they will not consider the subject?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. In the one case it would be disposed of under the ordinary rules of the House, and in the other case it would not be.

Mr. STANTON. I insist that this question shall be either debated or not debated. I am not particular which; but if debate is not in order, I object to it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair indulged gentlemen on the right and on the left in making suggestions, for the reason that this is a new question. The Chair does not remember to have seen or heard the question propounded, except in one instance during this session by a gentleman from Ohio, since he has occupied a seat on the floor of the House. After the question was raised by the gentleman from Ohio, the Chair made some examination, and was not able to find any precedent at all to govern him in reference to the interpretation of the rules.

Mr. RITCHIE. A question of privilege supercedes other business for the time being, or may be brought before the House without a suspension of the rules, but it does not follow that no other business is to be done until the matter of privilege is finally settled and determined.

Mr. HOUSTON. I appeal from the decision of the Chair, and ask for the yeas and nays on the appeal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. HOUSTON. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I would like the Chair to state the point of order exactly.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HARRIS] rises in his seat and states that he desires to call up a question of privilege—the Maryland contested-election case. The gentleman from Maine [Mr. WASHBURN] rises and objects, and insists that the Speaker shall propound the interrogatory to the House provided for in the 5th rule, which is as follows:

"When any motion or proposition is made, the question, 'Will the House now consider it?' shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker."

The gentleman from Maine demands that the question shall now be propounded, "Will the House now consider this question?" The Chair is of opinion that the gentleman from Maine has a right to demand that that question shall be propounded to the House. From this decision of the Chair, the gentleman from Alabama [Mr. HORTON] appeals, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WASHBURN] moves to lay the appeal on the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. That leaves it entirely with a majority of the House to determine whether they will now consider the question or not. I think the decision of the Chair is perfectedly right, and I hope the appeal will be withdrawn.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think the decision is wrong, and I insist on the appeal.

The question was taken on Mr. WASHBURN's motion, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 124, nays 56; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Branch, Brayton, Bufinton, Burlingame, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clark B. Cochran, John Cochran, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Hawkins, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Pottle, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Searing, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, and Zollicoffer—124.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Barksdale, Biscock, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Cobb, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dowdell, Edmundson, Eliott, Faulkner, Florence, Gillis, Gilis, Goode, Lawrence W. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Macley, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Millson, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Whiteley, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—56.

So the appeal was laid upon the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. DAVIDSON stated that he had paired off with Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin. If he had had a right to vote, he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. NICHOLS stated that he had paired off with Mr. VALLANDIGHAM upon all questions relating to the Maryland contested-election case, or he should have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. COX stated that, if he had been within the bar when his name was called, he should have voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. Will the House consider the question proposed by the gentleman from Illinois?

Mr. BURNETT. I call for the yeas and nays on that question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have made no motion of that sort.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Maine asked that the question should be propounded. The gentleman from Illinois proposes to call up the question, and the gentleman from Maine asks that the question shall be propounded, "Will the House now consider it?"

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I desire to make an inquiry, which I think will show the character of this decision.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the decision cannot now be debated. The House has already disposed of it.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I merely want to say that I can call up this question again and again, which shows the character of this decision; and I intend to do it persistently.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Can the gentleman call it up again on the same day?

The SPEAKER. The Chair will decide that question when it arises.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move that there be a call of the House; and on that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 37, nays 139; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Bowie, Boyce, Burnett, Burns, Cobb, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Florence, Gillis, Gregg, Hawkins, Jewett, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Macley, McQueen, Millson, Isaac N. Morris, Quimman, Savage, Henry M. Shaw, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, White, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—37.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Biscock, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Bufinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochran, John Cochran, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Eustis, Farnsworth, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Hughes, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, Pottle, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Rufin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Searing, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, and Zollicoffer—139.

So the House refused to order a call.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

An act (H. R. No. 619) for the relief of John Sawyer, a soldier of the war of the Revolution;

An act (H. R. No. 538) for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of Illinois; and

An act (H. R. No. 399) for the relief of certain purchasers of lands within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830;

When the Speaker signed the same.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate insist upon their amendments disagreed to by this House to the bill of the House (No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers, and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, ask a conference with this House on the said disagreeing votes, and have appointed Mr. YULEE, Mr. SEWARD, and Mr. CLAY, the committee on their part.

Also, that the Senate disagree to the amendment of this House to the forty-first amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending June 30, 1859, insist on their amendments disagreed to by the House to the said bill, ask a conference upon the said disagreeing votes, and have appointed Mr. DAVIS, Mr. COLLAMER, and Mr. SLIDELL, the committee on their part.

Also, that the Senate disagree to the amendment of this House to the thirtieth amendment of the House bill (No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859, insist on their amendments disagreed to by the House to the said bill, ask a conference with the House upon the said disagreeing votes, and have appointed Mr. BRIGHT, Mr. STUART, and Mr. SEBASTIAN, the committee on their part.

Also, that the Senate disagree to the amendment of this House to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, insist upon their amendments disagreed to by the House to the said bill, ask a conference with the House upon the said disagreeing votes, and have appointed Mr. PEARCE, Mr. MALLORY, and Mr. FOOT, the committee on their part.

MARYLAND CONTESTED ELECTION—AGAIN.

The question recurred, "Will the House now consider the report of the Committee of Elections with reference to the Maryland contested election?"

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 87, nays 97; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, John B. bot, Miles Taylor, White, Whiteley, Winslow, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—87.

YAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Harlan, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Kellogg, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, John C. Kuukel, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Woodson, and Zollicoffer—97.

So the House decided not to consider the question now.

During the call of the roll, Mr. COLFAX stated that Mr. WILSON had paired off upon this question with Mr. LAMAR.

Mr. GARTRELL stated that Mr. WRIGHT, of Georgia, had paired off with Mr. WALDRON.

Mr. DAVIDSON stated that he had paired off with Mr. WASHBURN, of Wisconsin.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of House bill No. 234.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of privilege. I move that the House proceed to the consideration of the Maryland contested-election case.

The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion, no business having intervened since that question was disposed of.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I wish to ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up and act on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses—

Mr. GROW. I object. If the Administration want to defeat the appropriation bills by their proceeding now let them do it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. We can remain here quite as long as the gentleman.

REVOLUTIONARY CLAIMS.

Mr. FENTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House for leave to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of House bill (No. 234) to provide for the settlement of the claims of the officers and soldiers of the revolutionary army, and of the widows and children of those who died in the service.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object; and demand the regular order of business.

Mr. FENTON. I move, then, that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

Mr. STANTON. There are five or ten millions in that bill, and I think we had better have the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 85, nays 77; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Case, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edmundson, Farnsworth, Fenton, Foster, Giddings, Giliss, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Robert B. Hall, Harb, Hoard, Horton, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Landy, Leidy, Lovejoy, MacLay, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Potter, Pottle, Robbins, Roberts, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, William Stewart, Tappan, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, and Wortendyke—85.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bliss, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Horace F. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Cockrell, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Florence, Foley, Garrett, Harlan, Thomas L. Harris, Hal, Hopkins, Houston, Huxley, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kent, John C. Kuukel, Leiter, McKibbin, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Milson, Moore, Nicklack, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Ruffin, Russell, Sandridge, Savage, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, John Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Stallworth, Stanton, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Wade, White, Winslow, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—77.

So the rules were not suspended, (two thirds not voting in the affirmative.)

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. CASE stated that his colleague, Mr. KILGORE, being unwell, was compelled to leave the Hall, and that he had paired off with Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, said: Mr. Speaker, as there is no time to consider the bill now, I vote "no."

The vote was then announced to the House as above reported.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES took the floor.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I rise to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has recognized the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I so heard. I claim the floor on a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania has the right to be heard; and then, if the gentleman from Illinois has a question of superior privilege, the Chair will recognize him.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill, the Navy appropriation bill, the mail steamer bill, and the supplemental Indian appropriation bill, be taken up; that the requests of the Senate for conferences upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses be agreed to; and that the Speaker appoint the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CLEMENS. If nobody else will object to these usurpations of power on the part of the Senate, and the concentration of power in the committee of conference, I will.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended for the purpose I have indicated.

The rules were suspended; and the motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES was agreed to.

The SPEAKER appointed the following as the several committees of conference on the part of the House on the bills indicated:

On the ocean mail steamer appropriation bill, Mr. JONES of Tennessee, Mr. MARSHALL of Kentucky, and Mr. ENGLISH.

On the Army appropriation bill, Mr. QUITMAN, Mr. CRAWFORD, and Mr. STANTON.

On the supplemental Indian appropriation bill, Mr. HOUSTON, Mr. CLAY, and Mr. LEITER.

On the Navy appropriation bill, Mr. BOCKOCK, Mr. KELLY, and Mr. MORSE of Maine.

MARYLAND CONTESTED-ELECTION CASE.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I ask that the House proceed with the consideration of the Maryland contested-election case of Whyte vs. Harris. I will say that I do not propose, if the question is taken up, to debate it to any extent; but if gentlemen on the other side desire to debate it, I am willing that they should have an opportunity to do so. We might have said all that was necessary to be said in this case, and been ready for the vote in the time we have uselessly consumed this morning. I want the question decided, and I want it decided now, as the House is fuller than it was before, and I will be content with the decision of the House whatever it may be. But, sir, I am not willing to let the question pass away with what has been done this morning.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. With the permission of the gentleman I will say a word. I see a struggle commencing which will consume the entire day; and, for the purpose of testing the feeling of the House on this question, if it be in order, I will move that the further consideration of this question be postponed till the second Tuesday of December next.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have not yielded the floor for that purpose.

Mr. Speaker, I do not propose to debate the question myself, as I remarked before, nor do I know what gentleman on this side of the House does desire to debate it. I desire that the sitting member shall have full opportunity to be heard; and I think that a few hours will be sufficient to dispose of the question. In the time which has already been uselessly consumed, if devoted to the subject-matter of the report, we might now have been ready to vote. I hope the question will be disposed of now; and if it be the wish of the House that it shall pass from the consideration of the House at this session, let them say so on the record.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. Will the gentleman yield to me a moment?

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I desire to say to the House, that so far as we understand this question in the State of Maryland, it is desirable for all parties that it should be disposed of. It has been here since the commencement of the session.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. Is debate in order?

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not see any reason why it is not debatable?

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. What is the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Maryland contested-election case.

Mr. STANTON. I did not know that that question was before us. I raise the point that we have decided this morning that we would not now consider this question. Now means to-day, and I would put it to the Chair whether, under the circumstances, this question can come up at this time?

The SPEAKER. The Chair decided that the gentleman from Illinois had the right to renew the motion just as he could renew a motion to adjourn, or that there be a call of the House. If the gentleman from Ohio has any authority on the point he makes, the Chair would be glad to see it.

Mr. STANTON. It is not a debatable question; and, if I had authority, I would not be allowed to submit it. I presume that, when the House refuses to consider a question now, that, as a matter of course, it goes over until to-morrow. That was the old construction of the effect of refusing to order the previous question. I think that it will be found in all parliamentary precedents, when the House refuses to consider a question now, that it operates as a postponement for a day.

The SPEAKER. There is a class of questions which has that effect, but they are specifically set forth in the rules. The Chair finds no authority which precludes the gentleman from renewing his proposition.

Mr. GROW. I hope, by general consent, the proposition of the gentleman from Indiana will be entertained, and that we will take a vote upon it. If this debate is entered upon, of course we shall be occupied with it for the remainder of the session.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I was but making a statement which I wish to be heard by the House. So far as the committee are concerned, they are perfectly willing that the case shall go to the House upon the report and testimony which has been printed and laid upon the desks of members for some time. If it is necessary, in closing the debate, to discuss the question, but a very brief time, I am sure, would be occupied for that purpose. But, in opening the case it is proposed by no member of the majority of the committee, nor any member upon this side of the House, so far as I know, to occupy any time. When it comes up, it must be decided upon the evidence which has been presented. Time enough has been afforded to weigh that evidence, and determine how members will be governed by it.

I make this statement because I am sure that gentlemen voted against taking up the case under an impression that much time might be consumed by a discussion. I have nothing more to say, and leave the matter with the House.

Mr. QUITMAN. I wish to present to the House a tangible motion upon which they can act, and signify, without debate, their wishes upon this subject. I know nothing of this case. I am one of those who have not had time to look at the papers. Looking to the interest of the great business of the country, I move that the further consideration of the matter be postponed until the second Monday of December next.

The SPEAKER. I understand that the subject-matter is before the House, and the motion is to postpone the consideration of the subject until the second Monday of December next.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I do not know the views entertained by the gentleman who occupies the seat now, whether he desires to have the matter settled by the House at this session or not; but I speak according to my apprehension of the subject-matter of the case, without reference to the wishes of the parties, and solely in regard to what I think is due from us, as the representatives of the country, upon an occasion of this sort. Here is a contested-election case from the State of Maryland. It has been pending from the commencement of the session. A great deal of testimony has been taken, and it has been printed for a considerable length of time. Arguments have been submitted by the sitting member and the contestant, Mr. Whyte, before the Committee of Elections, and the reports of the majority and of the minority have been made to the House. What is there then in the condition of this House; what is there in the state of the public business that would justify the House upon an occasion of this sort, in postponing a case involving the right and privileges of the House? This House has determined, by its action in conjunction with the Senate, to adjourn on Monday next. To that we have no objection; and if a proper consideration of this question will not have a tendency to prolong the session, what is the difficulty? We do not desire to discuss the question, and occupy the time of the House. So far as our views of the question are concerned, we think gentlemen have had opportunity to examine the testimony, and from that and the reports of the committee, to come to a satisfactory conclusion as to what disposition should be made of this case.

If it is settled this session, an opportunity will be afforded to have another election, if that result should be advisable, between this and the next session of Congress, and the people of that district will be able to dispose of the question in all its bearings. But if you now postpone its consideration, upon the proposition of the gentleman from Mississippi, until the second Monday of December next, it will come up at the commencement of the short session. Its discussion will occupy considerable time, and, if it shall be decided that the seat is vacant, an election will have to take place; but before that election can be held, this Congress may expire by its own limitation.

I therefore submit to gentlemen upon all sides of the House, if they are disposed to meet and dispose of all important questions, and to transact the public business, what justification is there, so far as this House is concerned, for procrastinating the consideration of this question? The people are entitled to be heard. The good people of the district are entitled to be regarded. I insist upon its settlement, in justice to the contestant and to the sitting member, whose right is brought in question, because the committee has decided that his seat is vacant. You should not compel Mr. Whyte to come here next session, for the purpose of contesting the seat, merely to see to the final disposition of this case, the operation of which, if successful, can only be to make a vacancy in the district. It is therefore due to him, as contestant, that this matter should be disposed of.

What are the reasons urged upon the other side to justify the postponement? They are that we have not time. Why, sir, I apprehend that we may get through with the business by next Monday. But suppose we could not, is that any reason why important matters should be postponed? Yesterday one most important case was postponed. I did not undertake to occupy the time of the House upon that question, but so far as I could act I did not feel that I could, in justice to my apprehension of what was proper in the discharge of my duties, vote for the postponement of that matter. I say we have full time to examine this question, and there is no sufficient reason, I submit, for adjourning this House while important questions, involving vital considerations and grave constitutional privileges—indeed the rights of every section of the country—are before the House undisposed of. I hope, therefore, that this question will not be adjourned. It is due to both parties immediately interested, to the people of that district, and to ourselves, that this matter should be disposed of at this time. If there is any good reason which can be urged why we should not now enter upon the examination of this case, I am ready to hear it, and properly to weigh it. The House will bear me witness that I have not occupied as much of the time of the House as I justly might; I have been content to remain in my place, and to take such action upon the subjects coming before the House, as seemed proper, and I am ready to sit here until all the necessary business is disposed of, though it might be two or three weeks, or even longer.

This is a question of grave importance. It is material, in relation to the time of the expiration of this Congress, and I say that it is due to the sitting member, due to Mr. Whyte, the contestant, and due to the people of that district, that the matter should not be left in its present condition. The sitting member, not knowing what may be the final action of the House, or whether he is to be entitled to the seat, may be just as anxious, for aught I know, as Mr. Whyte, that the matter should be disposed of.

We are now salaried officers. Under the compensation law we are paid for the whole year, and if members return home, leaving important matters like this, and the case which was postponed yesterday, undisposed of, ill-natured persons, and indeed well-disposed persons, will be apt to say, that, but for the compensation bill, we might have sat here until the dog-days. These considerations I know will not operate upon gentlemen who take the responsibility of deciding upon their own course; but I submit to members of all parties if it is not due to ourselves and to the merits of this important question that it should be taken up and settled.

Mr. QUITMAN. The gentleman from Maryland has rather propounded an inquiry to me, and I desire to answer it. I admit the full force of many of the reasons which he has urged. I would desire that we should dispose of all the important business; and this is important business. But the question is, whether we shall rescind our resolution, and extend the session for two or three weeks; whether we will change our plans, and remain here during the very hot season which is to follow, or whether we shall postpone this matter, and go on with other important business?

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. As I understand the action proposed to be taken on this question by the chairman and members of the Committee of Elections, as intimated by the gentleman from Illinois, I cannot conceive that this case can take up more than two or three hours.

Mr. QUITMAN. It may be so; but I know how much gentlemen who have investigated and are familiar with a case are in the habit of supposing that it will take but a short time. I understand that there is a volume of testimony, and that there are many principles of law involved; and I do not hesitate to say, in conclusion, that, if the House takes up this case, they will not get rid of it in less than two or three days. We have the appropriation bills and the reports of the committees of conference to act upon; and if we mean to take up this case, we ought at once to rescind the resolution to adjourn on Monday.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland. I have expressed my conviction of what is proper. I could not sit here silently, and allow this case to be postponed without entering my earnest protest against such action. I have now discharged my duty, and the House can dispose of the question as they see proper.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I desire only to occupy a moment of time in explaining the reasons why I proposed to make this motion to postpone.

I did it on my own responsibility, without consultation with any other gentleman on this floor, and I think I did it for good and valid reasons, and I desire to give those reasons in as few words as I possibly can.

I have no feeling about this case, one way or the other. I stand here as an unbiased and unprejudiced juror to try this case whenever it shall come properly before this House, and I will do it without regard to my political affinities or political predilections, as I have done on all former occasions when I have been called upon to decide questions of this kind.

The reasons which governed me were briefly these: we are now within less than two days of the final adjournment, and have less than two working days before us, with an immense amount of business interesting to this whole country that ought to be accomplished within that period.

Gentlemen talk about this question occupying only an hour or two. Sir, I have too much experience in this House, and have witnessed too many debates in reference to questions of not as much importance as the one under consideration, to believe for a moment that this question can be decided in less than two days. Here is a volume of twelve hundred pages of testimony. I will venture the assertion that not five men in this House have read that testimony. I know, sir, that I have attended to my duties here with as much fidelity as any gentleman here; but owing to the amount of business pressed upon me by the various committees on which I have been placed, it has been impossible for me to take up this case and decide the question as it ought to be decided between the contestant and the contestee, with a view to the rights of the citizens of Baltimore.

Sir, the question resolves itself into this: you have either to postpone the final adjournment of Congress for a week, or else you have to postpone this question. It is for the House to judge between these two alternatives. It is for the House to decide whether we will go on with the regular and legitimate business which belongs to the whole country, North, South, East and West, or whether we will now, just at the close of the session, take up and decide this question for the people of Baltimore.

I ask members of this House how the postponement of this case until next session is to affect the people of Baltimore? There are but two days of the session left. It will take the entire two days to decide the question. If we were to give the seat to the sitting member, or to the contestant, I ask what either of them could do during the short period of the session that would remain? If we postpone the case, gentlemen can take the report and testimony home and examine them at their leisure, and come here at the commencement of the next session prepared, as unprejudiced jurors, to settle this question according to the right between the contestant and the contestee. It seems to me that there can be no detriment to the interests of the people of Baltimore by the postponement of this question until an early period next session.

Mr. BURNETT. I shall not follow the example set me by declaring how honest or impartial I may be in the case. I shall make no professions of that sort. I moved an amendment to a proposition to adjourn, changing the time fixed for the adjournment of Congress from Monday to Thursday. I did so because I believed we could get through with the business in time. Now, we can decide this contested-election case and adjourn on Monday. But whether or not we are salaried officers of the Government, Congress lasts till the 4th of next March, and it is the duty of members on this floor to stay here and attend to their duties. Gentlemen may say that such a consideration ought not to govern, but I hold that it ought. The people are entitled to our services. It is our duty to stay here and dispose of the business of the Government.

Mr. COBB. Let us do it.

Mr. BURNETT. The gentleman from Indiana says, "how can it operate on the people of Maryland whether we act on this question or not?" He asks, how are they to be prejudiced? Why, if we postpone this case until December next, and if the report of the majority of the committee should be then adopted, the result will be that we leave that district without a Representative for the whole Congress. Both reports show that the contestant in this case is not entitled to the seat; and it is not proposed to give it to him.

The SPEAKER. The merits of the question cannot be discussed on a motion to postpone.

Mr. BURNETT. I am not going to discuss that question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman was contrasting the rights of the contestant and sitting member.

Mr. BURNETT. No, sir; the Chair misunderstood me. I merely mentioned the fact that the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. DAVIS] had made this argument; and I wanted then to show that if the case was postponed until December, the people of that district could not be represented here for the rest of the Congress; because the right of but one party to the seat is involved here; and that party is the sitting member. Now, the effect of postponing this question is—what? To settle the question, so far as the district is concerned, for the rest of the Congress. That is on the hypothesis that the report of the majority of the committee will be adopted. If it be, it will be impossible to order an election, and to hold it in time for the member elect to take his seat this Congress.

Several MEMBERS. Why?

Mr. BURNETT. For the simple reason that if it will take all the time to discuss it, that gentlemen say, it will take as much time then. I say that this question can be disposed of in a day. If you want more time to discuss it I am willing to hear you just as long as you want to discuss it. I am not prepared to sit here and vote to postpone an important question merely because we have fixed a day to adjourn. Besides, there is a strong probability—though gentlemen may not be apprised of that fact—that the session will be prolonged, and that we will not adjourn on Monday. With these facts before us, I ask gentlemen how we can take action, the result of which will be to deprive the district of representation here, during the Congress?

Mr. KEITT. I shall vote for the postponement, and, I think, for good and sufficient reasons. I take it that Congress will adjourn on next Monday. Assuming that, I take it that we must perform our public duties in correspondence to the time fixed. There are grave and delicate questions growing out of this contested election—questions very grave, questions of law, questions of Constitution, questions not exclusively of the power of the House, but of the exercise of its power, and of the most delicate character. I am unwilling, without grave reflection, to decide on these questions. I am unwilling to set a precedent which may be, hereafter, of the most dangerous significance. I am unwilling to decide hastily on questions which may touch the very structure of this body. I believe that it is of vastly greater importance that we should decide these questions calmly, and with full knowledge, that we should decide them after full examination, that we should settle them with a proper appreciation of the magnitude of their consequences, than that we should act hastily and decide finally on the rights of any contestant or contestee.

It is because of the importance and magnitude of this question; because of the vast amount of testimony brought within the compass of our decision, that I do believe that it is better for us to postpone this question. We may talk about extending this session; but it will not be extended on account of this question. The question with us is, whether or not we will postpone action on questions thus grave and delicate, or whether we will decide them hastily. I believe it is better we should postpone the consideration of this case.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I have but a few words to say in reply to the arguments made by the gentleman from Indiana and the gentleman from South Carolina, in favor of the postponement of this question. I have been here long enough to know, and I knew before I came here—what, indeed, every man knows—that when business is done at leisure, it is never done. The gentleman from Indiana argued that members would take the report home and examine it at leisure, and that, when they come back here they will be prepared to decide it. I venture to say that, if that leisure moment is waited for that is to be devoted to the examination of this question, it will never be examined. When gentlemen take up important matters of business to dispose of at leisure, they are never taken up and never disposed of. This document has been printed nearly four months. It was presented here on the 25th of February, and ordered to be printed; and if gentlemen have not read it, it is their own fault. There has been leisure enough, which has been given to matters of less importance or which has been thrown away, and which might have been devoted to the examination of the testimony in this case; and if gentlemen are not prepared to decide it, the fault must be theirs. They will not be better prepared to decide it next December than they are to-day.

Now, as to the time that may be consumed in discussing the question. I believe I stated that it is not intended, on this side, to occupy the time of the House in the discussion. There are subjects which have occupied months of debate, but which were, in fact, exhausted in a dozen speeches of an hour each. I am sure that this whole question can be presented by either side in half a dozen speeches, of an hour each, just as effectively, and just as clearly to the comprehension of the House, as if days were spent over it. This is not a question which I am disposed to have argued to the country, but to the House. We stand here as jurors to decide this case upon the law and the evidence, and not to make capital in the country for ourselves, or for political parties. I deprecate utterly any such thing coming into this case. If gentlemen have such design and wishes, and want prolonged discussion for that purpose, let them avow it. I have no such desire. I am aware that almost all our cases of contested elections run too much into party issues, and are not confined to the facts. I hope this will be an exception, and that its discussion will be confined to the real points in issue; and if it is, it ought to be presented by gentlemen in a single day, just as conclusively as in a month's debate. If it is the desire to wear out the time in debate, and thus prevent a decision at this session, let gentlemen avow it; but if it is the desire simply to present each side of the question, it can be done effectively in a short time.

Gentlemen say that it involves questions of a grave and delicate nature. I concede that. But questions of a grave and delicate nature are often as much involved in giving important propositions the go-by, as in deciding them. When questions are presented in the House as they are here, with the testimony printed, and before every gentleman for examination and decision, and they are given the go-by, such neglect or avoidance of responsibility subjects the House to imputations far more discreditable than to meet the issues presented, and decide them like men.

I think it is important that this question should be considered. I have no personal considerations to govern me in the matter; but connected as I am with the prosecution of the case on the part of the Committee of Elections, I feel it my duty to urge upon the House to decide it. I will not discuss the motion to postpone farther than I have. I hope the question will be decided at once; and that it may be, I call for the previous question.

Several MEMBERS. Do not call for the previous question.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I will not, if the gentleman will withdraw the motion to postpone.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes thirty-five, noes not counted.

So the previous question was not seconded.

Mr. MILLSON. I wish to say something on this subject, sir, but not much. There is a difference of opinion as to the time which may be consumed in debating this report of the Committee of Elections. Some gentlemen suppose that the time occupied will be only an hour or two; others say that it will consume a day or two. I think it will consume a day or two. I think it ought to consume a day or two. I should be very reluctant, on a question so important as this, to agree that it should be decided by the House of Representatives without giving to it the careful consideration which its magnitude demands. If we take up this question to-day, we may not be able to approach the termination of the discussion before Monday morning. What then? Why, sir, if we do not rescind our resolution to adjourn, as we ought to do—if the Senate do not assent to the resolution of rescission, as they ought to do, there is a very ready remedy for any evil which may result; and that is, that the President will, as he ought to do, keep us in Washington by his proclamation.

Gentlemen tell us that they are anxious to go home to their families, and that it cannot be expected that we should remain here during the warm months of summer. Why, sir, the first session of Congress which I attended, in 1850, was not terminated until the 30th of September. Nor has any Congress of which I have been a member adjourned its first session earlier than the month of August. Here we are, only in the month of June, early in June, receiving over double the pay we received then, and it is gravely argued that we are entitled to leave unperformed our public duties here, when, with a less salary than we now receive, we remained in session months beyond the time to which we have now arrived. And we propose, sir, to carry over the most important business of the long session to a session limited to the duration of three months. The business now unfinished upon your Calendar greatly exceeds the business already dispatched at this session. Sir, you have not yet considered the first case upon the Calendar of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman must confine his remarks to the question before the House.

Mr. COBB. If the question of adjournment is open to discussion, I have a word to say.

Mr. MILLSON. With submission to the Chair, I think that my remarks are in order, as I am showing that the effect of the postponement will be to throw over to the next session a vast amount of unfinished business.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman's remarks impress the Chair more with the conviction that they are against the adjournment than the postponement of this case.

Mr. MILLSON. I readily accept the admonition of the Chair; but I trust that the Chair will perceive that the argument I am presenting is a perfectly legitimate one, for I am endeavoring to answer the arguments of gentlemen who urge, as a reason for the postponement of this case, that we have determined to adjourn on Monday. I said that we not only might, but ought, to rescind the order for the adjournment on Monday; and that the mere determination of members to return to their homes two or three months earlier than they have been accustomed to do, constitutes no justification for leaving unperformed important public business.

Now, sir, in reference to the case before us, I can only say that I urge these general considerations, not because I have either the desire or the expectation that the House, when we approach the consideration of the question, will come to any particular conclusion, but because I do not think we ought to postpone to the short session any business so important as this—and other important business which has already been postponed—merely for the reason that we are tired of the session, and desire to return to our homes. If the consideration of this case should prevent us from passing all the bills which require the attention of Congress at this session within the time we have fixed for adjournment, there is a ready remedy in the President's proclamation calling us together again, even if we do not rescind the resolution we have adopted for adjourning on Monday. I hope, then, that we will come to some conclusion on this question at the present session, and not throw this and other important business over to the next session of Congress—the duration of which is so short that we cannot possibly consider one tenth part of the business proposed to be left unfinished at this session.

Mr. PEYTON. I shall not detain the House long. I am satisfied of one thing, and that is, if the House should talk from morning till night, from day to day, they may sit here until the 4th of March next, and still leave the business undone. If gentlemen will talk less and vote more, we have ample time to accomplish the business of the country. The object, as I understand it, of giving members a fixed salary, was that members should hasten through their business, talk less, and thereby save immense amounts of money to the Government. But with this mania for talking, we ought not to begin to talk about adjourning until the 1st of October. All I ask of gentlemen is to take it for granted that their colleagues upon this floor are as well posted up as they are, and that we are prepared to vote, and then we shall be able to adjourn on Monday.

The question being on postponing.

Mr. SAVAGE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 80; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Collins, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Fenton, Foster, Garnett, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Haskin, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Keitt, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, John Sherman, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Wood, Woodson, and Zollicoffer—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Bocoock, Bonham, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, John B. Clark, Clay, Cobb, John Cochrane, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dewar, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Florence, Foley, Gartrell, Gillis, Goode, Greenwood, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Houston, Hughes, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Letcher, MacLay, McQueen, Mason, Miles, Millson, Moore, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Singleton, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Miles Taylor, White, and Whiteley—80.

So the subject was postponed until the second Monday of December next.

Mr. COCKERILL stated, pending the call of the roll, that he had paired off with Mr. HARLAN.

Mr. DAVIDSON stated that he had paired off.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, stated that Mr. FARNSWORTH had paired off upon this vote with Mr. SAVAGE.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee, stated that he had paired off with Mr. KILGORE, who had retired from the Hall on account of indisposition; and that he [Mr. WRIGHT] would have voted in the negative.

Mr. MATTESON stated that Mr. MORSE, of Maine, was detained from the House by sickness in his family, and had paired off with Mr. SMITH, of Illinois.

Mr. NIBLACK stated that he would have voted in the affirmative if he had been in the Hall when his name was called.

The vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, moved to reconsider the vote by which the consideration of the question was postponed, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

APPROPRIATION BILLS.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to report back from the Committee of Ways and Means the Senate amendments to House bill (No. 466) making appropriations for the expense of collecting the revenue from customs, and House bill (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

There being no objection, the reports were made.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the amendments to these two bills be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and that they be printed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. Before that motion is put, I ask that the amendments just reported be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until disposed of, and that debate be closed on them, respectively, in five minutes after the committee shall take them up for consideration.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. COMINS. I desire to move, before we go into committee, that the light-house appropriation bill be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union immediately after the committee shall have disposed of the amendments which have just been referred to it.

Mr. BURNETT. How does the gentleman from Massachusetts get the floor to make that motion?

The SPEAKER. He cannot make the motion, unless the gentleman from Pennsylvania gives way for that purpose.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I insist upon my motion to go into committee.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair,) and took up for consideration, according to order, the Senate amendments to House bill (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate amendments were taken up in their order, when the following action was had thereon.

First amendment:

At the end of the bill add the following:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who shall receive the same compensation which is paid to each of the other Assistant Postmasters General; and the said Fourth Assistant Postmaster General is hereby authorized to send and receive letters, packages, and other papers, upon official business, through the mails free of postage, subject to the same restrictions and penalties as the other Assistant Postmasters General; and that the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated for the salary of said officer for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Under the present arrangement the duties proposed to be conferred upon this Fourth Assistant Postmaster General are performed by the chief clerk. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. HOUSTON. My opinion is that this amendment ought to prevail. The amendment may be in the wrong place, (being general legislation in an appropriation bill;) and if we propose to reject all amendments which come to us from the Senate that may be obnoxious to that objection, then I would say let this fail with the rest; but such is not the case. Other amendments of the same character are assented to, and if this one makes a reform, essential and necessary, we must judge of it upon its merits, as other propositions are judged upon their merits.

The organization of the Post Office Department at present, is such that there are really four bureaus in that Department. There are the First, Second, and Third Assistant Postmasters General, as also the inspection office, the duties of which are now performed by the chief clerk. There is another view of this subject. The duties of this office are more important in many respects than those performed by the other bureaus—if I may so call them—of the Post Office Department. Those duties are now performed by the chief clerk of the Department, a person who receives but a small salary, when viewed in connection with his duties; and it is impossible for the Postmaster General, for the salary of his chief clerk, to obtain the services of a man qualified to decide the questions which come before that office under the present arrangement. The questions which come up, and are now decided by the chief clerk of the Department are very important, involving the validity of all of the mail contracts that give rise to litigation or controversy—questions which grow out of and are involved in the assessment and release of fines, forfeitures, &c., by mail failures, and defaults of every kind springing out of the mail service. These are now passed upon by the chief clerk, who has a salary of $1,800 or $2,000.

A MEMBER. Two thousand two hundred dollars.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman says $2,200. I do not care whether it is $2,200 or $2,000. You cannot get a person who is qualified to discharge the duties of the office for that salary. If the Postmaster General were authorized to pay a sufficient salary, he should require and appoint a lawyer of the first ability to go there and discharge the duties which appertain to the office. All the contractors of the country are quite as deeply interested in this Assistant as in any other.

It is impossible for the Postmaster General, in addition to his other onerous duties, individually to look over and properly examine into all the questions of law and all the contracts and litigated subjects which at present go before the chief clerk. He has not the time to do it; and if gentlemen will refer to the remarks made by the Senator from Vermont, [Mr. COLLAMER,] who has himself discharged the duties of Postmaster General, they will find a conclusive and satisfactory argument in favor of the creation of this fourth Assistant.

Mr. ENGLISH. To enable me to say a word, I will offer a formal amendment, to increase the salary one dollar. Mr. Chairman, I think I am as little inclined to increase the number of officers of the General Government as any member on this floor; but after a careful examination of this subject, I am satisfied there is a necessity for the creation of this office. It is important that someone should be placed in charge of the supervision of the various contracts made with individuals for carrying the mails of the United States; and it requires a person with high attainments to discharge the duties of this office properly. These contracts amount to about ten million dollars a year, I believe; and it is necessary for some one to determine whether the contracts have been properly executed; whether fines should be imposed for the non-performance of contracts, and to decide various other propositions which ought not to be devolved on a mere clerk of the Department.

In addition to this, this Department ought to have a chief clerk, as other Departments have. As the matter stands at present, the entire time of the chief clerk of this Department is taken up in the discharge of those peculiar duties. He has not time to attend to the general business of the Department, or to discharge the duties usually performed by the chief clerk. I only desire to say that, in my humble judgment, after investigating the whole subject, there is a necessity for the creation of this office. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. COLFAX. I move, pro forma, to reduce the appropriation $500. No member of this House, I think, has proved himself more jealous than I have been of any increase of executive patronage, more anxious to reduce the expenses of Government, or more earnest in endeavors to reduce the number of its office holders. But I feel it equally a duty, as a member of an American Congress, whenever a clear case of necessity can be shown, to establish a new post office, or a post route, or a new bureau in a Department, or a proper officer for one already existing. And I can say that this is a case, and the only case I have found, of all that have been presented here, where I have felt justified in establishing an additional officer in any of the Departments.

What are the facts? The Post Office Department is increasing in its business with extraordinary rapidity. It is divided naturally into four bureaus—the appointment office, in charge of the First Assistant Postmaster General; the contract office, in charge of the Second Assistant; the finance office, in charge of the Third Assistant; and the inspection office, in charge of the chief clerk. In the first bureau, the number of post offices have increased in nine years from sixteen to twenty-seven thousand, and its business is performed by the same number of clerks it had in 1849, a highly creditable exception to the general rule here of increasing the number of subordinates for any possible reason. In the second bureau, since its organization, in 1836, thirty-eight million miles have been added to the annual transportation of the mails, and its business connected therewith has increased to one thousand six hundred cases per month. In the third bureau, six thousand five hundred mail contractors are now paid quarterly, and four hundred and fifty route or mail agents paid monthly. It supplies twenty-three thousand post offices quarterly, or oftener, with postage stamps and envelopes; receives, opens, and registers the quarterly accounts from twenty-seven thousand post offices, making one hundred and eight thousand per year; and counts, opens, examines and compares six hundred and fifty thousand dead letters per quarter. In the fourth bureau, the chief clerk has charge of the inspection office, which has grown into a most important branch of the Department, over which this Fourth Assistant is to preside. He superintends all our army of mail contractors, has charge of the mail-bag, key, and lock department, of depredations from mails, of fines for failure to perform service promptly, failures of connection, &c. His entire time has become engrossed with these accumulating and increasing duties, so that the Department has really no chief clerk at all. Every other Department in the Government has a chief clerk but this one; and it is but sheer naked justice that it should have one as well as the others. If the other Assistant Postmasters General are necessary, then a fourth one is equally so, to transact this branch of the business of the Department. If other Departments are justified in each having a chief clerk, then is the Post Office Department equally justified. Judge COLAMER, of Vermont, now a distinguished member of the Senate, as he was a most distinguished Postmaster General under President Taylor, fully endorses the necessity of this officer, by both speech and vote; and I shall, therefore, with this confirmation of the reasons I have briefly alluded to, make this case a solitary exception to my general rule, and vote in favor of the establishment of this new office.

Mr. JEWETT. I understand, Mr. Chairman, that in point of fact there is a bureau now in existence the same as that mentioned in the proposed amendment; but I understand that it is a bureau without a head. The Postmaster General, like the other Secretaries, is entitled to a chief clerk; but he has been compelled to give up that clerk, whose services he has a right to expect as an aid in the discharge of his duties as Postmaster General. He has to give up his clerk to the performance of these other duties, and, as I am informed, has even to render him assistance himself.

I understand, furthermore, that it is the most important bureau of the whole Department; that the contracts of every character and description come up for construction at that bureau; and that it requires, as was well remarked by the gentleman from Alabama, a man of very considerable legal learning to perform the duties of this office. I had a conversation with the Postmaster General myself upon this subject; and, entertaining a very high regard for his ability, honesty, and integrity, and believing that he would ask for nothing that was not really required for the public service, I have consented to advocate this proposition.

Mr. COLFAX, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

[A message was received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate have appointed Mr. FREN, on their part, upon the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1858.]

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by striking out that portion of it which gives the franking privilege to this officer. The franking privilege is entirely abolished by another amendment to the bill, and I propose to deprive this officer of the franking privilege also.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have no objection, if the franking privilege is taken away from other officers, that this officer should be put on the same footing. But if other bureau officers have it, why not give it to this officer?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. When we come to the clause of the bill which proposes to abolish the franking privilege of members of Congress, I shall propose to extend it to all officers of the Government, so as to make a clean sweep.

Mr. HOUSTON. Well, that will include this officer.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Not if the franking privilege is conferred upon him by another clause of the bill.

Mr. ENGLISH. I think that officers in the Post Office Department ought to be clothed with power to frank matter pertaining to the business of the Department, but that the franking privilege should go no further.

The amendment to the amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the amendment of the Senate by striking out "$3,000," and inserting "$1,500." I am opposed to this whole proposition. I do not see any particular necessity just at this time which requires this Fourth Assistant Postmaster General. I believe it is desired by nearly all the other Departments of the Government that they should have assistants. The Secretary of War wants an assistant; the Secretary of the Interior wants an assistant; and so, I believe, with all the other Departments. We have already three Assistant Postmasters General. But gentlemen say that this bureau is already in existence, and all that it lacks is a head. Well, who has performed the duties heretofore? How have they been discharged? And why cannot they be discharged in the same way a while longer?

Mr. ENGLISH. The duties have been discharged by the so-called chief clerk of the Department, which deprives the Postmaster General of a chief clerk.

Mr. LETCHER. Now, let that so-called chief clerk discharge the duties a while longer, and do not let us undertake to increase the expenditures at a time when the Post Office Department is asking an annual appropriation of nearly five million dollars. It seems to me that, instead of enlarging the expenditures, we ought, if we can, to get along without multiplying officers; and for this reason I hope the amendment of the Senate will not be concurred in.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not object to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] advocating economy; indeed, I am delighted when he does so; but I cannot very well understand the principle upon which he acts, especially when he comes in with one bill recommending an increase in the number of clerks in the Treasury Department, and another bill recommending a batch of extras to clerks and employes who never earned a cent of them, amounting to $75,000, or more; and now, when a proposition comes to us from the Senate to complete the organization of a Department which is one of the largest Departments of this Government, and is increasing more rapidly, probably, than any other, with a view of saving two or three thousand dollars, he objects to it on the ground of economy.

I say that there is no Department of this Government which has grown, or is growing, more rapidly than the Post Office Department. There is but little, if any, necessity for an assistant in the War or in the Navy Department. There is already an assistant in the State and in the Treasury Departments. But the Post Office Department is constantly growing in its consequence and in the amount of its business. Our mail facilities are being multiplied. Our offices and officers are being multiplied. Their duties are becoming more important and complicated. And yet, for the sake of saving a few thousand dollars, the gentleman would let all the mail contracts remain in the hands and under the control of a chief clerk at a salary of $2,000. Contracts in which the Government is interested to the extent of millions of dollars, are adjudicated and passed upon by the chief clerk. Now, sir, I do not regard that as economy. A few days ago the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads saw fit to bring forward a bill to readjudicate and release certain fines imposed against mail contractors. I believe that we have passed two or three bills of that character, and we have passed them because the House seemed to be of the impression that justice had not been done at the Department. Justice, sir, cannot, in all cases, be done, so long as you place these important questions and interests in the hands of one whose services can be obtained for so small a compensation.

Mr. LETCHER withdrew his amendment.

The question recurred on concurring in the Senate amendment.

Mr. JEWETT demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and HAWKINS were appointed.

The Committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 73, noes 58.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Second amendment:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the fourth section of the act of Congress approved August 5, 1854, entitled "An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1855," be, and the same is hereby, continued for one year from August 5, 1855.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That amendment refers to the act of 1855, and its effect is to allow a small additional compensation to the officers of the city post office in Washington, for documents which are franked and sent out. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

The amendment was non-concurred in

Third amendment:

Sec. 5. And be it further enacted, That the joint resolution of Congress, of the 18th of August, 1836, which provides that there shall be one principal messenger in each of the bureaus of the several Executive Departments, at an annual salary of $840 each, shall be understood to embrace within its true scope and meaning the offices of the Assistant Postmasters General.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment as they did in the first, but the Committee of the Whole have concurred in the first amendment, and this is essential to it. The first amendment provides for a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, and the third amendment provides a messenger for him.

Mr. ENGLISH. The object of this amendment, as I understand it, is to put the messengers in each of the bureaus of the Post Office Department upon the same basis, as to pay, as the messengers in the other bureaus of the Government.

The Senate amendment was not concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized and directed to pay to E. K. Collins and his associates, the sum of $147,730, the balance of appropriation heretofore made for the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool and back, and withheld by the Department at the quarterly payments made on the contract for that service, on the 30th days of June and September, and the 31st day of December, 1853, and the 31st of March and 30th of June and September, 1857, respectively; but there shall be deducted therefrom the sum of $115,500, or such sum as is owing to the United States, for allowances made to E. K. Collins and his associates by act of Congress.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendment is to pay the claim of E. K. Collins and his associates to moneys retained out of appropriations under their contract, for several trips. In consequence of the loss of one of their ships they substituted another, with the consent of the Department, which was not equal in speed. The Postmaster General retained certain portions of the amounts due on several trips performed by vessels which did not make the voyage in the same period of time as the other vessels. Mr. Collins claims that this money is due him; and the Attorney General has given his opinion to the same effect. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise for the purpose of sustaining the amendment of the Senate. It proceeds, as I understand, upon the force of facts, and the opinion of the Attorney General delivered upon those facts. It seems, sir, that in 1847 a contract was affirmed between the Government and E. K. Collins and his associates for carrying the mails between New York and Liverpool, and that another contract was made in 1849, extending the prior contract to the 1st of June, 1860. They proceeded to the fulfillment of the contract, and in 1854 they lost one of their steamers, the Arctic, and in 1856 another vessel, the Pacific. After the loss of the second steamer they were unable, without the assistance of another steamer, to perform their contract. They applied, therefore, to the Secretary of the Navy to permit them to resort to a substitute for the Arctic and Pacific. That consent was granted, and they substituted the Ericsson, and performed their contract. But under the plea that the duty was not dispatched with as much speed as by the Arctic and Pacific, this amount of money at the various dates mentioned in the Senate amendment was withheld by the Government—namely, $147,730. This amendment proposes to return to Collins and his associates this amount.

The plea put in upon the part of the opponents of Collins & Co., is simply that they did not perform the duty devolved upon them by the contract; and in the first place that they did not keep upon their line the number of steamers required by their contract. Says the Attorney General in this respect:

"I. They covenanted to build those four ships within a limited time. They did build them, and so their agreement was literally complied with. It was known very well that ships might be lost; but there was no promise, on the part

To this letter the Secretary of the Navy, under date of February 13, 1856, replies:

"Under the peculiar circumstances, I concur in your proposition to make the best possible arrangement you can for a steamer to take the place of the Pacific."

Now under this express authority and under the most trying circumstances—because it will be recollected that a portion of the family of Mr. Collins went down with the Pacific—the Ericsson was employed to take the place of the lost steamer. Is it because the Ericsson failed to make as good time as was made by the Pacific, that the Department has a right to make the deductions? Sir, I take it there ought to have been no such deductions made because of the substitution of the Ericsson for the Pacific. In all material respects the service that was required to be performed was performed. The usual trips were made and the mails carried as provided in the contract. The only allegation that can be made is that they were not carried as quickly as they were carried before. But inasmuch as the Navy Department authorized the substitution of this vessel, and recognized it, I think it is too late now for the Department to come forward and exact from him this large sum of $147,000 for the period that the Ericsson was on the line.

Now, sir, this question was examined into by the Attorney General under Mr. Pierce's administration. He decided against the allowance of the claim; but the subject has been referred to the present Attorney General; and, in a very lucid opinion which I have before me, he says that he thinks the claim a just one, and that the money ought not to be withheld; and that, I believe, is the opinion of a majority of the members of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads. At all events, I can say that, after a careful investigation of this subject—and I approached it, I confess, with some degree of prejudice—I have satisfied my own mind that the claim is a just one, and ought to be paid. Whether the contract which the Government made with Collins & Co. was a good one or a bad one has nothing to do with the question. It should stand or fall upon its own merit. I should not have voted for the original contract. I never have voted for any of these special contracts for ocean mail service; but I will execute in good faith a contract already made; and for this reason I shall vote for allowing the present claim.

The question was taken on Mr. SMITH's amendment; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I offer the following amendment:

Provided, That the Postmaster General shall also review the decisions of the late Postmaster General; and in all cases where fines have been imposed, or deductions have been made from the pay of the ocean mail steamer lines established under the act of Congress of 1847, and such fines and deductions shall have been imposed or made against law and the justice of the case, that the same be in like manner refunded, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I raise a question of order on that amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment not in order.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Then I propose, in lieu thereof, to strike out the first three lines of the Senate amendment.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask, how will the context stand?

Mr. CLARK, of New York. It is of no consequence, as I only seek the opportunity of making a very few remarks.

Mr. Chairman, the amendment which I just now proposed was offered in entire good faith. If, in the opinion of the House, the condition of the Treasury is such that we can begin to refund the fines which have been illegally imposed, and the deductions which have been unjustly made from the pay of the ocean mail steamer lines established under the act of Congress of 1847, we ought to include, all and show no favoritism.

Now, I do not rise for the purpose of speaking against the Senate amendment; for, personally, I am not unwilling that there should be made even a donation from the Treasury of the United States of $147,000 to Mr. Collins. You may make him that donation; you may double it; but you cannot by your donation, and you cannot by your bounty, enable him to compete successfully with that individual enterprise which goes along alone and undisturbed, and which is not dependent on the nation-age of the Government. But I have a right to ask the House that, if the Treasury is to be opened to one set of mail contractors, it should be also open to another. The parties seeking that these fines and deductions be refunded, are all my constituents; but I have no favorites among them, and I am inclined to give no one of them any preference over the other. I have in my desk an application from another of the mail steamer lines, established under the act of 1847, asking for the return of fines or deductions amounting to about twenty thousand dollars, imposed under circumstances of similar injustice. One of the cases I will briefly state, for it illustrates the injustice of this special legislation in favor of one of several claimants, all equally entitled. A few years ago, the Spanish Government prohibited a mail steamer—the property of some of my constituents—from entering the port of Havana. Although the guns of the Moro castle, directed against her, prevented her advance, the Postmaster General fined her proprietors $5,000, and deducted it from their mail pay, because they did not leave the mail, when they could not leave it. Now, I know all about the transactions out of which this application arises.

Mr. ENGLISH. I wish to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. I cannot yield any portion of my five minutes. Mr. Chairman, the relief sought in this case should be accorded by a general bill, and should not be ingrafted upon an appropriation bill. The relief should be broad enough to reach all the cases which depend upon the same principle. Sir, why should this $147,000 be tacked on to the naval appropriation bill? Why should not I, who desire to do full justice with a liberal hand to Mr. Collins, and every other claimant against the Government, have a right to vote upon it, should I deem the legislation partial, without being subjected to the necessity of voting against one of the Administration appropriation bills? If this claim rests upon a question of law, as is said, if the right to have these deductions refunded depends upon principles of law, then a separate bill should have been introduced and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary, and that committee would have dealt justly and fairly with it. If Mr. Collins is entitled to this sum of money upon any principle either of law or equity, I stand ready to vote to give it to him. But I object to the partiality by which you select one or two of a large class of claimants and let them put their arms into the national Treasury, while you exclude others who are equally entitled to the privilege.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. CAVANAUGH. This is a subject in which my constituents have no personal interest. The constituency that I represent are two thousand miles from the sea-board. They have no direct interest in the carriage of the mails to Europe, like the gentlemen from the city and State of New York. But, sir, they have an interest, as every American should have, in all that enhances the fame, develops the genius or elevates the character of our people as a nation in the estimation of the world.

Now, sir, in reply to the assertions of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. SMITH,] I will read an extract from the opinion of the Attorney General of this Government. Speaking of E. K. Collins and his associates, he says:

"They covenanted to build those four ships within a limited time. They did build them, and so their agreement was literally complied with. It was known very well that ships might be lost; but there was no promise, on the part of Collins & Co., to build others in case of accident to these. They did not agree to insure them against the peril of the seas."

Now, sir, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CLARK] has alluded to the enterprise and energy of individuals in putting afloat upon the ocean vast steamships, by which our mails may be carried. I believe, sir, that the individual who inaugurates a great enterprise, who first starts or conceives the idea, should, if there are any benefits to accrue from its inauguration, receive those benefits. Now, sir, where were these rivals in carrying the mails between New York and Liverpool, when E. K. Collins and his associates demonstrated not only to this American Confederacy, but to the world, the superiority of American genius and American naval architecture, and successfully contested with England the supremacy of the seas? There is not an American in this broad land of ours, who did not rejoice at the success of Collins when he launched upon the deep those magnificent structures that gave to our nation a European and world-wide reputation. And now, because God, in his mysterious providence, saw fit to strike down those wonderful specimens of naval architecture, the Arctic and the Pacific, after Collins and his associates had demonstrated the superiority of American genius and enterprise on the ocean, Mr. Vanderbilt, and others like him, in New York—gentlemen who always come in at the tail of an enterprise—now seek to deprive Collins and his associates of their just dues.

If we refuse to the pioneers of American steam naval enterprises that compensation to which they are justly entitled by their contract with Government, and if, by the injustice of Congress, they are driven to seek new channels for the employment of their ships, amongst which is that "wonder of the deep," the Adriatic, then, indeed, will the triumph of wealth and accident over brains and energy be complete.

Sir, I prefer, the whole country prefers, to aid the men who have shed glory upon the American name, in successfully and peacefully wresting from England her proud and boasted title of "mistress of the seas."

Sir, Collins & Co. ask no gratuity from the Government; they only ask that the Government shall fulfill its part of the contract.

The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. SMITH] says that Collins and his associates have failed to perform the duties imposed upon them by the terms of agreement. In answer to that, I quote the language of the Government's legal adviser. He says:

"But inasmuch as they have kept their covenants literally, and as there is no evidence that can justify a suspicion of bad faith, I see nothing in the case on which to rest my conscience in advising you to withhold from them the money which the Government has promised to pay them."

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to amend the amendment of the gentleman from New York by substituting "twenty-five dollars" for "fifty dollars."

Mr. Chairman, I do not know whence the gentleman from Minnesota derives his authority for saying that Cornelius Vanderbilt never originated an enterprise. Why, sir, if I understand his history, he was a poor boy, and has grown into consequence by an enterprise that has had no equal, and, consequently, no successful rivalry, anywhere. It has been the glory of his life to surpass all competition; and he does not come here now, and ask for a bonus from his country to maintain, on his part, a competition in ocean mail service. No, sir; it is for the gentleman's friend to come here to beg from the Treasury a bonus of $19,250 the round trip, in order to maintain a pretended rivalry with foreign steamers. What does Cornelius Vanderbilt ask now? That the ocean mail service shall be thrown open to the world, and that those may win who can. He does not desire that the Government shall lavish its treasure upon any enterprise. He asks that the matter may be left to American enterprise; he is perfectly content with that. But Mr. Collins, the committee must remember, asks that he shall be allowed his old contract for the inferior service performed by the Ericsson.

Mr. ENGLISH. I will ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I have not time to yield to the gentleman now. Now, sir, if I contracted with the Government for coach service, and the coach was to break down and become worthless, and I asked to carry the mail in a buggy, would anybody suppose that I was to get coach pay for buggy service? That is just what Collins wants us to do to him. Again, when this deduction now complained of was made, it was made by a Postmaster General who is no longer in office. It was made under the advice of an Attorney General who is no longer in office. It is a res adjudicata, and this whole proceeding is an attempt to reopen a transaction which has been closed by the judgment of those who had the power alone to pass on it. This amendment is nothing more than to give Mr. Collins a bonus of $147,000.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SANDIDGE. Mr. Chairman, it is very well known that I have never been a very particular friend in sustaining these steamship lines under the contracts heretofore made with them. A short time ago I proposed to this House a system which would be uniform, just, and equal, and at the same time insure certainty as to the time of departure. That proposition was not favorably considered. Nevertheless, while I am opposed to expending more money than we are compelled to expend under existing contracts, yet, sir, I am disposed to pay every cent justly due under those contracts. It seems to me that Collins & Co. should not be fined $147,000, because the steamer Ericsson did not come up to the speed of the very best vessels of their line. No gentleman can say that the contract made with Collins & Co. obligated them to make these trips in any given time. There is not one word in that contract which obliged them to make the trip in ten days, or twelve days, or twenty days. While this is so, and while they lost one of their ships and procured in its place the best steamer they could get, and made all the trips required by contract, they are fined $147,000. I should like to see the law which would authorize that fine being imposed. If any gentleman who opposes this matter will show me one word for it in the law, I will yield my position. Until that is done I will insist that it is unjust to Collins & Co. to refuse to pay them this large sum, the withholding of which, I have no doubt, has, in part, caused their recent failure. It is very well for the friends of Mr. Vanderbilt and other gentlemen who wish to run steamers to Europe, to prevent, if they can, the continuance of the Collins line. Let that line be broken up, and they will enjoy a monopoly, that, for the postages alone, will make their compensation greater than the contract pay to Collins. Collins inaugurated this steamship service, and we can certainly afford to be just to him—generosity is not asked.

The question was taken on the amendment to the amendment; and it was disagreed to.

The amendment of Mr. CLARK, of New York, was then disagreed to.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the committee rise with a view of taking a recess.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the Post Office appropriation bill, and had come to no resolution thereon.

On motion of Mr. KEITT, the House (at ten minutes past four o'clock, p. m.) took a recess until six o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at six o'clock, p. m.

CARMICK AND RAMSEY.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I am directed by the Committee on the Judiciary to report back to the House the memorial of Carmick & Ramsey, relating to their mail contract on the Vera Cruz, Acapulco, and San Francisco route, and ask to be discharged from the further consideration thereof, and that the report be laid on the table and printed.

It was so ordered.

PETER VAN BUSKIRK.

Mr. POTTLE. I ask unanimous consent that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 340) providing an increase of the pension of Peter Van Buskirk, of the city of Washington, District of Columbia. I desire simply to say that he is an old soldier of ninety-seven years of age, who has served through three wars, and the bill provides that he shall have full pension instead of what he now receives. If he is ever to receive any further aid from the Government, he should have it now.

The bill, which was read for information, changes the pension of Peter Van Buskirk from sixty dollars a year to eight dollars per month, to commence on the 4th of March, 1850.

Mr. RUSSELL. I object, unless the gentleman will so amend it that the increased pension shall commence on the 4th day of March last.

Mr. POTTLE. I will move to so amend the bill, though I regret that my friend should insist upon it.

No objection being made, the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union was discharged from the further consideration of the bill; and it was taken up for action.

Mr. POTTLE. I move to amend the bill by striking out "1850," and insert in lieu thereof "1858."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill, as amended, was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. POTTLE moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JENNETT H. M'CALL.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table Senate bill (No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of the revolutionary war.

The bill, which was read for information, directs the Secretary of the Treasury to pay to Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of General Pickens's brigade, in the South Carolina regiment, during the war of the Revolution, the seven years' half pay of a captain, as allowed by the resolution of Congress passed August 24, 1780, amounting to $2,100.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the regular order of business.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I hope the gentleman will not object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to all these special bills for half pay.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I move to suspend the rules. I desire to say that I have not asked for anything for my constituents this session. This is the first time that I have asked a favor of the House. Many other bills of less merits than this have been passed, even by the consent of the gentleman from Tennessee. The bill passed the Senate unanimously, and was sent to this House and referred to a committee. That committee reported it back to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass; and I do not see why, under the circumstances, it should not be allowed to pass. I ask for tellers upon the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BURLINGAME and WINSLOW were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 89, noes 36.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended; and the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the bill on the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I call for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The bill was then ordered to a third reading, and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ALBERT G. ALLEN.

Mr. CORNING. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of Senate bill (No. 277) for the relief of Albert G. Allen.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. This gentleman has received a salary of $2,000 for all the time he was in office; and I object.

Mr. CORNING. I move to suspend the rules, and call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SAVAGE and BURNETT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 96, noes 30.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended; and the Committee of the Whole House was discharged from the further consideration of the bill.

The bill directs that in the settlement of the accounts of Albert G. Allen, late Navy agent at Washington, District of Columbia, one and one fourth per centum be allowed him upon the disbursements of extra pay made by him under the acts of Congress of August 31, 1852, and March 3, 1853, to the officers, seamen, and marines, who had served on the Pacific coasts of Mexico and California, deducting therefrom such amounts as may be due from him to the United States.

Mr. CORNING demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. CORNING moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH.

Mr. CHAFFEE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to report, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, a bill granting an invalid pension to William Randolph.

Mr. ATKINS. I move that the House do now adjourn. I have been trying to get the floor for four or five weeks.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee has not got the floor to make that motion.

Mr. ATKINS. It is a privileged motion.

The SPEAKER. It is; and the gentleman can make it when he gets the floor properly. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks the unanimous consent of the House to make a report from the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

Mr. ATKINS. I object.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to suspend the rules in order that the bill may be reported and considered. It is the case I mentioned to the House the other day, of an old man ninety-five years old, who only gets four dollars a month. He is one of Wayne's old soldiers. The House can pass the bill in two minutes.

Mr. HOUSTON. I like to hear the gentleman from Kentucky talk, but I want to get away on Monday; and if we do that, we must dispose of the appropriation bills.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. This is the only bill I have had during the whole session.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I object to debate.

The House divided on Mr. MARSHALL's motion; and there were—ayes 105, noes 25.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

Mr. CHAFFEE then reported, from the Committee on Invalid Pensions, a bill granting an invalid pension to William Randolph.

The bill received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CIVIL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference, on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on House bill (No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of Government for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Under the decision of the House this morning, I object to the reception of that report; and ask that the question be submitted to a vote of the House whether they will receive it or not?

The SPEAKER. The report will be received.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then it will be before the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee raises the question whether it shall be considered.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If it is before the House, we shall be obliged to dispose of it. The question is, whether we will receive it or not?

The SPEAKER. That is not the question. The Chair refers the gentleman to the 5th rule.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Exactly.

The SPEAKER. The question is, "Will the House consider it?"

Mr. JONFS, of Tennessee. If the report is received, it will be before the House, and we shall be bound to consider it.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will receive the report. If the gentleman from Tennessee afterwards desires the question to be taken on considering it, it will be taken.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not want it afterwards.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I submit the report, and ask that it be read.

The Clerk read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 200) "making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859," having met, after a full and free conference, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to the respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from the following amendments: ninth, tenth, fifteenth, thirtieth, thirty-seventh, thirty-eighth, fifty-sixth, fifty-eighth, fifty-ninth, and sixtieth.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to, and concur in the following amendments of the Senate: fourth, fifth, seventh, eighth, eleventh, nineteenth, twenty-first, twenty-second, twenty-third, thirty-fourth, thirty-ninth, fortieth, forty-second, forty-fifth, forty-sixth, forty-seventh, fifty-second, fifty-fourth, and sixty-third.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the first amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows:

Strike out all of said amendment after the word "that," in line one, and insert these words: "the Secretary of the Treasury may make such allowances to the officers and men of the Army and Navy while engaged on coast survey service, for subsistence, in addition to their compensation, as he may deem necessary, not exceeding the sum authorized by the Treasury regulation of the 11th of May, 1844."

That the Senate agree to the second amendment of the House of Representatives.

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their twelfth amendment, with an amendment, as follows:

In the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the word "painting," and insert "paintings," and at the end of the amendment, as follows: "but this provision shall not be so construed as to apply to the execution of designs heretofore made and accepted from Crawford and Rogers."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the seventeenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment, as follows:

In the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the word "three," and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the eighteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the word "three" and insert in lieu thereof the word "two."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the twentieth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: at the end of said amendment insert, as follows:

"Provided, That no part of the sums herein appropriated, for the completion of custom-houses or marine hospitals, excepting those for Charleston and New Orleans, shall be expended until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the sums respectively appropriated will complete the buildings for which they are intended, and until arrangements shall be made to carry this into effect."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their twenty-eighth amendment.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the thirty-fifth amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "items," in the third line of said amendment, strike out the words "five thousand five," and insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "and paying fees of witnesses before committees of the Senate, seven thousand seven."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the forty-first amendment of the Senate, and that the Senate concur in the amendment of the House of Representatives, as an additional amendment, with an amendment, as follows: after the word "that," in the sixth line of said amendment, strike out the words, "they shall receive no fees or commissions," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "their compensation, including fees, shall not exceed $3,000 each, per annum."

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the forty-third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the word "and" in the eighth line of said amendment, strike out the words "such sum as may be necessary," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "$3,200."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their forty-fourth amendment with an amendment as follows: strike out the whole of the amendment of the House of Representatives and insert in lieu thereof the following: "That no part of the appropriations which may be at any time made for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenditures of the Senate and House of Representatives, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, unless such clerk, messenger, or other attendant, be so employed by a resolution of one of said Houses."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their forty-eighth amendment.

That the House of Representatives recede from their disagreement to the fifty-fifth amendment of the Senate and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: after the words "United States" in the fourth line of said amendment, insert the words, "for expenses and disbursements."

That the Senate agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives to their sixty-second amendment.

R. M. T. HUNTER,
WILLIAM BIGLER,
W. P. FESSENDEN,
Managers on part of the Senate.

JOHN S. PHELPS,
HENRY M. PHILLIPS,
WILLIAM A. HOWARD,
Managers on part of the House of Representatives.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. Mr. Speaker, the Senate amendments to this bill were sixty-four in number. Several of them, however, were provisions for general legislation, and not making appropriations to carry out existing laws, or for any of the contingent expenses of this Government. The House, in considering these amendments, concurred in twenty-one of them in the exact form in which they were sent to us from the Senate, and in seven of them with amendments. The committee recommend the House to concur in other seven of the amendments with amendments; and the committee unanimously recommend that the House recede from the amendments I will state. The first is a proviso attached by the House to the appropriation for the procurement of seeds and cuttings for the Patent Office. The House provided that none of the money appropriated should be expended in paying the expense of persons for procuring these seeds, or distributing them. On inquiry, it was found absolutely necessary, if the system of distribution of seeds and cuttings was to be kept up, that these expenses should be paid.

Mr. CLARK, of Connecticut. What amount is paid to those parties?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. The amount appropriated is $60,000 for the procurement and the distribution of seeds and cuttings; and out of that sum the expenses of persons for putting these seeds and cuttings into form for distribution to agricultural societies and to members of Congress is paid. The next amendment is an appropriation of $3,000 to pay the salaries of officers of the hospital for the blind. That is in pursuance of a law of this session which required the appropriation of that amount annually for five years. The next amendment appropriates $3,000 for improving Pennsylvania avenue. The committee recommend a concurrence in that amendment. The eighth amendment is a small appropriation for painting and repairing the Little Falls bridge, together with a provision that the bridge shall be turned over to the corporation of Georgetown, to be kept in suitable repair, and that the corporation may make such regulations against rapid driving over it, &c., as will insure in from injury. We recommend a concurrence in that.

The tenth amendment is for the aqueduct. The House attached a provision that before any portion of the money should be expended contracts should be made for the completion of the work. We have the report of the officer in charge, that there is a large force employed on it, and that under the expectation an appropriation would be made, proposals have been invited some time since, upon which he expects to make contracts for the completion of the aqueduct. The precise amount required he cannot say. He says, however, that if he is again to advertise and to discharge the force at present employed, consisting of nearly two thousand men, great loss and delay must ensue. Under these circumstances the committee recommend that the House recede from its disagreement.

The nineteenth amendment is an appropriation for certain custom-houses which are enumerated in Miscellaneous Document No. 120. The amount of the various appropriations in it for Ellsworth, Portsmouth, &c., is $257,000. The Secretary of the Treasury informs us that if this sum be appropriated these buildings can be completed and occupied during the ensuing fiscal year. There is also an appropriation for furnishing them. The committee recommends that the House recede from its disagreement to that amendment.

The twenty-first amendment is for fencing and grading, and for furnishing buildings enumerated in the other amendment, amounting to the sum of $97,400; of this, $20,000 is for furnishing buildings which are already completed, and now ready for use. The committee recommends that the House concur in the appropriations for the custom-houses at New Orleans and Charleston, with amendments reducing the amounts $100,000 in each case. There is no reduction of the appropriations for the remaining custom-houses, nor in the appropriations for the marine hospitals. The committee recommend the adoption of the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of the sums herein appropriated for the completion of custom-houses and marine hospitals, excepting those for Charleston and New Orleans, shall be expended until the Secretary of the Treasury shall be satisfied that the sums respectively appropriated will complete the buildings for which they are intended, and until arrangements shall be made to carry this into effect.

We are informed that the rents paid by the Government at several of these places exceed the amount required to finish and to furnish these buildings. Therefore, to appropriate money to finish and to furnish these buildings, is a measure of economy.

Mr. CHAPMAN. Is there such a proviso annexed to the appropriations for the custom-houses at New Orleans and Charleston?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. There is not. The Secretary of the Treasury informs us, in submitting the estimates for the custom-houses at New Orleans and Charleston, that the sum recommended for those custom-houses will not be sufficient to complete them.

The committees of conference had not time to consider the plans of those buildings with a view to recommend any change in the plan of their construction.

Mr. LETCHER. If I understand that proviso, none of the money appropriated for this purpose is to be expended until the Secretary of the Treasury has first ascertained that each and all of these buildings can be completed for the sum specified for each.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. With the exception of the custom-houses at New Orleans and Charleston.

Mr. LETCHER. So I understand. Now we have heard all along that it was necessary to make these appropriations because there were subsisting contracts, which if we failed to appropriate for, the contractors would come in here for damages. If the Secretary has the discretion, how is this difficulty to be gotten over?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. The committee thought that there need not be so much marble procured for the next year, and not so much prepared for use, and therefore they reduced the appropriation.

Mr. LETCHER. Are the Charleston and New Orleans custom-houses the only ones where there are contracts?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. No.

Mr. LETCHER. The discretion applies to all.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. We have the assurance of Captain Bowman, and of the Secretary himself, that the buildings in reference to which we have attached this proviso, can be completed with these appropriations. That was the reason the amendment was recommended to be concurred in.

Mr. MILES. Is it not stated in the report of Captain Bowman that all these custom-houses, with the exception of those at Charleston and New Orleans, can be completed with the amount of money contained in this appropriation?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. This appropriation for the custom-houses and the marine hospitals will complete them, and furnish the buildings, with the exception named by the gentleman from South Carolina.

The twenty-first and twenty-second amendments are merely incidental to the construction and completion of these works, such as fencing, grading, and furnishing these buildings, and some marine hospitals.

The twenty-third amendment appropriates $5,000 to complete the series of portraits of the Presidents under a law of Congress. The Committee on the Library say this sum is necessary.

The thirty-fourth amendment appropriates $8,668 to pay the expenses of volunteer companies called out by Governor Geary to preserve peace in Kansas. They were commanded by men of opposite parties. The Delegate from Kansas has informed the members of the committee that the men have not been paid, with the exception of a small amount advanced by Governor Geary.

The thirty-ninth and fortieth amendments are to supply deficiencies upon the part of the Senate in lithographing, engraving, and binding, ordered by the Senate during the present session. The money which had been appropriated, and which was expected to be used this session of Congress, is what is called a continuous appropriation, and has been applied to paying expenses incurred under preceding orders. The Superintendent of Public Printing says this amount is necessary to supply the deficiency.

The forty-second amendment will take a small amount of money to pay for the subsistence of the commissioner under the reciprocity treaty for one year, from a mistake which occurred in previous legislation. The amount will not exceed $1,200.

The forty-fifth amendment provides for the payment of the extra compensation allowed to the clerks to the committees of the Senate, under a resolution of the Senate, passed the last session of Congress. It is similar to the provision made by this House for its employees at the last session of Congress, for which we provided in the deficiency bill.

The forty-sixth and forty-seventh amendments provide against placing obstructions in the streets and avenues of the city of Washington, which are improved, either wholly or in part, by the Government of the United States. It imposes penalties upon persons who shall disturb the pavement and flagging, without the consent of the Commissioner of Public Buildings. The amendments were in the wrong place, but the committee thought best to adopt them.

The fifty-second amendment is in reference to the establishment of the western boundary of the Half-Breed tract in Nebraska. The line was run by McCoy, in 1838. We believed that it was correctly run at that time. The line which was run last year makes a departure from the previous line of one and a half lines, at its greatest departure, diminishing as it approaches its other terminus. We believed that difference to have arisen from the changing of the channel of the Missouri river. Settlers are upon that strip of land, and you have either to pay the settlers, or to compensate the Indians. You can pay the Indians the cheapest.

The fifty-fourth amendment authorizes the President to advance $6,000 to Clark Mills, to enable him to complete the equestrian statue of Washington. In consequence of the destruction of his foundry by fire, and another injury arising from a hurricane, he cannot go on with his work unless this advance is made to him. He is to give security for the completion of the work.

The sixty-third amendment directs the Secretary of the Treasury to allow the surveyors of ports performing, or having performed, the duties of collectors of customs since the passage of certain acts recited in the amendment, the same compensation, and no other, as is allowed to collectors for like services.

From all these amendments the committee recommend that the House recede from their disagreement thereto.

The committee recommend that the Senate do recede from the following amendments:

The ninth amendment, appropriating $7,000 for filling up the ravine and grading Judiciary square;

The tenth amendment, appropriating $10,000 for planting with trees and grading the unimproved portions of the Mall;

The fifteenth amendment, appropriating the sum of $2,589 04 to pay the Secretary of the Senate the sums paid by him to the representatives of certain deceased Senators, under the resolution of the Senate of March, 1848;

The thirtieth amendment, for the extension of the court-house portion of the City Hall, so as to provide necessary accommodations for the courts of this District, $30,000;

The thirty-seventh amendment, appropriating $9,000 for contingent expenses of the Territory of Kansas;

The thirty-eighth amendment, providing for compensating the surveyors of the private land claims in California, not to exceed twenty-five dollars per mile;

The fifty-sixth amendment, in reference to the compensation of the consul or acting consul of the United States at Constantinople whenever he shall act as dragoman;

The fifty-eighth amendment, appropriating $30,000 to pay certain claims made under the Cherokee treaty of 1835;

The fifty-ninth amendment, authorizing the payment to Charles H. Mason, Secretary of Washington Territory, the difference between the salary of Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs, and the salary of the Secretary of the Territory, for the time said Mason was acting as Governor and superintendent of Indian affairs ad interim; and the Sixtieth amendment, making the salary of the surveyor general of Washington Territory $3,500 per annum.

The House agree to the following amendments of the Senate, with amendments:

First amendment, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to make reasonable allowances for unusual expenses to officers and men of the Army and Navy when employed upon the Coast Survey service;

The regulation of the Treasury Department of 1844 authorizes the Secretary to allow such extra compensation for subsistence, when extra expenses are incurred. These men are sometimes detached from their parties, and their expenses are thereby increased. The committee recommend that this amendment be agreed to, with the following amendment: strike out of said amendment all after the word "that," in line one, and insert these words:

The Secretary of the Treasury may make such allowances to the officers and men of the Army and Navy, while engaged on Coast Survey service, for subsistence in addition to their compensation, as he may deem necessary, not exceeding the sum authorized by the Treasury regulation of the 11th of May, 1844.

Twelfth amendment, in reference to the Capitol extension. The committee recommend that the Senate agree to the amendment of the House to that amendment, with an amendment as follows: in the fourth line substitute the word "paintings" for the word "painting;" so as to exclude the idea of ordinary painting; and at the end of the amendment insert the words:

But this provision shall not be so construed as to apply to the execution of designs heretofore made and accepted from Crawford and Rogers;

so that the clause, as amended, shall read:

Provided, That no part of this appropriation shall be expended in embellishing any part of the Capitol extension with sculpture or paintings, unless the designs for the same shall have undergone the examination of a committee of distinguished artists, not to exceed three in number, to be selected by the President; and that the designs which said committee shall accept, shall also receive the subsequent approval of the Joint Committee on the Library of Congress; but this provision shall not be so construed as to apply to the execution of designs heretofore made and accepted from Crawford and Rogers.

Thirty-fifth amendment of the Senate, appropriating $5,500 for the contingent expenses of the Senate. The committee recommend that the House agree to that amendment, with an amendment, making the sum $7,700. The Senate have incurred some expenses for witnesses before an investigating committee; and since they made the amendment, further expenses have been incurred of a like character in the investigation of some charges against a Senator of that body, which renders this increased appropriation necessary.

The forty-first amendment of the Senate provides for the payment of certain expenses for printing incurred by the Legislature of the Territory of Washington.

The House struck out this amendment and inserted a provision concerning the salaries of the land officers in New Mexico. The committee recommend that the House agree to the amendment of the Senate, and the Senate agree to the amendment of the House, with the following amendment: after the word "that," in the sixth line, strike out the words, "they shall receive no fees or commissions," and insert, in lieu thereof, the words, "their compensation, including fees, shall not exceed $3,000 per annum."

The forty-third amendment is for salary of two clerks in the Treasury Department. We ascertained that they are needed in the Treasury Department. They are actually employed at this time under an appropriation for the incidental expenses appertaining to the issuing of Treasury notes; but the Secretary of the Treasury can no longer employ them than the termination of this session of Congress. If the loan bill pass, the services of two additional clerks will be absolutely required; and even if it should not, and the Secretary of the Treasury should reissue Treasury notes under the act that we passed this session, these clerks will be needed. The committee recommend a concurrence in the Senate amendment, with an amendment appropriating $3,200 to pay their salaries for the next fiscal year.

The forty-fourth amendment was one adopted by the Senate with reference to the contingent expenses of this House. The House of Representatives struck out the Senate amendment and introduced a provision that all allowances made by the Committee of Accounts at the last Congress shall be paid, and declaring that the true intent and meaning of the third section of the deficiency bill was to include all allowances made by the Committee of Accounts during the last Congress.

We were informed that some extra allowances were certified during the recess of Congress, and that certificates are outstanding, bearing the signature of the chairman of the Committee of Accounts after his term of service as a member of the House had expired. Under these circumstances, neither committee of conference felt disposed to concur in it; and they have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses to reenact a provision adopted in 1845, with reference to the contingent expenses of the two Houses, restoring in that section some words which had been omitted in the enrollment of that bill. This is what is recommended shall be adopted in lieu of the Senate and House amendments:

That no part of an appropriation which may be at any time made for the contingent expenses of either House of Congress shall be applied to any other than the ordinary expenses of the Senate and House of Representatives, nor as extra allowance to any clerk, messenger, or attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, nor as payment or compensation to any clerk, messenger, or other attendant of the said two Houses, or either of them, except such clerk, messenger, or other attendant be so employed by resolution of one of said Houses.

We also had the opinion of the Committee of Accounts of the House, recommending such provision, which the committee believe to be a salutary one.

Mr. BURNETT. I would like to ask a question there. If I understand the report of the committee of conference, it recommends the reenactment of the act of 1845. I would ask what reason there is for reenacting it when there has been no refusal, on the part of the Treasury Department, to pay under that act, where we employ officers and pay them out of the contingent fund?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. If the gentleman from Kentucky had given his attention he would have found something more. We reenact the act of 1845, restoring to that act that which we know was omitted in its enrollment.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to ask another question.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. The language to be restored to the act makes it more restrictive than it is at present.

Mr. BURNETT. I wish to ask another question—whether, under the provision which the committee of conference recommend this House to adopt, we could not, to-morrow, by a single resolution of the House, vote extra compensation to every employee of it?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. Precisely as you did at the last session of Congress; but unless you appropriate money to pay it, it cannot be paid. The decision of the Comptroller is this: that he will pay no clerk, or messenger, or attendant employed by either House of Congress, except he is employed by resolution of the House, and except an appropriation be made to meet that expenditure—and is not that right?

Mr. BURNETT. With the permission of the gentleman I will say this: that if this House adopt the provision recommended by this committee of conference, a single resolution of this House may give extra compensation to its employees, and the natural construction that would be given to this law would be that they could draw extra compensation under it.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. The gentleman is very much mistaken, or else I am. I think I can understand the opinion of the Comptroller, who decides that he will not pay, under a simple resolution of the House, except an appropriation be made to meet the allowance.

The fifty-fifth amendment is a provision for the payment of certain expenses incurred by I. D. Andrews, connected with the reciprocity treaty. He made certain expenditures, and asks to be reimbursed them. There is no allowance to himself for services, but for the expenditures he has made. In the amendment adopted by the Senate, his accounts were authorized to be settled by the Secretary of State. We have restricted it so that he shall receive no compensation for his own services, but merely be reimbursed the money expended on behalf of the Government in regard to the reciprocity treaty.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. What was he engaged in?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. Aiding in the negotiations that led to the reciprocity treaty of 1854. It was a matter that had been carried on for several years before it was consummated, commencing as far back as the administration of President Polk, and going through the administrations of Taylor and Fillmore, and finally to that of General Pierce.

There are then certain amendments adopted by the House to the amendments of the Senate, in which the committee of conference recommend a concurrence. There is one appertaining to lifeboats on the Atlantic coast. The House had directed Holmes's life-boat to be obtained; the Senate struck out "Holmes's," and inserted "best;" the House amended that, and inserted "self-righting." The committee of conference agreed to recommend that the amendment be concurred in, so that it will read the "best self-righting" boat.

The twenty-eighth amendment concerns statistics of manufactures. The House attached the limitation "provided the same shall complete the work." The committee on the part of the Senate agreed to recommend a concurrence in it.

The forty-eighth amendment is concerning the ascertainment of debts due to the States. The committee on the part of the Senate recommend concurrence in the amendment of the House requiring a report to be made by the Secretary of the Treasury to the next Congress.

The sixty-second amendment is the amendment of the Senate for the printing of the State papers. The only question between the House and the Senate was the proviso attached by the House; and the conferees on the part of the Senate said they would recommend the proviso to be retained.

I have now explained the action of the committee of conference; and I demand the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask the gentleman from Missouri to withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I cannot do it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Preferring to see the bill defeated, rather than have it passed in its present shape, I move to lay the bill on the table.

Mr. CLEMENS. On that motion I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. WALBRIDGE. If the motion to lay on the table does not prevail, cannot the question be taken separately on these amendments?

The SPEAKER. The Manual provides expressly that the vote on a conference report shall be taken as an entirety.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. If the report is laid upon the table, will it not carry the bill also?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Several MEMBERS. That is the very thing we want.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee, who has moved to lay the report on the table, that his object can be better attained, and a good deal of time will be saved, by simply taking a vote on the adoption of the report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. No, sir; I am opposed to the whole bill.

Mr. SICKLES. With the permission of the House I desire to ask the chairman of the committee of conference a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 48, nays 109; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Burnett, Caskie, Cobb, Colfax, Curry, Curtis, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Elliott, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Granger, Grow, Howard, Humphrey, Martin, George W. Jones, Letcher, Lovejoy, Mott, Powell, Reagan, Russell, Scates, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, Stevenson, Talbot, Tompkins, Underwood, Jo in V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—48.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Bocoek, Boyce, Burlingame, Burns, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dewart, Dimmick, Durfee, Edie, English, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Leidy, Leidy, Leiter, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Miles, Milson, Moore, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Judson W. Sherman, Samuel A. Smith, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tripp, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Winslow, Wood, and Woodson—109.

So the House refused to lay the report upon the table.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. SAVAGE stated that he had paired off with Mr. FARNSWORTH. He [Mr. SAVAGE] was opposed to the bill.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 82, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Bowie, Boyce, Bufinton, Burlingame, Burns, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, John Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dimmick, Edie, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Lawrence W. Hall, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelly, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Leiter, Miles, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Pottle, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Russell, Scott, Searing, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Winslow, Wood, and Woodson—82.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bocoek, Brayton, Burnett, Caskie, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Goode, Granger, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Lamar, Letcher, Lovejoy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Mott, Parker, Powell, Reagan, Ricard, Royce, Rufin, Sandidge, Scates, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, William Smith, Spinner, Stevenson, Talbot, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, and Zollicoffer—74.

So the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee, stated that he had paired off upon this question with Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, or he should have voted "no."

Mr. BLISS stated that he was not within the bar when his name was called, or he should have voted "no."

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HOPKINS in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The CHAIRMAN stated that the pending question was on the fourth amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to reduce the amount $10,000.

Mr. Chairman, I stated, when I addressed the committee upon this subject before the recess, that these contractors had never fulfilled their contracts. I have the evidence of it before me now.

Mr. ENGLISH. I rise to a question of order. I make the question of order that the gentleman must confine himself to the pending amendment; that he has no right to go into the general question of the manner in which the contractors have performed their contract.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the question of order is well taken. The gentleman must confine himself to his motion to reduce the appropriation.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Here is a proposition made to pay these men $147,000 on account of their mail service. Of course, whether we do it or not depends upon our conception of that service, and the manner in which they have fulfilled their contract. Now, if that be so, I should like to know how I am out of order?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman's remarks were out of order. The gentleman will pursue a course of argument pertinent to the particular amendment he has offered.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. That is what I was doing. I was adverting to the contract out of which this claim has grown, and I confess my inability to do otherwise than to address myself to the contract under which alone the parties can be entitled to this money.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will proceed in order.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. The question is, whether, under their contract, these parties are entitled to more than the sum I have named? I say they are not, because they themselves have never fulfilled that contract; and one of the points to which I address myself is to show that they never have done it.

Let us look at this question in another point of view. I have the memorial of these gentlemen here before me, dated January 27, 1857. They say:

"After the labor of nearly ten years, it is a matter of notoriety that every consideration which prompted our Government to enter into their arrangement with us has been triumphantly achieved, and that the only failure of the enterprise has been in its producing less remuneration to us than we had reason to anticipate."

I deny it in toto. I have the contract here, and they have never complied with it. They were to build steamers of great speed. They did that, to be sure, but it was their bargain. But when casualties happened to their vessels, they had to resort to steamers not of great speed. They were bound to build steamers of great speed, and they built and lost them, and then they expect the Government of the United States to give them the bonus that was promised for vessels of great speed when they have put on the service steamers not of great speed. I say they are not entitled to this money. I say that the Postmaster General, who superintends this service, with the approval of the Attorney General, Mr. Cushing, as is stated by the present Attorney General, having concluded to diminish the allowance made to these men because of the inferior character of the service for which they stipulated, there is no principle of justice and no propriety in giving them this $140,000. You might as well give it to some of these poor old men and women, about whom we have heard so much.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Mr. Chairman, there is not much of argument left on this question, and there are but very few facts on which that argument proceeds. It is confined to a question based upon the contract—a contract which is subsisting at this identical time; and upon that contract and that alone is it that these parties here should stand or fall. The opinion of the Attorney General has been delivered upon this contract, and he states in that opinion that there is no degree of speed required by it, and that whether these vessels performed the voyage at the rate of twelve miles or more an hour, or whether in twelve days or more is entirely immaterial, for there is no limitation as to speed.

Then, as to the question of the fine or penalty. There is none now inflicted or that has ever been attempted to be inflicted. It is a simple question of withholding payment because of a failure to perform the service as agreed. In my judgment that service was performed; but for a few trips, not by the original steamers, but by the Ericsson, substituted because of the loss of the Arctic; and that substitution, sir, was made by the consent of the Navy Department. These are the whole facts of the case. Said I not right, then, that this is simply a question of justice, simply a question of performance of contract, and not a question involving competing interests? Sir, if a question of competition arose here, I might perhaps occupy a different position.

The gentleman whose name I was sorry to hear introduced into this discussion, Commodore Vanderbilt, is a constituent of mine. His name is identified with enterprise and commerce, and is dear to the pride of the country. Familiar in his early days with the humble pursuits of labor, now the prowess of his vessels contend with the waves of every sea; their keels vex the placid waters, and their shrill whistle startles the silence of tropical forests. To him, above all others, should be attributed the earliest occupancy of the Central American avenues of a world-expansive commerce. I deprecate all struggles of competition with that gentleman. I am proud that I am enabled to comprehend him on this floor among a constituency that would reflect honor on any man. But, sir, I demand, at the same time, justice for Mr. Collins and his associates; and it is upon the justice of that contract, as averred and adjudicated by the opinion of the Attorney General, that I put this question here this night before this committee, and ask their favorable vote.

The amendment of Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, was disagreed to.

The amendment of the Senate was then concurred in.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Here the committee informally rose; and Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles:

An act (S. No. 130) for the relief of Jennett H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall, of the revolutionary war; and

An act (S. No. 227) for the relief of Albert G. Allen;

When the Speaker signed the same.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The committee again resumed its session.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. Was the Senate amendment announced as concurred in?

The CHAIRMAN. It was.

Mr. DAVIS, of Maryland. I called for a division at the time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thought he heard some call for a division, but was not certain of it; and he paused to hear if it would be repeated. The Chair will put the question to the committee whether there shall be a division on that amendment.

The question was put; and it was disagreed to.

Fifth amendment:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That so much of the eighth section of the act entitled "An act to reduce the rate of postage and limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds in the revenues of the Post Office Department," approved March 3, 1845, as requires the advertisement of letters uncalled for in any post office, to be inserted in the newspaper or newspapers having the largest circulation in the town or place where the office advertising is situated, be, and the same is hereby repeated; and the Postmaster General shall henceforth cause the same to be published in such newspaper as will publish it at the lowest price; and that the compensation to be paid for the said advertisements shall not be greater than that now allowed by law.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. That amendment of the Senate is a change of the law relative to advertisement of letters uncalled for. It provides, instead of advertising in papers having the largest circulation, that they shall be given to the lowest bidder. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust that it will not be concurred in. The price now paid is hardly a living price. This means of giving information to a large class of the community ought, too, to be continued. The consequence of the adoption of this amendment will be to give the advertisement to papers of a small circulation. There is a paper in Philadelphia which publishes this advertisement, and which circulates sixty thousand copies a day; and while it is probable that that paper, rather than not have it would do it for nothing, yet I think it ought to be paid a fair price for doing it.

Mr. COLFAX. I differ with my friend from Pennsylvania, and hope that the amendment will be concurred in. All over the country there is doubt about the veracity of the affidavits made as to the number of circulation upon which contracts for these advertisements are made, and this provision will remove that difficulty.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. FLORENCE. I give notice that I shall call for a division on this amendment in the House.

Sixth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That not more than two thousand five hundred dollars per annum shall be paid to any special agent of the Post Office Department as compensation for services; but this act shall not be construed so as to raise the rate of compensation of such agents in any case.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The effect of that amendment is to lessen the compensation of special mail agents, and the Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

And be it further enacted, That post offices shall be open for the receipt and delivery of letters, papers, and mail matter, for all persons at the same time; and no practice or arrangement shall be allowed by which any person or persons, for any consideration, can obtain their letters or papers earlier or later, out of said offices, than all or any others may receive their letters or papers, on applying therefor; nor shall any practice or arrangement exist whereby any person or persons can mail their letters or papers earlier or later than all or any other persons may mail their letters or papers on offering so to do: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the use of locked boxes as they have been heretofore authorized.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That after the 30th of June, 1858, the rate of postage on all letters sent through the mail shall be five cents for any distance under three thousand miles, and ten cents for any distance over three thousand miles.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have nothing to say on that amendment further than that I suppose every member understands it. It repeals the present law fixing the rate of postage at three cents, and increases it to five. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I trust the Senate amendment will be adopted. I do trust it will be adopted at any rate, because we are already appropriating large sums from the Treasury to support the Post Office Department. We can easily remedy the difficulty and increase our receipts by levying this small contribution upon persons all over the country. We all know that three cents for a distance of three thousand miles is inadequate.

Mr. FLORENCE. I trust, most sincerely, that the amendment will not be agreed to. [Cries of "Question!"] I am not in favor of retrograde movements. I think we took one retrograde movement a little while ago, and I trust the good sense of this committee will vote down this amendment, so that intelligence may be diffused through the country at the lowest rate. Gentlemen talk about this being a self-sustaining Department. Is the Navy self-sustaining? Is the Army self-sustaining? [Cries of "Question!"] I have said all I desired.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move to amend, by inserting after "three thousand miles" the words "and not less than one hundred miles," so as to leave the present rate of postage in force for all distances less than one hundred miles.

Mr. ENGLISH. Will it be in order to amend that amendment, by adding "from Washington city to Warrenton, Virginia?"

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I do not know what the gentleman means by that; but he can have any amendment he pleases, so far as Warrenton is concerned.

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. SANDIDGE. For the purpose of saying a few words, I move to amend by striking out "ten," and inserting "fifteen." Now, I am satisfied that this House will not agree to this amendment proposed by the Senate; but I think the amendment ought to be agreed to, and that every member of the House coming from the interior of the States should vote for it, for the simple and substantial reason that but in five States of this Confederacy do the receipts from postage pay the expense of transporting the mails. The consequence is that the expenses are so much in advance of the receipts, that all gentlemen who come from the new States, or from the interior and thinly settled portions of the old States, find it an exceedingly difficult matter to get those mail facilities to which they think their constituents entitled.

Now, if you want mail facilities in the interior, and in the western and southwestern country, you must increase the receipts into the Treasury; and I know of no other way in which it can be done except by an increase of the rate of postage. My opinion is that there is not a man in this Confederacy off the Atlantic coast, which is the only place where the mail receipts do more than meet the expenses, who would not be willing to pay five cents upon a letter carried any distance, on which he now pays three cents. These are my reasons for believing that the Senate amendment ought to prevail.

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to the amendment; and I hope we will have a vote. We have heard this whole thing discussed over here twice before.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. GARNETT. I move to strike out "five" and insert "eight," so as to make the letter postage eight cents. I desire to give a few reasons why the Senate amendment should be concurred in. Last year we voted for the deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office Department of $2,500,000. This year we also voted a deficiency of $1,400,000, making an aggregate of $3,900,000, which the Post Office Department has cost us over and above receipts, besides $2,000,000 further for transportation of ocean mails. This is one of the few amendments which the Senate has offered to us to reduce the expenditures of the Government, and I wish to see whether the House intends to concur in it or not.

We have, by committees of conference and other means, agreed to appropriation after appropriation, extravagance after extravagance. The House will bear me witness that there has been no bona fide effort made this session to reduce the public expenditures. As a member of the Democratic party, of that party which has a majority in the House, of that party which will be held, and which ought to be held, responsible to the country for the expenditures of the Government, I hope the House will reduce them. Sir, I believe that there has been, if not a systematic effort, at least an unconscious effort on the part of members on the Opposition side of the House to create a deficiency in the public revenue—and that for the purpose of raising the tariff upon us again. I believe there is an effort on the part of members here to keep the expenses of the Government to that point that will entail the necessity of increasing the tariff of last year. I have heard such propositions privately intimated, and I have heard them publicly made. I denounce them as contrary to the principles of the Democratic party. Wherever an argument is made against a party on the ground of extravagance, as in the party platforms of 1840 and 1844, the people are governed by such arguments. Now, sir, I believe that there is a design here to raise the tariff; and this is the meaning of all the extravagances of this Congress. I hope the House will concur in the Senate amendment.

Mr. GROW. I am opposed to the gentleman's amendment. This is an old discussion. Let the vote be taken.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to strike out "five" and insert "two."

Mr. MAYNARD. I propose to amend the amendment of the gentleman from Virginia, by striking out "eight" and inserting "five."

Mr. KILGORE. That is my proposition.

Mr. MAYNARD. I sought the floor, Mr. Chairman, for the purpose of stating that an objection which I have to this proposition coming from the Senate is, that it is in conflict with the seventh section of the first article of the Constitution, which provides that all bills for raising revenue shall originate in the House of Representatives. This measure, tacked on to this bill by the Senate, is a bill for raising revenue; and I protest—and have sought the floor for that purpose—against that provision of the Constitution being infringed in this indirect way, because this proposition is nothing more than a proposition to raise revenue. It is accepted as such; it is defended as such. It is pressed upon our attention as a means of replenishing an exhausted exchequer.

Without going into the question of the sufficiency or insufficiency of the present rates of postage, or whether cheap postage is, on the whole, wise economy or not, I am, on the ground I have already submitted, opposed to the amendment of the Senate, and shall vote against it. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. KEITT. I shall vote very cheerfully, Mr. Chairman, to advance the rates of postage to the extent indicated, and also for the abolition of the franking privilege. I do not hold the objection made by the gentleman from Tennessee as tenable; his objection being that this is the origination of a revenue bill by the Senate. It is not that. It is merely amending a revenue bill which originated in the House, and which was passed by the House.

Mr. MAYNARD. I ask the gentleman from South Carolina whether he considers the original bill as a bill for the raising of revenue?

Mr. KEITT. If the original bill is not a revenue bill, this amendment does not make it a revenue bill, and therefore the objection does not hold.

Mr. MAYNARD. This is a revenue measure. Mr. KEITT. But I pass on. I believe that these various Departments of the Government should support themselves. It is not right to tax one portion of the people for the benefit of another portion; and to that extent your legislation is unfair and iniquitous.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Would the gentleman have the Army and Navy self-supporting?

Mr. KEITT. That is an entirely different matter. I will vote for this amendment. I will also vote for the abolition of the franking privilege, because I believe that it will save $5,000,000 of revenue. I have said all I want to say on that subject, and I will take the other when it comes up.

The question being on Mr. GARNETT's amendment, Mr. GARNETT withdrew it.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desire to amend the Senate amendment, by adding the following proviso.

Provided, That this increase shall only take place in the States where the postage is insufficient to pay the expenses of the service.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded tellers.

At this time the utmost noise and confusion prevailed in the Hall.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should like to know what the question is. We have not been able to hear anything the Chair has said for the last half hour, in this neighborhood.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would be surprised if gentlemen did hear. They never will hear while there is so much noise in the Hall.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is why I want it stopped.

The CHAIRMAN. If gentlemen wish to make a noise, there is plenty of room outside of the Hall for them to do it, without making it here. [Laughter.] This is a very inappropriate place for it.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask that the amendment may be again reported.

The CHAIRMAN. It can only be done by the consent of the committee. It has been read twice.

Mr. DEAN. I object.

Mr. HOUSTON. We have not heard the amendment at all in this part of the Hall, and I suppose we have a right to have it read.

Mr. DEAN. I withdraw the objection.

The amendment was again read.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BUFFINTON and JOHN COCHRANE were appointed.

Mr. McQUEEN. That amendment is unconstitutional.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 71, noes 72.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected.

The noise and confusion in the Hall still continuing.

The CHAIRMAN said: The Chair begs leave to suggest to the committee, in a spirit of all kindness, that it is impossible that the committee should proceed intelligently with business if gentlemen insist in a violation of order. They will economize time and promote their own convenience by preserving order. The business will thus progress more pleasantly, and with more dispatch.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. There is one remedy for the disorder. I move that the committee do now rise.

[Loud cries of "Order!" and renewed confusion.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will entertain

no motion until the committee comes to order; and if gentlemen will not take their seats and preserve order, they must pardon the Chair if they are called by name. If members will not behave themselves, the Chair will invoke the power of the House to make them do so. There is no alternative left, if order is to be preserved, but to enforce the rules.

The question recurring on the Senate amendment, it was again reported.

Mr. McQUEEN demanded tellers on the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and FAULKNER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 40, noes 96.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Ninth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the franking privilege now accorded to members of Congress be, and the same is hereby, abolished from and after the 4th day of March next.

Mr. WINSLOW. I offer the following amendment:

Strike out "members of Congress," and insert in lieu thereof the words, "Senators of the United States."

Mr. Chairman, I want to say a word on this subject. I am utterly opposed myself to the abolition of the franking privilege; but if it were a personal question, merely having reference to my own convenience, I would be glad to get rid of it. It imposes great labor on me; but, sir, I take great pleasure in doing anything to oblige my constituents. I do not think that it ought to be abolished, for divers reasons; but I do not intend, at this late hour of the session, to detain the House with a long harangue on the subject. While I wish to retain it for the benefit of my constituents, I have too much liberality to impose this privilege upon the Senate against their will. [Laughter.] By a large vote, some thirty-eight to four, they have said that they do not want the franking privilege. I trust that there is liberality enough in the House of Representatives to indulge the Senate in their whim. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOUSTON. I presume that the gentleman from North Carolina is not serious in his amendment.

Several MEMBERS. Oh, yes, he is.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I regret that the gentleman proposes an amendment which can be understood in no other light than as a reflection upon the coördinate branch of the national Legislature. Gentlemen say they want to reflect upon it. I do not. The Senate has the right to propose an amendment to any bill sent to them; and it has proposed this amendment in good faith. The Senate proposes to abolish the franking privilege; and I believe that it ought to be abolished. I believe that the amendment of the Senate ought to prevail. I do not suppose, however, that on the yeas and nays the gentleman from North Carolina will put himself upon the record, to go down to posterity, as being willing to discriminate between the two Houses, and reflect unfairly upon a coördinate branch.

Mr. WINSLOW. My friend must allow me to observe that we must all take our chance with posterity. I am as willing to go upon the record as he is.

[The committee informally rose, and a message in writing having been received from the President of the United States by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, the committee resumed its session.]

The question was taken on Mr. WINSLOW's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move to amend so as to provide that this provision shall take effect one day sooner than the time specified in the amendment. I offer my amendment simply to give me the opportunity to express my regret that a subject of this importance should be treated with the levity which has been manifested upon this occasion.

Mr. MORGAN. I rise to a question of order. It is only a few moments since that the gentleman from Indiana called the gentleman from Virginia to order for wandering from the subject. I raise the same question of order now.

Mr. ENGLISH. The few remarks which I have to offer shall be confined to the subject under discussion. My amendment proposes that this provision abolishing the franking privilege shall take effect one day earlier than is specified in the Senate amendment, and I have the right to offer such remarks thereon as I desire.

Mr. CLARK B. COCHRANE. I rise to a question of order. It is that the gentleman should confine his remarks to discussing the question whether the provision should go into effect one day sooner than the Senate propose. I know that he can do it; because I know he has an inventive genius.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. ENGLISH. I believe that the sooner this provision is adopted the better it will be for the country. I do think that a matter of this grave importance should be met with a different spirit from that which has been manifested here to-night in reference to it. I think the franking privilege is one of the greatest abuses of the Government, and it should be materially abridged if not abolished entirely. I am not prepared to say that it is the proper place, upon an appropriation bill, to adopt a measure of this sort; but that it is an abuse which requires reformation I think there can be no question. Whether that shall be done now, or at some future time, I am entirely satisfied that it should be done, and the earlier it is done the better.

I withdraw the amendment.

Mr. KILGORE. I move to amend by striking out the words "4th of March next." I think that if it is our intention to make this reform in the Post Office Department, we should apply the rule to ourselves. I cannot see any good reason why gentlemen who are disposed to economize, and make the Post Office Department a self-sustaining institution, should restrict this provision to a time subsequent to the 4th of March—the time when our period of service expires—thus retaining this privilege to ourselves, and denying it to those who shall succeed us. By the adoption of this provision, many thousands of dollars would be saved to the Post Office Department if gentlemen would be as liberal in their distribution of documents and circulation of speeches, as I know they will be during the fall. The sums saved would be in small items, it is true; but "many mickles make a muckle;" and by saving these mites, they will amount to a considerable sum. I am anxious to see this Department made a self-supporting Department. I would be extremely glad to see the Navy Department and the Army Department made self-supporting, if that could be done by any ingenuity possible; because it is important at this particular time to save enough to the Treasury, when millions of dollars are being expended in anticipation of a bloody conflict with a few crazy Mormons, which turns out to be a bubble.

Mr. COX. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. KILGORE. The gentleman is too late in his point of order. I have said all I desire. I hope my amendment will be adopted; for I have offered it in good faith.

Mr. KEITT. The gentlemen from Indiana says it is not proper for us to enjoy the franking privilege, and deny it to those who come after us. Upon that ground no reform can ever be made in this Government. The question is, whether or not the country will gain by abolishing the franking privilege, and not whether those who come after us will be stripped of a privilege which we have enjoyed? I ask what good results from the use of the franking privilege? How many letters do we receive upon business connected with public affairs, in proportion to the number received in relation to the claims of individuals for office, or upon private business? In the indictment of law, we should frank no letters except those which have connection with the discharge of our public trust.

Mr. KILGORE. Would it not be proper to commence this reform by applying the rule to ourselves as well as all who come after us?

Mr. KEITT. Yes, sir; and I am willing to do it. I intend to apply the rule to myself, though the amendment may not apply it until the 4th of March next.

Mr. KILGORE. I want to apply it now.

Mr. KEITT. I do not often use the franking privilege. I ask, in all fairness, upon what matters the franking privilege is most often exercised? We know that upon the eve of a presidential election it is used for the benefit of party, and not for the benefit of the public interest. We know also that if this franking privilege should be abolished, the abuses which both parties in this House proclaim against will be cut off. The immense amount of trash with which the public is now gorged would be withheld if we abolish the franking privilege. How many people in the country would pay the postage upon the documents which now issue from this Hall? If we abolish the franking privilege, would not these worthless documents be cut short? Your surveys, your explorations, in numberless instances gotten up for party purposes, and for the benefit of individuals, and not for the purpose of diffusing information—for they give little or no information—would be cut off. I do not believe that for the five years I have been here there are half a dozen of these volumes which gentlemen have read. Your Congressional Globe is not read anywhere in the country except by act of Congress. I believe, with Webster, that, if the English language is to be demoralized, it will be by the debasement of the English tongue in the Halls of Congress. And at the same time you impose a heavy and onerous tax on the country!

The abolition of this franking privilege would, in my judgment, save the country $5,000,000; and does it lie in the mouths of men who clamor here against the extravagance of the Government; who talk about extravagance in building up your Navy to sustain your flag, and repel outrages upon it; who clamor about the enormities of your printing expenses; does it lie in their mouths, I say, to oppose the abolition of the franking privilege?

[Here the hammer fell.]

The question was taken on Mr. KILGORE's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MORGAN. I offer the following amendment:

After the words "Senators of the United States," insert the following:

Ex-Presidents, all the postmasters, and every other officer of the Government.

If there is to be any change made, Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of going the entire length, and let every officer of the Government pay his own postage, so as to have no privileges about the matter whatever. As the Senate amendment now stands, you leave the privilege to postmasters, all ex-Presidents of the United States, and a great variety of other officers. If you cut one off, cut all off. If you choose to try the experiment, do it without any exception.

Mr. MILLSON. I oppose the amendment of the gentleman from New York, because I am opposed to the abolition of this so-called franking privilege. My friend from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] repeatedly called it the franking privilege. It should rather be called the franking duty. It is rather a duty than a privilege: the duty is ours, the privilege our constituents'. It is a duty which we perform for the benefit of the public; it is a duty which very many members would be very glad to be relieved from; but the interests of the people require that we should bear this burden a little longer. Do gentlemen really fancy that members of Congress are to be relieved in this way from the obligation of sending to the people such information as they desire to have, and ought to have? You would very soon find that some other plan would be substituted for the franking scheme; you would find that stamps would be issued to members of Congress, and perhaps to a greater extent than they require them, with which to circulate letters, speeches, and documents, among their constituents.

The objection made by the gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. KEITT] is, that this franking duty involves a very heavy expense, and that the Post Office Department ought to be a self-sustaining one. I never desired that it should be altogether so. I believe that a portion of the expense should be borne by the general public. The gentleman's objection arises from the supposition that no man derives advantage from a letter or a newspaper but the man who receives the letter or subscribes to the newspaper. This is a very great mistake. There is scarcely a letter received by any one which does not contain information that is communicated to the neighborhood. There is no information contained in a newspaper that is not, to a greater or less extent, diffused throughout the country. It is not the man who receives a letter or a newspaper who derives exclusive advantage from it; nor is there any reason why he should bear the entire burden of the postage charge.

The information we now send to our constituents, in the shape of speeches and public documents, must be relied upon to correct the partial, unfair, prejudiced, and sometimes slanderous statements of newspaper correspondents. It is in this way that we are enabled to give correct reports of our proceedings in Congress, and protect ourselves against the imperfect accounts sent to the country by the correspondents of newspapers. I regard it as a duty which we should continue to perform, and one which I hope the representatives of the people will not, in this way, try to rid themselves of.

Mr. FOSTER. I move to amend by providing that postage everywhere within the limits of the United States should be equalized. Is that amendment in order?

The CHAIRMAN. Not now. This is an amendment affecting the franking privilege alone.

The question was taken on Mr. MORGAN's amendment; and it was rejected.

The question was taken on the Senate amendment as amended; and it was non-concurred in—ayes fourteen, noes not counted.

Tenth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the printing of post bills, blanks, printing drafts and warrants, postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and printing parchments for the use of the Post Office and other Executive Departments, shall be hereafter given to the lowest responsible bidder after due public notice.

The amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I now desire to offer the following amendment, to come in at the end of the Senate amendments:

And be it further enacted, That postmasters who have been or shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, shall continue in office until their successors shall enter upon the duties of their offices, notwithstanding their commissions may have expired; but this shall not continue more than one month after the next regular meeting of the Senate subsequent to the termination of their terms of office.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I raise a question of order on that amendment, that it is not relevant to any part of this bill, that it changes the existing law, and that the text of the bill is not open to amendment.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I wish to explain the amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish the question of order decided.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman from Missouri that the committee is now acting upon the amendments of the Senate alone.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I am aware of that; but I think the gentleman from Tennessee will withdraw his objection when he understands the amendment. Postmasters who are appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, are commissioned for a term of four years, and no more; and when that time has arrived, and their successors have not been appointed, or have not entered upon the discharge of their duties, they have been permitted to retain their offices. Doubts are, however, entertained whether they are liable to any penalties.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask a decision of the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the amendment is not in order.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. Very well; then I will not insist on it.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee do now rise and report the amendments to the House, with the action of the committee thereon.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to the Post Office appropriation bill, and had directed him to report the same to the House, with a recommendation that some of said amendments be concurred in, and others non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question on the amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

First amendment:

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That there shall be appointed by the President, with the consent of the Senate, a Fourth Assistant Postmaster General, who shall receive the same compensation as is paid to each of the other Assistant Postmasters General; and the said Fourth Assistant Postmaster General is hereby authorized to send and receive letters, packages and other matters, on official business, through the mail, free of postage, subject to the same restrictions and penalties as the other Assistant Postmasters General; and that the sum of $3,000 is hereby appropriated for the salary of said officer, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended a concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. ENGLISH demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 79, nays 86; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bingham, Bowie, Bryan, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cayanaugh, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dinmick, Dowdell, Edie, English, Faulkner, Florence, Gillis, Hatch, Hawkins, Horton, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Purviance, Robbins, Roberts, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Seavine, Shorter, Sickles, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, White, Whitely, Winslow, Wood, and Woodson—79.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bliss, Bobcock, Boyce, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chapman, Clawson, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Crawford, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Grovesbeck, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hoard, Hopkins, Howard, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelsey, Knapp, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Matteson, Milson, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Olin, Parker, Pendleton, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Quitman, Reagan, Keilly, Ricoud, Royce, Scates, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, Talbot, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, and Zollcoffer—86.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

During the call of the roll,

Mr. LETCHER stated that Mr. GARNETT had paired off with Mr. KILGORE.

Mr. RITCHIE stated that he had paired off upon this vote with Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee; he [Mr. RITCHIE] being opposed to the amendment, and Mr. SMITH in favor of it.

Mr. COCKERILL stated that he had paired off with Mr. HARLAN.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by one of its clerks, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the civil appropriation bill.

Also, that the Senate had passed House bill (No. 460) granting an invalid pension to Beriah Wright, of New York.

ENROLLED BILL.

Subsequently,

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that he had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 460) granting an invalid pension to Beriah Wright, of New York; when the Speaker signed the same.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL—AGAIN.

The House then resumed the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the Post Office appropriation bill.

The second and third amendments of the Senate were non-concurred in, as recommended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, without division.

The fourth amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, directed to pay to Edward K. Collins and his associates the sum of $147,730, the balance of appropriations heretofore made for the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool and back, and withheld by the Department at quarterly payments made on the contract for that service on the 30th days of June and September, and 31st of December, 1856, and 31st of March, 1857, and 30th of June and September, 1857, respectively; but there shall be deducted therefrom the sum of $115,500, or such sum as is owing to the United States for advances made to E. K. Collins and his associates by act of Congress.

The SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence in this amendment.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 76, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, English, Florence, Foster, Gillis, Gilman, Granger, Hatch, Hawkins, Hopkins, Horton, Howard, Hughes, Huyler, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leidy, Matteson, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Olin, Parker, William W. Phelps, Potter, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Sickles, James A. Stewart, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Walton, Ward, Israel Washburn, and Whiteley—76.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Blair, Bonham, Boyce, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Cox, James Craig, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dowdell, Edie, Foley, Giddings, Gooch, Goode, Groesbeck, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Leiter, Letcher, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Morrill, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Pottle, Purviance, Quidman, Reagan, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Spinner, William Smith, Stanton, Stevenson, Talbot, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Elihu B. Washburne, Woodson, and Zollcoffer—74.

So the amendment was concurred in.

Fifth amendment:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That so much of the eighteenth section of the act entitled "An act to reduce the rate of postage, and limit the use and correct the abuse of the franking privilege, and for the prevention of frauds on the revenues of the Post Office Department," approved March 30, 1845, as requires the advertisement of letters un-called for in any post office to be inserted in the newspaper or newspapers having the largest circulation in the town or place where the office advertising is situated, be, and the same is hereby, repealed, and the Postmaster General shall henceforth cause the same to be published in such newspaper as will publish it at the lowest price, and that the compensation to be paid for the said advertisements shall not be greater than that now allowed by law.

THE SPEAKER. The committee recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand a division on the amendment.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 94, nays 41.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was concurred in.

Sixth amendment:

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That not more than two hundred and five hundred dollars per annum shall be paid to any special agent of the Post Office Department as compensation for his service; but this act shall not be construed so as to raise the compensation of such agents in any case.

THE SPEAKER. The committee recommend a concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Seventh amendment:

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That post offices shall be open for the receipt and delivery of letters, papers, and mail matter, for all persons at the same time; and no practice or arrangement shall be allowed by which any person or persons, for any consideration, can obtain their letters or papers earlier or later out of said offices than all or any others may receive their letters or papers on applying therefor; nor shall any practice or arrangement exist whereby any person or persons can mail their letters or papers earlier or later than all or any other persons may mail their letters or papers on offering so to do: Provided, That nothing herein contained shall prevent the use of locked boxes, as they have been heretofore authorized.

THE SPEAKER. The committee report a concurrence in the amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Eighth amendment:

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That after the 30th of June, 1858, the rate of postage on all letters sent through the mail shall be five cents for any distance under three thousand miles, and ten cents for any distance over three thousand miles.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays on that.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 39, nays 121; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Barksdale, Bocooc, Bonham, Boyce, Bryan, Caskie, Clemens, Cobb, Curry, Dowdell, Faulkner, Goode, Hopkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Letcher, McQueen, Millson, Moore, Peyton, Powell, Quidman, Reagan, Ruffin, Sandidge, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, William Smith, Stallworth, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Winslow, and John V. Wright—39.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Avery, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, English, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Giddings, Gillis, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lovejoy, Macley, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sickles, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, and Wortendyke—121.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. SAVAGE stated that he had paired off with Mr. FARNSWORTH.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, the reading of the list was dispensed with.

Ninth amendment:

SEC. 11. And be it further enacted, That the franking privilege now accorded to members of Congress be, and the same is hereby, abolished from and after the 4th day of March next.

Mr. MASON demanded the yeas and nays on concurring in the amendment.

Mr. BARKSDALE demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. BRYAN and ABBOTT were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported, ayes twenty-nine—a sufficient number; and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 83; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Bliss, Bonham, Brayton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Cragin, Crawford, Curry, Dawes, Dean, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Foley, Granger, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Hopkins, Huyler, George W. Jones, Keitt, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Macley, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Mason, Moore, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Pendleton, Potter, Purviance, Reilly, Robbins, Roberts, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thompson, Tompkins, Trippie, Walbridge, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—71.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Billingshurst, Blair, Bowie, Bryan, Buffinton, Burns, Case, Chapman, John B. Clark, John Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gillis, Gilmer, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Groesbeck, J. Morrison Harris, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, Jackson, Jenkins, Jewett, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, Lamar, Landy, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Samuel S. Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Millson, Morgan, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Quidman, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Royce, Savage, Shorter, Stallworth, William Stewart, Talbot, Underwood, Wade, Walton, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Whiteley, Winslow, and Woodson—83.

So the amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, said, pending the call: This act is to take effect after the 4th of March, is it not?

THE SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. Then the present members of Congress would be permitted to enjoy it during their term; and by law we would deny to our successors the same rights we are enjoying now. Therefore I vote "no."

Mr. LETCHER stated that he would have voted "ay" had he been present when his name was called.

Mr. BURNETT made a similar statement.

Tenth amendment:

SEC. 12. And be it further enacted, That the printing of post bills, blanks, printing drafts, and warrants, postage stamps, stamped envelopes, and printing parchments for the use of the Post Office and other Executive Departments, shall, hereafter, be given to the lowest responsible bidder, after due public notice.

THE SPEAKER. The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommend a concurrence.

The amendment was concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the several votes by which the various amendments were concurred or non-concurred in; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. QUITMAN. The committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the Army bill, have met, and, after full and free conference, report the following result of their action:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
June 11, 1858.

The committee of conference upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending 30th of June, 1859, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-fourth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, thirty-second, thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, forty-fifth, forty-sixth, forty-seventh, and forty-ninth amendments, disagreed to by the House.

That the House recede from their disagreement to, and concur in, the first, nineteenth, thirty-sixth, thirty-eighth, fortieth, and forty-third amendments of the Senate.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same, with the following amendment: In the fourth line of said amendment, strike out "forty-five," and insert "twenty-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

In the tenth line of said amendment, strike out all after the word "War," to the end of the amendment, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "and at his discretion in applying to the old or new arms any recent improvement in the mode of priming."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-second amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "fifty," and insert "forty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from the thirty-first amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "two hundred," and insert "one hundred and fifty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-third amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "one hundred and fifty thousand," and insert "one hundred and twelve thousand five hundred."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-seventh amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "fifty," and insert "thirty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-second amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

In the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the words, "for printing."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the forty-first amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same.

JEFFERSON DAVIS,
JOHN SLIDELL,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. A. QUITMAN,
MARTIN J. CRAWFORD,
B. STANTON,
Managers on the part of House of Representatives.

If it is the pleasure of the House, I will explain so many of the amendments as the House may desire to have explained, and pass over those on which the House desire no explanation. [Cries of "Give us all of them!"] I will proceed with a brief explanation of the amendments as they occur.

The Senate recede from their amendments, as follows:

The sixteenth amendment, which appropriates $10,000 to enable the Secretary of War to examine and report upon suitable sites for an armory and foundry in the West and on the Pacific coast.

The seventeenth amendment, making an appropriation to enable the Secretary of War to compensate F. W. Lander for services and expenses in making a reconnaissance for a railroad from Puget Sound to the Mississippi river in 1854-55.

The eighteenth amendment, which appropriates

$385,000 for the payment of volunteers operating in Florida in 1857.

The twentieth amendment, which appropriates $50,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Knox, Maine.

The twenty-first amendment, which appropriates $50,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Montgomery, New York.

The twenty-fourth amendment, appropriating $20,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Wood, New York.

The twenty-seventh amendment, appropriating $75,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Calhoun, Virginia.

The twenty-eighth amendment, appropriating $25,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Sumpter, South Carolina.

The twenty-ninth amendment, appropriating $75,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Clinch, Florida.

The thirty-second amendment, appropriating $50,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Pickens, Florida.

The thirty-fourth amendment, appropriating $50,000 for continuing the construction of Fort Gaines, Alabama.

The thirty-fifth amendment, which appropriates $10,000 for the extension and repairs of Fort St. Philip, Louisiana.

The forty-fifth, forty-sixth, and forty-seventh amendments, providing for an amendment of the act of the 3d of March, 1851, entitled "An act to found a military asylum for the relief and support of invalid and disabled soldiers of the Army of the United States," and extending the provisions of said act to invalid and disabled soldiers of subsequent wars.

The forty-ninth amendment, in relation to the war debt of California.

The committee recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to, and concur in, the first amendment of the Senate.

That amendment relates to the rank and pay of certain officers at the Military Academy at West Point. The effect of the amendment is to increase the pay of instructors some twelve hundred dollars in the aggregate. The rank which it confers is mere local rank, and it holds only while those officers are in the discharge of their duties as such officers. It carries no pay.

The committee recommend that the House recede from their disagreement to, and concur in, the nineteenth amendment of the Senate, which is in reference to continuing certain works of defense.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I desire to ask if it would be in order to move that the House concur in the report of the committee without any further explanation? It is signed, I understand, by all the members of the committee.

Mr. QUITMAN. I am informed that the Senate have agreed to this conference report.

Mr. BARKSDALE. If it is in order, I make the motion.

Mr. BILLINGHURST. I desire to hear the report explained.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I merely wish to know what amendments are recommended to be passed.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I demand the previous question upon my motion.

Mr. STANTON. I think the House ought to hear the report explained.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I understand the gentleman himself signed the report.

Mr. STANTON. Certainly. But I think the House ought to hear it.

Mr. CLEMENS. If gentlemen choose to adopt this mode of legislation, I ask the privilege of filing my written protest on the Journal.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Read the amendments recommended to be adopted.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I withdraw the demand for the previous question.

Mr. QUITMAN. As the amendments in regard to the arsenals have been read—

Mr. CRAWFORD. We reduced each one of them twenty-five per cent., and took only four or five points on the Atlantic coast and on the Gulf. We recommend an appropriation for Portland, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, the Keys of Florida, and San Francisco, reducing the Senate amendment twenty-five per cent. for each. The whole reduction that we succeeded in making is over a million dollars.

Mr. QUITMAN. The committee recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the amendment of inserting "twenty-five" instead of "forty-five," so that the amendment will read:

For the purchase of breech-loading carbines of the best model, to be selected and approved by a board of Army officers, $25,000.

The committee recommend that the House recede from its disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out all after the word "War," and insert as follows:

And at his discretion in applying to the old or new arms any recent improvement in the mode of priming.

So that the amendment will read:

For the alteration of old arms, so as to make them breech-loading arms, on a model to be selected and approved by a board of Army officers, $25,000: Provided, That any portion of said sum, not exceeding $5,000, may be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War and at his discretion, &c.

The committee recommend the House to recede from its disagreement to the twenty-second amendment, and concur in the same with the following amendment:

Strike out "fifty," and insert "forty."

So that it will read:

For the fort at Hog Island ledge, Portland harbor, Maine, $40,000.

The committee make the same recommendation as to the twenty-third amendment, reducing the appropriation for the fort at Richmond, Staten Island, New York, from $100,000 to $75,000.

The committee make the same recommendation as to the twenty-fifth amendment, reducing the appropriation for Fort Delaware, Delaware harbor, Delaware, from $100,000 to $75,000.

The committee make the same recommendation as to the twenty-sixth amendment reducing the appropriation for Fort Carroll, Soller's Point flats, Baltimore harbor, Maryland, from $100,000 to $75,000.

The committee make the same recommendation as to the thirtieth amendment, reducing the appropriation for Fort Taylor, Key West, Florida, from $100,000 to $75,000.

The committee make the same recommendation as to the thirty-first amendment, reducing the appropriation for Fort Jefferson, Garden Key, Tortugas, Florida, from $200,000 to $150,000.

The committee make the same recommendation reducing the appropriation for Fort Point, San Francisco, California, from $150,000 to $112,500.

The committee recommend the House to recede from its disagreement to the thirty-seventh amendment, with an amendment, to substitute $30,000 for $50,000, so that it will read:

For construction of permanent platforms for modern cannon of large caliber in existing fortifications of important harbors, $30,000.

The committee recommend the House to recede from its disagreement to the forty-second amendment, with an amendment, striking out the words "for printing," so that it will read:

That there be appropriated, &c., for preparing the drawings of the sailing charts of the Behring's Strait and North Pacific exploring and surveying expedition, under the control and direction of the Secretary of the Navy—but not for printing—the sum of $8,700.

The committee on the part of the Senate agree to recommend that body to recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to the forty-first amendment of the Senate, in respect to the administering the prescribed oath of enlistment to recruits by commissioned officers when the services of a civil magistrate cannot be obtained.

I now move the previous question on the adoption of the report.

Mr. MILLSON, (at ten minutes after eleven o'clock, p. m.) I move that the House do now adjourn; and I ask for tellers on that motion, because I want to show that the number of members present justifies it.

Tellers were not ordered.

The House refused to adjourn.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled, an act (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; when the Speaker signed the same.

SUPPLEMENTAL INDIAN APPROPRIATIONS.

Mr. HOUSTON, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the supplemental Indian appropriation bill, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth amendments.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to its thirtieth amendment, and concur in the same.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same with an amendment, as follows: in the fourth line of said amendment, strike out the word "March," and insert "August."

J. D. BRIGHT,
W. K. SEBASTIAN,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

GEORGE S. HOUSTON,
B. F. LEITER,
JAMES B. CLAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I do not know whether the House desires any explanation of this report. The Senate have yielded everything the House desired, and I ask the previous question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to know what the amendment is to which the House agrees.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is as follows:

For compensation of five extra clerks in the Indian office, under acts of 5th March, 1854, and 3d March, 1855, and under appropriations made from year to year, $7,000.

The committee recommend a concurrence in that amendment, with an amendment to strike out "March" and insert "August," so as to give the right date of an act.

Mr. CLEMENS. I would ask if these are the clerks employed on the land maps?

Mr. HOUSTON. Oh, no; they are clerks in the Indian office.

Mr. CLEMENS. Then I am satisfied.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. HOUSTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION BILL.

Mr. MASON. Is a motion in order now?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. MASON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House, that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill to grant pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812.

Mr. BOGOCOCK. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MASON. I will give way for a moment for that purpose.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman yield to allow the report to be disposed of?

Mr. MASON. Yes, sir; if I can have the floor after it is disposed of.

[Cries of "Agreed!"]

Mr. STANTON. I understand that the Senate have adjourned and have not acted on the reports of the committees of conference on the Indian and Navy bills, and there is, therefore, no necessity for us to stay here all night. I move that the House do now adjourn.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman from Ohio will excuse the Chair, the Chair would suggest that the House have three bills remaining in committee, and it is very important that the House

Mr. STANTON. Well, I withdraw the motion.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BOCKOCK, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Navy appropriation bill, submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, having met, have, after a full and free conference, agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate do recede from its first and fifth amendments.

That the House do recede from its disagreement to the second and third amendments of the Senate.

That the House do recede from its disagreement to the tenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to said amendment, with an amendment as follows: Strike out "1st day of July, 1856," and insert "passage of this act."

That the Senate do agree to the amendment of the House to its fourteenth amendment.

S. R. MALLORY,
SOLOMON FOOT,
J. T. BENJAMIN,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

THOMAS S. BOCKOCK,
JOHN KELLY,
F. H. MORSE,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I shall occupy the attention of the House but a short time in explaining the provisions of this report of the committee of conference. It will be seen by the House, that the action of the committee has been approved by every member of the committee of this House and every member of the committee of the Senate. The report is signed by all the managers of the conference. There were but few subjects of disagreement between the two Houses.

[Cries of "Question!" "Vote!" and "We will agree to it!"]

Mr. BOCKOCK. Well, if the House does not want any explanation, I am quite willing that the vote shall be taken.

Mr. CLEMENS. I want an explanation.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I merely want to have that read which it is proposed shall become law.

Mr. BOCKOCK. The report has been read, and I will briefly explain it. There were but few amendments in controversy between the two Houses. The Senate, it will be seen, have receded from their first and fifth amendments. It is scarcely necessary, I suppose, to explain what those are. [Cries of "No!" "No!" and "Go ahead!"] The House recedes from its disagreement to the second and third amendments. Those amendments are coupled together, and relate to the same subject—an appropriation of $50,600 for filling in the new purchase in the Brooklyn navy-yard. I wish to make a brief explanation in relation to that subject. Some years ago the Congress of the United States appropriated $80,000 for the purpose of building marine barracks at Brooklyn, in the State of New York. No provision was made for the purchase of a site for such barracks. It was designed that they should be located on the grounds owned by the Government at that place, but there were no grounds upon which these marine barracks could be erected, without filling in a portion of the purchase that the Government had a few years before made. A considerable amount of money has been already expended in filling in a sufficient portion of that new purchase to furnish a site for these marine barracks. It is now nearly completed. The Secretary of the Navy estimated, at the beginning of the session, that it would require $50,650 to complete that filling in. That is all that this amendment provides for. Until that is done, these marine barracks cannot be built, and the object of the appropriation made some two years ago will be defeated. This sum of $80,000, appropriated for the purpose of erecting marine barracks, has never been used, and there are now no barracks, but merely sheds, for the use of the marines at that place.

Mr. MORGAN. I would ask the gentleman if the Representative from that district, who is familiar with every foot of the land, and knows everything about it, did not at first go before the committee and say that there was no earthly use in this appropriation, and afterwards, when he found that it was necessary, in order to get votes next fall, discovered that it was very necessary, and take the other side?

Mr. BOCKOCK. If any such thing happened, I do not know anything in the world about it, and have not looked to such considerations. I have looked solely to public and not to private considerations.

Mr. MORGAN. As to the barracks, there is no earthly necessity for them. They do not even propose building them now.

Mr. BOCKOCK. At the first session of the last Congress $80,000 was appropriated to commence the erection of the barracks.

Mr. MORGAN. The time has expired, and that money has gone back into the Treasury.

Mr. GROW. I desire to inquire, if this is not the proposition which has been twice rejected by the House?

Mr. BOCKOCK. Of course; it has been rejected or it would not be the subject of controversy here. The committee was only called to act upon those subjects that the two Houses disagreed upon.

Mr. MORGAN. This was defeated in the House by two overwhelming votes.

Mr. BOCKOCK. I do not recollect the votes. I wish further to say, in relation to this matter—for it seems to be the only bone of contention—that it was represented to the committee that, in order to complete this filling in, it will be necessary to obtain earth, and that that can be obtained now very conveniently and at a moderate price. Contracts for completing this filling in have already been advertised for. The last contracts were made, I believe, at fifteen cents a yard. It is believed that, under the advertisements already issued, very great bargains can be procured by the Government in relation to this filling in. If that is not done, and the earth now convenient and accessible for the purpose of completing this filling in should be applied, as it probably will in a short time, to other purposes, then it could not be done in a year or two hence, except at a greatly enhanced price.

Mr. MORGAN. I have no idea that this thing will spoil. They are digging cellars all around the neighborhood, and I presume, if permitted, it would be filled in for nothing.

Mr. BOCKOCK. No such representation was made to us.

Mr. KELLY. I will say a word on this matter, with the permission of the gentleman from Virginia. The Government owns the land between the navy-yard and the marine hospital. It is now all, or nearly all, a swamp. A part has been filled in, and filled in, I believe, for the very small price of sixteen cents a yard. As the property now stands, it cannot be of any use to the Government. Even if the Government desires to sell, it would be a sound economy and prudent foresight to first fill it in. It would then command a large price. It extends for a long way along what is called the Wallabout, and it shows a complete water front. If the Government filled it in at the rate contracted for before, they might sell lots there for large sums, which are now of no earthly use to anybody. Until it is filled in the marine barracks ordered by Congress cannot be built; and the marines at that yard are now quartered in sheds. They are small, and not at all tenable for the purpose for which they have been temporarily put up. I hope, therefore, that this appropriation will be concurred in. I am convinced that it is needed, and needed now.

Mr. CLEMENS. I understood my colleague to say that it could be done for fifteen cents a yard. How many yards does the Government own there?

Mr. KELLY. They own about one hundred and sixty acres of land—a complete swamp, and of no earthly use unless it is filled in.

Mr. CLEMENS. You propose to appropriate $60,000 to reclaim a swamp.

Mr. KELLY. It is provided that only enough shall be reclaimed to answer the purposes of the marine barracks building.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Mr. Speaker—Mr. BOCKOCK. I cannot yield any further.

The next amendment is this: The Senate made an amendment in these words:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st of July, 1856, the clerks, messengers, and watchmen at the navy-yard and marine barracks, at Washington, shall be entitled to receive the compensation authorized by the acts of April 22, 1854, and August 5, 1854, for the payment of such sum as may be necessary, and the same is hereby appropriated out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

I will briefly call the attention of the House to the acts alluded to. In the act of April 22, 1854, was this provision:

"To the clerks employed at the navy-yard and marine barracks, at Washington, &c., shall be paid an increase of twenty per cent."

It was supposed that that was a permanent increase of pay; but it was afterwards decided not to be one, so far as the clerks in the Departments were concerned. Subsequently an act was passed making it permanent in respect to them. The act, however, was not extended to the clerks at the navy-yard. The Senate put in a provision making this a permanent increase for those clerks, and extending it back to the time when it was decided by the officers of the Government that they were not entitled to it. The House rejected the amendment. The managers of the conference on the part of the House objected to giving this provision a retroactive effect; but we thought the increase was right, and agreed to allow it for the future. There are only nine clerks; one class gets $800, and the other $1,000, and by the operation of this provision they will be advanced to $1,000 and $1,200, while the lowest class of clerks in the Departments get $1,200, and the highest $1,800. We strike out of the Senate amendment the words "1st day of July, 1856," and insert "from and after the passage of this act."

The next is, that the Senate do agree to the amendment of the House to the fourteenth amendment. That amendment was striking out "five," in the number of ships, and inserting "ten." The Senate agreed to our provision on that subject. I now call for the previous question.

Mr. MORGAN. This is one of the greatest bills of abominations we have yet had; and I move to lay it upon the table, and on that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. Is not that a defeat of the Navy appropriation bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a defeat of the bill, if it be laid upon the table.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Let us take the yeas and nays on adopting the conference report.

Mr. MORGAN. I will withdraw my motion; and call for the yeas and nays on the adoption of the report.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 67, nays 74; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Avery, Barksdale, Bockock, Bowie, Boyce, Bryan, Burnett, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, John Cochrane, Conins, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dumnick, Dowdell, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gillis, Groesbeck, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jewett, J. G. Blancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kent, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Macley, McKibbin, Milton, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, Phillips, Quitman, Reilly, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Slatworthy, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Whiteley, Winslow, and Wortendyke—67.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Atkins, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bayton, Bulfinch, Burlingame, Caskie, Claflie, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Dawes, Dean, Darce, Edie, Fenton, Goodrich, Goveaux, Granger, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Hoard, Horton, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Leitcher, Lovejoy, Hun-phrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, John S. Phelps, Pottle, Ricaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Tappan, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Wade, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and John V. Wright—74.

So the report of the committee of conference was disagreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. HOWARD said: I desire to make a statement in reference to a pair. Some time ago, Mr. GREENWOOD paired off with one of my colleagues to accommodate him, but reserving to my colleague the right to vote upon appropriation bills. Subsequently, my colleague was compelled to leave; and I agreed to withhold my vote against any appropriation bills. He was inclined to vote for them; and if I was inclined to vote against any of them, I was to withhold my vote. Inclined, as I am, to vote against this bill, I withhold my vote.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana, said: I desire to change my vote. I desire to say that I do not like this bill; but as the session is so near its close, I will vote in the affirmative.

The result of the vote was then announced, as above recorded.

Mr. MORGAN moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was disagreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. Cannot the House agree to all the amendments of the Senate, except the one in controversy, and thus reduce the contest to that?

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. What amendment is that?

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. The Brooklyn navy-yard.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. So far as that is concerned, I would have voted for the report. I object to the amendment for the ten sloop-of-war.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object to debate.

Mr. STANTON. I move that the House further insist upon its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. MORGAN. If it is in order, I will withdraw my motion and move for a new committee of conference.

Mr. STANTON. It is surely in order for the House to further insist, and to ask for another committee of conference. I make the motion.

The SPEAKER proceeded to divide the House upon Mr. STANTON's motion.

Mr. SICKLES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. MASON. I had a proposition before the House, by unanimous consent, I believe.

Mr. COLFAX. I rise to a question of order. The vote was being taken before the gentleman from New York rose and moved to adjourn.

Mr. SICKLES. I moved to adjourn before the report of the committee of conference was made; and I renewed it before the vote was announced.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York addressed the Chair while the Chair was putting the question.

Mr. MASON. I had the floor by unanimous consent.

Mr. SICKLES. I have no desire to press the motion to adjourn against the general sense of the House.

Mr. BURNETT. I rose for the purpose of moving an adjournment before the question was put; but understanding that the gentleman from New York had made the motion, I refrained from making it.

Mr. SICKLES. I insist upon my motion.

Mr. STANTON. The Chair had divided the House, and propounded the question on both sides, and the gentleman cannot move to adjourn until the result is announced.

Mr. SICKLES. Before the motion was made by the gentleman from Ohio, I moved to adjourn, but the Speaker took his seat because it was impossible to put the question in the great disorder in the House. The motion to adjourn is without prejudice to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, for that can be acted upon to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York moved to adjourn, but the Chair did not recognize the motion until the Chair had propounded the affirmative and negative. The result was not announced, as a division was called which suspended the announcement. The Chair supposes now that it is competent for the gentleman, before the division takes place, to move to adjourn.

Mr. SICKLES. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. HOUSTON. If this bill is not acted upon finally by the House to-night it will result in keeping Congress in session for the greater part of next week.

Mr. GROW. The Senate have adjourned.

Mr. HOUSTON. True; but if the House can agree to this report, the bill will be presented to the House to-morrow morning in a shape to be signed, and send it to the President.

Mr. HOPKINS. I rise to make a motion which takes precedence of the motion to adjourn. I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet at nine o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I do not think it is of any use to do that, because absent members will not know it, and we shall not have a quorum.

The SPEAKER. In the opinion of the Chair the motion of the gentleman from Virginia will not take precedence of the motion to adjourn.

The question was taken on the motion to adjourn; and it was not agreed to.

Mr. COBB. I rise to a privileged question.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio made a privileged motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move that the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was disagreed to be reconsidered.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will entertain that motion, and thinks it takes precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROW. Does that cut off the gentleman from Ohio from his rights?

The SPEAKER. The reason why the Chair entertains the motion is, that action upon that motion may result in not ordering another committee of conference.

Mr. GROW. But the Chair was dividing the House upon the motion of the gentleman from Ohio. That was business not completed. The motion to reconsider might be entered, but could not be called up for action until the other motion is disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks otherwise.

Mr. GROW. Then I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. The gentleman has not the floor for that purpose. I have made the motion for the purpose of stating what I understand to be the question now before the House. There are three amendments in issue between the two Houses. One is to appropriate $50,000 for fitting up at the Brooklyn navy-yard; another is a provision for giving increased compensation to a few clerks at the navy-yard in this city. These two amendments were made by the Senate. The third one is an amendment made by the House to an amendment of the Senate. The Senate propose in their amendment to authorize the construction of five sloop-of-war. The House struck out "five," and inserted "ten." The Senate, by this conference report, propose to recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House. Then I presume there will be no difficulty with the Senate upon that point.

If, then, the action of this House shall be reported to them to-morrow, all they will have to do to pass this bill will be to recede from their amendment appropriating $50,000 for this Brooklyn navy-yard, and their amendment increasing the salaries of those clerks; and then to recede, as they propose to do by this conference report, from their disagreement to the House amendment in reference to these sloop-of-war.

Mr. HOUSTON. Look at the question in issue, Mr. Speaker. Here is the main proposition that has caused the defeat of this bill—the amendment for ten sloop-of-war instead of five—which received a vote in this House of more than two to one. And yet because the committee of conference have secured an action on the part of the Senate by which the Senate agree to that amendment, it is brought in here, and contributes to the defeat of the conference report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If my recollection is right, the ten sloop amendment in the House was agreed to by a majority of one vote.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I am mistaken to that extent. Nevertheless, it was an affirmative vote of the House, and that vote is now to be used by gentlemen as means of defeating the conference report sustaining the action of the House. The principle is the same. Here is a combination of elements made to defeat a conference report which involves, so far as the disagreeing action of the House is concerned, only $50,000 for the work at the New York navy-yard. The House itself put in the amendment for the ten sloop-of-war: therefore that ought not to be entertained against the report of the committee of conference. The other is only used for the purpose of defeating the conference report, and keeping back this bill so that Congress cannot adjourn at the time fixed.

Mr. BLISS. I desire to correct the gentleman's statement. He says that the appropriation for the Brooklyn navy-yard is the reason why we vote against the conference report. So far as I am concerned, it is not the reason. The reason is the appropriation for the sloop-of-war.

Mr. HOUSTON. That is precisely what I object to—that gentlemen should call on the House to defeat a conference report because the committee of conference has not recommended the House to repudiate its own solemnly-recorded vote in favor of a proposition; and that, in order to aid the defeat of this report, other elements are brought in. The $50,000 appropriation for the Brooklyn navy-yard is brought in; and gentlemen oppose the report because of that item, at the very closing of the session, when they may defeat the entire Navy bill or be the means of causing Congress to be called back for an extra session. Now, I say that, in my opinion, this is not the mode for us to legislate. I do not call upon gentlemen to yield up their principles in a contest of this sort.

Mr. WRIGHT, of Tennessee. Are we not paid for stopping here and doing the business; and, therefore, will an extra session be any extra expense to the Government?

Mr. HOUSTON. That is a matter of no earthly importance to gentlemen who propose to legislate for the benefit of the country. The sense of the House and of the Senate has been expressed in favor of an adjournment next Monday, and it is a matter of no consequence whether we meet here at our own expense or at the expense of the Government. But for the information of my friend from Tennessee, I tell him that we cannot have an extra session without its costing the Government more than fifty thousand dollars. None of this money will go into his pocket or into mine, but such expense is a necessary incident to an extra session. The various modes and means of expenditure will make the cost largely over fifty thousand dollars, so that the gentleman's argument is not a tenable one.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I think the conference report ought to be adopted, and adopted to-night. But, with a view to obtain the vote of a full House, I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. GROW. I hope the gentleman will withdraw that motion. There are two other bills in committee.

Mr. HOUSTON. Then I withdraw the motion, and ask for a vote on the motion to reconsider.

Mr. GROW. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. FLORENCE. On that I call for the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. As I have attained my object, I withdraw the motion to reconsider.

Mr. COBB. I renew the motion to reconsider. Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move the previous question upon that motion.

Mr. WINSLOW. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to—

Mr. CURTIS. I insist on the motion to adjourn.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion so that I may move that the House adjourn to meet at ten o'clock to-morrow morning.

Mr. CURTIS. I withdraw it for that purpose. Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I make that motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. There is a motion to suspend the rules pending.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If we adjourn now we need not put ourselves to the trouble of meeting at an early hour in the morning. It cannot make any very great difference, as the session will have to be extended.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I hope we will get through with this business to-night. We will have the loan bill up to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS. I will modify my motion by moving that the House adjourn until ten o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That motion cannot be entertained except by unanimous consent.

Mr. FLORENCE. I object.

Mr. CURTIS. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. GROW. I hope we shall not waste time in talking on these motions.

Mr. CURTIS. Well, I withdraw it.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. CURTIS. I have not withdrawn my motion to adjourn.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. The gentleman certainly withdrew it and took his seat.

The SPEAKER. The Chair understood the gentleman from Iowa to withdraw his motion.

Mr. CURTIS. No, sir; I did not.

The SPEAKER. Then the Chair stands corrected.

Mr. TALBOT demanded tellers on the motion to adjourn.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. ABBOTT and TALBOT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported, ayes 45, noes 83.

So the House refused to adjourn.

The question recurred upon Mr. GROW's motion to lay upon the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was rejected.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I wish to make an inquiry as to the effect of this vote. If we should lay the motion to reconsider upon the table, would it then be in order to move for a new committee of conference?

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it would. Mr. RUSSELL demanded tellers on Mr. GROW's motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. DEAN and BURNETT were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 60, noes 66.

So the House refused to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays on the motion to reconsider.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 68, noes 61.

So the motion to reconsider was agreed to.

The question then recurred on the adoption of the conference report?

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—ayes 64, nays 71; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Andrews, Avery, Barksdale, Bock, Bowler, Boyce, Bryan, Burlingame, Cavanaugh, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, John Cochrane, Collins, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gillis, Groesbeck, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Macley, Milson, Niblack, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Pike, Quinman, Reilly, Rufin, Russell, Sandridge, Seales, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Whiteley, Winslow, and Wortendyke—61.

NAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Atkins, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bliss, Bratton, Buffinton, Case, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Durfee, Edie, Fenton, Gooch, Goodwin, Granger, Grow, J. Morrison, Harris, Hoard, Horton, Kellogg, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Humphrey Mar-hall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Olin, Palmer, Parker, John S. Phelps, Potter, Pottle, Powell, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Savage, Spinner, Stanton, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Waldron, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and John V. Wright—71.

So the report was rejected.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. STEWART, of Pennsylvania, stated that he had paired off with Mr. BOWHAM.

Mr. KEITT. I am satisfied that the session must go into next week. I have been trying to avoid it as long as I could. I move that the House adjourn.

The House divided, and there were—ayes 62, noes 68.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GROW. What objection can there be to the appointment of another committee of conference?

Mr. BOCK. I object to the gentleman debating the question out of order.

Mr. HOPKINS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. OWEN JONES and DEAN were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-six, noes not counted.

So the motion was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I move that there be a call of the House.

The motion was not agreed to.

The question recurring upon the motion that another committee of conference be appointed, it was put, and agreed to; and Mr. WINSLOW, Mr. GROESBECK, and Mr. WASHBURNE of Illinois, were appointed as such committee on the part of the House.

And then, on motion of Mr. MORGAN, (at one o'clock, a. m.,) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

SATURDAY, June 12, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. J. L. ELLIOTT.

Mr. HUNTER. It is so near the end of the session that I will make a motion which, I believe, I never made before, to dispense with the reading of the Journal.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It requires unanimous consent to dispense with the reading of the Journal. The Chair hears no objection.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House agreed to some, and disagreed to other amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

The Senate proceeded to consider its first, second, third, eighth, and ninth amendments to the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, which had been disagreed to by the House of Representatives; and, on motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate insisted on these amendments, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. GWIN, Mr. CRITTENDEN, and Mr. JOHNSON of Arkansas, were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

A subsequent message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House insisted on its disagreement to certain amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and had agreed to the conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and had appointed Mr. H. C. BARNETT, Mr. C. C. BILLINGHURST, and Mr. E. CORNING, managers of the same on its part.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 200) making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and it was signed by the Vice President.

ARMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest that, in order to get those bills enrolled, which are almost finished, we allow the committees of conference on the Army bill and supplemental Indian bill to report.

Mr. MALLORY. I object; because we adjourned last night with the report of the committee of conference on the naval bill before the Senate, unacted upon for the want of a quorum, and, in my judgment, we ought not to act on any other conference report until that is disposed of.

Mr. HUNTER. We know—the message will be here in ten minutes, notifying us—that the House of Representatives has rejected the report of the committee of conference on the naval bill. Why should we consume time on that, for no useful purpose? We want to get those bills to the President.

Mr. DAVIS. The House of Representatives have concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the Army bill, and I suppose it is only necessary for us to concur in the message of the House.

Mr. HUNTER. No, sir; we have to act on the report. It is an entire thing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection to receiving the conference report on the Army bill?

Mr. STUART. I shall object to any consideration of the conference report on the naval bill until the bill is here, and I should have done so last night if I had known then that the bill was not here. We see now the importance of proceeding according to rules. The House of Representatives voted down that report last night. We have not the bill here to act on.

Mr. MALLORY. The Senator from Michigan speaks as much without his host now as last night. The naval bill was here when the report was made.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must call the attention of Senators to the fact that the question is on receiving the report of the committee of conference on the Army bill. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. DAVIS. I present the report.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senate by general consent may take a vote on it as a whole, as it has been concurred in by the House.

Mr. ALLEN. It had better be read. We ought to know what it is.

The Secretary read the report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, have met, and, after a full and free conference, have agreed to recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from their sixteenth, seventeenth, eighteenth, twentieth, twenty-first, twenty-fourth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, twenty-ninth, thirty-second, thirty-fourth, thirty-fifth, forty-fifth, forty-sixth, forty-seventh, forty-eighth, and forty-ninth amendments disagreed to by the House.

That the House recede from their disagreement to, and concur in, the first, nineteenth, thirty-sixth, thirty-eighth, fortieth, and forty-third amendments of the Senate.

That the House recede from their disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: in the fourth line of said amendment strike out "forty-five," and insert "twenty-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same, with the following amendment: in line ten of said amendment of the Senate strike out all after the word "War" to the end of the amendment, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following: "and at his discretion in applying to the old or new arms any recent improvement in the mode of priming."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-second amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "fifty," and insert "forty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-third amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-fifth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the twenty-sixth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirtieth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "one hundred," and insert "seventy-five."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty-first amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "two hundred," and insert "one hundred and fifty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty third amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "one hundred and fifty thousand," and insert "one hundred and twelve thousand five hundred."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the thirty seventh amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: strike out "fifty," and insert "thirty."

That the House recede from their disagreement to the forty-second amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with the following amendment: in the fourth line of said amendment strike out the words "for printing."

That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the amendment of the House to the forty first amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same.

JEFFERSON DAVIS,
JOHN SLIDELL,
J. COLLAMER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.
J. A. QUITMAN,
MARTIN J. CRAWFORD,
B. STANTON,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

SUPPLEMENTAL INDIAN BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, informed the Senate that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 557), making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending the 30th June, 1859.

Mr. HUNTER. I believe the chairman of that committee of conference is ready to report.

Mr. BRIGHT submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House to its thirtieth amendment, and concur in the same.

That the Senate recede from its twenty-sixth, twenty-seventh, twenty-eighth, and twenty-ninth amendments.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the third amendment of the Senate, and agree to the same, with an amendment as follows: in the fourth line of said amendment strike out the word "March," and insert "August."

W. K. SEBASTIAN,
H. M. RICE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

JAMES B. CLAY,
Managers on the part of the House.

The report was concurred in.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had disagreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and asked a further conference on the said disagreeing votes, and had appointed Mr. WARREN WINSLOW, Mr. W. S. GROESBECK, and Mr. E. B. WASHBURN, managers at the same on its part.

Mr. HUNTER. I understand the Senator from Florida desires to submit a motion to recede in regard to the naval bill.

Mr. MALLORY. The report of the committee of conference was read last night to a very thin Senate. I ask that it be read again. ["Oh, no!"]

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to make an appeal to the Senator from Florida. We know we are to take the vote on the Indiana case at twelve o'clock. Let the Senator from Florida submit his motion, and take the sense of the Senate in regard to it without debate; but if we are to have the report read, and a debate on that, we shall spend half the day on the naval appropriation bill.

Mr. MALLORY. It is very extraordinary that we have to suspend the reading of the Journal of the Senate; and not a Senator here can know what was transacted yesterday, unless, after the Senate adjourns, he should take an opportunity to go to the clerks and get the Journal and read it. It is very surprising that an objection should be made even to an explanation, simply because a day for ad-journalment has been fixed for the convenience of a portion of Congress, and we are to hurry through with the business of the Senate to meet that end. I desire to make a motion without unnecessarily consuming time, that the Senate recede from all its amendments to the naval appropriation bill, except one which the House amended in regard to the sloop-of-war. The vote of the Senate was for five sloops, and the House provided for ten. I desire the Senate to agree to that amendment of the House; and I propose to recede from our other amendments to which the House disagreed; and I have a few words to say in explanation of this motion.

I should have proposed this course last night, but those who were here will recollect that at the time of the adjournment we found there were but twenty-three Senators present, and I was indisposed to say a word with so thin a body; but I should now like to explain to the Senate why we ought to agree to the proposition of the House in regard to the additional sloop-of-war. The honorable Senator from Michigan, [Mr. STUART,] in discussing this measure, took the opportunity to deliver somewhat of a lecture to the committee of conference, and the lecture was delivered in that tone and manner which would have been offensive did I not know the general good feeling and courtesy of that gentleman. He said that, with twenty-three of us here, we could reform this bill and pass a new bill, in four hours, at any time. The committee of conference agreed to the amendment of the House for ten sloops instead of five, because it supposed it was representing the feeling of the Senate. The honorable Senator from Michigan is generally as accurate as any other Senator, but his inaccuracy on this point was only equaled by the boldness of his assertions. He said it had been twice voted down upon a direct vote of the Senate. Sir, the exact reverse is the case. I hold the yeas and nays in my hand. The first vote of the Senate was on a direct proposition made by the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. HALE] to strike out four sloops, as reported by the committee, so as to leave only the five originally reported by a separate bill. The vote on that motion was 22 for striking out and 31 against it. There were eleven absent. That tested the sense of the Senate in favor of the ten sloops. The next vote taken in Committee of the Whole was, whether the ten sloops should be in the bill, and there was a majority of four against it, there being forty-four Senators present. There were fifty-three present before.

Mr. HALE. I know the Senator does not mean to misrepresent the action of the Senate, of course; but did not a portion of these gentlemen who voted against striking out the four sloops, also vote against the whole; thereby not showing, as the Senator would intimate, that it was because they wanted the ten sloops, but because they wanted the distinct vote on the original amendment, thinking in that way they might defeat the whole?

Mr. MALLORY. I do not know what their motives were.

Mr. HALE. But does not the record show that they voted against the ten sloops afterwards?

Mr. MALLORY. The third vote was, in the Senate, 19 to 17, a very thin Senate, as was properly observed by the Senator from Michigan—thirty-six present and twenty-eight absent. The Senator from Michigan last night took occasion to say that this committee of conference (and, with the exception of myself, it was composed of gentlemen who have the public weal as much at heart as he has, and, I presume, understand the subject as well as he does) had misrepresented the feeling of the Senate, and that the Senate had twice voted down the proposition directly. The facts do not sustain him.

I desire the Senate to listen to a few words in favor of the proposition for ten sloops-of-war. That was the recommendation of the Department before we had any word of any existing necessity for an increase of our Navy at all, as a measure of peace; and upon that estimate and recommendation of the Department I took the subject into consideration, and have paid some attention to it, and I am convinced that public economy, that the wants of the country, that the service of the Navy, and our treaty stipulations, will all be best subserved by providing for the construction of these ten small vessels, and I will proceed to show you the reason in a few words.

We have not a single steam cruiser on the coast of Africa—not one that we can send there; and it is well known that one small steam cruiser drawing seven and a half feet of water is worth all the fleet we send there to protect our flag against infraction in regard to the slave trade. We have not a single small steam cruiser that we can send to the coast of Cuba to protect our flag in the same way. It is well known that one small steam cruiser would do more service than any two large frigates we have got. We do not want large frigates to protect our flag in this respect. It ought to be a satisfaction to the Senate to know that we can sail seven of these small vessels at the same expense as two large ones. We can sail seven vessels of the size of the Fulton, whose expenses are $57,000 a year, at the same cost as two of our large vessels, whose expenses are $174,000; and we can have fourteen of them at the same expense as four large vessels. If we should have these ten vessels, we can then either withdraw our large vessels from our fleets, and keep them for emergency, or keep them for foreign service entirely.

I shall not now detain the Senate by going over the list of vessels we have afloat; but having paid some little attention to the condition of the Navy, I can assure the Senate that there is a great deal of propriety in the complaint of Great Britain, that our flag is prostituted for the slave trade, and the very document now on your table, sent in by the Secretary of State not three weeks ago, shows that at least one vessel captured must inevitably have been a slaver bound outwards, and every gentleman who knows anything of the subject, who has ever given any attention to the cargoes of slave vessels, must come to the conclusion that that vessel, at least, was designed for the slave trade. She carried the American flag. We have large frigates of forty guns on our coast; but we have not got a vessel fit for the purpose of stationing on the coast of Cuba or the coast of Africa, to take care of the interests of our flag in that respect. Let us not suppose that any news we get from Great Britain by the newspapers is altogether reliable. Just so long as we do not keep vessels on the coast of Cuba to do our duty and search our suspected vessels, Great Britain will do it, as she has done it ever since the Ashburton treaty. There is nothing new in the recent occurrences, but they are remarkable because so many instances have occurred in a brief period. The British officers are acting under the same order under which they have acted for the last ten years; no new orders have been given to them; they are doing now what they have been doing for ten years past, and what they will continue to do, unless we ourselves shall do our duty, and send out these small steamers. I shall not occupy the attention of the Senate longer.

Mr. STUART. I do not know which most to regret, the remarks of my friend from Florida, or what I said myself. If the Senator has given a proper interpretation to what I said, I certainly must have been very incorrect; but I have noticed on several occasions that, when anything is said disagreeing with the sentiments of other Senators, it is very common to say it is an attempt to lecture the Senate; and yet, sir, I never found a Senator who had any idea of lecturing the Senate, and never heard of one. The Senator from Florida, however, does but justice to my motives and my intentions. I said this—and I intended to say it with great respect—I think there is no Senator who will deny it—that it is the clear duty of a conference committee to represent the wish of the body that appoints it. On a question that is in dispute between the two Houses, no matter what is the sentiment of an individual on the conference committee, his duty undoubtedly is to represent the will of the body that appoints him. Let me illustrate: there are sometimes a hundred amendments to one appropriation bill, frequently fifty. I suppose it would be impossible to find three Senators whose individual opinions agreed with the vote of the Senate on each and every question; and therefore, if a Senator on the committee is to carry out his own opinion, he would go against the views of a majority of the Senate in half the cases. Certainly, that cannot be his duty.

On this question I spoke last night, from recolection, and I think now that in some form the Senate was brought to a vote twice on the proposition to add to the steam sloop, and voted it down twice. The Senator has examined the record, and undoubtedly he is correct, and it seems, from his statement, that the Senate voted it down but once. It is confessed that once they did vote it down on the yeas and nays. What, then, was the sense of the Senate on the question of providing for ten sloop-of-war? Against it. All I said, all I intended to say, was that if the Senate still retained their opinion, if that was their judgment, they should reject the proposition because it disagreed with their sense. It appears now that the House of Representatives has voted it down also. I understand, from the papers, that there was a long debate in the House of Representatives on two propositions connected with this bill—these sloop, and some grading at Brooklyn, and that upon both those propositions the House was brought to a vote, and voted against them. Now, why should we adopt it? The Senate has voted against the ten sloop, and the last vote of the House on the report of the committee of conference is against the ten sloop. Why should we agree to them?

I will not make any extended remarks. My object in rising was simply to say that there would be no injury in voting down this report and having another conference; and we ought certainly to do one of two things. As the House of Representatives has rejected the conference report, if we recede from the amendments so far as the Senator from Florida has proposed, we should certainly include the one in regard to sloop. We should not retain the thing we voted against and recede from that which we voted for; nor should we retain what the House has joined us in voting against.

Mr. MALLORY. I wish to interrupt my friend for a moment, to say that I think he is mistaken. The House voted on the report in gross, and did not vote on the amendments in detail.

Mr. STUART. They voted on the report as a whole, of course; for they could not vote for it in any other way; but I say the opposition was to the sloop, and to the $50,000 appropriation for grading at Brooklyn. This being the fact, if the Senate recede at all, I submit they should recede from the whole; and they certainly should recede from the sloop amendment if they entertain the opinion they had before. At all events, let us have a vote.

Mr. SLIDELL. I would suggest to the chairman of the Naval Committee that it would be well to postpone the consideration of this subject until after the Indiana case has been disposed of; and in the meanwhile I ask the consent of the Senate to allow a message from the President of the United States, which is on the table, to be read. That may, perhaps, influence our action in this and other matters.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. Foot in the chair.) The Chair will take that to be the sense of the Senate, and will present the message and have it read.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

The Secretary read the message; as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I feel it to be an indispensable duty to call your attention to the condition of the Treasury. On the 19th day of May last, the Secretary of the Treasury submitted a report to Congress "on the present condition of the finances of the Government." In this report he states that, after a call upon the heads of Departments, he had received official information that the sum of $37,000,000 would probably be required during the first two quarters of the next fiscal year, from the 1st of July until the 1st of January. "This sum," the Secretary says, "does not include such amounts as may be appropriated by Congress over and above the estimates submitted to them by the Departments, and I have no data on which to estimate for such expenditures. Upon this point Congress is better able to form a correct opinion than I am."

The Secretary then estimates that the receipts into the Treasury from all sources, between the 1st of July and the 1st of January, would amount to $25,000,000, leaving a deficit of $15,000,000, inclusive of the sum of about three million dollars, the least amount required to be in the Treasury at all times to secure its successful operation. For this amount he recommends a loan. This loan, it will be observed, was required, after a close calculation, to meet the estimates from the different Departments; and not such appropriations as might be made by Congress over and above these estimates.

There was embraced in this sum of $15,000,000 estimates to the amount of about one million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the three volunteer regiments, authorized by the act of Congress approved April 7, 1858; for two of which, if not for the third, no appropriation will now be required. To this extent a portion of the loan of $15,000,000 may be applied to pay the appropriations made by Congress beyond the estimates from the different Departments, referred to in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

To what extent a probable deficiency may exist in the Treasury between the 1st of July and the 1st of January next, cannot be ascertained until the appropriation bills, as well as the private bills containing appropriations shall have finally passed.

Adversity teaches useful lessons to nations as well as individuals. The habit of extravagant expenditures, fostered by a large surplus in the Treasury, must now be corrected, or the country will be involved in serious financial difficulties.

Under any form of government, extravagance in expenditure must be the natural consequence, when those who authorize the expenditure feel no responsibility in providing the means of payment. Such had been, for a number of years, our condition previously to the late monetary revulsion in the country. Fortunately, at least for the cause of public economy, the case is now reversed; and to the extent of the appropriations, whatever these may be, ingrafted on the different appropriation bills, as well as those made by private bills, over and above the estimates of the different Departments, it will be necessary for Congress to provide the means of payment before their adjournment. Without this, the Treasury will be exhausted before the 1st of January, and the public credit will be seriously impaired. This disgrace must not fall upon the country.

It is impossible for me, however, now to ascertain this amount; nor does there at present seem to be the least probability that this can be done, and the necessary means provided by Congress to meet any deficiency which may exist in the Treasury before Monday next at twelve o'clock, the hour fixed for adjournment, it being now Saturday morning at half past eleven o'clock. To accomplish this object, the appropriation bills, as they shall have finally passed Congress, must be before me, and time must be allowed to ascertain the amount of the moneys appropriated, and to enable Congress to provide the necessary means. At this writing it is understood that several of these bills are yet before the committees of conference, and the amendments to some of them have not even been printed.

Foreseeing that such a state of things might exist at the close of the session, I stated, in the annual message to Congress, of December last, that "from the practice of Congress such an examination of each bill as the Constitution requires has been rendered impossible. The most important business of each session is generally crowded into its last hours, and the alternative presented to the President is either to violate the constitutional duty which he owes to the people, and approve bills which, for want of time, it is impossible he should have examined, or, by his refusal to do this, subject the country and individuals to great loss and inconvenience."

"For my own part, I have deliberately determined that I shall approve no bills which I have not examined; and it will be a case of extreme and most urgent necessity which shall ever induce me to depart from this rule."

The present condition of the Treasury absolutely requires that I should adhere to this resolution on the present occasion, for the reasons which I have heretofore presented.

In former times, it was believed to be the true character of an appropriation bill simply to carry into effect existing laws and the established policy of the country. A practice has, however, grown up of late years to ingraft on such bills, at the last hours of the session, large appropriations for new and important objects not provided for by pre-existing laws, and when no time is left to the Executive for their examination and investigation. No alternative is thus left to the President but either to approve measures without examination, or, by vetoing an appropriation bill, seriously to embarrass the operations of the Government. This practice could never have prevailed without a surplus in the Treasury sufficient large to cover an indefinite amount of appropriations. Necessity now compels us to arrest it, at least so far as to afford time to ascertain the amount appropriated, and to provide the means of its payment.

For all these reasons, I recommend to Congress to postpone the day of adjournment for a brief period. I promise that not an hour shall be lost in ascertaining the amount of appropriations made by them for which it will be necessary to provide. I know it will be inconvenient for the members to attend a called session, and this, above all things, I desire to avoid. JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 12, 1858.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that the message lie on the table, and be printed. We shall have an opportunity hereafter of considering the question there submitted as to the postponement of the day of adjournment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The message will lie on the table. The motion to print it will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The message should go to the public; and the Committee on Printing authorize me to report at once in favor of the motion to print it.

The motion was agreed to.

SUSPENSION OF RULES.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the resolution of the Senate for a suspension of the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses for the remainder of the present session.

INDIANA SENATORIAL ELECTION.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The hour has arrived for the consideration of the special order, being the question of privilege in regard to the Indiana senatorial election, the pending question being on the motion of the Senator from Illinois [Mr. TRUMBULL] to amend the amendment of the Senator from Maine [Mr. HAMLIN] by adding to it:

That, in the opinion of the Senate, no election of a member of this body made by the Legislature of a State consisting of two branches is valid when made in a meeting of individual members of both, unless such meeting for that purpose was prescribed by law, or had been previously agreed to by each House acting separately in its organized capacity, or is participated in by a majority of the members of each House, or is subsequently ratified in some form by each House in its organized capacity.

Mr. TRUMBULL called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 26; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Iverson, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—26.

So the amendment to the amendment was rejected; and the question recurred on Mr. HAMLIN's amendment to strike out all after the word "resolved," in the resolution of the Judiciary Committee, and insert:

That the case of JESSE D. BRIGHT and GRAHAM N. FITCH be recommended to the Committee on the Judiciary, with instructions to report specially the grounds on which the resolution is based declaring said BRIGHT and FITCH elected.

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered, and taken, with the following result:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Clark, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hamlin, Harlan, King, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—16.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—34.

So the amendment was rejected; and the question recurred on the following resolution reported by the Judiciary Committee:

Resolved, That GRAHAM N. FITCH and JESSE D. BRIGHT, Senators returned and admitted from the State of Indiana, are entitled to the seats which they now hold in the Senate as such Senators aforesaid—the former until the 4th of March, 1861, and the latter until the 4th of March, 1863, according to the tenor of their respective credentials.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I move to amend the resolution by inserting the word "not" before "entitled."

Mr. GREEN. I suggest that it amounts to the same thing as voting against the resolution.

Mr. COLLAMER. It does not amount to the same thing.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I apprehend this is the only way to settle the question definitely.

Mr. MASON. I am aware of the general understanding, in which I acquiesced last night, that there should be no debate on this question to-day; and I shall not, of course, say anything; but I wish to remark that I had desired and intended to state the reasons which govern me, but I am precluded by an agreement to which I was a party.

Mr. SEWARD. I call for the yeas and nays on this question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BELL. I desire to state that I have paired off with one of the Senators from Minnesota, Mr. SHIELDS. I was authorized to state that, if he were here he would vote in favor of the sitting members from Indiana retaining their seats. If I were at liberty to vote, I should vote against them.

The question being taken on Mr. TRUMBULL's amendment, resulted—yeas 23, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Dixon, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, King, Mason, Pearce, Seward, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitzpatrick, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—30.

So the amendment was rejected.

The resolution was agreed to.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WADE. I move to take up—

Mr. HUNTER. I will suggest that the conference report on the naval bill was laid aside informally. If the Senator from Ohio wants to get away by Monday evening he had better let us get the appropriation bills to the President to-day. I still entertain hopes that we may get off by Monday evening, if we can get these bills to him to-day so that he may examine them.

Mr. WADE. There is a resolution of the House which I am very anxious to have taken up and acted upon.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that what has been done heretofore has been by unanimous consent; and if any Senator moves to take up a bill, at this time, before the call for petitions and reports is concluded, it must be by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUNTER. I shall not object to the motion of the Senator from Ohio, after we dispose of the conference report. I want to get these bills into the hands of the President. I understand that the pending question in regard to the naval appropriation bill is the motion of the Senator from Florida to recede from the amendment in regard to the New York navy-yard, and to agree to the House amendment to the Senate amendment with reference to the steam sloop-of-war.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The naval appropriation bill is now before the Senate, as it was taken up before by unanimous consent.

Mr. HUNTER. If the motion of the Senator from Florida should prevail, the bill would then be closed, and all we should have to do would be to send a message to the House of Representatives communicating our action. If, on the other hand, his motion should not carry, it will then be necessary to ask for another committee of conference, and settle the bill in that way.

Mr. STUART. I suppose it will be necessary to take these questions separately.

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly. Let us take it on the sloop first.

Mr. MALLORY. No; on the other first.

Mr. HUNTER. Well, take it on the other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is moved and seconded that the Senate recede from its amendment appropriating $50,000 for the navy-yard at Brooklyn.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. The question now, I suppose, is on the motion made by the Senator from Florida to agree to the House amendment to the Senate amendment in regard to the sloop, putting it at ten instead of five. I shall vote against that motion.

Mr. STUART. I desire to submit a motion which will supersede that; and it is, that the Senate recede from its amendment in regard to the sloop, and on that question I ask the yeas and nays.

Mr. HUNTER. I voted against all these sloop; but I am not certain that the motion of the Senator from Michigan can be made, because the House of Representatives have agreed to our amendment, for five sloop, with an amendment, and all that is left for us to say is, whether we disagree to their amendment or not. The provision for five sloop is now in the bill, as I understand, by the joint action of both Houses.

Mr. STUART. I understand that they have substituted ten for five; that is the way the bill stands.

Mr. HUNTER. I thought it was an addition, but if it stands as a substitute, the Senator is right.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The amendment will be read.

The Secretary read the amendment, as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Navy cause to be constructed, as speedily as may be consistent with the public interests, five steam screw sloop-of-war, with full steam power, whose greatest draught of water shall not exceed fourteen feet, which ships shall combine the heaviest armament and greatest speed compatible with their character and tonnage; and one side-wheel war steamer, whose greatest draught shall not exceed eight feet, armed and provided for service in the China seas; and that there be, and is hereby, appropriated, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of the Navy, for the purpose above specified, the sum of $1,200,000, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The House amendment was to strike out "five" and insert "ten."

Mr. HUNTER. The effect of the motion of the Senator from Michigan would be to strike out the whole provision for sloop, and it is in order.

Mr. MALLORY. I submit that the motion of the Senator from Michigan cannot be in order. The provision for five sloop is already in the bill by the action of the two Houses.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion of the Senator from Florida is to agree to the House amendment. That supersedes the motion of the Senator from Michigan, in the opinion of the Chair.

Mr. STUART. How can it?

Mr. HUNTER. Either motion will close the bill.

Mr. STUART. But if the Senate recedes from its amendment, there is no point of disagreement left.

Mr. HUNTER. But the motion of the Senator from Florida would close the bill, and among motions which close the bill, the first made is to be first put.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks the motion of the Senator from Florida is in order.

Mr. STUART. I ask for the yeas and nays on it.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 26, nays 30; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clingman, Crittenden, Douglas, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Kennedy, Mallory, Mason, Reid, Sebastian, Simmons, Shidell, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—26.

NAYS—Messrs. Broderick, Chandler, Clark, Collamer, Davis, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Earlan, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, King, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Stuart, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—30.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move that the Senate insist on its disagreement to the House amendment to their amendment in relation to the sloop-of-war, and also agree to the request of the House for another conference; and insist on their other amendments to which the House has disagreed, if there be any such.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. PEARCE, Mr. THOMSON of New Jersey, and Mr. FOSTER, were appointed the second committee of conference.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and

An act making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending 30th June, 1859.

MAIL STEAMER BILL.

Mr. YULEE, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers, and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, reported that the committee were unable to agree. He moved that the Senate further insist on its amendments, and ask for a further conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. HAMMOND, HALE, and MALLORY, were appointed the committee on the part of the Senate.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, afterwards announced that the House insisted upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers, and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. DANIEL E. SICKLES, Mr. RICHARD MOTT, and Mr. M. R. H. GARNETT, managers at the same on its part. A subsequent message announced that Mr. JOHN C. KUNKEL had been appointed in the place of Mr. MOTT.

POST ROUTE BILL.

Mr. YULEE. I am directed by the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 585) to establish certain post roads, to report it back with amendments. I will state, as it may render unnecessary the reading of all the amendments, that they are simply the establishment of post routes, nothing else, with the exception of this one amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be authorized to make such arrangements for the transportation of the great through mails between Portland and New Orleans, as will insure the most speedy and certain connection, including in the route for one of the daily mails, as many of the sea-board commercial cities as may be consistent with the greatest dispatch.

It is not a direction, only an authority.

Mr. HUNTER. Authority to do what?

Mr. YULEE. To provide for the speediest transportation of the mails between Portland and New Orleans.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) The Chair hears no objection to the consideration of this bill. It is before the Senate as in Committee of the Whole.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not mean to debate the bill; I would not debate anything at this time of the session. I merely say that, so far as I am concerned, I will not vote for any new post route bills, unless you raise the postage, so as to make the Department self-sustaining.

The bill was reported to the Senate, the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had agreed to the second and third amendments, and disagreed to the fourth amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, and agreed to the first amendment of the Senate to the said bill, with an amendment.

MILITARY ASYLUM.

Mr. HALE. I move that the select committee on the Military Asylum have leave to report next session. We do not ask any power to sit during the recess, but we have not completed our investigations, and we want to report at the next session.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. There is one appropriation bill on which the Senate will have to act, the Indian deficiency bill, and I now move that it be taken up and disposed of.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 555) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1858; the question pending being of the following amendment of Mr. Houston:

And be it further enacted, That the superintendent and agents within the superintendency of Texas shall be hereafter appointed in the same manner as other superintendents and agents are appointed and confirmed; and that the Wichita agency is hereby attached to the superintendency of Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON. I regret exceedingly that my voice is so much impaired by cold and hoarseness that it will be impossible for me to do full justice to this subject. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Arkansas to it. The other evening, understanding that he objected to my amendment, I desired him to explain the reasons for his opposition, in order that I might occupy as little time as possible in answering him. I now repeat the request, and ask the Senator to state the grounds of objection.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. On the invitation of the Senator from Texas, I will state what I understand to be the objection to the amendment which he has offered; and as this is certainly no occasion for long speeches, I will confine myself as strictly as I can to the performance of that duty with as few words as possible. The proposition of the Senator from Texas is to take that section of country which lies between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degrees of west longitude, from the southern Indian superintendency, and transfer it to what is called the Texas superintendency. Texas has but few Indians of her own; this Government owns no land there; there is no superintendency there; but they have a principal agent and two subordinates. The proposition is to take this section of country from the southern superintendency and place it under the Texas superintendency. I will state briefly the objection to it, and then submit the papers from the Department, which can be read, and which will show to the Senate the policy of the Government in this regard.

The country between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degrees of west longitude is part of the Choctaw country. Those Indians, we know, are exceedingly jealous of their rights. This section of country, it will be found by reading the treaty of 1855, is actually subject to the laws of the Choctaw people. The Department think it bad policy that a portion of that country, subject to the same Indian laws, and belonging to the same Indian tribe, should be placed under a distinct, perhaps a hostile, certainly a rival superintendency. The Department think it would destroy unity in the decisions, it would be calculated to breed strife on the borders, and it would, in all probability, involve the Choctaws, for they would feel themselves at liberty, if their laws were violated, and their rights invaded, to muster their own forces, and march over and expel the Indians who did not conform to their laws. The Department consequently think that the whole country belonging to the Choctaws should be continued in the southern superintendency, and object to the proposition of the Senator from Texas, that that portion of it lying west of the ninety-eighth meridian of longitude shall be placed under an altogether different supervision. I send to the Chair some letters showing the views of the Indian bureau, and I ask that they may be read as concluding all the remarks I see any necessity for my making on this subject at this time.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR, May 31, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 24th instant requesting my opinion as to the propriety of providing by law for the creation of a new Indian superintendency to embrace the Indians of Texas, and those who may be located in the country west of the ninety-eighth meridian leased from the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and whether the creation of such a superintendency would interfere with the rights of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and lead to a conflict of jurisdiction.

The subject was referred to the acting Commissioner of Indian Affairs for examination and report. This was furnished on the 27th instant, and a copy of the same is herewith inclosed.

The Indian office is of opinion, for the reasons stated in the report, that it would be inexpedient to make any change in the present organization of the southern superintendency, and in this I concur.

It will be seen from the report that there are but a small number of these Indians on the reserves in Texas; and that there is a probability that those will be removed. The only Indians who may be considered as permanently located in Texas are those west of the Pecos; and a single agent will suffice for them. There is, therefore, no necessity for the creation of a superintendency in Texas.

Neither can I perceive any good reason for dismembering the southern superintendency, the boundaries of which have been so long established. It is true that the wild tribes who commit depredations on the Texas frontier pass through the territory leased from the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and that their hostile incursions can be effectually checked only by the establishment of a military post and agency; but no change in the organization of the Indian service is necessary to accomplish this result. In addition, there is a positive objection, and a serious one, to the proposed transfer of jurisdiction. The Choctaws have formally protested against it; and it is easy to foresee that if the plan be carried out, much dissatisfaction will be created, and vexatious disputes will arise to embarrass the Department.

It is my opinion, therefore, that no action by Congress, of the character proposed, is required.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

J. THOMPSON, Secretary.

Hon. A. B. GREENWOOD, Chairman of Indian Committee, House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR,
OFFICE INDIAN AFFAIRS, May 27, 1858.

SIR: I have the honor to acknowledge the receipt, by reference from you for a report thereon, of a letter from the chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs of the House of Representatives, dated the 24th instant, requesting the views of the Department on several questions growing out of a bill now before the committee, by which, as I understand, it is proposed to create an additional full superintendency of Indian affairs, to include the Indians of Texas and those to be colonized within what is known as the leased portion of the Choctaw and Chickasaw country, lying between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degrees of west longitude.

The first article of the treaty of June 23, 1855, with the Choctaws and Chickasaws, defines the boundary of their country, which extends west between the Red and Canadian rivers, to the one hundredth degree of west longitude. By the ninth article of that instrument, those Indians "lease to the United States all that portion of their common territory west of the ninety-eighth degree of west longitude for the permanent settlement of the Wichita and such other bands of Indians as the Government may desire to locate thereon," with certain exceptions; "which Indians," it is provided, "shall be subject to the exclusive control of the United States, under such rules and regulations, not inconsistent with the rights and interests of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, as may from time to time be prescribed by the President for their government: Provided, however, That the territory so leased shall remain open to settlement by Choctaws and Chickasaws as heretofore."

It will thus be seen that the Choctaws and Chickasaws made no cession of the district of country referred to, but merely a lease thereof for a specific purpose. It still remains a portion of their country, with the full right on their part to occupy it, except so far as might interfere with the carrying out of the proper and legitimate objects of this lease, as expressed in the treaty. And by virtue of the seventh article of the treaty, the Choctaw government and laws extend over it in the same manner and to the same extent as over any other portion of the country within their jurisdiction, except as to the Wichita and other Indians located or to be located there by the Government, which are to be under the exclusive control of the United States. Such Choctaws and Chickasaws as reside, or may hereafter remove there must continue to be under the charge and supervision of the agent for those tribes, and of course within the present superintendency. To place the country or the Indians there within another superintendency, would be an improper and unsuitable arrangement, that would lead to a conflict of jurisdiction, and consequent embarrassment and difficulty.

The Indians to be located within the leased country will be in charge of the agent specially appointed for them; and, to avoid conflict and embarrassment arising from the jurisdiction of the two agents extending over Indians within the same tract of country, as well as to secure harmony, concert of action, and a homogeneous policy, so far as necessary, both agents and the Indians in their charge should be under the same superintendency.

It would cause great dissatisfaction among the Choctaws and Chickasaws, and be unjust to them, to sever and transfer a portion of their country, and apply it to another, and to them, a foreign jurisdiction; and they have strongly protested, through their agent, against such an arrangement. It would have the effect of procuring their people from emigrating to the leased country, and which the Government should encourage to a proper extent, as, being much more civilized, and disposed to engage in agricultural pursuits, they would set a good example to the wild Indians, and otherwise aid in promoting their civilization and improvement.

It was from the foregoing and other considerations that the Department finally refused, last year, to place the Wichita and other Indians located within the leased portion of the Choctaw and Chickasaw country, together with their agent, under the jurisdiction of the supervising agent in Texas. Further reflection on the subject has only tended to strengthen the views then entertained as to the impolicy and impropriety of the measure.

Circumstances beyond the control of the Department prevented the adoption last year of effective measures for collecting and locating the Indians intended to be colonized within the country in question, though seasonable and proper instructions were issued for the purpose. Further attention will be given to the subject, and such proceedings required to be adopted as, it is hoped, will lead to the accomplishment of the object at an early day, so far as it may prove to be practicable.

With respect to the creation of another superintendency for the Indians in Texas, it is not deemed at all necessary. The present arrangement of three agents, one of whom, called the supervising agent, is invested with all the essential powers and jurisdiction of a superintendent, and with an adequate salary, is regarded as amply sufficient for the control and management of the limited number of Indians in that State. There are now two reservations, about fifty miles apart, upon which some fifteen hundred Indians have been colonized; and the establishment of a third, west of the Pecos river, has been recommended. In view of the proximity of the former, and the limited number of Indians upon them, it is believed that one agent for them would be sufficient; and should these Indians be removed to, and colonized within, the tract of country leased of the Choctaws and Chickasaws—a measure which is deemed to be practicable—a single agent for the remaining Indians of Texas would be all that would probably be necessary.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

CHARLES E. MIX,

Acting Commissioner.

Hon. JACOB THOMPSON, Secretary of the Interior.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope, Mr. President, in the present condition of my voice, there may be something like order maintained in the Senate, so that I may be heard by Senators in behalf of Texas. I believe her security, the preservation of her peace, and the salvation of the lives of her citizens are involved in this question. It is no matter of speculation on the part of Texas; it is no desire of her Senator on this floor to occupy, unnecessarily, a moment of the time of the Senate; but I do it in maintenance of her rights, and that justice may be done and the laws carried out. The section of country to which the Senator from Arkansas has referred, and to which these papers relate, lying between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degrees of west longitude, was acquired from the Choctaw and Chickasaw Indians for the express purpose of colonizing and placing on it the wild Indians within a certain district of country, confining them to reservations, withdrawing them from their predatory habits, and civilizing and humanizing them as fast as possible. For that reason this land was acquired, at a cost of not less than $800,000; $600,000 of the money was given to the Choctaws for their interest in it, and $200,000 to the Chickasaws, in proportion to the population of the respective nations. This tract of country was intended to be settled on by the Indians for the purpose of civilizing them, of restraining them, of controlling them, and of giving protection to the inhabitants of Texas. Ever since the third year after the annexation of that State to this Union, we have heard of an almost uninterrupted series of massacres, of murders, of robberies, and they continue unabated until the present moment. It became the duty and the desire of Texas to call for some protection against the wild and predatory bands of Indians that infest her northern border. She has annoyance enough for the distance of six or eight hundred miles from Indians who are immediately contiguous to her territory and south of the Red river; but the Kioways and Camanches are roaming over the country north of the Red river, and they make predatory excursions on us whenever it suits their convenience. They find a market in Kansas for the horses which they steal from us. This reserve is two degrees, or one hundred and twenty miles, in width. There is no fortress within it. The Indians find an uninterrupted resort to it, and they are permitted to issue forth, after organizing the lawless portions of each band of the northern tribes, to make a raid upon Texas. Have we any protection against it? None on earth. You tell me you have plenty of regular troops there—very regular; regular in doing us no good, giving us no protection, pursuing no Indians, and preventing the incursions of none. This is the way Texas is protected; and if a claim is brought here for money paid out for purposes of defense, it is ruled out of order in the Senate, or the Secretary of War says that there was no occasion for it, because the regular troops were in that country, and therefore he does not recommend that Texas be refunded the money she has paid out to protect her defenseless frontiers. That is the situation of Texas at this moment, and it is to arrest such evils in future that I now advocate this amendment as indispensable to her future security.

This tract of country was acquired for the purpose of colonization, from the Choctaws and Chickasaws. Did they not know for what it was they gave a perpetual lease upon it—for ninety-nine years, I believe? Their inhabitants may settle upon it if they choose to do so, under regulations that the President of the United States may establish there, not reserving any national or tribal right to it whatever; but they may go and settle on it, subject to the regulations which the President of the United States may make. Texas has no sovereignty there, and no claim to the soil; she has unconditionally ceded it, merely reserving to her citizens who choose to locate there, the right of settlement. The Choctaws have not protested against my proposition, though their agent has. What good does it do him? I should like to know what connection he has with Texas. This tract of country lies upon our borders, and an ideal line is all that separates us, and for many miles upon its south and its west, it is bordered by Texas. It is one hundred and fifty or two hundred miles from the Choctaw agent, and it is some forty miles from Fort Arbuckle. Is the fort any protection to it? No; but it is a fact conceded in the Department, that the Indians from the north, making incursions upon Texas, do pass through this reserved territory and make their inroads upon Texas. But, sir, the Choctaw agent is a great man, I suppose; I have not the honor of his acquaintance; but we know that if you give a little power to an individual, and there is any show or display about it, he is very reluctant to yield it up. It curtails his dominion that he has never seen; it appropriates it to a useful purpose—the protection of Texas; but an agent, perhaps, would come within a hundred miles of him and settle, and then there would be somebody to contrast and compare with him, and if we get the one there that we want, I do not know that he will make by the comparison, but I am sure the other will lose nothing. I mean no reflection on the gentleman; I fortunately do not know him; but he has assumed to protest against this in the name of the Choctaw nation. They are just as intelligent as he is, and just as capable of protesting for themselves; but they have not done it, and if they had protested, they would have had no right to do it. They have ceded this territory; it is not theirs; it is the nation's. It was intended to colonize the Indians there; and for what purpose? That they might be brought within the control of proper officers, and that Texas might be redeemed from the suffering of many years. There are regular troops in Texas, but there is no fortress in this reserve. There is no society there for the officers; they cannot have the elegant accommodations that are necessary for officials to enjoy with a handsome salary. There are no splendid mansions there; no elegant society. They cannot go to balls and parties; they cannot enjoy themselves at all. It is not a country suitable for persons of taste! How would you remunerate a man for the sacrifice of his amiability of disposition by giving him $1,500 a year, or the like of that, to serve in such a country? It is perfectly ridiculous, sir! You cannot compensate a man of genius, taste, and refinement, for placing him away out there. Money is not sufficient; but they are very willing to get office, trusting to favoritism and such means as will bring them into agreeable society.

Within the last year I think not less than twelve hundred horses have been stolen from citizens of Texas and the reserve Indians. The trails have been followed; they have gone into this territory to which we have our eyes directed, and in which we wish to see the Indians located, and a regular agency established. The reserve Indians are denounced, because the reserve policy requires more attention on the part of the agents, and they have not so much leisure if they devote themselves to it. The civilized Camanches on the reserves sent out an expedition of their own; and they retook no less than seventy horses, part of their own ponies, many of them public horses, and others belonging to the community surrounding the reservation. They caught these horses in the possession of two Spaniards and two wild Camanches. They were striking through this region to reach Kansas; for there is a market there, and with the civilized Indians bordering upon the route. Gentlemen have told me that they have seen horses which were taken from Texas sold in Kansas as far up as Fort Leavenworth. You must arrest this commerce, or Texas is to be the constant prey of this system of horse-thieving. The Indians of the reserve, by Major Neighbors's permission, under the command of their sub-agent, followed and overtook the horses with two Spaniards and two Camanches. They thought it was unnecessary to be put to the trouble of taking care of all of them; and so they killed the Spaniards and brought in the Camanches, and reported them to the agents. They said to the two wild Indians that their rule was, before they came to the reserve, to kill fellows for such offenses; and they executed them. This may be fearful to a state of good morals; it partakes a little of the lynching system; but I am not sure that it is not a good frontier system in extreme cases. Not long since, Captain Ford pursued the Indians who had stolen some three hundred horses into the very heart of this country purchased from the Choctaws, and there overtook them. He had under him one hundred and two white men, Texas rangers, called out by the State, as necessary to its protection; and he had one hundred and thirty of the reserve Indians, who cultivate the soil, and produce a superabundance for the sustentation of themselves and their families. With these he attacked about four hundred of the Camanches—two to one in number. He killed seventy-six of them and took seventeen prisoners, and retook upwards of three hundred horses.

Tell me, sir, what millions you have expended to support your regular Army since Texas has been annexed to this Union, and that they ever performed half the service to the frontier or made reclamation for wrongs upon Texas equal to this. We are charged with having so many troops quartered upon us, and now there is to be a hesitancy about granting the regiment of rangers. Texas has to protect her own frontier after the generous manifestation of her kindness to the United States in granting reservations on which to locate Indians, prompted by feelings of humanity that she might reclaim men who had betrayed her people, that she might show them the white path of peace, that their minds might become enlightened from culture and education, their habits reformed, and they rendered useful and comfortable, and finally taught the greatest aspiration of intelligence, the conception of a God. She has given you this; and what have the United States done? Have they responded, by exertion on their part; to meet the wishes and the object of Texas? Never. I will show you the feeling that exists on the part of the representatives of this Government—officers educated at public expense by the influence of family and connections. They are the men who, when placed in official situation to render service to the country, forget the duty of a man as well as an officer, and treat the rights of Texas and this Government with contempt. Major Neighbors, anterior to the annexation of Texas, had been an agent for years; he had traveled with the Indians; he was the first explorer that ever found a route directly from the settlements of Texas to El Paso. By traveling with the Indians and associating with them after he was appointed agent, he had their confidence, and they took him where he found water and grass and everything necessary, and he went on comfortably to El Paso by a direct route, which our engineers failed in finding. The access now is easy, with everything necessary for the facilities of travel. For years before annexation we had no bloodshed on our frontier; we had no troops stationed there—not a company; and the President himself had gone up into the interior without a guard of a single man, met the hostile Indians, and treated with them. He had risked his life; he was willing to lay it down to redeem his people and shield them from the uplifted tomahawk. He made peace, and the Indians kept it; and not until after the administration of General Taylor came in and appointed another agent in place of Major Neighbors, was the peace disturbed; and even then for some time peace was maintained on the frontier; but, the agent not going amongst them, and their old confidential friend being withdrawn, the Indians became hostile, and from that moment to the present they have been so. Ten thousand dollars, distributed under the administration of the Texas government, satisfied the Indians, and kept peace from the Red river to the Rio Grande: every dollar was accounted for. Then there was some respect for the suffering frontier; there was some sympathy for the Indian in his nomadic state; there was some respect for humanity, prospective as well as present. There were no salaries given by Texas for the elegant and refined tastes of gentlemen now-a-days. They were a rude people, but they were honest.

There are two reserves, one called the Brazos reserve of four leagues; and about forty miles up the Brazos, along the base of the mountains, is a second reserve of two leagues, granted by Texas to the United States for the occupation of the Indians. At the upper agency there are about one hundred and fifty Indians, and at the lower agency, on the Brazos, about twelve hundred. At the upper agency, being the most exposed situation, there was a force, I think, of two companies, and Captain Evans was in command. Not very long ago, the agent wrote to him that there was danger; that he was appraised by the friendly Indians, and those on the reserve, that the hostile Indians of the north meditated an attack upon them. What did he do? I will show you presently. In the mean time, Camp Cooper, which had been located within the reserve, and not very far from its center, was removed, by way of making a small trading transaction for the benefit of the Government. Camp Cooper was removed under a superior's order, from the land that was given by Texas to the United States, and taken about twelve miles off, by the circuitous route of the road; or eight miles by a pathway from the reserve; taken to a private ranche, private property, with the understanding that all the improvements made there were to be occupied so long as the United States thought proper, and then they were to revert to the owner of the ranche. They had to haul timber some twenty miles to consummate that handsome establishment that was to be made anew. Thus the protection of the fort was withdrawn, not only from the Indians of the reserve, but from the inhabitants who were settling along the reserve, and taken out of the way in a westerly direction not interposing between the inroads of the Indians from the north at all. That ranche was understood to belong to an officer, who had, perhaps, economized sufficiently to purchase a tract of land there, supposing it would aggrandize him and make his prospects a little better. No doubt the United States, after a while, will have a claim for timber and spoiliations upon his property to the amount of $150,000, and he will get it. If it was only fifteen or twenty thousand of an honest claim, he could not get it; but if it be $150,000, he can afford to hire lobby members, and $150,000 would have some influence, while an honest demand of $20,000 would be a contemptible thing that would be kicked out of doors. What does this intelligent gentleman say when he is written to by Captain Leeper, an Indian agent? I will let you see. Mr. Leeper wrote to the Army headquarters, at San Antonio, protesting against the removal of Fort Cooper from the reserve. The answer he received was this:

HEADQUARTERS, DEPARTMENT OF TEXAS,
SAN ANTONIO, April 14, 1858.

SIR: In reply to your communication of the 29th ultimo, relative to the change of site for the military post of Camp Cooper, I am instructed by Colonel Wilson, the department commander, to reply that orders in regard to this matter have been issued; and that should Agent Leeper feel insecure in remaining where he now is, he can move the agency to a position nearer to the new site for the post.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

KENNER GARRARD,
First Lieutenant Second Cavalry,
Acting Assistant Adjutant General,
Major R. S. NEIGHBORS, Supervising Agent Texas Indians,
Comanche Agency, Texas.

So the agency is to be broken up to suit a few companies temporarily there, to stult the taste of officers who wish to benefit individuals by a transfer of the post. That is the spirit that actuates these men. Why should they be accommodating or just to Indian agents? They think the Indians are dogs, and the agent's gradation is only a little better than a dog. Any man who would respond in such a manner to an officer of the Government who would call on him for a necessary and useful purpose, should have a pen dashed through his name; and if I had power, he should not hold his position a moment. I would rebuke him, and I would never rescind my order of degradation. The army complain there that they are not going to be a frontier police. A man who would act in this manner is not fit to head a gang of scavengers on this avenue. That would be elevation to the man—much more than he deserves. What, taunt an officer of the Government by saying "I will do as I please; break up the Indians; disappoint the objects of the Government; abandon the reserve; and if you want protection, go to the fort!" Our rangers have protected us, and the Government owes us $80,000 for giving protection to its posts in Texas. Their regulars cannot protect themselves, except by shutting their gates and keeping the Indians out.

When it was reported that the Indians were coming down in large bodies, another appeal was made. These Indians were the same that Ford has lately whipped. They could not get a supply of provisions for a long time. I do not know that they wanted them, for their supplies are very precarious until they reach Texas, and then they help themselves out of the herds of Texas. This Mr. Evans says to Mr. Leeper, that if the wild Indians were actually fighting on the reserve, and he could get reliable information of the fact, he would then send troops. If they were fighting, and had twelve miles to send them, I should think the fight would be over before they traversed the twelve miles. Infantry march rather slowly, and they would not be disposed to hasten much if they expected a conflict with the Indians when they got to the end of their journey. They would be very apt to get lost, and find their way back to the fort again. [Laughter.]

Sir, I desire the Texas agents to be made permanent, as other agents are. They are now special agents, and are not confirmed by the Senate, as other agents are. It is degrading them; it is treating them as if you had given special favors to them which they were not entitled to, not placing them on a footing with other men occupying the same relations to the Government that they do. That is one object of my amendment. The other object is, to have this reserve—which lies upon our borders, which is on two sides surrounded by our territory, which is separated only one hundred and ten miles from our superintendency, whereas it is two hundred and fifty miles from the superintendency on the Red river, at Fort Smith, with Indian settlements and Indian nations intervening—attached to the Texas superintendency. It is immediately on our borders. The Wichitas and Wacos, and other Indians that inhabit the country where this reserve is, embracing the Wichita mountains, have ever been enemies of Texas for the last twenty-five years, to my certain knowledge. They are there yet. They are intermarried with the Indians of Texas who are upon the reserves, and are being civilized. If intercourse is kept up with them, and they are not under the same superintendency with the Indians of Texas, we shall have no security whatever; we shall be liable, at all times, to inroads from them as for twenty-five years past, and as they have recently made an inroad, in connection with other tribes that Ford had the battle with. I wish to bring these Indians within the control of our agency, which is only a hundred and ten miles from them, to assist them in their intercourse with our Indians, so that they can give to the other reserves intelligence of any hostile movements of the Kioways and Camanches, and they will soon become, from their assimilated character, one people, united and in friendship with Texas. How is it now? They are our enemies, and have always been our enemies. Why? They receive their annuities from Fort Smith and other places, and they look upon us as a separate people. They do not deprecate upon Arkansas, or upon the friendly Indians under the Arkansas superintendency. Why? Because their supplies come through their country, although they are one hundred miles nearer our superintendency. If you bring their supplies through Texas, and up the Red river, and deliver them to them in that way, they will know that they are in connection with the people of Texas; they will look upon us as friends; they will become cordial in their feelings towards us.

There is no natural connection between these Indians and the superintendency at Fort Smith, two hundred and fifty miles from this tract of country; and one of them, I venture to say, has never been there. But our superintendency is only one hundred and ten miles from them, about three hundred miles from Bent's Fort; and these Indians have constant intercourse with that. As long as these Indians can come in and rob us of our horses, and sell them in Kansas, the northern bands of the Kioways and Camanches, united with the Keechies and other Indians, will pass down through the reserve and make their inroads upon Texas. It is to prevent this that I wish to have an agency created there, and attach it to the Texas superintendency. If there had been an agent there, subject to the supervision of the Texas agency, what necessity would there have been for the recent battle of Ford with the congregated Indians in that reserve?

There was an agent appointed—a clever man, I am told; but he may be not very well suited for an Indian agent. Fifty thousand dollars were appropriated by the last Congress to be expended for the advantage of the agency, to restrain the Indians from outlawry or violence upon us; and what has been the consequence? He went there, and staid three days at Fort Arbuckle, within about forty miles of the limits of the agency, and never went into the agency. How can these Indians become civilized without the influence of intelligence upon them, and without some care and regard paid to them? That is the way we have been treated. Our frontier has been assailed, our citizens slaughtered, and our property stolen; and what is the conduct of the United States when we demand reclamation, though their agent was never there to interpose his influence, or exercise his functions in preventing depredations? They say we might have done it ourselves; and it comes at last to that with Texas. She has to do it herself; and you will not reimburse her the expense. Now, sir, we have a claim on the nation. Billy Bowlegs has got on our side of the Mississippi; and we will cry "Billy Bowlegs," and then you will call out the militia, and you will have to pay them. [Laughter.] So, if Florida has lost anything by Billy's emigration, we have gained. I do not wish the nation to lose on account of Billy, as has heretofore been the case; but if Texas should gain as much as Florida, without any acts of error, I shall have no objection. [Laughter.] Texas wants help now.

We wish these Indians placed in a situation where they will be accountable to our superintendency. In seeking this object I am supported by high authority.

I am not going to be deluded in this matter, or diverted from my purpose by any letters of the Indian bureau or the Interior Department. I will have justice; and if official power inflicts wrong, I will rebel against it. Now, I propose to read a letter from the Texas superintendent, which was submitted to the Department as far back as March 6, 1857, in which he gives some of the reasons evincive of the necessity of a transfer of this agency. Major Neighbors, in this letter, speaking of the country in which the Wichitas are, says:

"That country, for a number of years, has been a general rendezvous for horse thieves, viz: Wichitas, Keechies, Kickapoos, and renegades from other tribes, who have carried on a very lucrative trade with Indian and white traders from the Creeks and Cherokees, and white traders from Arkansas, as a large portion of the horses stolen from Texas have been disposed of in this very Territory; also the fact that it will be absolutely necessary to concentrate the several bands of Camanches at one point before they can be fully controlled. The Wichitas intermarry with the Wacos, &c., and there is a friendly intercourse generally between the Indians who must be settled on that reserve and the Indians of Texas; and most of the supplies for that agency must be procured, and can be purchased at a cheaper rate, from Texas than from any other point—that reserve being about one hundred miles nearer to the Texan agencies than to any other established agency. I would also recommend that the Camanches now settled in Texas be removed to that reserve as early as practicable, and the present reserve be abandoned; also, the establishment of a military post on said reserve of sufficient strength for its protection."

This was the recommendation of the superintendent. My late honorable colleague, General Rusk, was familiarly acquainted with this region of country. He had been there in quest of Indians. He knew all about their tribal character. He knew their affinities and relationships. He knew all about the true policy of the country in relation to those Indians, and particularly what was required for the protection of Texas; and what did he say? Major Neighbors's letter, from which I have read an extract, was submitted to the Department, with this indorsement:

"I have examined the foregoing communication, and entirely approve the recommendation it contains."

"THOMAS J. RUSK."

That was the language of Rusk. Was there any action taken upon his recommendation? If there was not, it would have been treating him with very little respect; but it was attended to, and Commissioner Manypenny, in his communication of the 19th March, 1857, says:

"With reference to the new reservation west of the Chickasaws, and the suggestion made by you in relation thereto, the opinion of the Secretary of the Interior has been obtained, and there does not appear to be any objection, but a manifest propriety, in placing the Indians on the reservation referred to, on the same footing, as to policy and treatment, that prevails among the Texas Indians; nor, for all that now appears, is there any objection to the agent in charge of them being put under the direction of the Texas supervisory agent. But it is to be observed that, in obtaining the tract of land from the Choctaws west of the ninety-eighth parallel of longitude, for the occupation and colonization of the Wichita and other Indians, it was expressly understood by the Choctaws, Chickasaws, and myself, that the Indians of Texas were not to be colonized thereon, and good faith in this respect will forbid that any Texas Indians should be permitted, now or hereafter, to locate within the tract referred to."

That was a mistake which the Commissioner made in respect to the treaty.

"You will, therefore, as supervising agent in Texas, take care to permit no idea to obtain prevalence among the citizens of that State that the Texas Indians may be removed to the reservation. When the agent appointed under the recent law shall have qualified, the subject will be taken up, and instructions issued embodying fully the views of the Department; but until then, no action will be had."

They appointed the agent more than a year ago. He has received his salary, but has never been in the Indian nation. There have been repeated forays, two battles fought in the country, one against double odds, in which more Indians were killed in battle than ever have been killed by all the regular troops, notwithstanding the $30,000,000 that have been expended to support them in Texas. Sir, you want to economize, and you talk of economy and retrenchment in your financial system; repeal the bill creating the four regiments of regulars, and you will save $5,500,000 a year. A friend tells me that he will make an effort to repeal it at the next session, and I say to him, God speed his effort.

I know it is the interest of some to assail the system of reserve Indians, as conducted by the superintending agent in Texas, after all his laborious services for years. No money has been so wisely and profitably applied to the objects of civilization, or to the protection of the community, as the amount of money that has been expended for the Indian reservation there. I am willing to rebuke that agent for what he has done out of fashion and improperly. Sir, he has been guilty of one heinous outrage, for which he ought to be held amenable to the Senate. I am willing to arraign and try him on it, and he will be convicted at least of inconsistency with the present rule of the Government, though there is nothing criminal in what he has done; but his conduct is so rare and so extraordinary that it even furnishes some pretext for the suspicion that there is criminality in it. Eighty thousand dollars were appropriated for his agency, and he has had the impudence to report to the Department, that out of the $80,000 he has an unexpended balance of $60,000 now on hand. That is an outrageous thing; I insist that such a thing has not been since the establishment of the Government, and therefore he ought to be held responsible for setting such an example. [Laughter.] That is the only thing he has done improperly that I have heard of, and it is a rebuke to so many that I think he would not meet with much favor. I will now show the influence that civilization has had upon the Indians under his care.

I have stated that there are four hundred Indians on one reserve. They have one hundred and fifty acres of land in cultivation there; but they have no protection against the wild Indians. On the Brazos reserve there are twelve hundred Indians, with eight hundred acres of land in cultivation. They raised last year no less than eight thousand bushels of corn and sixteen hundred bushels of wheat. Does not that look like advancing civilization among Indians, that before never had anything but a flying camp; never lived in a hut for an hour; never took hold of an implement of agriculture at all, until within the short space of time that the Government has been experimenting upon them? Is this making no progress? I am satisfied that with anything like reasonable care exercised toward the Indians, and without any remarkable increase of expenditure, or rather coming within the limits of what has been expended, all the Indians that have been hostile to us can be brought down to domestication and rendered good people, inoffensive in their character; for so soon as you can turn them to the arts of agriculture, peace ensues. They begin to find that their homes with their women and children comfortable, are better than a camp in the wilderness with their women and children standing around them. Their friends coming in from far distant hunting grounds see their comforts, and they will seek to change their modes of life, abandoning the hunter's pursuit and turning their attention to the arts of civilized life. There has not been such an advance made since the settlement of this continent to the present moment, amongst any Indian tribes, as has been made in Texas for an inconsiderable expenditure. All that is necessary, is to withdraw them from the pursuit of hunting, for they have been accustomed to rely on the chase for subsistence. Let them find that there is a more certain way of obtaining comfort and all the necessities of life, and they will abstain from war, because there is danger in it, and will give themselves up to peace. But, sir, so long as you encourage them in war, or pursue a policy which is calculated to divert them from the arts of peace and encourage them in their wandering habits, so long you are warring against humanity and interposing barriers to civilization.

But, Mr. President, I have something else to say in regard to the Indians. The Government of the United States pay the Kioways and Camanches to make their inroads on us, and supply them annually with four hundred rifles. They did it last year; they do it this year. When they have made their inroads upon Texas, some of their marauding parties have been killed, and guns taken from them that were issued by the Government at Bent's Fort. They conspire to massacre the citizens of my State. I wish to Heaven my voice was clear, and I would make it ring; yes, sir, it is a conspiracy to murder our citizens. You furnish the hostile Indians with arms. Why? Ah, there is the secret—why? Not through special malice towards Texas, but on account of the worthlessness of your Army. One of your agents reported that he was transporting supplies to Fort Bent, and that he had to give arms to the Indians because they came around him with their faces painted, and said they would have his life if he did not issue arms to them; and he gave them four hundred arms, and says he will have to give them four hundred again this year. There are eight hundred arms—enough to arm a regiment of wild Camanches, and bring them down upon Texas; and yet you will not give us rangers to defend ourselves; you will give us troops to eat beef, and stay in pickets and garrisons, and who cannot go out. We want prevention, and that will anticipate retaliation. Why were these arms issued to the hostile Indians? The agent applies to the Government to give him men to protect him and his annuities, and they will not do it. The Army will not be a frontier police; they will not go, because it is disagreeable business; they will not go across the plains, from Independence to Bent's Station, upon the Arkansas. The agent, in transporting his annuities, had no one to defend them but a few teamsters. He had applied for a detachment of soldiers, and was told he could not get them.

When the Indian department applies to the War Department for troops, the latter consults the feelings of the officers. These gentlemen do not want to be a frontier police; they do not want to go on the border; they remonstrate against it. It is out of the question. It will be unfortunate; and they will ruin their horses if they go, and they will be wet! It will be a very disagreeable business; and they would rather let the cursed Indians alone. They think the agents are no better than the Indians. The Secretary of War defers to the gentlemen. They have all friends and families and political influence to come to the Department and show that frontier service among the Indians is a very disagreeable thing. A gentleman may say to the Secretary of War, "you know I would be happy to oblige you; and my people have a good deal of influence at home, and all this influence is at your command; this officer is a peculiar favorite with us all; he is a pet; do not send him out; maybe he will get killed out there." Sir, I would wipe out such men; as the Indians say. I would begin wiping, and I would wipe away until I got to the root of the evil; and I would find that in the delinquency of the heads of Departments and officials, who should say to one of their officers, "go," and he should go, and to another "come," and he should come. That was the way in the time the Roman eagles floated gloriously over subjugated nations. But it is not so in our day.

Well, sir, I ask that this agency may be transferred to the superintendency in Texas. It has no connection with the eastern agency, in Arkansas. It has every connection with us. An agent there can anticipate incursions, for it is through this territory that the hostiles will have to pass; he can have Indian spies planted that can run and give information to our frontier, that the bands are congregating there, and meditating an attack upon us, and we can be ready to repel them. Give us a Texas regiment of rangers that we may defend ourselves, that we may keep constant scouts on our frontiers, and anticipate these incursions; for if that is the case, the Indians will be careful how they make trails into our settlements, or on our frontier, as our men will be far advanced, and if they were to strike their trail, they know they would follow them and arrest them before they struck the blow. Give us a regiment of rangers; take away your regular thousands—take them away. Take them to where you can get beef and supplies cheap. Why, sir, you waste more in the transportation of supplies to them in a single year than would support a regiment of rangers. The quartermaster's department pays more in a single year in my opinion, than would keep a Texas regiment in the field, who would give us protection and defend us against an enemy. Give us a regiment of rangers, place this agency where I have desired, and I pledge you my honor, I will lay down my life, if within five years we have not entire peace, if I should live that long. If you will only do it, it is all I ask; I ask for no increased expenditure. We have saved you $60,000 through the integrity of a capable man, and I want him to extend his protecting mantle and his sagacious policy over those Indians that are our enemies, and will remain so until they become identified with us as friends, and receive their annuities through our country, and know that we are identical with the other portions of the Union.

I may mention a circumstance that once occurred in Texas, some sixty or eighty miles, perhaps, from the Colorado, at the point of the Brazos. The people on the Colorado had war with the Camanches and other tribes in the interior. They were conducting it with great violence, with continual inroads, interchanges of invasions of Indians by the whites and invasions of whites by the Indians. The Indians living on the Brazos had intercourse with the Brazos people and were perfectly friendly. The people from Brazos could go up amongst the Indians and could trade. They were on terms of perfect amity. There was a remarkable man living on the Brazos, a man fond of excitement. The Colorado people said, we have to suffer this war and the Brazos people will not help us because the Indians will not attack them; the Indians are their friends. Now, we will go and we will bring war upon the people on the Brazos. So they made up a campaign, caught a party of peaceful Indians and massacred them.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I hope the Senator from Texas will allow me to make a suggestion to him. With that very high respect which he knows I bear to him in everything, I will say to him merely that, in the earnestness of debate, the fact of the escape of time does not attract his attention.

Mr. HOUSTON. I have but a few more remarks to make.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. If we do not get early action on this bill, within an hour, the Senator will even defeat his own object of getting a vote on his amendment, with any hope that it will ultimately become a law; and his advocacy of it may be its destruction. I shall consume no more time than an answer can be possibly given in. I do not think I shall take ten minutes. He has certainly made a most able argument on his side of the question.

Mr. HOUSTON. I am hoarse, and I can hardly talk. I was observing that they determined on the Colorado to involve the people on the Brazos. They came over. They got a white man who had a remarkable appearance on the Brazos associated with Coloradians. In the conflict or skirmish they had with the Indians, this man was killed. The whites, as I recollect, left him unburied. The Indians discovered that he was the man with whom they had been on terms of amity on the Brazos; and, finding him associated with the others, they thought they had been deceived by the people on the Brazos, and instantly they made war on them as well as on the Coloradians. By this stratagem they were brought in.

Now, sir, so long as the Indians know that it is through the instrumentality of the people of Texas, or by the direction of the Government, that the goods pass through Texas to the agency, and that it is under the superintendency of a Texas agent, they will not rebel against him, and will cease to annoy us or to afflict us. It will give us protection. It will take nothing from Arkansas, because there are counties intervening between it and Arkansas, and it has no more connection with Arkansas than it has with Kansas or Missouri. There is no object in keeping it as it is—none on the face of the earth, except to swell a superintendency and increase the responsibilities. I am sure if the superintendent was consulted, he would say give it up. I know him. All that he wants is to do his business well. He is a man of integrity and ability, and I am sure if he could be here, he would say give it up; because it is no advantage, only that the goods they receive are transported up the Arkansas river, and across to Fort Smith, and I believe everything pays toll that touches there, and storage and transportation and all those things. I want it done in the cheapest way, and that is through Texas.

Have I any authority for what I have been saying? I will bring the highest authority, the sovereign authority of the State of Texas, to see whether I am borne out in insisting upon the regiment of rangers for our protection. Governor Runnels, under date of 28th of May, in writing to the delegation here, after referring to a report made by him, says:

"If it is the intention of the President to order out the Texas regiment, why is it not done? The existing evils are unbearable. And besides, it is unjust that our State should be taxed with this, at best a temporary protection, which she is now compelled to afford, without the assurance of obtaining remuneration from it hereafter from the Federal Government, whose duty it is. Aggravated by this recent defeat, there is too much reason to believe that a general desert will be made, our entire line of frontier broken up and devastated, without some prompt and early action by the authorities at Washington." You will therefore confer with the President and Secretary of War, and urge them to action, with the least possible delay."

This is the language of Governor H. R. Runnels, of Texas. I need offer no comments on this. He is there and knows the facts. He has received Captain Ford's report. He has had details of the condition of things before him, and he speaks from home without a desire to increase the expenses of the Government, or to produce any excitement. He is not a man subject to excitement. He is one who would be calm and considerate under the influences by which he is surrounded; but he says there is a tumultuous excitement amongst the people there, and I do not wonder at it. The aggravation is great; our necessities have been urgent; no relief has ever been furnished us. We have had to stand on the defensive as much with your regular troops, as we did battling for our liberty with a little band in the glorious days of our revolution.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I am aware, as is the Senate, of the condition in which this bill stands. It is an appropriation bill concerning the Indian service. At this period of the session, with the necessity upon us for the transaction of this public business, it is, I admit, entirely preposterous on my part to go into an extended discussion on the subject. Upon the part of the Senator from Texas I do not say that it is so, because he feels very earnest in regard to the matter which he has so laboriously and elaborately presented to the Senate. I trust, however, that he will consider the very few remarks which I may have to make on the subject as not calling for any lengthened reply on his part. He and I are both anxious that the bill should pass, or at least willing that it should. Much debate would defeat it. Therefore I will notice only the few matters I must necessarily notice, to give the Senate those points which it seems to me compel them to reject at once the amendment offered.

His proposition, in short, is to transfer from the superintendency which controls the Choctaw nation a portion of their territory, and put it under a separate superintendency. He transfers only a portion of the country which belongs to the Choctaws, instead of the whole of it, to a superintendency against which they have bitterly protested, and that protest is on file in the public offices.

Mr. HOUSTON. I ask leave to say it was a protest only by the agent.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. A delegation of Choctaws was here, and by their concurrence, and at their instance, the agent representing them has put in that protest. The Choctaws themselves are here, and I do not understand from them that it is pleasant to them that a portion of their country only should be taken from one superintendency and put under another. It leads to this consequence: a portion of the Choctaw nation has been leased by them to the United States, but expressly, according to the terms of the treaty now before me, (and I will not go into any discussion of it, or even read it to the Senate, unless it is called for,) the ownership is reserved to them, and they have only leased it with authority on the part of the United States to put other Indians in there from certain prescribed regions of country.

Mr. HOUSTON. Subject to rules prescribed by the President.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Yes; and they go on and say it shall be subject to the laws of the Choctaw nation, and they moreover reserve the rights of the Choctaws and Chickasaws, who are but one nation now, to move into it and settle upon it. This is the condition of things, and they protest against putting under a Texas superintendency a portion of their country. They believe it will breed war and trouble amongst them. The Department of the Interior and the Commissioner of Indian Affairs concur in this belief, and they themselves protest against it as a matter of public policy. I believe, and I venture that expression now, that the end of this will be, unless we take the whole Choctaw nation and put it under the Texas supervision, which I think would be far better than to take part of it, that the Government of the United States will have to pay a million or two more to the Choctaws for that piece of country, and pay to buy it out, if they do not also have, to accompany it, heavy claims of damages for losses that will be sustained by the Choctaw nation in consequence of this divided jurisdiction. The object should be, and such I believe to be the object of the Department, to preserve a unity of power, and a unity of action, of instruction, of direction, and of decision in regard to all the action that is there, and all the difficulties that may arise there.

Now the Department did not appoint an agent from the State of Texas to go over those Indians in that particular section of country. They appointed an agent from the State of Arkansas. The Senator makes strong complaints against that agent. The Department inform me, on my inquiries there, that those complaints are just. Very well; I have had no opportunity of hearing from that agent; I cannot say anything about those charges. The agent, I know, is a very excellent and clever gentleman; but he may have been remiss, and the Department declare they intend to remove him. This being the state of facts, I cannot, of course, prevent any such action on the part of the Department, and he will be removed. I asked them, then, what their course would be? They are disposed to give the appointment of the agent to Texas. If a man should be taken from amongst her people, sympathizing with her interest, he might notice depredations that the Indians committed or obtain notice of them, in order that the State of Texas may be properly protected. That much, I find, they are disposed to do at once, and that, I think, is a very satisfactory answer to these complaints of anticipated losses and sufferings upon the part of the borders of Texas. The State which I represent, so far as I know or can judge of its sentiment, I think is perfectly willing to agree to that course—at least, I shall support it here, believing it to be reasonable and right. Therefore, if the agent should be taken from there, notwithstanding all his sympathies with Texas, if we could establish a common tribunal to which, on all occasions, an appeal can be made, in whose decisions there shall be uniformity and unity, there would not be any very serious consequences resulting from it.

Thus much for the relief that is, I know, disposed to be granted there for the protection of the Senator. He has gone into a long account of matters of which I shall take no particular notice. I will call attention to only two other points. He speaks of the necessity of the superintendent being appointed from the State of Arkansas; and falling upon my part of that State he asks, where is the necessity of his being appointed from there? He thinks that the superintendent should be from his own State. I can say to that Senator that I like him too well to refuse him anything in reason, and there is nothing that I could give that would not be most cheerfully granted to him. I take pride and pleasure in confessing it upon this floor. The name of the present agent is Rector, a friend of the Senator himself. He is a gentleman of the highest respectability. He is the same person who served in Florida in so distinguished a manner in taking the Hon. William Bowlegs away from that country. I believe it would be very difficult to get rid of this little section between the ninety-eighth and one hundredth degree belonging to the Choctaws, and at what expense? At an expense of unity of instructions and unity of action in regard to difficulties that may arise inside of the country, which ought to be subject to some laws.

I do not think the proposition of the Senator from Texas a reasonable one. There is nothing connected with the interest of that superintendent or the advantage of having him in that section of country that I deem it necessary to clear myself of, and I clear the Senator of it also. But what does the Senator from Texas want? He wants the control of that strip of country which belongs to the Choctaws. The United States have, as a matter of policy, recognized the right of occupancy on the part of these Indians. They have allowed them to hold lands, and have never called upon them to give them up unless they had not paid for them. The State of Texas has done nothing of this kind. The State of Texas does not recognize the right of an Indian to own land within her limits. Is the United States to give the control and supervision of the agencies to Texas, and even go outside of her boundaries to make an agency for one of her citizens. I cannot think it possible, considering the strong sympathy he would have for his own State, which recognizes no rights of the Indians at all, that an agent should be taken from Texas at the expense of the Choctaw and Chickasaw nations. They have called the United States, with great propriety, their Great Father; but when Texas is placed over them she will be a step-mother. She will never recognize their rights, and the children will be expelled from their father's house altogether. Such, I am afraid, will be the result of the action the Senator from Texas is desirous we should adopt. This I fear. But although I fear it, an answer to the argument readily presents itself to me. These, however, are only suggestions that come to my mind in looking through the darkness of the future at the ultimate results of this proposition. In answer to the policy which he has presented, I will merely remark that there is a concession which I, as one of the representatives of Arkansas, am willing to make, which I think will be amply sufficient; and that is, to give them an agent having all the sympathies of their people, and who shall be a resident of their own country, to protect them against such depredations as may be attempted upon their people and borders.

I wish, also, to correct a statement I made the other day, when this subject was first under consideration, in regard to the position which the late Senator Rusk occupied upon this subject. I then informed the Senate, that after calling upon General Rusk, and stating to him the interests involved in this matter, he at once not only consented that the appointment should be from the State of Arkansas, but he said the superintendency or supervision of that country ought to be confined to what is called the southern superintendency. I believe that was the statement I made here. In one respect, it was incorrect. He at once conceded that the agent ought to be from Arkansas, but that the superintendent should belong to Texas. Having made an erroneous statement at first, I feel that I should correct it, and now do so. Every one knows the generous character of the late Senator Rusk. I am satisfied that he was conscientious in his belief in regard to the matter. I am satisfied that the action the Senator from Texas proposes is by far the wisest for Texas. I am not satisfied that it is the wisest for the United States, either having regard to our Treasury or what may fall upon it hereafter, or to those Indians who now own that country—the Choctaws and Chickasaws.

In regard to these depredations, the immediate relation which the agent has to them is to keep a very strict guard upon them; and whenever he can exercise an influence to prevent them, he will do so. Whenever peace is imperiled by a motive which, having ascertained, he himself is unable to reach or control, then it is his duty at once to give notice to the authorities to bring to bear an influence or strength which shall prevent it or give relief. That can be maintained by granting to the Senator himself, or to the delegation from his State, the power and right to select a proper agent to discharge that duty, subject, of course, to the approval of the Government of the United States; and with that, it seems to me, the Senator ought to be satisfied.

Another reason which the Senator gives why this superintendency ought not to exist where it does, but should be extended to his own State, is, that the location of the superintendency is now two hundred miles distant—that is, at Fort Smith. I believe that is what the Senator stated.

Mr. HOUSTON. Two hundred and forty miles.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. He says it is two hundred and forty miles. That is no great distance in that country; and this reason is of still less consequence when you come to consider that the agent is to act under general instructions. Those general instructions stand throughout the land until altered, changed, or amended in some way or other; so that I do not think that consideration presented by him of very great weight. In that country, distances of two hundred and ten and two hundred and forty miles are not deemed very great. I doubt exceedingly, however, whether the Senator is not mistaken in the number of miles when he says it is two hundred and forty. I do not think it is over one hundred and fifty. I may be mistaken in that. I will not put my knowledge or my judgment in comparison with his on that matter. I say, therefore, let it be considered as two hundred and forty miles.

The Senator states that the agent did not discharge his duty, that he only remained there three days. I think he is in error—

Mr. HOUSTON. He never was in the reservation at all. He was three days at Fort Arbuckle.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. We will suppose that there is no dispute about these statements, because the Department has not stated that he remained as he should have done. I understand the Department determined to appoint a successor in his place. I can say nothing about that. There is a plan to give the Senator's State ample protection under the circumstances. The law is here, and so is the treaty, to which it is unnecessary for me to refer particularly. I only speak of the legal conclusions that are to be drawn from the treaty. I believe the Senator and myself do not differ in regard to them, and it is unnecessary for me, therefore, to dwell upon them.

I will merely say, in conclusion, that I have called the attention of the Senate to the correspondence between the Department and the House of Representatives, so late as the 31st of last month, not three weeks past, and have caused it to be read. The resolutions were the ground of the amendment which is proposed. The Department considered it against public policy and gave many reasons which I will not attempt to repeat, and stated that the consequences could not well be foretold by them. With these few remarks I submit the question, so far as I am concerned, to the consideration of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the question will be taken. We ought to have a vote on this bill now.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope there will be no such thing.

Mr. HUNTER. We ought to take up the revenue bill which is returned from the House with amendments. I hope we shall bring this bill to some conclusion.

Mr. HOUSTON. I should not have occupied much longer time than the gentleman has now done; but I am not going to be choked down in this Senate. If Senators consume, unnecessarily, the time of the body for months, and for years, it shall not cut me off from reasonable debate when necessary to vindicate the rights of my people, and arrest the scalping-knife and tomahawk. I do not wish to consume the time of the Senate. It has not been my habit to do so. A certain degree of courtesy that I have never withheld from other Senators, I am determined to exact for myself when the rules of the Senate guaranty it to me. This is a matter of no ordinary importance to my State. It is a matter that enters into its vital existence and the lives of its citizens. It is justice, and the true policy to the Indians, that I have risen to vindicate. I do not intend to occupy the time of the Senate, but I rise to say emphatically, that there is no reason on earth against my proposition.

My friend from Arkansas knows that the superintendency is on the extreme verge of the State of Arkansas. It is two hundred and forty miles from where she is cut off by this reservation.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I admit that.

Mr. HOUSTON. It is as disconnected from Arkansas as it is from California. Arkansas has no claim upon it. The Choctaw Indians have never protested against the measure. Their agent has protested. He protests against it—for what purpose? It is to be detached from the southern superintendency and create a new superintendency of the Chickasaws, Choctaws, and this new reservation of the Wichitas. There are three nations, and he is carving out a superintendency for himself. That is the movement here. I will have none of it. I assure my honorable friend from Arkansas that I have never intimated a wish to have the appointment of the agent. I do not care who he is. Texas does not want an agent, she does not want to create one of her own citizens into an agent, but she wants security to her frontiers and nothing else. Was I caviling for an agency, or intimating a wish to have an agency there?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I have not said such a thing. I do not believe you will do it.

Mr. HOUSTON. I know it. My friend said we were welcome to have it. I do not want it. I have not asked for it; I have not intimated a wish for it. I hope I divest myself of such consideration when there is a great national concernment in the way. He concedes that the fort shall be established at the foot of the Wichita mountains within this reservation; that an agent shall reside there; and that the Indians shall receive their annuities through our country, or in connection with us, and not from the opposite point on the Arkansas. I want to draw their minds to Texas, and to show that that is the object to affiliate with them, so far as we can with our relations; that we shall teach them to view us as friends, and not as enemies. Let the benefits come from us; and the Indian, who is a material being, will realize it to a certain extent, as far as his senses will go, that we are his friends, and are not opposed to him.

Sir, this is an important object. It is to keep the peace. The gentleman tells you that this proposition will save millions. I tell you, that if this little amendment is passed, in the course of five years it will save $10,000,000 to your Treasury, and you can take your troops from there, and do what you choose with them. You may disband them. You may station them where they can get supplies, without each ration costing fifty cents. You can take them away. Leave us a single regiment of our own; give us the agency, and the Choctaws will rejoice at it. Why? Because they send their children in our country to have them educated. On the Red river there is nothing but that little line or narrow strip. They move over into our State. The wealthy portion of them even own plantations in Texas. They purchase our land. They are cut off from Arkansas and move over to us and have their children educated among us. They never send their children to Arkansas to be educated, nor locate themselves in the limits of Arkansas. The Choctaws are our friends. They would be glad to be attached to the superintendency of Texas, and I am willing to accept them. I will not ask an agent unless his qualifications are superior. I have nothing more to say except to implore the Senate, if they regard Texas or Texans, if they regard peace, if they regard the civilization of the Indian, the harmony of the frontier, and our defenseless condition, to vote for this amendment.

Mr. DAVIS. The Senator from Texas and the Senator from Arkansas have argued this question as a question relating to two States. I should do it as a question of public interest relating to the Choctaws, a tribe of Indians who once resided in Mississippi, and whose proud history it is never to have shed the blood of a white man. They very faithfully bore arms as the allies of the whites in the war of 1812. They migrated to this country, where a certain tract of land was set apart for them. A portion of that land the Senator desires to seize for the use of the Indians of Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON. No, sir; not a foot of it. I will explain to the gentleman. It has been purchased by the Government for an Indian reservation, but I do not want a Texas Indian to go on it at all. The gentleman misapprehends me.

Mr. DAVIS. It has not been purchased. It was only granted in use. The Choctaws still retain their right to it. The Choctaws have no idea of surrendering their jurisdiction over this land. They specifically retain their right to settle it. They expect to mingle some portion of their tribe with such tribes as choose to go into their territory West. They have schools which are, I expect, as good as any in the northern part of Texas. They need not send their children out of their own tribe for that species of education; and they can educate the older tribes if they are brought under their laws, jurisdiction, and government. I think it is the best opportunity we shall have for the civilization of the wild tribes, but I say that the Choctaws have a right to decide who shall go on this land that they have granted for certain purposes, retaining to themselves jurisdiction and rights in the land set apart.

Nor, sir, is this question, as a practical matter, of very great importance, unless it is a struggle to raise a superintendency for the territory outside of Texas for the agent now within her border. He maintains that the United States bear a peculiar relation to that State. The United States own none of that land that the Indians were raised upon; Texas is the owner. A few small reservations have been set apart, so as to separate the Indians from the common pressure of settlement. If the Texas Indians could go into the Choctaw country, they would go out of the jurisdiction of Texas, and properly separate themselves from the control of the agent, whose instruction and whose relations are to the Indians of Texas residing upon the territory of Texas, and not upon the territory of the United States.

But, to sustain himself, the Senator from Texas arraigned the private and the official character of the agent of the Choctaws; and, after hurling denunciation at him, announces that he does not know the gentleman. Then, sir, I will tell him something about him. He is a man who held many positions of honor and trust before he received this Choctaw agency, and in peace and in war well discharged the duties of them all. Those who know him best would not consider that I complimented him at all when I tell the Senator he is his peer on any occasion. Yet without knowing him, without caring to know the man, he hurls denunciations at him as though he would convict him—

Mr. HOUSTON. Convict whom?

Mr. DAVIS. The agent of the Choctaws. He went from the country in which these Indians resided before they removed West. From his fancy up he had known those Indians, and many of the old men remembered him. He went there. He acquired an affectionate regard for those Indians. He has done more to elevate the nation, in my belief, than any agent I have ever known of an Indian tribe. He established his agency upon the extreme western border of the settlement of the Choctaw Indians, in order that he might have control of this very territory, into which certain wild tribes were invited to settle. It is true, the agency was removed to Fort Wichita; but still the western part of the Choctaw nation, on the False Wichita, is near the residence of the superintendent of this country, on which the Choctaws have agreed that wild Indians might reside.

I will not consume the time of the Senate. I will not imitate the example of the Senator, on the last day of the session, in consuming time. The speech might as well have been made three months ago, unless recent changes made it an object not to do so. If he had not plumed himself upon this insult of a personal friend of myself, I should have said nothing; though I think there is a great deal in his remarks in which he could not possibly maintain himself—his general denunciation of the Army, his specific denunciation of one officer of the Army. That officer will not feel much intimidated at the threat the Senator makes—that if he had the power he would run his pen through his name. He will sleep secure; he will sleep long before that Senator attains such power.

Why all this denunciation of the officers of the Army? I hear nothing except that they are gentlemen of education—nothing except that they are gentlemen of refinement and cultivated taste; to which he appends, as a necessary consequence, that they will not serve on the frontier, and make peace among the Indian tribes. Is it true, sir? Does the history of the country sustain the accusation? Do they not reside on the frontier? What portion of our population has seen anything like the same amount of personal intercourse with Indian tribes as the officers and soldiers of our Army? He may sustain his accusation against them that they are gentlemen, educated men; and if that be a crime in his eyes, he may judge them upon it. But he says they do nothing; and this shows how reckless of assertion and how regardless he is of reputation; for, on another occasion, I read an account narrating what they had done in his own State of Texas—a service which showed physical endurance and military prowess which would fairly compare with anything of like character of service in any history of any nation.

But after all this, he winds up with the plea of humanity—humanity for the Indian; and mingles with that vauntings about the number of Indians a Texas ranger can kill. Why, sir, this is a queer view of it. He complains of the Army because they do not kill these poor creatures instead of trying to raise them to a higher position than they now occupy. If that was the real purpose, a gentleman of education and refined taste, it seems to me, would prefer to do that rather than to massacre the poor helpless creatures that fall into his hands.

I will not, Mr. President, continue my remarks, and would not have trespassed upon the Senate at this hour, but for the reason I have stated.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman's surprise, I am sure, did not exceed mine, and does not exceed it now. I would be glad if the gentleman would be so kind as to tell me what remarks of a personal character I applied to his friend, the Indian agent?

Mr. DAVIS. I cannot repeat the language. You were at it, I think, for a quarter of an hour.

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to know a single expression that I used disreputable to him.

Mr. DAVIS. Did you not speak of his failing to do his duty?

Mr. HOUSTON. Never.

Mr. DAVIS. What did you say?

Mr. HOUSTON. I said it was unfortunate to carve out a superintendency there, but I said nothing against the gentleman. Now, sir, this goes out to the world as if I had availed myself of my senatorial position wantonly to attack the character of an individual. As the Senator does not know what it was, and asks me if I did not do it, I tell him, no sir, I did not do it.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator did not attack the character of the agent of the Choctaws, then the Senator from Arkansas and myself, who were his principal auditors, were greatly mistaken.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would thank the Senator to state the expression I used.

Mr. DAVIS. I do not pretend to report your speech. The reporter attends to that.

Mr. HOUSTON. The gentleman has made a charge that I uttered a word disreputable to this gentleman. I deny it completely. The inference I drew, and which is the only thing that could be construed into such a thing, was, that it was a scheme to carve out a new superintendency there. I did not use the name of that gentleman; I do not know him, as I have stated. I did say that he had made this remonstrance, but that the Choctaws never did, and never wrote a protest. The Senator from Arkansas concurred in it at the time it was made. I have used no epithets. I have called him by no degrading name or term, and I am not going to be charged indirectly with such things by any gentleman on this floor. I have only to say to the gentleman, that if he belongs to his peerage, I am satisfied he should claim it. I have no ambition to belong to the peerage. I belong to the House of Commons.

But, sir, I have assailed the character of nobody. I said that that officer, for his disreputable reply when he was called upon to give aid, by saying that if they wanted protection he would go to the fort and bring Indians to protect them, when it was intended to give protection and sustain the Indians in their reservations, deserved dismissal; and he does. But that is not all. It is told us on good and reliable information, that he informed the Indians that they ought to stay on that reserve with the hostile Indians, and if attacked that we would go and defend them. It is a taunt unworthy of chivalry or chivalrous men. I would thank the gentleman from Mississippi hereafter, when he undertakes to make an allegation against me, that I have used expressions derogatory to a gentleman, that he would at least be prepared to sustain it.

Mr. DAVIS. If the Senator will permit me, I will say to him that if he had told me he did not mean to arraign the official or private conduct of the agent of the Choctaws, I should have said, "certainly, sir, I am glad to know it;" but when he tells me nothing of the sort, all that I can say is, that my ears must have vastly deceived me if I am wrong, and I think the notes of the reporter will sustain me.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman had asked me, I would have said exactly what I say, with pleasure. But when he makes a charge, I am not prepared to notice an apology or disclaimer to it. I will do exactly what is right on all occasions, and I will assail the character of no individual who has not furnished the official reasons for his conduct. But I say, Mr. President, that this is not applying the rule to these Indians at all. This territory was ceded and subject to the regulations of the President of the United States, and the President of the United States, in a treaty, has ceded to the Indians, or they have reserved it, that they are to settle and occupy it as they had previously done, or are to have an intercourse for any of their inhabitants that they should gather together there, subject to the regulations made by the President of the United States. It is trenching upon them to settle other Indians there. As they lie along our borders on the west and south line near to our agency, and as they wish to be connected with our Indians, I think it is better to allow them to be connected with them than to have them at war with us.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MASON.) The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Texas.

Mr. IVERSON. What is the amendment?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Secretary will read it.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the superintendent and agents within the superintendency of Texas shall be hereafter appointed in the same manner as other superintendents and agents are appointed and confirmed; and that the Wichita agency is hereby attached to the superintendency of Texas.

The question being put, on a division there were—yeas fifteen, nays not counted.

Mr. STUART. I ask for the yeas and nays. We seem to be without a quorum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. There is evidently a quorum present.

Mr. STUART. They will not vote. I ask for the yeas and nays.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Oh, no. We have got a quorum.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. GREEN. I ask for a division of the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question, then, is on the first branch of the amendment; which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the superintendent and agents within the superintendency of Texas shall be hereafter appointed in the same manner as other superintendents and agents are appointed and confirmed.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I am very certain, from the indifference manifested upon this question, and from the character of the vote as evinced by the last division, that the Senate do not probably comprehend the question which has raised a division of opinion between my colleague and the Senator from Texas. This proposition embraces two branches. The first is to elevate what is now a special agency for the Indians of Texas into a superintendency, which will be attended with an increase of the salary of that officer $1,000.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not a cent. I assure the gentleman that it will not increase the salary of the supervising agent.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. Then I withdraw the remark. It certainly intends to convert a special agency for the Indians of Texas into a superintendency. The Senator from Texas disavows any intention to increase his salary. That is but a question of time as we know, sir; if it is not done now, that it will be, as a legitimate consequence, next Congress.

Mr. HOUSTON. Not at all.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I think that is an objection to changing the character of that officer. As the Senator from Mississippi well remarked, the jurisdiction there is peculiar. Whatever we do is ex gratia. Texas claims jurisdiction over the State and the Indians; and when the Legislature apportioned small districts of the country for the occupation of the Indians, the United States stepped in with the same spirit of liberality, and made an appropriation of from fifty to seventy-five thousand dollars for the maintenance of the Indians upon those reservations. The whole of that is a gratuity, and not the discharge of any obligation to support or maintain the Indians over which she maintained jurisdiction, and over whom Texas still claims jurisdiction; and for the same reason Mr. Neighbors, an eminently practical man for Indian affairs, I must admit, is called special agent for the Indians of Texas, and is the only officer in the administration of Indian affairs who is known by that anomalous term.

Now, Mr. President, the Choctaws, in 1855, ceded a portion of their western territory, which happens to lie north of Texas and out of the jurisdiction of that State, for the purpose of settling the Wichetas and other wild tribes, who were then located upon the territory, and that was attached to the southern superintendency, where it had always belonged. The southern superintendent is a public officer under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government. The allowances are under the jurisdiction of the Federal Government, and they are apportioned to the Indians for whom the Federal Government is bound to care and provide. You destroy the harmony of the system entirely by attaching Indians upon a part of the public domain of the United States to the superintendency of the special agent for a State over whose Indians the Federal Government has no jurisdiction whatever.

Then, again, some three or four years ago—I state from recollection—upon my report as chairman of the Committee on Indian Affairs, this whole matter of defining the boundaries of superintendencies, locating of agencies, and the position of superintendents, was conferred upon the Secretary of the Interior, who was bound, as a matter of administration, to determine these things according to his own judgment and discretion. By the existing law, therefore, he is competent to determine this very question, which the Senator from Texas has raised here. I understand the fact to be, that an application has been made to him, and deliberately rejected by the Secretary of the Interior, and now we have an appeal from the Secretary of the Interior to the revisory power of the Legislature of the country. I see no reason, if this be done, why we do not step aside from our legitimate duties and interfere with matters of administration under the supervision of all the Departments. If we can alter the boundaries of a mere superintendency, a mere question of administration to be determined by the Secretary of the Interior, I do not see why we may not overleap the boundary and intrench on those of the War or Navy Departments, and command a certain regiment to be stationed at a certain place, or a certain ship to sail from a certain port. This is simply the question involved.

I hope, therefore, Mr. President, that we will not mar the beauty and harmony of the system of legislation by attempting to treat here of a matter which belongs entirely to the administrative powers of a Federal officer; that we will not attempt to govern him in the exercise of a discretion already conferred upon him, and in the exercise of which he has undoubtedly greater facilities than we have. That is now the real issue between the Senator from Texas and my colleague.

Mr. HOUSTON. I will remark that we have the decision of the Secretary of the Interior proposing to attach this to the Texan superintendency. We have the recommendation of General Rusk, and upon that recommendation of facts it was stated that the Secretary made his decision. He has now revoked it; and that is just the position of the subject. The question is, whether it is necessary to the harmony of that portion of the country that the Wichita agency should remain as it is, or should be attached to one immediately connected with it, which would give peace to all the entire frontier, and save millions every year to the country?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the first branch of the amendment offered by the Senator from Texas.

Mr. HOUSTON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken resulted—yeas 22, nays 14; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Broderick, Chandler, Clingman, Collamer, Fitzpatrick, Foster, Green, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, Polk, Reid, Rice, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—22.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Clay, Davis, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Hamlin, Hunter, Iverson, Mason, Pugh, Sebastian, and Stuart—14.

So the first branch of the amendment was agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now recurs on the second branch of the amendment in the following words:

“And that the Wichita agency is hereby attached to the superintendency of Texas.”

Mr. HOUSTON called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 15, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Broderick, Fitzpatrick, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Polk, Reid, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—15.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Bigler, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Hamlin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Mason, Pearce, Pugh, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, and Wright—22.

So the second branch of the amendment was rejected.

The amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. It was read the third time, and passed.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate proceeded to consider the message from the House of Representatives announcing the action of the House on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

The first amendment of the Senate was to strike out the first section of the original bill, which was in the following words:

“That, instead of the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for the half year, from the 1st day of January, 1858, to the 1st day of July, 1858, contained in the joint resolution approved on the 14th day of February, 1856, there be, and hereby is, appropriated for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for said half year, the sum of $1,600,000, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, together with such sums as may be received from storage, cartage, drayage, and labor said half year.”

And in lieu of it to insert:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, the sum of $1,500,000, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, together with such sums as may be received from storage, cartage, and labor for said half year.

The House of Representatives concurred in this amendment with an amendment restoring the words of the original section with the single exception of substituting $1,800,000 for $1,600,000.

The second amendment of the Senate was to strike out the second section of the original bill, as follows:

“Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That there be, and hereby is, annually appropriated for the expense of collecting the revenue from customs for each and every fiscal year, from the 1st day of July, 1858, the sum of $4,000,000, payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, until otherwise ordered by law, together with such sums as may be received from storage, cartage, drayage, and labor, for each fiscal year: Provided, That from and after the said 1st day of July, 1858, all laws and parts of laws which authorize the payment of the expenses or any portion of the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs to any port or ports on the Pacific coast of the United States out of the accruing revenue, before the same is paid into the Treasury, shall be, and hereby are, repealed.”

And in lieu of it to insert:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the said 1st day of July, 1858, all laws and parts of laws which authorize the payment of the expenses, or any portion of the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, to any port or ports on the Pacific coast of the United States, out of the accruing revenue before the same is paid into the Treasury, shall be, and hereby are, repealed.”

The House of Representatives concurred in this amendment.

The House of Representatives disagreed to the fourth amendment of the Senate, which was to insert the following as an additional section:

And be it further enacted, That no collector of the customs, deputy collector, naval officer, deputy naval officer, surveyor, deputy surveyor, general appraiser, superintendent of warehouses, or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenue, shall receive a greater compensation than is now paid to the officers and persons engaged in said service at the port of New York: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to increase the compensation of any officer of the customs, or of any person engaged in the collection thereof.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the question will be taken on the amendments separately. It will be remembered that the Senate amended the revenue collection bill so as to appropriate $1,500,000 every six months, instead of $2,000,000 every six months, as proposed in the original bill. The House further amend that amendment, by inserting $1,800,000 instead of $1,500,000, so as to make the appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue amount to $3,600,000. That is about the sum, less by some twenty or thirty thousand dollars, that was expended in collecting the revenue in the year 1857. I will state that, since 1854—I believe since 1853—the expenses were never less than $3,500,000. I hope the Senate will concur in that amendment of the House to our amendment.

Mr. CHANDLER. I hold in my hand the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing that the expenses in collecting these revenues were much less than the Senator from Virginia seems to suppose.

Mr. HUNTER. I took my statement from the Secretary of the Treasury. The Senator, perhaps, has fallen into the mistake of not adding the expenses in California to those on the Atlantic coast. The expenses on the Atlantic coast have been less since 1854; but if the Senator will add the expenses in California, and on the Atlantic coast, he will find that since then they have never been less than $3,500,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I find, Mr. President, that, in 1851, the receipts from customs amounted to $49,017,567, and the whole expense of collecting to $1,882,000. I find, also—

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator has fallen into the mistake I mentioned. He will find that during that same year $1,300,000 were spent in California, making upwards of three million dollars. If he will examine into the matter, he will see that my statement is correct, that since 1854 the expenditures have not been less than $3,500,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. I believe the expenses have been very much reduced there since that time. I understand they have been reduced several hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. HUNTER. They are reduced on the California coast, but have been increased on the Atlantic. If the Senator will take those years and add the sum collected on the two coasts, he will find as I stated that it is not less than that amount.

Mr. CHANDLER. Well, sir, I insist if it costs $3,600,000 to collect $40,000,000 of revenue that it is too much; that the expense of collecting should bear some comparison with the amount collected. I find that in 1850 the whole expense of collecting the revenue of the country was only five per cent. It is now proposed to appropriate $3,600,000 which will amount to nine per cent. upon the whole estimated revenue of the coming year. In no single year, from 1850 to 1857, did the expense of collecting the revenue amount to over six per cent., and here a proposition is made to swell this amount to nine per cent. on the whole revenue of the country from customs.

I hope that it will not prevail, for I believe the amount inserted in the bill by the Senate—$3,000,000—altogether too large. I believe that $2,240,000 is more than is required for collecting the revenue of the coming year. I believe a whole army of supernumeraries might be dismissed from the custom-houses along the Atlantic slope. This enormous expenditure of $3,000,000 might safely be reduced to $2,450,000. I admit I was in error in regard to the expense for California. I was not aware of that. I supposed the whole amount was included here. I find the expenses upon the Atlantic slope as the Senator from Virginia states them to be. The expenses upon the Atlantic slope in 1851 for collecting $49,017,567 were $1,882,000. In 1852, for collecting $47,000,000, they were $2,093,000. In 1853, for collecting $58,000,000, which is $18,000,000 more than the estimated revenue for the coming year, the whole expense of collecting on the Atlantic coast was $2,366,000. The proposition now under consideration is to give $3,600,000 for the collection of $40,000,000. Sir, it is enormous. To appropriate nine per cent. upon the whole amount collected for the expense of the collection of the revenue of this Government, is perfectly outrageous. I hope the amendment of the House will not prevail, and that we shall adhere to our amendment giving $3,000,000. Were it not too late, I should move to reduce the amount to $2,450,000, which would be $200,000 more than it cost to collect $58,000,000 in 1853. I hope the Senate will adhere to its original proposition of $3,000,000.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. "Will the Senate concur in the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate?"

Mr. WILSON. I must ask for the yeas and nays on that question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. CHANDLER. If we concur in the amendment, that will leave the amount at $3,600,000, will it not?

Mr. SIMMONS. Those in favor of retaining the $3,000,000 appropriation will vote "nay," I suppose.

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir; those in favor of the proposition reducing it to $3,000,000 will vote "nay," and those in favor of increasing the amount, and allowing $3,600,000, will vote "yea."

Mr. STUART. I beg the attention of the Senate for a single moment. I shall vote for this motion; and I wish to state, in a few words, why I shall do so. As the bill came here before, it appropriated for an indefinite period $4,000,000 annually, for collecting the revenue. As it stands now, it simply appropriates $4,000,000 for one year. The House has amended our section which we substituted for the remainder of the bill by adding that amount to it. I am willing to try it for one year; and if it can then be reduced very readily, without injury to the Government, I will vote to reduce it.

Mr. TOOMBS. That the expenses of the collection of the revenue have passed all reasonable bounds is an undeniable fact; but the idea of taking an absolute sum without any reference to the wants of the service or the laws of the land, it seems to me, is a very injudicious way of reducing them. I was willing myself to make some measure of reduction, and I am willing to indicate my opinion that the existing state of things does not answer. But in looking into this question, it is very apparent that the fault for the last five or six years has been with Congress themselves; and I believe those gentlemen who are most clamorous about the expense have gone on and by law have created, time and again, every session, ports of entry and delivery.

Mr. STUART. Ports of delivery generally.

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, they are generally ports of delivery. In all those you create new offices; and yet these gentlemen never voted for any of them!

Mr. SIMMONS. I never voted for one of them.

Mr. TOOMBS. Well, like many other things, they always pass; and when I utter opposition to them, I find but dull ears in the Senate. They pass somehow. Nobody votes for them, and yet they get on the statute-book. I may not be accurate as to the amount, but I believe, during the last four or five years, you have doubled the ports of delivery in the United States. They have got to be paid for. You have made the office, and you are compelled to pay the man according to the usual scale elsewhere. An executive officer says here is a port of delivery, and you must have a Government officer there, as was the case at the last session, where a man had to be appointed at a place in the West, somewhere on the Ohio river. An act of Congress directs it, and it must be done. Revenue has to be paid there by the order of Congress, and the Government must appoint officers there; otherwise they will be charged, as they were by my honorable friend from New York [Mr. KING] some time ago, with violating the laws of Congress. He said, "here is a law for the erection of custom-houses, which is not carried out."

In this very case it would be impossible to reduce it by naming an absolute sum. I presume every one of the appropriations is for the payment of something which is put down in the Blue Book. Whatever is put down there has to be paid for. If the Government officers refuse to do it at a particular place, we shall hear another clamor in the Senate about the dispensing power; that they are acting like James II. when he dispensed with the laws of the land; and that a free country ought not to have a dispensing power. Congress ordered it, they say, and it must be done whether there is money or not. That has been the argument of several gentlemen around me during this session. I think, about ten years ago, when I was on the Committee of Ways and Means in the House of Representatives, we brought down the expenditure on the Atlantic coast to $1,750,000. At the next session, in order to carry this $1,750,000, we cut off here and there, and abolished offices here and there; and the whole Congress gathered together in one solid body, like a band of mad bulls, against our action. Every one said, "do not strike me down; retrench in every place but right here; cut somebody else down."

Like a boil, the retrenchment was never on the right place. Every place, according to some gentlemen, was the worst place at which it could be commenced.

If you want to retrench at New York, a gentleman from South Carolina or Georgia will think it is probably a very good place; but if you want to retrench at Savannah, he can find a great many places where it had better be commenced than at Savannah. If you want to retrench at New Orleans, the magnitude of its business will be explained to us very graphically, as it was the other day by my friend over the way from the city of New Orleans, [Mr. SLIDELL;] for then he insisted, probably with a great deal of justice, that New Orleans cannot get along with the present force; she wants more officers. An excuse was given here why certain officers had not discharged their duty, by which honest men were to be mulcted in great sums of money, that we had not officers enough to do the duty, and they insisted upon putting a great burden on honest people upon the ground that the Government did not furnish officers enough to inquire into frauds on the revenue.

Though, in common with the Senate, I am for a reduction, and voted for it, I think the proper plan is, to keep it on its present basis. The proposition to bring California on the same basis with New York is a wise one, and I will vote for that now because I know it is right; but as to reducing the whole amount, it is only in extreme cases that we ought to do it. The House of Representatives says I will give you $3,600,000, and then let the Committee on Commerce, or whatever committee has charge of this business, present a new schedule. I have no doubt you have two or three hundred men in New York that ought not to be there. I have no doubt in the world that you have more at Savannah than are needed. There is a constant pressure on the Government to increase them, because gentlemen have their friends there, and they are offices that are sought by their constituents. Why? Because serving the public is not paid for as labor on generous and liberal principles; but a scavenger about your Capitol, a man that you could get for thirty dollars a month, you pay a thousand dollars a year. When you create an office there are a thousand applicants for it. An honest laboring man is not running about to get employment from you, if you do not pay him more than anybody else. A man who could not earn a sixpence in any honest employment, we give a thousand dollars a year to as inspector in one of our towns; and then he comes to a member of Congress or the Senate, to make it $1,500, because, being an officer of the Government, he must live respectably, and must live like a gentleman. Surely you would not have your officers do otherwise. They must keep fast horses to trot in two forty, or inside of three minutes at least. Of course you could not expect the clerks in your Departments here to live in any other way. The reason of all this is, because you have departed from the great fundamental principle, on which you ought to pay everybody. Pay what that kind of labor and talent is worth, and then there will be no struggle; then honest men will not be pressing you for offices, because they can serve somebody else as well as you, and receive as good pay.

Therefore, I suppose, under existing circumstances, we had better let the amount in the bill stand at what the House has put it, although I would prefer the other than get into a squabble when we have not got the information on which to act. As to these schedules which the Senator from Michigan makes about collecting $58,000,000 of revenue for so much money, and therefore that we ought to collect $40,000,000 for less, that Senator knows, or ought to know, that the expense of collection at a particular place does not depend on the amount of revenue collected. The same officers in New York could collect $100,000,000 as easily as $40,000,000. It would not require another man. A great many of your officers are on preventive service, to prevent smuggling and protect the revenue. If you put it on the basis that because at a certain place you do not collect more than five thousand dollars, therefore you should not pay more, it would be a very absurd thing, and would let in a sluice of smuggling. A great deal of this is preventive service; and but for it, there would be the largest and most inordinate abuses. Therefore, the expense of collecting does not at all depend upon the amount collected. If you have $40,000,000 to collect this year, and had $48,000,000 before, you must keep the same officers. It is as easy to go through all the elements of an invoice of $100,000 as $50,000. A merchant who imported $50,000 worth of dutiable goods last year, may, under the stringency of the times, think $20,000 worth will do this year, but it takes as many officers, and there are as many things to be done on an importation of $20,000 as $50,000. Therefore there is nothing in the comparison drawn by the Senator from Michigan. It does not make the slightest difference if they were the same kind of goods. If, with reference to the difficulties of the country, only half as many of different variety are imported this year as last, it would take just as many men to collect the duties. Then his comparison will not answer; but I believe there are more officers than are necessary to collect forty or fifty-eight million dollars.

Hence, I think, if we are going to retrench, we should take up the subject intelligently. Let us see who is willing to part with this port of delivery, with this custom-house, or with the officers in this town, if he has the appointment of them. There is the great difficulty about it; there is the great trouble. If you mean reform, you must put it on some conservative intelligible principle. Until ten years ago, when this law was brought into the House of Representatives, there was no limit. This bill never showed its face from 1779 to 1849 in Congress, because the collector paid the expense of collection out of the revenues, and all he ever showed you was the net proceeds. We thought, as a check, we would compel him to bring the expenses here, and we would appropriate for it as we do for the Post Office Department. This is a permanent appropriation until you act again. I suppose that is the reason you go up to $4,000,000. I was opposed to that, and shall vote against it; but I am for keeping the appropriation on the basis of last year until you can reform it intelligently, which is not possible at the present time.

Mr. SIMMONS. It seems to me that the speeches on this bill are somewhat inconsistent. Yesterday the great reason for making this appropriation of $4,000,000 was because it was permanent. That was the argument of the Senator from Virginia. He agreed that it was too much, but he thought it best to leave it at $4,000,000. Now the reason for reducing the appropriation to $3,600,000, is because it is only for a year. For some reason or other these appropriations will get up. If you cannot get them up on the ground that they are permanent, you will get them up on the ground that they are not permanent.

The Senator from Georgia says that the amount of revenue does not make any difference as to the expense of collection. I agree with him that it does not make a pro rata difference. But these officers were multiplied when we were importing coal and salt from Nova Scotia in large quantities, and we had to have more measurers to measure it. We are not doing so now, but we do not get rid of the measurers. I think they might possibly be got rid of. I venture to say that there are now ten men where there ought to be one upon any data of figures which can be presented to us. I think that the bill as it originally came to us, appropriated, for the six months now upon us, $1,600,000. They now propose to appropriate $1,800,000 for the last two quarters of the present year. Am I not correct in that? I will ask the Senator from Virginia if there was not an appropriation in the bill for the two current quarters we are going through of $1,600,000?

Mr. HUNTER. There was in the original bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. As it came here yesterday. I suggested to the Senator from Massachusetts, inasmuch as the Department had fixed that sum for the two current quarters through which we are now passing, to make his amendment just equal to it, the estimate on these two quarters being $800,000. He thought it too much. I had heard an estimate made that the Department had saved about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars in California alone. The Senator from Massachusetts said he would come down to $3,000,000. I believe that the proposition from the House is to increase the amount for the two current quarters, which was $1,600,000 yesterday, to $1,800,000, and go from $3,000,000 to $3,600,000, and to add $200,000 in the first section, making it altogether $3,800,000.

I am astonished that my friend from Georgia should ever agree to such a measure; but I am not disappointed when I see the Senator from Virginia, who advocated the appropriation yesterday because it was permanent and necessary, supporting the House amendment. The Senator can present it as well as any man in the Senate. I said yesterday that I did not vote against it from any disposition to cut any Department short of the necessary means. I will vote them what is sufficient, at any time; but I have no more doubt that $1,800,000 is ample than I have that $1,250,000 is—not a bit. If I had, I would vote for more. I believe, sincerely, that as long as we keep appropriating all that is asked, there will never be a man dismissed. That was the reason for my vote. I am willing to give them $1,600,000, which is just what they ask for the two quarters through which we are passing; and I am willing to go to the same ratio next year—$800,000 a quarter.

Now, when you come to this matter of measuring the coal imported, the more cargoes you have, the more it will cost. There is a great deal of labor about it, but there is a great deal less of it imported now than there was formerly. In the city of New York there is at present great complaint that there are not laborers enough to do this manual labor. It takes a great deal of labor. The importations of goods during the present year will not be more than two thirds as much as they were last year, and will take less labor, and be a diminished expense. I admit the salaries will be just as much. But here is a reduction in California that still remains, by putting the salaries of the officers there on the same ratio with those in New York. That will take off fifty or sixty thousand dollars more. With a reduction made in salaries, $800,000 a quarter will be ample hereafter. That is the amount that has been spent heretofore upon an importation of $360,000,000. Taking the $200,000 extra for the two present quarters, it makes the amount at least two hundred thousand dollars more than was ever spent in this country. I want to know if Senators call that retrenchment. It will give you $200,000 more for the next year, and for every succeeding year, than you have for this; for it is now $200,000 more than is asked for the next fiscal year. It will give $3,800,000 for the next fiscal year. I have not looked into this subject, but I have never heard of the expenditures exceeding $3,600,000. I understood, from the Senator from Virginia, that there was appropriated for California last year $436,000, and now but $280,000. There is a reduction of $150,000 in that place. Here is a reduction contemplated next year by cutting down salaries in California; and it is perfectly evident that a less amount will be needed during the present fiscal year than during the last year.

I have no disposition to thwart the objects of the Administration at all. I want to see something done. I repeat again what I said yesterday, that it is no sort of economy to stop the building of vessels for defense, or fortifications, and putting the sum thus saved upon the salary of these officers. That is the kind of economy I see practiced. I regret to say it, but I have never known anything pass here that looked like lessening the expenditures for the officers and employés of the Government. The last man who I thought would ever give way was my friend from Georgia.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is no reduction of salaries proposed.

Mr. SIMMONS. It is proposed to reduce the amount appropriated, and the effect of that will probably be, that they will dismiss some of these officers.

Mr. TOOMBS. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. That is what I think ought to be done, and that is my purpose in endeavoring to reduce the amount.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator from Rhode Island is mistaken in supposing that this proposition contemplates spending more than has been heretofore expended. As I said before, this appropriation of $3,600,000 is less by some twenty thousand dollars than was expended in the fiscal year 1857. I also stated before, that, since 1854, we have never expended less than $3,500,000 in collecting the revenue. It seems to me that it is manifestly unsafe for us to undertake to strike in the dark, to strike blindly, and to attempt to reduce the appropriations below what they have been for four years, upon the mere theory that such a reduction might safely be made. I said the other evening, if Senators chose to reduce it to what was actually expended, that I would not object to such an amendment. That, however, was not done; but it was reduced to $3,000,000, which was $600,000 less than was expended in 1857; and I did not believe we could get along without it.

Now, sir, I recollect the time when the first proposition was made, making this appropriation for the payment of the expenses of the collection of customs, after the whole amount of revenue was directed to be paid into the Treasury. It was introduced by a gentleman then from the State of New York—Mr. King, I think. I recollect looking into this subject at that time, and I found that the whole matter had before that been at the discretion of the Secretaries. They paid out of the revenue what they thought necessary in order to discharge the expenses of collection, giving what salaries they chose to the inferior officers, making everything pretty much as they chose to have it. The first step was then taken, which was one of reform, to require them to pay all the receipts into the Treasury, and to pay the expenses of collection by appropriation; but still the difficulty occurred that the salaries of the subordinate officers were matters of regulation. I recollect turning my attention to it at that time, for I was anxious to introduce any scheme of reform; but I found that there were not sufficient data, and it was on my motion that that provision of law was introduced which required them to state what they expended in collecting the revenue, in salaries, &c., at each port, in order that by these statements we might have at least this check on the expenditure: that we might see how the money was disbursed and distributed, and in order, too, that we might be able hereafter to collect out of these statements the means, if we could, of digesting some system.

Now, sir, whenever we mean to retrench the expenses of the collection of revenue, it must be done upon system. I understand that there has been before the House of Representatives, during this year, a scheme of revenue laws which has been presented by the Secretary of the Treasury. I know that his attention is directed towards this matter, and I hope that early in the next session we shall have some scheme presented to us; and I shall be ready to go for any scheme that will promise to meet the necessities of the Government in regard to guarding and collecting the revenue, at the same time that it diminishes the expenditure. I will go for it with pleasure whenever such a scheme shall be presented; but, for the present, I am unwilling to appropriate less for collecting the revenue than has been expended heretofore—less than the sum which, I may say, has been expended for the last four or five years. I think it would be unsafe to attempt any reform upon mere theory, or to cut down the appropriation upon mere theory; for it is to be remembered that this expenditure is vital; upon it depends the revenue which we collect. It is through it that we guard and protect the revenue from smuggling and fraud; it is through it that we provide the means by which we gather it into the Treasury. If we were to make any mistake, so that we should not be able to keep up the preventive service, or to keep up the machinery necessary for collecting the revenue, it might operate more mischievously than a failure in any other department of the Government to appropriate what is necessary. I think, therefore, the Senate may be well content to agree to the amendment of the House of Representatives, which proposes a scheme of expenditure based upon the actual experience of some years past.

Mr. CHANDLER. The honorable Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] has fallen into an error in regard to the expense of collecting a given sum of money. I will allow myself to be corrected in almost any point by that honorable Senator; but on the cost of importing goods I beg to state that I consider my information better than his. It is well known that in every sea-port an inspector is placed on board a foreign vessel the moment she arrives, and that inspector must remain on board the vessel until her cargo is landed. Will that Senator tell me that the expenses of watching a thousand vessels in port, will be no greater than of watching twenty? You have to keep a thousand inspectors if there are a thousand vessels in port from foreign countries. It is the same in the custom-house proper, and in nearly all the expenses.

Mr. TOOMBS. My proposition was that a vessel which has but $20,000 of dutiable goods on board requires an inspector as well as if it had $1,000,000.

Mr. CHANDLER. That is true; but fewer vessels arrive now, and the vessels do not come in with half cargoes. I say that the expenses of collecting your revenues, while they may not be reduced in the exact ratio of the reduction of importations, may still be reduced in very nearly that ratio. A few of your high-salaried men must remain, but you may cut off your supernumeraries; you may reduce your inspectors in the city of New York from three to two hundred; you may reduce your inspectors at every sea-port in accordance with the reduction of business. You may do the same thing in your custom-houses, and with regard to all the expenses of collecting the revenue. I believe that with a reduction of the duties collected, from $65,000,000 to $40,000,000, you may safely diminish the expenses of collection $600,000 a year, and yet have a surplus. I hope we shall not accede to the amendment of the House of Representatives, but shall adhere to our amendment reducing the amount to $3,000,000. I still believe that that is more than is necessary.

Mr. SIMMONS. I perceive that I was right in the statement that the original bill appropriated for the current half year, from January 1, to July 1, 1858, $1,600,000, and the House amendment increased that to $1,800,000, together with such sum as may be received from cartage, storage, and labor for the half year. All these incidental charges for warehousing are in addition to this sum, and we know very well that warehousing last year was pretty large.

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator say storage? Storage was once very large, but we get none now, because of the system of private warehouses.

Mr. SIMMONS. We have a great many warehouses. I see signs on them, when I go to New York.

Mr. HUNTER. We have in San Francisco, nowhere else.

Mr. SIMMONS. The amendment of the House carries the appropriation for the current year $200,000 higher than the original bill.

Mr. HUNTER. This is making a provision for the year. It is true that when you proposed $4,000,000 per annum, the Department asked only $1,600,000 for the first two quarters, but you do not know what the expenditure was for the two preceding quarters. The way they have been getting on was this: when Mr. King, of New York, first introduced his bill it was for $2,500,000 annually; it was then a great deal more than enough; surpluses accumulated, and when the expenditure went beyond the amount of the appropriation, the surpluses of previous years were transferred. It was considered to be a continuing service, and those surpluses were used to help out the deficiencies. It is in that way that they have been enabled to get along until now, but now that resource is exhausted, and the only safe thing we can do is to go back, and take a series of years, and I have shown that from 1854 up, they have never expended less than $3,500,000, and in 1857 it was a little more than three million six hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia, upon what estimate the $1,600,000 for the current half year was put in the original bill as it came to us? Was not it from the Department?

Mr. HUNTER. The estimate was a double estimate—$1,600,000 for the half year, and $4,000,000 annually. If the first appropriation turned out to be too little, the excess in the annual appropriation might have made up for the deficiency.

Mr. SIMMONS. I know it is very easy to mystify people, and I may not understand this matter; but if $1,600,000 were appropriated for the two current quarters ending the 30th of June next, I desire to know whether it could be helped out by an appropriation for the next year?

Mr. HUNTER. Certainly.

Mr. SIMMONS. How?

Mr. HUNTER. As I said before, it has been construed to be a continuing service; and a surplus in one year may be expended to supply any such deficiency. The Senator from Rhode Island, in order to show any inconsistency, must show either that since 1854 they have gotten along with less than thirty-five or thirty-six hundred thousand dollars, or else he must show that there is an estimate from the Secretary, by which he undertakes to say they could get along for less than this amount. He can show none. He can only show that in that double estimate the Secretary was willing to take $1,600,000 for these two quarters, with a permanent annual appropriation estimated on the basis of $4,000,000; but how much of accumulated surplus he had before the Senator does not know.

Mr. SIMMONS. I want to call the attention of the Senator from Virginia to the figures. In 1854 we collected $66,000,000 of revenue, and on the Atlantic side the expenses of collection were $2,700,000. Next year they were $2,708,000, and in 1856 $3,100,000.

Mr. HUNTER. The Senator does not say what was expended on the Pacific side.

Mr. SIMMONS. When we get this down, we can go over to the Pacific side. I understood the Senator from Virginia and the Senator from California the other day to say that the expenses of collecting the customs on the Pacific side had been reduced over a hundred thousand dollars the present year.

Mr. GWIN. I have not the tables before me. They have been very considerably reduced. I gave the figures the other night.

Mr. SIMMONS. I think the Senator stated the reduction at one hundred and forty or one hundred and fifty thousand dollars.

Mr. GWIN. I think not so much as that.

Mr. SIMMONS. You said the expenditures there for this year would be $289,000.

Mr. GWIN. That was for three quarters—up to the 1st of March.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then take the expenditures for the Pacific side at $400,000 a year, and add them to those on the Atlantic, and you cannot get an average total expenditure of more than $3,200,000. That is the fact, if I can add figures together.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senator will add the expenses on the Pacific to those on the Atlantic coast, he will find that they have been beyond that ever since 1854.

Mr. SIMMONS. I am taking the present expenditures in California, not what they were when they spent $1,250,000 a year. I am taking what are said to be the expenses the present year; and now I want to know if you mean to increase the average by adding $1,000,000 to the present expenditures of California?

Mr. HUNTER. Does the Senator advert to the fact that the expenses have increased a little faster on the Atlantic than they have been diminishing on the Pacific?

Mr. SIMMONS. They increased last year $200,000. In 1855, they were $2,708,000. I do not see any very great increase in that. I do not wish to waste the time of the Senate. I suppose the idea is, that as you cannot get exactly $4,000,000 for the next year, you will add $200,000 for the current two quarters, and get $3,600,000 for the next year, so as to make $3,800,000.

Mr. KING. I understand that this is an appropriation which continues from year to year without limitation; that is, it continues until further legislation. I suppose the House amendment is amendable, and I therefore offer an amendment to limit the appropriation to the next fiscal year.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MASON.) This amendment is not amendable. It is an amendment of the House of Representatives to an amendment of the Senate.

Mr. SIMMONS. We can concur in their amendment with an amendment.

Mr. PUGH. There is a Senate amendment and a House amendment. This is an amendment to an amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the amendment of the Senate. It has gone to the last stage of amendment.

Mr. TOOMBS. That rule does not apply to amendments between the Houses. We can take the House amendment with an amendment. In our own body the rule is, that we cannot go to an amendment in the third degree; but when the other House has amended an amendment of the Senate, I do not think that rule of limitation applies. The Senate may agree to the amendment of the House with an amendment.

Mr. HUNTER. That has been the practice. I think we have treated an amendment of the House as a proposition in the first degree.

Mr. KING. Then I offer my amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the amendment.

Mr. KING. I am willing that the vote shall first be taken on the amendment of the House in regard to the amount of the appropriation.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Then the question is on concurring in the amendment of the House to the first amendment of the Senate.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 13; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Poik, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Essenden, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Simmons, Trumbull, and Wade—13.

So the amendment to the amendment was concurred in.

Mr. HUNTER. I move to insist upon our next amendment in regard to the salaries of the officers in California, to which the House disagreed with an amendment. I am willing to apply the reduction to the officers who get high salaries; but I am informed that it would not be safe to apply the New-York standard to the clerks and inferior officers who are paid under regulation. You cannot get clerks in California for as little as you can in New York. Let the amendment to to which the House disagreed be read.

The Secretary read the fourth Senate amendment, as follows:

And be it further enacted, That no collector of the customs, deputy collector, naval officer, deputy naval officer, surveyor, deputy surveyor, general appraiser, superintendent of warehouses, or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenue, shall receive a greater compensation than is now paid to the officers and persons engaged in said service at the port of New York: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to increase the compensation of any officer of the customs, or of any person engaged in the collection thereof.

Mr. HUNTER. I move that the Senate insist on that amendment, with an amendment to strike out the words "or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenues." These are persons, as I understand, who are paid by regulation. They are the clerks and inferior employees.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Virginia that, this being a Senate amendment in which the House refused to concur, the Chair entertains doubts whether the Senate can now amend its own amendment and send it back. He will, however, take the opinion of the Senate.

Mr. HUNTER. If a committee of conference reported that we should insist on our amendment with an amendment, nobody would doubt our power to do so. I only propose that we shall do now what we do through committees of conference—insist on our amendment with an amendment. However, if the Chair rules it out of order, I shall not press it.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not rule it out of order. He only suggests, for the consideration of the Senate, that he entertains doubts whether, the House having refused to concur in an amendment of the Senate, it is competent to the Senate to send back the same amendment in a different form.

Mr. HUNTER. Then I shall move to insist on our amendment, and ask for a conference. I am willing to make that compromise. I believe it is necessary after what I have heard. If it be the pleasure of the Senate, I move to insist on our amendment, and ask for a conference.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not really see why we should go through that form. Has not the Senate the right to modify its own amendments? It proposed an amendment to the House. The House sent it back, disagreed to. Now, we modify the amendment, and ask them if they will agree to it in this form. What is to prevent us from doing that? We can modify it, and bring it in such a shape as to suit them. The original amendment did not suit them. We can now withdraw a part of it.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we can do it in the way I propose, without debate or difficulty. I think we had better do that, although I agree with the Senator from Louisiana, that we have the right to amend the amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will receive the amendment if it be offered.

Mr. HUNTER. I do not like to run counter to the sense of the Senate, and I think it would be better to insist on our amendment, and ask for a committee of conference. I make that motion.

Mr. PEARCE. I really think it is unnecessary, and if there should be no further debate, I hope the Senate will express its opinion that it is competent, in this stage of the business, to entertain the proposition of the Senator from Virginia to amend our amendment.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands the Senator from Virginia to decline making it.

Mr. PEARCE. I think it will be a briefer way of disposing of the bill.

Mr. GWIN. I do not object to fixing the compensation of all salaried officers by law; but the Senate has included some who are not salaried. I shall have to say something on the proposition in that form.

Mr. HUNTER. I think we shall get along easier by a committee of conference, because we shall get rid of a speech [Laughter]—not that I am not very glad always to hear the Senator from California. I move that we insist on our amendment, and ask for a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. HUNTER, BRIGHT, and WADE, were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

A message was afterwards received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had insisted upon its disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, and had agreed to the conference asked by the Senate upon the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. JOHN COCHRANE, Mr. WARNER L. UNDERWOOD, and Mr. CHARLES L. SCOTT, managers at the same on its part.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PEARCE submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1859, having met, have, after a full and free conference, agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the House do recede from their disagreement to the tenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to said amendment with an amendment, as follows: insert the word "and" between the words "clerks" and "messengers," in the third line, and strike out the words "and watchmen," in the fourth line.

That the House do recede from their amendment to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to said amendment with an amendment, as follows: strike out the word "five," in the third line, and insert the word "seven."

J. A. PEARCE,
L. F. S. FOSTER,
JOHN R. THOMSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

WARREN WINSLOW,
E. B. WASHBURN,
W. S. GROSSBECK,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PEARCE. I will state to the Senate, that the House having concurred in eight of the fourteen amendments of the Senate, and the Senate having receded from four of its amendments which were non-concurred in by the House, there remained but two amendments as the subject of conference between the two committees. The first of these is the amendment relating to the pay of the clerks, messengers, and watchmen at the Washington navy-yard. The pay of the clerks and messengers at that yard was enlarged by the act of 1856; but the watchmen were not included in that act. The House proposed to recede from its disagreement to the provision of the Senate which gave back pay and increased pay to the clerks and messengers, omitting the watchmen who were not provided for in the law of 1856. The amendment, therefore, as now proposed to the Senate by the committee of conference, carries out the law of 1856, in which the watchmen were not included. The fourteenth amendment related to the additional war steamers. The Senate inserted five war steamers, besides one for service in the China seas; and the House struck out five and inserted ten. The compromise of the committee of conference is a very simple one: it proposes to insert seven instead of ten or five. We could not exactly split the difference, saying seven and a half, but we came as near to it as we could, so that the Senate has got rather the better of the bargain.

Mr. THOMSON, of New Jersey. I understand that the House of Representatives have already adopted the report of their committee.

Mr. PEARCE. That is an additional reason why the Senate should agree to this report. I hope the Senate will concur in the report, which will put an end to the dispute.

Mr. PUGH. Is the bill here or in the House?

Mr. PEARCE. The bill is in the House.

Mr. PUGH. I merely wish to put in my protest against the Senate agreeing to the report of any conference committee without the bill to which it relates.

Mr. HUNTER. We are entitled to the bill; the House has acted.

Mr. PUGH. When the House send us the bill, I have no objection to acting on it; but I wish to put it on record that I protest against voting on bills that are not before the Senate, and I shall ask for the yeas and nays—not that I oppose the report, but that I think there ought to be some regularity in legislation.

Mr. HUNTER. The papers will be here in a minute.

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection to action when the papers come; but I do object to voting on this report without the papers.

Mr. HUNTER. We can send to the House and have the papers here in five minutes.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on concurring in the report of the committee.

The report was concurred in.

A message was subsequently received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

PENSION MONEYS.

Mr. CLAY submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the Senate, as soon after the commencement of the next session of Congress as possible, the amount of money paid for pensions in each of the States and Territories since the commencement of the present Government, discriminating between the Army and Navy pensions; and that he also state the aggregate amount paid by the United States for pensions of both kinds in all the States and Territories.

LOAN BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

The bill was read twice by its title.

Mr. HUNTER. I would prefer that that bill should lie over till to-night. I cannot now believe that it will be necessary to add to it; but perhaps it may be. We want to see how much is added to the estimates by the action of Congress. I think it will turn out that we have cut down nearly as much as we have added; but we may want to add to the loan.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) It will be laid aside.

NANCY MAGILL.

Mr. PUGH. I ask the Senate to indulge me in calling up a little bill which I have deferred, because I was waiting for the Senator from Virginia. It is the bill (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Nancy Magill, of Ohio, which was objected to the other day on some general ground. I move to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to place the name of Nancy Magill, widow of James Magill, of Ohio, on the pension roll, at the rate of eight dollars a month, for five years, commencing March 4, 1858.

Mr. CLAY. Is she the widow of a soldier?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir. He was appointed lieutenant, and resigned because he was mortally wounded and could not serve.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

COURTS IN MINNESOTA.

Mr. BAYARD, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 412) supplemental to an act for the admission of the State of Minnesota into the Union, have instructed me to report it back with an amendment. It is merely to carry out the law under which Minnesota was admitted, so as to define the times and places of holding the Federal courts in that State. I hope the bill will be considered now. It will not take two minutes.

The bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole. The amendment of the Judiciary Committee was to strike out all after the enacting clause, and insert:

That the judge of the district court for the district of Minnesota shall hold a term of said court in each year at the following places, to wit: At Preston, to commence on the first Monday in June, and at St. Paul, on the first Monday in October. The said court shall be open at all times for the purpose of hearing and deciding cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction, so far as the same can be done without a jury. The judge of the said court shall appoint a clerk for said district, who shall reside and keep the records and papers of said courts at either of the places herein designated for the holding of said court, as the judge in his discretion shall direct.

The amendment was agreed to. The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PROPOSITION FOR A RECESS.

Mr. SLIDELL. I move that the Senate take a recess until half past six o'clock. There are a number of committees of conference out engaged on the appropriation bills.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

Mr. SLIDELL. It is impossible that we can do business with so small a Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. There is a motion pending to reconsider the vote postponing the homestead bill, and I desire to say a few words on that question. I shall not occupy the Senate longer than fifteen minutes.

Mr. SLIDELL. I do not know that that is any particular inducement for me to withdraw my motion. I prefer to have the opportunity of taking a little refreshment. We shall be here late to-night, and our time will be, perhaps, worse than uselessly consumed if we remain here continuously from this time forward.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I think a motion to reconsider is a privileged question, and as such, I call for the motion to which I have alluded.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. It is a privileged question to make the motion, not to consider it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I insist that it is a privileged question, and can be called up by the mover at any time.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that it is a privileged question to move a reconsideration, but afterwards it depends on the Senate to say whether they will consider the motion.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The motion can be called up at any time by the mover. What is before the Senate now but the motion to reconsider, which I have called up?

Mr. SLIDELL. I would ask if a motion to take a recess is not in the nature of a motion to adjourn, and is not of a higher order than a motion to reconsider? It strikes me in that light.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. It does not strike me so.

Mr. CLAY. At all events, when a motion to take a recess has been made, and is pending, it is certainly not in order to supersede it by another motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair so understands.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I wish to speak to the motion for a recess. I think if there is any fit occasion on which we can dispose of a large quantity of executive business in executive session it is now. I am as anxious as my friend from Louisiana to indulge in some refreshment; but we are all making all the speed we can for the purpose of closing the session on Monday, if possible. It is very well known to the Senate that our table is burdened with nominations, and in the race-horse speed that has characterized our movements for the last few days there has been no attention paid to the Calendar in executive session. I ask my friend to withdraw his motion, to enable me to move that we proceed to the consideration of executive business. It is well known that unless we do that now, and have a report between now and Monday morning, on some nominations, they will have to lie over, and even on Monday it will be in the power of any Senator to carry over all the nominations unless we take them up by consent.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will with great cheerfulness accede to the request of the Senator from Alabama, provided it be understood that we go into executive session merely for business to which there is no objection, and for the purpose of reference.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. That is what I designed.

Mr. SLIDELL. That will not take more than ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. No gentlemen have a right to make an agreement that we shall take up such business as they choose in executive session.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators will allow the Chair to inquire whether the motion for a recess is withdrawn?

Mr. SLIDELL. Yes, sir.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FITZPATRICK. I move an executive session.

The motion was agreed to; and, after some time spent in executive session, the doors were reopened at fifteen minutes before five o'clock.

NAVAL APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PEARCE. I understand that the action of the Senate on the naval appropriation bill has, by some mistake, been incorrectly reported to the House of Representatives. The House has been notified that we receded from the amendment in relation to the Brooklyn navy-yard, whereas we not only receded from that, but from three other amendments. It seems to me, the proper way to correct the error would be to send a message to the House to inform them that the Senate receded from all these amendments.

Mr. HUNTER. What did the committee of conference report to us as to these amendments?

Mr. PEARCE. Nothing as to these four amendments; because they had been receded from by the Senate. The first and fifth amendments had been receded from, I think, on the report of the first committee of conference; and the Senate afterwards receded from the second and third amendments.

Mr. HUNTER. All that is necessary to make it complete, inasmuch as the report says nothing of the amendments from which we receded, would be to send a message to the House that we did recede from those amendments.

Mr. PEARCE. So I supposed.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the Chair will direct that to be done. The Chair hears no objection.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. HUNTER. I find that we shall have to act on the loan bill at once. I was not aware before of the precise action which the House had taken. They intended to pass the precise bill which we passed; not choosing, I believe, that we should originate measures of this sort; but, owing to some of their rules of order, they moved to strike out the enacting clause; and the bill was passed as originally reported here, not as we amended it. My purpose is to take it up and substitute our bill for it, which will be more acceptable to them than their own; and if, after we ascertain the amount appropriated, it be necessary to add to the loan, we can do it then. I therefore ask that the bill be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no objection to taking up the bill.

The bill (H. R. No. 552) was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUNTER. I move, as a substitute for it, our own bill. Their bill, owing to a mistake, as I have mentioned, was passed as originally reported by us.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair hears no demands for the reading of the amendment at length. ["Oh, no."]

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendment was concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time, and passed.

SIGNAL LIGHTS.

Mr. CLARK submitted the following resolution, and asked for its immediate consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to cause the invention of Samuel Gardner, jr., for making signal lights on vessels at sea and in harbors, by electricity, to be tested; and that he report the result at the commencement of the next session of Congress.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. I move that the resolution be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. KING. Is it a mere resolution of inquiry?

Mr. ALLEN. It is not merely a resolution of inquiry, but it directs that experiments shall be made—to what extent we do not know.

Mr. CLARK. One suggestion, I think, will satisfy the Senator from Rhode Island. It is the invention of the same gentleman who has put in the method of lighting the Senate Chamber. He has also a method of furnishing a light on a ship at sea. I have a letter from Lieutenant Maury, saying that he thinks it far exceeds anything he has known; and I dare say that in the vacation the Secretary of the Navy may make some test of it, so that it may be known what it is.

Mr. ALLEN. The experiments that are applied to the ships, not only of this country, but abroad, are innumerable.

Mr. CLARK. I have a letter from Lieutenant Maury saying that it is desirable this should be tested.

Mr. ALLEN. A number of such applications have been referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, and probably if the experiments were carried out which have been presented to the committee for the last six months they would cost $100,000.

Mr. CLARK. I do not suppose this will cost anything of any consequence.

Mr. ALLEN. It will involve a considerable expenditure.

Mr. CLARK. I am sorry it should be delayed, because it is desirable that this test should be made during the vacation.

Mr. MASON. If the Secretary of the Navy is instructed to have these experiments made, it will involve an expenditure of money of the amount of which we are uninformed.

The motion to refer the resolution to the Committee on Naval Affairs was agreed to.

JOHN HOLLAND.

On motion of Mr. SEBASTIAN, the bill (H. R. No. 631) granting an invalid pension to John Holland, of Arkansas, was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to grant him a pension of eight dollars a month during his life, commencing December 14, 1857.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 230) for the relief of Mary Bennett, reported it without amendment, and that it ought not to pass.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the motion to print the letter of W. Reckyan Bey, with his account of the dromedary, its treatment, and uses, reported the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate, in addition to the usual number, two thousand copies of the letter of W. Reckyan Bey to Edward De Leon, Esq., consul general of the United States, in Egypt, on the treatment and use of the dromedary.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Treasury relative to the fees or charges of the consul general for Canada, on goods imported into the United States, reported in favor of the motion, and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the report of the Secretary of the Navy relative to the cost of building and repairing vessels of war, reported in favor of the motion, and it was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a motion to print the message of the President in relation to the Isthmus of Tehuantepec, reported in favor of printing the message, and the motion was agreed to.

Mr. FITCH, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) in regard to the carrying the United States mails from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, California, reported it without amendment, and asked for its immediate consideration.

Mr. TOOMBS. I object.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the joint resolution cannot now be considered.

WILLIAM RANDOLPH.

Mr. FOSTER. The Committee on Pensions to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 650) granting an invalid pension to William Randolph, have instructed me to report the same back without amendment, and I beg leave to say a word upon it. This petitioner is from the State of Kentucky. He is eighty-nine years old. He was injured in General Wayne's campaign in 1794. The bill proposes to give him four dollars a month from the 4th of May, of the present year. I hope it will be passed without objection.

By unanimous consent the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole, reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. GWIN, from the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, reported that they had met the conferees on the part of the House of Representatives, and that the committee were unable to agree. He moved that the Senate further insist on its amendments, and ask for another conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Mr. Toombs, Mr. Brown, and Mr. COLLAMER were appointed conferees on the part of the Senate.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

On motion of Mr. GREEN, the Senate proceeded to consider the following resolution, submitted by him on the 28th of May:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be requested to report to the Senate, at the commencement of the next session of Congress, a full and complete list of all collection districts for the collection of duties on imports; showing in each district:

1. The amount of revenue annually collected;
2. The amount expended for salaries of officers and employees annually; and
3. The amounts expended for custom-houses, or rents of offices, and warehouses.

Also, that he state what custom houses, or ports of entry or delivery, can be dispensed with, with a proper regard to economy and the security of the collection of the revenue, and consistently with commercial interests; or what modification of the laws are necessary for the public interests in relation to the collection of customs.

Mr. HAMLIN. I move to amend the resolution, by adding as an additional specification:

4. The name of every person employed directly or indirectly, connected with the collection of the revenue either as officer or agent, and the amount of compensation paid to each, and the law under which such officer or agent was appointed.

Mr. GREEN. I accept the amendment.
The resolution, as modified, was agreed to.

WILLIAM HOWELL.

Mr. BELL. I move that the Senate take up the bill (H. R. No. 513) granting an invalid pension to William Howell, of Tennessee. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. Toombs] has examined the report, and I take it that when he says the bill is proper, no Senator will object to it. The man is very old, and unable to get a living.

Mr. CLAY. Has the bill been referred to the Committee on Pensions?

Mr. BELL. Yes, sir, and reported favorably; and the Senator from Georgia has, at my request, examined the case, and he says it is right.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of William Howell, of Tennessee, on the invalid pension roll at the rate of eight dollars a month, commencing February 23, 1858, and continuing during his natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

MORDECAI'S AND DELAFIELD'S REPORTS.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia, reported a joint resolution (S. No. 53) directing the printing of certain reports therein mentioned; which was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the publication, for the use of the Army and militia, of ten thousand copies of the reports of Major Delafield and Major Mordecai, of the United States Army, on the state of military organization, fortification, and ordnance, as observed by them in the States of Europe during the campaign in the Crimea, and appropriates for this purpose $43,500, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

JOSEPH WEBB.

Mr. HAMLIN. I ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 347) for the relief of Joseph Webb.

Mr. CLAY. I object.

Mr. HAMLIN. I hope the Senator will not object. Allow me to state the case. The bill has passed the House of Representatives, and the Senate committee have considered it and reported it unanimously. The invalid is now in the possession of a pension of six dollars a month. By two as eminent surgeons as there are in the State of Maine it is certified that his disability is total; and this bill proposes to make his pension eight dollars a month for total disability.

Mr. CLAY. I withdraw the objection to that; but I will object to all other pension bills this year.

The motion to take up the bill was agreed to; and it was considered as in Committee of the Whole. It proposes to increase Joseph Webb's pension from six to eight dollars a month, from January 1, 1852.

Mr. CLAY. I must object to that. It violates an established principle of the committee of which I am a member; and the Senator from Maine is mistaken in saying this bill is reported unanimously by the committee. It goes back to 1852. I do not understand for what reason it relates back.

Mr. HAMLIN. I will state to the Senator the reason. It is because the invalid then petitioned Congress for the increase, and the committee reported in favor of it; and the bill was passed through one House at that time. It is adopting the rule applied at the Department, that the pension shall commence from the time when the evidence is complete. In this case it was complete at the time named in the bill. That has been the rule of the committee, and forty bills have been passed on the same principle.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

OREGON MILITARY ROAD.

Mr. DAVIS. I move to take up the bill (H. R. No. 56) making appropriation for the completion of the military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory. Some money was appropriated for the construction of a road from Astoria to Salem, which was intended to be, simply a wagon road; but the money only sufficed to make it a good wagon road for part of the way, and for the rest of the route only a bridle path. The appropriation now asked for is to make it a wagon road from one place to the other. It is important in several relations. If an enemy were to appear on the Columbia river, the Willamette valley, containing the great bulk of the population of Oregon at this time, as it probably ever will, would be compelled to furnish troops for the defense of Astoria and the mouth of the Columbia. Indian depredations may be committed in the valley of the Willamette, and they rely on Astoria for arms and supplies. During a large portion of the year they cannot send by water on account of ice and other obstacles, and they are compelled therefore to go by land. This road is direct from one point to the other, cutting off the great elbow which is made by the two rivers, and is deemed of great importance for military and territorial purposes, whether we look to defense against the Indians or a foreign foe on the exterior. This is the only one of this class of bills, of the number before them, on which the committee have acted favorably, except in regard to one other road, for which they put an amendment on an appropriation bill—a road west from Arkansas. I move to take up this bill, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill was considered, as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to appropriate $30,000, to be expended under the direction of the Secretary of War.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

PAPERS WITHDRAWN.

On motion of Mr. FITCH, it was Ordered, That the papers in the case of C. Alexander and T. Barnard, on the files of the Senate, be referred to the Court of Claims.

On motion of Mr. WRIGHT, it was Ordered, That Catharine Keller have leave to withdraw her petitions and papers.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the bill of the Senate (S. No. 424) for the relief of Georgiana M. Lewis.

DES MOINES LAND GRANT.

Mr. JONES. I ask the Senate to do me the favor to take up the bill (S. No. 386) reported from the Committee on Public Lands, to amend "An act granting lands to the Territory of Iowa to aid in the improvement of the Des Moines river in said Territory."

Mr. GREEN. I object to that. You cannot pass that bill at this hour.

Mr. JONES. It does not ask for an acre of land or a cent of money, but proposes merely to divert a grant of land made to the State of Iowa for the construction of a canal from that purpose, and allow it to be applied to the construction of a railroad which is being made.

Mr. CLAY. Is there any report on the subject?

Mr. JONES. I do not know whether there is any report or not.

Mr. CLAY. If there is, I should like to hear it.

Mr. STUART. I can state to the Senator from Alabama what the case is. There was a grant of land made for the improvement of the Des Moines river; but it has been ascertained satisfactorily to the committee that the land thus appropriated will be useless. There is a balance of it remaining, and the object of the bill is to apply that balance for the construction of a railroad in the vicinity.

Mr. GREEN. I object to the consideration of the bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion to take it up is in order.

Mr. STUART. The effect is to allow the diversion of the land from the improvement of the river to the construction of a railroad, provided it creates no addition to the amount, nor in anywise affects the construction of the grant. The bill raises the single question whether the land shall be diverted from that purpose to the construction of a railroad, that is all.

Mr. GREEN. It involves other things. When the grant was made, it was for the purpose of improving the navigation of the Des Moines river. The Des Moines river is the common boundary between the States of Missouri and Iowa for about forty miles. The grant was supposed to benefit Missouri as much as Iowa to the extent of the forty miles. They made their contracts, commenced their work, and prosecuted it. They now owe large sums to the contractors who undertook the work on the faith of the lands; and if they can divert the proceeds of the lands, they will not only violate public faith to Missouri, disappoint public expectation with regard to the improvement, but they will violate their contracts to their contractors who have done the work. The diversion ought not to be made. It is sought by a local influence for the benefit of the town of Keokuk, and not the public. The river Des Moines enters the Mississippi river about four and a half or five miles below the town of Keokuk; and it is found that the completion of the work according to the contract, and according to the terms of the grant, will take the trade of the rich valley of the Des Moines away from Keokuk. They are determined to force it to Keokuk, and, to accomplish that end, to abandon the improvement of the Des Moines river; and, instead of improving the Des Moines according to the terms of the grant, to make a railroad by which they can carry the trade to the city of Keokuk, and prevent it coming down the Des Moines.

Mr. CLAY. With the consent of the Senator from Missouri, I rise to move that the Senate take a recess until seven o'clock. We shall be obliged to sit here to-night until a late hour. The House has taken a recess.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I would suggest to the Senator from Iowa that we cannot let his bill pass; and, therefore, he ought not to insist upon it.

Mr. JONES. I am very confident that if the Senator from Louisiana, or any Senator in this body knew the whole case, he would not object, except, perhaps, the Senator from Missouri and his colleague, and I do not believe his colleague would object if he were here, or if he did, it would at all events, be against the wishes of the city of St. Louis.

Mr. GREEN. I know all about it.

Mr. JONES. I know all about it myself.

Mr. GREEN. I have yielded the floor for the motion for a recess.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Iowa yield his motion?

Mr. JONES. No, sir.

Mr. CLAY. I had the floor by the consent of the Senator from Missouri, and moved to take a recess.

Mr. JONES. I am willing to allow a recess to be taken, but I cannot yield the bill.

Mr. STUART. I desire, if it would suit the convenience of Senators, to fix the meeting at half an hour earlier than is proposed, for the reason that I wish the Senate to go into executive session. I am charged with two reports which will consume considerable time of the Senate to dispose of in executive session. I only make the suggestion. ["Oh, no; seven o'clock."] Very well.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate took a recess until seven o'clock.

EVENING SESSION.

The Senate reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker of the House had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

An act for the relief of Georgiana M. Lewis; and

An act for the relief of Nancy Magill, of Ohio.

COMMITTEE REPORT.

Mr. WRIGHT, from the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate, to whom was referred a resolution relative to the price to be allowed for binding the Congressional Globe and Appendix for the Thirty-Fourth Congress, submitted an adverse report; which was ordered to be printed.

DES MOINES LAND GRANT.

Mr. WADE. I move that the Senate take up House joint resolution No. 36.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state to the Senator that there is a bill before the Senate, and a question pending—a bill in relation to the grant of land to Iowa for the improvement of the Des Moines river.

Mr. WADE. I was not aware of that.

Mr. GWIN. I hope that will be laid aside, as the gentlemen interested in it are not here. There was a joint resolution reported to-day in connection with a mail route to California. It is a matter of great importance, and I hope it will be taken up.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is a bill before the Senate, and some disposition must be made of it.

Mr. STUART. The bill under consideration is one which will be discussed so much that I think it cannot pass at this session. I move, therefore, simply to postpone it.

The motion was agreed to.

WIDOWS' HALF PAY.

Mr. WADE. I now move to take up House joint resolution (No. 36) giving a construction to the second section of the act of February 3, 1853, "to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans."

Mr. STUART. It is obvious that that cannot pass at this session of Congress. I have in my drawer certain facts which I have had there for two years, and it would occupy, at least, an hour or two to present them; and I know that there are other Senators who are disposed to go into a very lengthy consideration of that question. The whole subject was debated two years ago in the Senate on an appropriation bill; and, after a very lengthy debate, the Senate rejected a similar proposition.

Mr. WADE. I am very sorry to hear the gentleman say the bill shall not pass on account of any information he may have in regard to it that has been on hand so long. I will not, at this time, go into the merits of the joint resolution; but I will say that, after the most elaborate and careful examination of the whole question before the Court of Claims, after counsel had been heard on both sides, that court came to the conclusion that the construction which is affirmed by this resolution was just and legal.

Mr. FOSTER. The Senator is a little mistaken in saying that counsel were heard on both sides, for this reason: the solicitor of the United States, after hearing the argument on the other side, said he did not see that there was any answer to it, and he declined to make an argument on the part of the United States against the claim.

Mr. WADE. That was equivalent to a hearing; he examined it and gave it up. The solicitor, a very good lawyer, a competent man, agreed upon this construction of the law, which, in my judgment, is too plain for argument, and so did the Court of Claims. The court gave several judgments, for there are a great many cases depending on the same construction, and that is the reason why, I suppose, the House of Representatives, instead of passing a private bill for each of those cases, adopted the resolution under consideration, which gives a legislative construction to the act of 1853 conforming exactly to the decision of the court. It was argued, deliberated upon by some of the most astute and I may say some of the most economical gentlemen of the other House. The resolution was most carefully drawn, I believe, by Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, of that House, who is not very likely to give a very loose construction to any of these matters, and it passed that body by a vote of 140 to 30. It has received the sanction of the Committee on Claims of the Senate at a former Congress, and of the same committee unanimously at the present session.

Without going further into the merits, I think there is a strong prima facie case against what the Senator from Michigan says is so plain that he supposes the resolution cannot possibly pass.

There is a great number of widows whose rights depend upon this construction of the law. I suppose most of the members of this and the other House have been applied to to present petitions for relief under the construction of the law which this resolution gives. They are old; they are fast passing away, and if we intend to give them the benefits of this law, we should do it now. They are all of them old ladies. Many of them are dying off every year. This resolution is so carefully worded that it does not apply to any but those who are living at this time, so that it will take no great sum out of the Treasury to adjust these claims. I hope there will be no factious opposition to the resolution, because it is in the power of one or two to put it over. I hope no such thing will be resorted to against the rights of these old ladies. I do not wish to argue the case.

Mr. STUART. It was not, as the Senator from Ohio seems to suppose, from any factious disposition in regard to this measure that I made the suggestion I did. The paper to which I referred is a copy of a communication addressed by the Secretary of the Interior to the then Presiding Officer of the Senate, dated February 25th, 1857, in response to a resolution of the Senate inquiring of him what amount of money would be required to answer the provisions of this measure, and he incloses a copy of a communication from the Commissioner of Pensions, in which it is stated that it will require $1,187,500 to satisfy the requirements of this measure; and two years ago, or about that time, the Senator from Ohio who makes this motion moved to amend a general appropriation bill, by inserting an appropriation of three hundred or three hundred and fifty thousand dollars to be applied to those cases. As I stated before, the subject was then elaborately discussed in the Senate, the decision of the Court of Claims was reviewed, and some of the best legal minds in the Senate came to the conclusion that an opinion of that character could not be sustained, and this body, after full discussion, voted down the amendment, thus signifying their sense in regard to the proposition. It was for that reason that I suggested that if a measure were now taken up, which, according to the statements of the Interior Department, appropriates $1,187,500, it would not probably be disposed of to-night.

I remember that there was a great difference of opinion in regard to the law. I recollect that my friend from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS], and my friend from Missouri, [Mr. GREEN], argued it, and, as I said, some of the ablest minds in the Senate came to the conclusion that the Court of Claims were incorrect. I say, then, to my honorable friend from Ohio, that it was in no factious spirit, and in no spirit of prophecy, that I suggested it would not be wise or judicious to seek to pass this bill to-night; that it was entirely out of the question. I think so, and therefore objected to taking it up. I believe the Senate may as well dispose of it on the motion to take it up, as in any other way.

Mr. HAMLIN. I suppose the Senate is familiar with the facts of this case, and I do not propose to discuss them at all; but I wish to correct the Senator from Michigan in a very material point. He says the matter was discussed two years ago, and the Senate decided against this measure by a very decided vote. Now, what are the facts? They are not as the Senator from Michigan supposes; but my colleague offered an amendment to the pension appropriation bill, providing that this law should take effect precisely as this resolution proposes, and the Senate adopted it by a vote of two to one, after discussion, and sent it to the House of Representatives, where it was rejected on the ground that it was legislative matter attached to an appropriation bill.

Mr. STUART. I recollect that I talked with my honorable friend from Maine about that matter; and after our conversation the other day, I sent for the Journals, and they were brought to my desk, and what I say is true. It may not have been two years ago; it may have been at the last session; but certainly, either at the first or last session of the last Congress, what I have stated did take place.

Mr. HAMLIN. What took place at the last session of Congress I am not familiar with; I was not here then. I was speaking of what took place two years ago, when, as I stated, the Senate adopted an amendment giving this construction to the law, by a very large vote, and sent it to the House of Representatives. That House rejected it; it came back here and was discussed, and the Senator from Virginia, the chairman of the Finance Committee then and now, urged his objections to it upon the ground that it did not belong to that bill; that while it was right in itself, it ought to be in a separate bill. Now the House of Representatives have sent it to us as a separate bill. There are sixty or seventy cases now on the Calendar of the House covered by its provisions, and it is a question, I think, that ought to enter into its merits, whether we shall dispose of the whole matter by a general provision of the law, or wade through each case separately. They are all reported from the Court of Claims. The Court of Claims have adjudicated, have determined that this law does take effect in 1848. I drew the section of the law myself, and I know what I intended. I submitted it to the then Secretary of the Interior for his construction, and he told me at the time that it would take effect in 1848. But I am not going to discuss the merits of the case now.

One other fact, and that is as to the amount. It would have taken about $1,100,000 to allow the five years' half pay (from 1848 to 1853) to all these claimants originally; but I imagine that it will take little more than half that sum now. In 1853, five years ago, the number was as stated in the communication to which the Senator from Michigan has referred, but thousands of them are dead now, and the provisions of this resolution do not attach to any one of them who has died since the passage of the law, and therefore the amount required will be many thousands of dollars less than the estimate then made.

Mr. BAYARD. I have looked at this joint resolution this moment for the first time. I do not know that I shall vote against it, and I agree with the Senator from Maine that it is better to make a general provision like this than to act on each particular case, especially as they all depend upon the construction of a law; but my objection is, that this resolution, as I read it, refers to the decision of the Court of Claims in the case of Jane Smith; and I do not know that the case of Jane Smith has been before the Senate at all. I can only say, for myself, that what the decision in the case is, I do not know; no document containing it has ever been given to me, and I have had no opportunity of examining it. I pass no opinion about it. I do not know whether it is right or wrong; because, though the law required that copies of the opinions of the Court of Claims should, in all cases, be delivered to every member of the Senate, I have never received one in a solitary case myself. I have had no opportunity of examining into the question. I can pass no opinion upon the propriety either of the individual case, or the class of cases included in this resolution. Under these circumstances, I cannot be expected to vote in favor of a measure which is to pass $1,000,000 out of the Treasury, without knowing whether there be some basis for it or not. If I had the opportunity to examine it, the amount would not deter me from voting for it if I conceived the measure right and proper; but I have had no opportunity to inform myself in regard to it.

Mr. TOOMBS. This question was very fully argued at the last Congress, when we had time, when a large number of this body were not engaged in the necessary business of committees of conference, when we had many members present, and we decided that this measure ought not to pass; and we were much indebted to the argument of my honorable friend from Michigan [Mr. STRUTT] on that occasion. Then, after deliberate argument by my friend from Ohio on the one side and my friend from Michigan, and others, on the other, the Senate said that this gratuity ought not to be extended. We ought not to attempt to pass such a measure on this last night of the session. I esteem $1,250,000 as a matter of some consequence to the Government, and I think we ought not now to take up a measure which appropriates that sum, in opposition to the deliberate judgment of the Senate, heretofore expressed. As far as I am concerned, if the measure is taken up, I want to be fully heard on it. We ought to postpone it until the next session. It is a gratuity; nobody has any right to it. I know we are all abused for not attending to just claims on our bounty; that is, the claims of those who ask us to give them the public Treasury. Let us act deliberately. Before this is done, I desire to be heard at length on the measure. I think it is wrong to ask the Senate to take it up now, whether they be for it or against it, to take it up on Saturday night a few hours before the adjournment; and especially it is wrong when the Senate have heretofore expressed their judgment deliberately against the proposition. It must not be done.

Mr. FOSTER. I hope the joint resolution will be taken up; and notwithstanding the assertion of the Senator from Georgia that it is a gratuity, I submit that it is not a gratuity. We passed a law in 1853, under which law persons have gone to the Court of Claims, and have got a decision that they are entitled to a certain amount of money. The Department having previously given a construction contrary to that decision, adhere to their construction, and will not pay the money. This resolution proposes simply to give a construction to the act we passed, and which the Court of Claims has decided to be the legal construction of the act, but yet the parties cannot obtain their rights under it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Rights!

Mr. FOSTER. I say rights, certainly. I say so, because I have the authority of a court of law constituted by the Legislature of the United States competent to decide that question, and they have decided it.

Mr. TOOMBS. Did you go for David Myerle's claim?

Mr. FOSTER. I do not now remember, but I am inclined to think that I did vote for the bill for the relief of David Myerle.

Mr. TOOMBS. The court decided against him.

Mr. FOSTER. If it were so, it would be no reason why I, acting in my legislative capacity, should not vote for it if I saw good reason to vote for it; but I submit that it is a reason why the honorable Senator, lawyer though he be of great eminence, should yield his opinion to a court of law of the United States, made, by the act creating them, competent to decide a legal question. Granting that a comparison of the members of that court with the honorable Senator would be very much in his favor and against them, still they form the court to whom the power of decision is given. Now the question is whether we, after having passed a law, will assume to ourselves the right to give a judicial construction to it as against the decision of a competent court of law. Do we not create a despotism in this Government, if, making a law, we afterwards reserve the right to give a construction to it as against the courts? for that is the question here. The Court of Claims have decided upon the meaning of this law, and we say they are mistaken. Now I submit, that after we have created a court of law, we ought to be bound by their decisions, at least as legislators, and not to take out of their hands the construction of a statute of the United States upon which they have passed. We have made it; that was our appropriate function. It is the function of the courts to give a construction to it; and when they have given a construction, if we undertake to correct their errors, and to give a construction contrary to theirs, I say we assume, in addition to our constitutional legislative powers, judicial powers which cannot and do not belong to us. I hope we shall take up the resolution and pass it.

Mr. STUART. Mr. President—

Mr. HAMMOND. I wish to make a report from a conference committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to take up the joint resolution named by him.

Mr. STUART. The report of a committee of conference is a privileged question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair supposes the question before the Senate to be the motion to take up this joint resolution.

Mr. STUART. I think the report of a committee of conference has always been considered privileged.

Mr. HAMLIN. Not at all; but it has been received by general consent.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair is not aware of any rule which gives a conference report a preference over the pending motion. By general consent, however, the report may be received.

Mr. STUART. If the Senate will give unanimous consent to hear the report, I shall be very glad to do it myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is unanimous consent given to receive the report of the conference committee?

Mr. TOOMBS. No, sir.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Then the question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio to take up the resolution named by him.

Mr. STUART. I am really at a loss. I want this report made, and I suppose the whole Senate does. I have a communication before me which shows all the facts in regard to this resolution, and it is a very able exposition of it, and I want to say something in reply to the honorable Senator from Connecticut in respect to his ideas about the Court of Claims.

Mr. TOOMBS. If my friend from Michigan wants to make a speech, I withdraw my objection to receiving the conference report, so that he may go on afterwards. When I made the objection I did not know that he wished to make a speech.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If there be no objection, the report of the committee of conference will be received. The Chair hears none.

MAIL STEAMER BILL.

Mr. HAMMOND submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers and otherwise during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, having met, have, after full and free conference, agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate do recede from its first amendment. That the House recede from its non-concurrence in the third amendment of the Senate, and concur in said amendment with amendments as follows: insert the word "new" between the word "other" and the word "contract" at the end of the third line of said amendment. Strike out the word "five" in the fifth line of said third amendment, and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof, and add at the end of the said amendment the words "nor for any other compensation than the sea and inland postages on the mails so transported."

That the House recede from its non-concurrence in the fourth amendment of the Senate.

That the Senate recede from its fifth amendment.

J. H. HAMMOND,
S. R. MALLORY,
JOHN P. HALE,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

D. E. SICKLES,
M. R. H. GARNETT,
JOHN C. KUNKEL,
Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HAMMOND. I suppose some explanation of the report is necessary. The first amendment to this bill was to authorize the Postmaster General to allow a change in the terminus of the route of the Collins line, so that their vessels might go to Southampton instead of Liverpool. From that amendment the committee of conference recommend that the Senate recede. The second amendment was not touched. The third amendment is altered. In its original form it provided that the Postmaster General should not make a contract for ocean mail service for a longer period than five years; and it has been modified to read that he shall make no such new contract for a period longer than two years, nor for a greater amount of compensation than the postages, sea and inland. The fourth amendment in which the House did not concur, provided that the Postmaster General should be authorized to make contracts for carrying the mail by sea for the amount of the postages: in the case of a foreign vessel for the amount of the foreign postages, and in the case of an American vessel for the foreign and inland postages, but in all cases to give a preference to an American vessel unless it should sail at a period later than three days from the foreign vessel. In that amendment, made by the Senate, in which the House did not concur, the committee recommend that the House shall concur. The other amendment was nothing but a repetition of that, amounting to very little, and the committee propose that the Senate recede from it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I move to concur in the report. I think it is a very good report.

The report was concurred in.

A subsequent message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and it was signed by the Vice President.

SAN FRANCISCO POST OFFICE.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 10th instant, certain papers relative to alleged violations of law and malfeasance in office on the part of the postmaster at San Francisco.

Mr. BRODERICK. In accordance with a suggestion of the chairman of the Post Office Committee, I move that the communication be printed; and let the motion go to the Committee on Printing.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion will be referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. BIGLER. I move that the communication be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. BRODERICK. I have no objection.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas, from the Committee on Printing, reported in favor of the motion to print the communication of the Postmaster General; and the motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE REGULATIONS.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a report of the Postmaster General, communicating, in compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 11th instant, information respecting the purchase and distribution of certain books of regulations by the Post Office Department; which was ordered to lie on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS—WIDOWS' HALF PAY.

Mr. GWIN. I should like to have the Senate take up a joint resolution from the House in regard to carrying the mail to California.

Mr. HAMLIN. What has become of the motion submitted by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE?]. It was passed over to receive the report of the committee of conference on the mail steamer bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Senator from Ohio yielded the floor, and by unanimous consent the conference report was received. The Senator from Ohio has not since addressed the Chair, and the Senator from California is now entitled to the floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. I would inquire whether the motion of the Senator from Ohio was yielded for any purpose except to receive the report of the conference committee; and is not that motion now before the Senate, the conference report having been disposed of?

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks not. He would have been happy to recognize the Senator if he had risen.

Mr. HAMLIN. He is out on a conference committee.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will recognize him when he comes in, if he endeavors to obtain the floor.

Mr. HAMLIN. But the motion was before the Senate; and it has not been disposed of. It was the Senator from Michigan who yielded the floor to the Senator from South Carolina to make his report. The Senator from Michigan was on the floor, and was in the act of speaking.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will state that, on calling to mind what occurred, the motion of the Senator from Ohio was before the Senate; and, by unanimous consent, the floor was yielded to the Senator from South Carolina to make a report from a committee of conference. That report having been disposed of, the Senate recurs to the motion of the Senator from Ohio to take up the resolution which he named; and on that motion the Senator from Michigan has the floor.

Mr. STUART. I am desirous that there should be an executive session; and I think it important that we should have one. I intimated it before the Senate took the recess.

Mr. GWIN. I hope we shall attend first to legislative business.

Mr. STUART. I feel it incumbent on me to move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. GWIN. There is a question before the Senate; and that motion cannot be made until the pending question is disposed of.

Mr. STUART. It has always been held that a motion for executive session is like a motion to adjourn, and is always in order.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair thinks, indeed he knows, that, during this session, a motion to proceed to consider executive business has been held to be always in order.

Mr. COLLAMER. I suppose that motion is a question which may be discussed.

Mr. STUART. No, sir; a motion to go into executive session is not a debatable question.

Mr. COLLAMER. Then if a motion is made to go into executive session every man is gagged.

Mr. STUART. You cannot discuss in open session the necessity for going into executive session.

Mr. COLLAMER. I merely wish to say that we have appropriation bills yet unpassed upon; and if we now go into executive session for the evening, we cannot finish our legislation.

Mr. STUART. At the request of several Senators, I withdraw the motion; but, in my judgment, we ought to have an executive session.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion to take up the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Ohio, [Mr. WADE.]

The motion was not agreed to.

MAILS TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. GWIN. I now move to take up the House joint resolution (No. 37) in regard to carrying the United States mail from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, in California.

On a division being called for, thirteen Senators voted in favor of the motion.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The motion is not agreed to.

Mr. BRODERICK. I think the question had better be stated again. It is an important matter. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will again put the question.

The question being put; the motion was not agreed to.

FLORIDA CLAIMS.

Mr. MALLORY. I made an attempt a few mornings ago to call the attention of the Senate to the bill (S. No. 373) declaratory of the acts for carrying into effect the ninth article of the treaty of 1819 between the United States and Spain. I explained at that time what the character of the bill was, and I now move to take it up for consideration. I do not propose to discuss it to the exclusion of legislation on the appropriation bills, but I should like to have the sense of the Senate upon it.

Mr. BAYARD. The bill which it is now proposed to take up is one which will necessarily lead to a long discussion. It involves the question of interest on the Florida claims. It has been before the Senate repeatedly, and it was rejected by a vote of, I think, seven to one on the last occasion when it was here. The Court of Claims have decided against the legality of the allowance, if I understand their decision rightly. The case involves many questions, and the principal one is whether the law of 1834 overruled the former decision of the Secretary of the Treasury, so as to declare that the interest was within the treaty, or whether the allowance was a mere gratuity, and whether, under all the circumstances, interest ought to be allowed. The amount involved is somewhere between a million and a million and a half dollars. The bill cannot be passed without discussion. It was before the Senate in former times, when many gentlemen who are not now here were members of the Senate. On the last occasion when it was before us, it was rejected by a most decisive vote, at least seven to one. I have not seen the opinion of the Court of Claims in full on the whole merits of the case, but my former impressions were against the claim, and, at all events, I shall insist on the right of discussing it. I am very sure it ought not to be taken up in this way.

Mr. MALLORY. I will occupy the attention of the Senate but a moment in reply to the Senator from Delaware, if I can get the ear of the Senate, which I perceive to be a very difficult matter.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair must appeal to the Senate to preserve order, and have less confusion in the Chamber. The Chair will not recognize any Senator while the conversation is so general.

Mr. MALLORY. This bill was reported from the Committee on Claims upon the 17th of May, and last week I drew the attention of Senators to it, and asked them to consider the report made by the Senator from New Hampshire, [Mr. CLARK,] in favor of the bill. It is evident that, unless it be taken up now, the session will pass by without its consideration. It is not my purpose now to make a debate upon the merits of the bill. The Senator from Delaware has truly stated its character. It is to allow interest on the Florida claims. It is, in other words, to redeem the plighted faith of the country under the Florida treaty. It is to meet the complaints of a foreign nation to whom the faith of this country is pledged. I will not detain the Senate, because gentlemen who wish to discuss the bill can do so after it shall have been taken up. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to take it up.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The motion was not agreed to.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. PEARCE, from the Committee on the Library, to whom the subject was referred, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill (S. No. 456) to furnish the Court of Claims with law books and congressional documents.

The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 44) to grant to the judges and solicitor of the Court of Claims the use of the Congressional Library, and for other purposes, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to; the bill reported by the committee being considered as a substitute for the joint resolution.

Mr. BENJAMIN, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Henry M. Fleury and others, submitted a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Henry M. Fleury, of Louisiana. The bill was read and passed to a second reading, and the report was ordered to be printed.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had further insisted on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, agreed to the further conference asked by the Senate on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HENRY M. PHILLIPS, Mr. JOHN M. WOOD, and Mr. WILLIAM W. BOYCE conferees on its part. A subsequent message announced that Mr. JOHN V. WRIGHT had been appointed in the place of Mr. BOYCE.

POST ROUTE BILL.

The message further announced that the House of Representatives had concurred in the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 585) to establish certain post roads.

SEATS IN THE NEW HALL.

Mr. IVERSON. I offer a resolution which affects every member of this body:

Whereas, it is expected that the Senate will occupy the new Hall preparing for its use, at the next session, to prevent confusion in the assignment of seats therein, be it

Resolved, That the choice of seats therein shall be determined and regulated as follows: The Senators shall be divided into three equal classes. The first class shall consist of those who have been longest in continual service in the Senate, who shall first draw for choice of seats amongst themselves. The second class shall consist of those who have served continuously for the next longest term in the Senate, who shall draw for choice of seats amongst themselves. The remaining number shall draw for choice of seats among themselves. And in each case the drawing shall be conducted in the usual manner.

I ask for the present consideration of the resolution.

Mr. HALE, Mr. POLK, and others, objected. The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the resolution must lie over.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

An act granting an invalid pension to William Randolph;

An act granting an invalid pension to John Holland, of Arkansas;

An act granting an invalid pension to William Howell, of Tennessee; and

An act making an appropriation for the completion of the military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory.

CAPTORS OF THE BRIG CALEDONIA.

Mr. BELL. I desire to call the attention of the Senate to House bill No. 218. It is a private bill which has been twice reached on the Calendar, but was objected to, and of course went over under the rule adopted that no bill should be considered to which any member objected. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. SLIDELL] objected to it upon both occasions, but since he made the last objection he has told me that he had an amendment prepared which would remove the objection, and I think the bill may as well be taken up now; for there will be no time occupied in its discussion, because the principle on which it rests is well known. It is a proposition founded upon the usage of the Government in such cases. By some unaccountable omission on the part of Congress, the capture of the British brig Caledonia in the war of 1812, was not noticed at the time, although the officer who commanded the Detroit, a brig that was captured at the same time, was not only distinguished by a medal, but shared in the benefit of an appropriation of the supposed value of the brig. The Caledonia was captured by General Towson, and his gallant comrades, who contrary to an order of the naval commander took the responsibility of preserving her from the flames, which he was ordered to communicate to her, and she performed distinguished service in the battle of Erie subsequently under Commodore Perry. I hope the honorable Senator from Louisiana will respond to the statement I have made on the subject.

Mr. SLIDELL. I did object to this bill; and I am not entirely satisfied with its principles. I informed the Senator from Tennessee, however, that if certain amendments were made, I should interpose no objection to its passage. It was discussed in a full meeting of the Naval Committee, and I believe all the members assented to the amendments which I proposed; but it was not thought necessary to have the bill recommitted, and with the understanding that the amendments will be accepted, I have no objection to the consideration of the bill. If they be not accepted, it will probably lead to a protracted debate. With the understanding that the amendments I have already shown to the Senator from Tennessee shall be admitted, I consent to the bill being taken up.

Mr. BELL. Very well.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 218) for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812, was considered, as in Committee of the Whole.

It provides for the payment of $25,000 to the captors of the British brig Caledonia, on the 8th of October, 1812, on the Niagara river, near Fort Erie, or to their legal representatives. The payment is to be made to the legal representatives of the late Captain Jesse D. Elliott, to the legal representatives of the late General Nathan Towson, then a captain of artillery, and to the officers and men engaged in the capture, or their legal representatives, in such proportion as each may be found to be entitled to, according to the usages of the naval service.

Mr. HAYNE. I rise, Mr. President, to do justice to two distinguished soldiers, and to their families now alive. I am minutely acquainted with all the circumstances of this case. I was myself in Sackett's Harbor, and this transaction occurred immediately after the battle of Sackett's Harbor. It was a gallant and noble deed. Never was there an act more opportune. It occurred at a time when there was nothing to grace our trials on the lakes. It was the wave that moved forward to the glories that were subsequently consummated on the lakes by our distinguished commander, Commodore Oliver Perry. This capture was consummated with great gallantry. The claim has been long pending, and I think it is just. In addition to that, some of the members of the families concerned are in great poverty, particularly the family of Commodore Elliott. Where is there a gallant man who would be so recreant to courage and justice and everything else, as to refuse to do what is proper in regard to the wife and children of such a man, very much reduced by poverty? It is an honest claim, and a small one; and I hope Senators will not deny them this small boon. I shall vote for the bill with all my heart.

Mr. SLIDELL. My amendment is in the eighth line, to strike out the words "or to their legal representatives;" in line nine, to strike out the words "legal representatives," and insert "widow;" in line ten, to strike out "legal representatives," and insert "child," and in lines twelve and thirteen, strike out "or their legal representatives;" so as to make the bill read:

Be it enacted, &c., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized to pay, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, the sum of $25,000 to the captors of the British brig Caledonia, on the 8th of October, 1812, on the Niagara river, near Fort Erie. The payment to be made to the widow of the late Captain Jesse D. Elliott, to the child of the late General Nathan Towson, then a captain of artillery, and to the officers and men engaged in the capture aforesaid, in such proportions as each may be found to be entitled to, according to the usages of the naval service.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BAYARD. It is an ungracious and unpleasant task to object to a bill of this character, connected as it is with the past history of the country, and services which one is not disposed to deny; but I have read the report accompanying this bill, and I confess it does not satisfy me. The difficulty is to account for the lapse of time; for Congress was exceeding liberal in reference to acts of gallantry connected with the war of 1812, and there are some facts which are obscure. My difficulty is to know why no application was made to Congress in reference to these acts during the long period of time when both Commodore Elliott and General Towson were alive. There are some things connected with the report which have raised doubts in my mind connected with a decree of the district court in New York, with reference to the rights of the captors, which is said to have been lost or burned. That is not satisfactory to me. I do not know that I shall vote against the bill; but I would rather have a more satisfactory explanation than the report shows before I can support it.

Mr. BELL. If the Senator from Delaware had examined the papers fully—it was not thought proper to cumber the report with all of them—he would have found the fullest and most ample explanation of the whole delay. It was owing to the pride of General Towson. He was not voluntarily noticed at the time of the transaction by Congress, and it was with some difficulty that General Scott, and other distinguished officers then in command, could prevail upon him to remain in the service. He considered himself a wounded man in his honor, by the neglect on the part of Congress to notice him; although it was not a willful neglect; but such was the spirit of the man. Until within a very short time before his death in this city, he would never consent to bring forward the claim, and then it was principally on account of the widow of Captain Elliott, and not on his own account, so far as the pecuniary matter was concerned. All the circumstances are calculated to do honor to the spirit and character of General Towson. My honorable friend from Delaware must know that he distinguished himself on the northern frontier on more occasions than this.

Mr. BAYARD. I have no doubt of it.

Mr. BELL. In this very fight, although the little boat with which he was to seize the Caledonia was manned principally by sailors, he had a few trusty men of his own artillery company with him, and when the naval officer who was in command of the boat ordered his pilot to pull out of the way, for he could not effect a landing against the Caledonia, he asked the pilot: "Can you reach the ship," and he said: "Oh, yes, sir." "Then go ahead; I assume the responsibility and the command," said Towson; and after a gallant affair, though rather bloody and desperate, he captured the ship. It was the pride of the man that prevented him from making the application to have justice done him, or even his gallant companions; but some of them fell into poverty, or General Towson never would have applied for any portion of the value of the ship.

If the honorable Senator from Delaware had read all the papers he would have found that the Caledonia, which had just arrived from the upper lakes, was laden with valuable furs, estimated by some, I believe, to be worth $200,000. Some of the coarser furs, the bear-skins and others, that could be made useful to the Army in the severity of that winter, were used by the Army; but the fine furs were taken to New York and sold, as it was understood, on account of the captors. The moneys were received by the clerk of the court, but he proved a defaulter. We are not able to say what was the value of the furs that were sold, but not one cent of the money was ever paid to the captors. The honorable Senator would have found that in the papers if he had examined them fully. I hope that accounts for the circumstances. The $25,000 here appropriated includes no part of the cargo, but simply the estimated value of the vessel alone.

Mr. BAYARD. I have not looked at the papers; I could not pretend to read them; I trusted to the committee, so far as to state what they show; and my objections arose on the face of the report. The report is not a long one, and I ask for its reading, and then I shall state the doubt that arises in my mind upon it.

The Secretary read the report made by Mr. JOHN SHERMAN, in the House of Representatives, on the 21st of January:

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the memorials of the representatives of General Nathan Towson, late of the United States Army, now deceased, and David R. Whitely, a member of his company, now of Baltimore, asking payment for the capture of the British brig Caledonia in the war of 1812, have had the same under consideration, and report:

That the facts in relation to this claim are fully and clearly stated in a report of the Committee on Naval Affairs made to the Senate on the 7th of July, 1856. Your committee, after a careful examination of the papers on file and the historical records of the capture of the Caledonia, concur fully in the statements and recommendations of that report, and have therefore embodied the substance and most of the language of that report herein.

It appears from the official account of Lieutenant Jesse D. Elliott, dated October 9, 1812, and other documents, that, being in command of the public armed vessels at Black Rock, he conceived the idea of capturing two British brigs, the Detroit and Caledonia, which had just come down Lake Erie and anchored, the first about two miles above the fort, on the British side of the river, and the latter immediately under the guns of the fort.

That, being short of force, Lieutenant Elliott, applied to General Smyth for volunteers from the Army. The artillery companies of Captains Towson and Barker were allowed to furnish part of the quota, whilst another portion was taken from the infantry. These artillery companies belonged to Colonel Scott's command. Captains Towson and Barker being of equal rank, the command was decided by lot, and the privilege was assigned to Captain Towson. [See the letter of General Winfield Scott, page 6, printed statement. See also the statement, page 8, of Major, then Captain, J. N. Barker.] About thirty of the artillery were thus assigned to Captain Towson.

Two boats went off during the night of the 8th of October, 1812, on the expedition thus planned by Lieutenant Elliott—the lieutenant himself commanding one, (with the infantry on board,) and the other being in charge of Sailing-master Watts, with Captain Towson in charge of the artilleers.

After getting near the Caledonia, some hesitation was expressed by the sailing-master as to the possibility of reaching the brig, whereupon Captain Towson at once assumed the command of the boat, and ordered the men to pull alongside. [See the statement of David R. Whitely, one of the artilleers.] In a few minutes, after a severe conflict, in which one of his men was killed and eight others wounded, (one of them mortally,) Captain Towson succeeded in boarding and capturing the Caledonia, with her valuable cargo, valued by Lieutenant Elliott, in his official dispatch, at $200,000. Soon after this the Detroit surrendered to Captain Elliott.

The Detroit was afterwards burnt by order of Lieutenant Elliott, to save her from falling into the hands of the enemy; and a similar order was given by him in regard to the Caledonia; but Captain Towson, not perceiving the necessity of this, took the responsibility of saving the latter, with her rich cargo, and she afterwards formed a part of Commodore Perry's fleet on Lake Erie, and rendered good service, under Lieutenant Turner, in the brilliant action of the 10th September, 1813. [See the statements of Captain Champlin, of the Navy, and Major John G. Camp, of the quartermaster's department.] David R. Whitely, one of the artilleers, whose opportunities of knowing all the circumstances seem to have been good, states that he is con-dent the success of the enterprise, so far as the Caledonia was concerned, was owing to the energy and unflinching courage of Captain Towson, who had the faculty of inspiring all his men with his own resolution and spirit.

The important part borne in this perilous enterprise by Captain Towson, on board the Caledonia, not only in assuming the command at a critical moment, but in saving the vessel and rich cargo from destruction at great personal hazard, is well attested; and Generals Brown and Scott, Major Barker, Captain Champlin, and Major Camp, all concur in commendations of his valuable services to the country. Indeed, his fame is inseparable from the several brilliant actions which rendered the names of Brown and Scott illustrious in the campaign of 1814.

The value of the Caledonia is estimated by Captain Champlin at $15,000, without her armament, and by Major Camp at $30,000.

The cargo of the Caledonia was estimated, by the news of the day, at $200,000. It consisted of valuable furs and peltries. Major Camp states that the skins were used for the Army, and the fine furs sent to New York. Captain Towson himself stated his impression that a large portion of the cargo of the Caledonia was put into the public storehouses at Black Rock, and some of it burnt by the British. The part sent to New York city was sold by the United States marshal, and no part of the proceeds paid over to the captors. Captain Towson also states that a suit was instituted in the United States district court for the southern district of New York, and after much delay, on a second trial, a verdict was rendered in favor of the captors of the Caledonia, but for what amount is not known; but that no part of it was ever paid over to the captors.

The present clerk of the United States court states that the books and papers of his office having been burnt, he is unable to give any information at present in regard to the suit aforesaid; but that the amount of the verdict was probably paid into the hands of Heron Ridd, who was clerk of the court from 1812 to 1816, and became a defaulter for about sixty thousand dollars.

Captain Towson explains, in a letter, the reasons for his delay in making the application, and is desirous that Mrs. Elliott, the widow of Commodore Elliott, should also be provided for, so far as her husband was entitled, for planning the expedition. Mrs. Elliott herself desires to be included, and refers to her papers, connected with an application which she was about to make, in the hands of an attorney, since deceased; but the main facts of the case are referred to as being part of the public records of the times.

On referring to the legislation of Congress on this subject, it does not appear that any allowance has ever been made for the Caledonia or her cargo. On July 13, 1813, Congress included in "An act to reward the officers and crew of the sloop-of-war Hornet," &c., a provision "to Lieutenant Elliott, his officers and companions, &c., the sum of $12,000, for the capture and destruction of the British brig Detroit."

It appears, by a certificate from the Fourth Auditor, herewith appended, that of the prize money awarded by the act of July 13, 1813, Captain Towson received $400 as his distributive share, but that the Caledonia was not included, although the pay-roll was headed for both vessels. The act only appropriated $12,000 for the capture and destruction of the British brig Detroit, and no provision has ever been made for the capture of the Caledonia.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

FOURTH AUDITOR'S OFFICE, June 17, 1856.

It appears by the files and records of this office, that Nathan Towson, who held the rank of captain, received $400 as his distributive share of the prize money, or "reward" appropriated by Congress for the capture of the British brigs "Detroit" and "Caledonia," to J. D. Elliott, and the officers and men under his command. It appears, upon a reference to the Statutes at Large, volume three, page 4, chapter 8, that the appropriation was for the capture of the British brig "Detroit" only.

A. O. DAYTON, Fourth Auditor.

In a joint resolution, approved January 29, 1813, Congress acknowledged the brilliant achievements of Captains Hull, Decatur, and Jones, in the capture of the British vessels Guerriere, Macedonian, and Frolic.

The second section of the said resolution authorized the President to present to Lieutenant Elliott, of the Navy, an elegant sword, with suitable emblems and devices, in testimony of the just sense entertained by Congress of his gallantry and good conduct in boarding and capturing the British brigs Detroit and Caledonia, whilst anchored under the protection of Fort Erie.

It is with reference to the part borne in this brilliant and hazardous affair by Captain Towson that the statements of Generals Scott and Brown, and Major Barker, apply; and in regard to which General Brown said, in his letter of October 8, 1814, "the modesty of Captain Towson forbade him to urge his pretensions; but the Government gave intimation that a suitable notice would be taken of this meritorious act."

The delay in this application, as explained by General Towson, does not in any degree detract from the merit or justice of the claim now pending, the facts forming a part of the history of the country.

It is therefore recommended that a bill be passed directing payment to be made to the widow of the late Commodore Jesse D. Elliott, to the legal representatives of the late General Nathan Towson, and the other officers engaged in the enterprise, and to the sailors, soldiers, and volunteers accompanying them, according to the usages of the naval service in regard to captures from the enemy, for the capture and preservation of the brig Caledonia. The value of the cargo, or of such part as was applied to the use of the Army, is not ascertained with sufficient precision to justify an allowance at present, and therefore no action upon this branch of the memorial is deemed advisable.

Your committee therefore report the accompanying bill, and recommend its passage.

Mr. BAYARD. The hearing of the report confirms the impression made on my mind at the time I first read it. No one doubts the gallantry or the services of Captain Towson; but I must look at these things according to what the action of the Government has been. I find a bill now reported which leaves out other soldiers and seamen connected with this transaction, and gives the money equally between the widow of Captain Elliott and the child of Captain Towson.

Mr. KENNEDY. And David Whitely.

Mr. SLIDELL. I wish to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from Delaware. This bill, as amended, gives to the widow of Commodore Elliott and the child of Captain Towson, and to any survivors, their distributive share of this sum of $25,000. I offered the amendment because I had occasion, in some previous matters before the Naval Committee, to be strongly impressed with the conviction that in all these old and antiquated cases, and even in cases of three or four years' standing, where prize money or any gratuity is directed to be paid to the legal representatives of soldiers or sailors, certain legal representatives are always found or made. If the Senator will read the bill as I have amended it, he will find that it guards against that difficulty, and that alone. The balance of the sum of $25,000 which will not be paid to the widow of Commodore Elliott, to the child of General Towson, and to any survivors, will remain in the Treasury, and will lapse. That is my intention, and I think I have carried it into effect.

Mr. BAYARD. I think the bill provides for the payment of the sum of $25,000 equally between the widow of Commodore Elliott and the child of General Towson, and takes no notice of any of the other parties concerned. According to the course of the Government in reference to captures during the war of 1812, where the captor brought in the vessel, he was entitled, under the general law, to the distribution of prize money among the officers and crew in certain proportions, according to the value of the vessel. In many cases the vessel was destroyed, and then the Government did not allow the whole value of the vessel, but allowed what they considered a proper sum in lieu of the destroyed vessel. For instance, in the case of the Guerriere, I think $50,000 was allowed; and in the case of the Wasp, $25,000. There were various sums allowed in such cases where the property of the enemy was destroyed, according to the judgment of Congress at the time as to what was proper. In the case now before the Senate, it appears that one of these vessels was destroyed; and acting upon the principle of substituting for the value of the destroyed vessel what Congress thought a reasonable compensation to the captors, and dividing it according to the law of capture by vessel at sea, they gave the sum of $12,500 to Captain Elliott, of which, it appears, only $400 went to General Towson. I admit that it appears by the report that that had no reference to the Caledonia, although, in the statement of the account, it is stated as referring to both vessels. But, when you come to the case of the Caledonia, you have the fact that that vessel was taken, but you have no evidence from General Towson himself that the cargo ever went to the use of the Government. On the contrary, according to his statement, the greater part of it was destroyed. There is one witness, Major Camp, who says something about its being used by the Army; but it so happens that, in another case widely different from this, I recollect some testimony of Major Camp which does not incline me to place any great reliance on his testimony, either from lapse of memory or something else, in reference to what was used by the Army in the war of 1812, on the northern frontier. General Towson's statement is, that part was destroyed and part sent to New York, where it was libeled and ultimately condemned in favor of the captors, and the condemnation entitled them to the money. The Government never interposed to prevent their getting the money. At this point the difficulty arises, and it is said they never received the money; but it was received by the clerk of the court, and he failed as a defaulter some forty years ago. If there was a decree for capture, they were entitled to receive the money, and might have done so but for their own neglect. If the clerk of the court received it under any decree or order of the court, they could have claimed it from him at once. There was no reason why they should not do so.

Under these circumstances, are Congress to carry the practice beyond what they have ever carried it before, and say that where there has been a capture, or decree of condemnation, we are to make good the default of an officer of the court, when we have no evidence that the parties applied to him for the money, or that there was anything like due diligence used to get the money from him? Any one who knows anything about the proceedings of a court of admiralty necessarily knows that the court would peremptorily order the payment of the money by immediate process. There is no delay there, but the money would be directed to be paid to the captors pro rata. The clerk must give bond when he receives money. This may not always be done; but where he is in fact receives it, there is no difficulty in enforcing payment of the money immediately. There is never any delay in matters of this kind, where the decree of a court of admiralty is rendered. We have no evidence, so far as I know, as to the amount of money received by the clerk, or even as to the amount of the decree in favor of the captors.

I do not think, then, that it comes within the principle on which Congress have previously acted where property taken from an enemy has been destroyed, and they have chosen, in consequence of the gallantry of the action, to say to the captors, "we will give you a reasonable sum, to be distributed pro rata as would have been the amount which you would have received if the vessel had been brought in." In this case they did that in regard to one of the vessels. The other vessel was brought in; her cargo was libeled, and there was a decree in favor of the captors. I have not seen the record, but that is the statement as it is made. It seems to me that it is carrying the practice very far now, when so long a period has been suffered to elapse, when we are not able to trace why or wherefore the money was not paid, or even the amount of the decree that was rendered in favor of the captors, to call upon us to distribute $25,000, not between the entire parties concerned in this capture, but solely between two individuals who represent the commanding officer of one boat, and the commanding officer of another.

Mr. HAYNE. I have not risen to make a speech; I should be sorry to inflict one on the Senate at this time, or to cause a minute's delay. I rise only to state that I believe I am the only individual among the Senators who knows, personally, all the circumstances of the case, and I am sure (though I will not enter upon any arguments to prove it) that the claim is just. If Senators could but know how poor some of these parties are, they could not hesitate to grant a boon so small. Even allowing for a moment that the letter of the law may be against the claim, which I utterly deny, the spirit of the law, the spirit of philanthropy, of justice, of kindness, is all for the widow and the distressed. I hope the Senate will do justice, though it is late. It is never too late to act justly.

Mr. KENNEDY. I may be allowed to say a single word; I do not mean to make a speech. I wish simply to correct a misapprehension of the Senator from Delaware in regard to the applicants. One of them is David R. Whitely, who was the sergeant under Captain Towson at the time. He is now living in the most abject, squalid misery in the city of Baltimore. He is one of the beneficiaries of this bill. He is now supported entirely by private charity, and is really an object of commiseration.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not mean to oppose the bill any further. If it is the will of the Senate to pass it, I have no objection. My opposition to it is only on general principles. I think it ought to be amended. As the bill stands it directs the money to be paid to the captors; that is the language. It says they are to be entitled to $25,000. It does not say anything about their shares or proportions. If it described in what relative proportions the money should be paid, and then declared, as it does subsequently, that the money should go to the widow of one officer and the child of another, of course it would mean their shares. As it stands the effect of the bill is to direct the entire amount which you say is to be paid to the captors, to be given to two parties.

Mr. PUGH. I think the Senator misunderstands the bill.

Mr. BAYARD. I do not think I do.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state to the Senator from Delaware that I was the only member of the Naval Committee who opposed this bill on principle, but I simply declared that if the amendments which I offered were not made, I should discuss the question in the Senate. If the yeas and nays are called on the bill, I shall vote against it; but I think the bill in the form in which it now stands amended, perfectly protects the Treasury from any such demands as the Senator from Delaware supposes. If, however, he wishes to move a further amendment out of abundant caution to make it perfectly safe, I shall accept it.

Mr. BAYARD. I have read the bill as amended, and I believe the Senator from Louisiana is right on that point.

The bill was reported to the Senate as amended, and the amendments were concurred in, and ordered to be engrossed, and the bill to be read a third time. The bill was read the third time.

Mr. SLIDELL called for the yeas and nays on its passage; and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 29, nays 9; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hamlin, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Iverson, Kennedy, Mallory, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, Reid, Slidell, and Stuart—9.

So the bill was passed.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 550) making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

On motion of Mr. BENJAMIN, the bill was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

MARY A. M. JONES.

On motion of Mr. PUGH, the Senate resumed the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 42) granting a pension to Mary A. M. Jones.

Mr. PUGH. There were several amendments offered to this bill when it was up before, which the Senators who offered them were disposed to withdraw provided Mrs. Gaines's case was withdrawn. That is Mrs. Gaines's own desire, as signified to the Senator from New York, [Mr. SEWARD;] and I hope, by general consent, those amendments will be withdrawn or voted down, and that the House bill will pass without amendment.

Mr. SEWARD. I comply, with great pleasure, with the suggestion of Mrs. Gaines that she may not embarrass Mrs. Jones by this movement; and I move to amend the bill as it stands, by striking out the provision in favor of Mrs. Gaines.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I presume, by common consent, the amendments put on the bill can be withdrawn, and let the bill pass for Mrs. Jones's relief.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. FITZPATRICK.) That will be regarded as the general sense of the Senate, unless objected to. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I do not consent to it.

Mr. PUGH. There was an amendment put on to the original bill on the motion of the Senator from Georgia, [Mr. TOOMBS;] but I have satisfied him; by a certificate which I have, that his amendment makes only a difference of two dollars a month. I hope some Senator will move a reconsideration of that amendment.

Mr. IVERSON. I suggest if it is fair to take up the bill in the absence of my colleague?

Mr. PUGH. I have spoken to him. He does not care about it.

Mr. BIGLER. Has the common consent of the Senate already been had to strike off all the amendments?

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. That is the understanding of the Chair.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I will make no objection.

THE PRESIDING OFFICER. The bill will be read as amended.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

Be it enacted, &c., that the Secretary of the Interior be directed to place the name of Mary A. M. Jones, widow of Brevet Major General Roger Jones, deceased, late Adjutant General of the Army, upon the roll of pensioners, and pay her a pension at the rate of fifty dollars a month, said pension to commence with the 21st day of July, 1852, and to continue during her natural life.

Mr. PUGH. I hope the Senate will take off the latter clause, which is a change of the House bill. It makes only a difference of two dollars a month. The bill, as it originally stood, allowed her one half the pay proper of her husband. That would be fifty dollars a month. The limitation put on, at the suggestion of the Senator from Georgia, makes but a difference of two dollars a month, and necessitates the bill going back to the House of Representatives at this stage of the session, which is tantamount to its defeat. He told me he did not care about it, as it only made that difference. I hope some Senator who voted in the affirmative will move a reconsideration.

Mr. STUART. I voted in the affirmative; and to oblige the Senator, I will move a reconsideration.

Mr. PUGH. I am very much obliged to the Senator.

The motion to reconsider was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have an amendment to offer:

And be it further enacted, That there be paid to Mrs. Mary Kirby Smith, widow of the late Captain E. Kirby Smith, of the United States Army, a sum, which, added to the pay to which she is entitled under the pension act as widow of a captain, will equal the half pay of a lieutenant colonel, this latter rank being the capacity in which said Captain Smith was serving at the time he received a mortal wound in leading on his battalion to the decisive charge at the battle of Molino del Rey, in Mexico.

Mr. PUGH. Let us take the question. I hope the Senate understands this business of putting one bill on to another.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand that the bill is a proposition to pension the widow of an officer of the Army who served his country for a long time, and perhaps very faithfully and efficiently, with high rank, at a large salary; but there is a good deal in the way these cases are stated. The argument is general, that the individual to whom you propose to give a pension served the country. Now, there is no one who will hear me say aught against the services and patriotism of General Jones; but there is another way to state the case. A man may serve his country, and his country may serve him; and sometimes if you keep a correct account, and credit the individual with all the services he rendered, and then charge him with the length of time the Government has supported him, there may be some doubt as to which way the balance would fall. General Jones served his country faithfully no doubt, and it is equally true that the country served him faithfully for some thirty-five or forty years, sustained him, paid him a large salary. He died in his bed, as I understand, at a green old age. I present you the case of a man who went out to fight the battles of his country, and who fell in fighting the battles of his country most gloriously and gallantly. When the widow of that captain comes here you put her on the pension roll at twenty dollars a month, in the first instance for only five years, but under the recent law it is continued for life. There does not seem to be any great sympathy for a widow of that description. Then look at the widows of the soldiers. They receive a half-pay pension for five years, which is only sixty dollars a year, and the whole five years would come to $300, just half the amount you propose to give in this bill for one year. It is strange that the widow of a gallant soldier, a private, a lieutenant, or captain, should not be entitled to receive the same amount of comfort and attention as the widow of an officer of higher rank, who always obtained large pay from the Government while alive. Mrs. Smith has three children, whom she supports by her own exertions as a teacher. If Mrs. Jones is entitled to fifty dollars a month as a gratuity, when her husband died at a ripe age, not from disease or wounds contracted in the line of duty, how much more is Mrs. Smith entitled to a like monthly allowance?

I do not intend to consume much time, but when there is such a great anxiety to do justice at this late hour of the session, I do not see why we should not embrace all the cases within the scope of justice. I do not see why individual cases should be selected and pressed at this un-propitious time, at the heel of the session, to the exclusion of all others. I desire to secure equality. In the case covered by the bill, the man died in his bed after his country had served him for a number of years. In the case for which my amendment provides, the man fell on the battlefield, left his wife and children to mourn his loss, unprovided for. I send up the report and ask to have it read at the clerk's table, as part of the speech I intend to make in the widow's behalf.

Mr. PUGH. I do not see what business we have reading a report. A report is read in support of a bill. This is a private amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I want it read as a part of my argument.

Mr. PUGH. I do not wish to have any difficulty with the Senator about it; I do not want to be captious.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have as much right to have it read as to give an explanation.

The Secretary read the following report, made in the House of Representatives, by Mr. A. Oliver, on the 19th of July, 1856:

The Committee on Invalid Pensions, to whom was referred the memorial of Mary Kirby Smith, report:

That they have examined the same, the evidence therewith submitted, and the report made in the same case to the Thirty-First Congress, by the Committee on Revolutionary Pensions, and that they concur in said report, which is as follows:

"The memorialist claims to be the widow of E. Kirby Smith, who was a captain in the fifth regiment of the United States infantry, in the late war with Mexico, and who fell, mortally wounded, while leading a battalion, acting in the capacity of lieutenant colonel, in the attack on Molino del Rey, on the 8th day of September, 1847; and she asks that she may receive, under the act of July 21, 1848, the half pay of a lieutenant colonel for five years, in lieu of the half pay of a captain, now allowed her by the Commissioner of Pensions, under the provisions of said act.

"The committee find that the memorialist is the widow of E. Kirby Smith, deceased; that before the commencement of the late war with Mexico he was a captain in the United States Army, and in the month of August, 1845, was ordered to join, and did join, the army under General Taylor; that he was in the battles of Palo Alto and Resaca de la Palma, on the 8th and 9th of May, 1846; and that in the action of May 9, 1846, he was in the thickest of the fight, having been one of the first to enter the ravine, and there remained until the contest closed; that, on account of domestic affliction and personal sickness, he was not permitted to accompany the army to Monterey, but joined the corps under General Worth at Saltillo, and was transferred from thence to Vera Cruz, under General Scott; that at the disembarkation of the troops below that city, he performed the duties of a major in a battalion under the command of Lieutenant Colonel C. F. Smith; that he continued to discharge the duties of major in said battalion from said time until near the time of the battle of Molino del Rey; that on that occasion his battalion consisted of eight companies, and, on account of the sickness of his colonel, its command devolved on Captain Smith; that he led said battalion to the charge on that occasion with a gallantry that commanded the admiration of the whole army; and that in said act, in the line of his duty, at the very moment of victory, he fell, mortally wounded, by a musket-ball striking him under the left eye and passing out at the left ear, from which wound he languished for four days, and died on the 12th day of September, 1847; that at the time of the decease of said Smith he had three children under the age of sixteen years, to wit: of the age of eleven, eight, and five years, respectively, who are now living and dependent on their mother, the widow of said deceased, for their support and education.

"Inasmuch as the said E. Kirby Smith was, at the time he received the wound that caused his death, performing the duties of a lieutenant colonel, and but for that might have been spared to be the protector and support of his said widow and helpless children, your committee would recommend that the prayer of the petition be granted, and that the petitioner be inscribed on the pension list at the same rate as she would have been had her said husband been duly commissioned a lieutenant colonel on said 8th day of September, 1847; and for this purpose they would recommend the passage of the accompanying bill."

Your committee would respectfully recommend the passage of the accompanying bill.

Mr. STUART. I hope my honorable friend from Tennessee will give me his attention for a moment. I think that is a most meritorious case. It is in the way, if it has not passed this body, to be passed. I am apprehensive he does not understand the precise condition of the other case, and I barely wish to state it to him. It has been agreed all around, and Mrs. Gaines, among others, has participated in the agreement, to disincumber Mrs. Jones's bill entirely, and let the Senate vote upon it, and then let the other cases stand independently, and receive the separate action of the Senate, this case among others. I should vote for this myself on the reading of that report, but I suggest to the Senator from Tennessee whether he had not better allow it to stand independently, and let Mrs. Jones's bill that has come from the House be acted on independently. I think we shall not advance his case at all by seeking to add it to this bill.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. An appeal from the Senator from Michigan would have as much influence with me as from any other Senator. I think he understands that always, when gentlemen have a favorite case, they want to get it through stripped of all incumbrances. This case is meritorious, and I think more so than the original bill.

Mr. STUART. Allow me one word. I agree with the Senator, and am not at all certain that I shall vote for Mrs. Jones's bill. I only say that the Senator from Tennessee will not advance his case by putting it on this bill, because the Senate, if they have not passed that bill, I apprehend, cannot fail to pass it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. My object is to advance the great principle of justice; and while we are dealing out justice to one, I want to present another case stronger than the one we propose to provide for; and I hope we shall have the yeas and nays.

Mr. KENNEDY. I would say to my friend from Tennessee that I have a case precisely similar to his. It is a very strong one, of a constituent of my own, one that appealed as strongly to me as any case in the world, one that I am very anxious about, but I refrain from putting it on this bill. Mrs. Jones's bill has passed the House, and if we incur it by amendments we defeat the whole. I am prepared, with the amendment I have to offer, to bring it in at the proper time as a separate, and distinct bill. It stands on precisely the same footing as the case presented by the Senator himself.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will simply say to the honorable Senator from Maryland that this is no constituent of mine. There never has been an appeal to me in this case. No interested or hired persons have made appeals to me in behalf of this widow. I accidentally came upon the case, and was made familiar with the facts. It is for no constituent of mine. I never saw any of the parties; I know nothing about them; but I was interested in it from the clear, strong appeal that is made by a simple recitation of the facts. Gentlemen call on us to pass the bill as an act of justice; I look upon it as a gratuity; and I think, in such matters, we should act equally. One appeal is just as strong as the other. I am in hopes the Senate will act favorably upon my amendment. It is not a case from my State. I think it is more meritorious than the original bill.

Mr. PUGH. I believe the Senate understands the question. I hope that we may have a vote.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The first question is on the original amendment, which has been reconsidered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I thought the Senate had acted on that.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. They only reconsidered it. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. POLK. I should like to understand from the Senator from Ohio whether it increases or decreases the amount?

Mr. PUGH. I stated yesterday that it would increase it; but the Senator from New Hampshire has placed in my hands a certificate of the Adjutant General, which shows that the bill will give two dollars a month more than the amendment. I would not care about that amount; but to send the bill back to the House at this stage of the session destroys it.

Mr. HALE. It gives fifty-two dollars a month instead of fifty.

The Secretary read the amendment; which is, in lines seven and eight to strike out the words "one half the pay monthly to which her husband was entitled at the time of his death," and insert "at the rate of fifty dollars per month."

Mr. PUGH. Read the certificate of the Adjutant General.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

ADJUTANT GENERAL'S OFFICE,
WASHINGTON, June 12, 1858.
The pay proper which the late Brevet Major General R. Jones, Adjutant General of the Army, was in receipt of at the time of his death, amounted to $104 per month.

E. D. TOWNSEND,
Assistant Adjutant General.
The amendment was rejected.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question

now is on the amendment of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I hope the Senate will give us the yeas and nays upon it.

Mr. STUART. Let me appeal to my friend again. While I will vote for his case by itself, on the presentation of the report, most cheerfully—and I apprehend many Senators stand as I do—I shall be compelled, from the suggestions that have been made, to vote against it here. It places Senators in an awkward position. I appeal to my friend not to press it; it will not advance his case a particle to put it here. It will be just as far advanced without going on here as with it.

Mr. IVERSON. I must beg leave to differ entirely with the Senator from Michigan. There is no prospect of getting this case through, unless the amendment prevails. The case of Captain Smith is so strong a one that I think there will be no difficulty, if the bill goes back to the House of Representatives with the amendment, in obtaining the concurrence of the House in the amendment.

Mr. STUART. My friend from Georgia misunderstands me. I only said it would not advance this bill, and I apprehend the Senator from Tennessee can have his case passed in a minute as a separate bill.

Mr. IVERSON. But this is the difficulty about it; the bill, as the Senator terms it, for Captain Smith, is an original bill in this House. ["Oh, no."] Has it passed the House of Representatives?

Mr. STUART. No, sir.

Mr. IVERSON. Then what chance would there be to get it through the House of Representatives in its original shape? None upon earth. This is the last day of the session; so it is understood.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that is a House bill.

Mr. IVERSON. Has it passed the House?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. So the Secretary informs me.

Mr. IVERSON. Then it is altogether a different question.

Mr. PUGH. We understand it; let us have the question.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The report shows that the House bill gave her twenty dollars a month, but this proposes to give her the half pay of the rank which her husband actually held when he died.

Mr. PUGH. You can amend that bill when it comes up as easily as you can this.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. There is no chance of getting it up unless it goes on this bill. That gives it to her if the other House concur.

Mr. IVERSON. I want to understand the facts about this case; because they seem to be differently represented by the Chair and Senators upon the floor. A bill for the relief of Mrs. Mary Kirby Smith passed the House of Representatives in the shape read by the Secretary a little while ago. That is what I want to understand.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Not at all.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Not in that shape.

Mr. IVERSON. I understood from the Chair that the bill which the Senator from Tennessee offers as an amendment has already passed the House. If that is the fact, I want to understand it.

Mr. PUGH. It is as easy to amend that bill as this.

Mr. IVERSON. I can tell the Senator the difference: that if this amendment for the relief of Mrs. Smith is put upon Mrs. Jones's bill, it will stand a better chance to pass through the House than if it goes separately; because it will then have the accumulated power of both bills.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I ask for the yeas and nays on my amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Do not discriminate between widows in that way. Give us the yeas and nays. Do not vote one widow down and another widow up.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. MALLORY. I only desire to say that, having withdrawn an amendment which I offered in behalf of the widow of Commodore Perry, in order that this bill might pass, as a matter of course I cannot vote for another amendment, however meritorious it may be.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 9, nays 25; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Chandler, Fessenden, Foster, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, and Wright—9.
NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bright, Broderick, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Doolittle, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Gwin, Hale, Harlan, Hayne, Jones, Kennedy, Pearce, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thom-on of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Yulee—25.

So the amendment was rejected.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and on the question, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. FESSENDEN called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 28, nays 8; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Doolittle, Douglas, Fitch, Foot, Gwin, Hale, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Jones, Kennedy, Mallory, Pearce, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—28.
NAYS—Messrs. Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Harlan, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, Polk, and Stuart—8.

So the bill was passed.

MYRA CLARK GAINES.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Senate now take up the bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senate will take up a bill which will not occupy five minutes. It is a bill for no private interest. It relates to the general interest of a portion of the country. It is a bill in relation to the courts, and holding their terms in several Territories of the United States. It will not give rise to debate.

Mr. PUGH. I do not think Mrs. Gaines's bill will give rise to debate, and I hope we shall pass it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Ohio.

The motion was agreed to; and the bill (S. No. 383) for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to direct the Secretary of the Interior to place the name of Myra Clark Gaines, widow of the late Major General Edmund P. Gaines, on the pension roll, at the rate of half the pay per month to which he was entitled at his death, to commence from the 6th day of June, 1849, and to continue during her natural life.

The bill was reported to the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to amend the bill by inserting the words "not to exceed fifty dollars a month." ["Oh, no."] We want to pass it.

Mr. TOOMBS. It will take you till late in the morning to pass it as it is.

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, and was read the third time.

Mr. TOOMBS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered; and being taken, resulted—yeas 34, nays 7; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bigler, Bright, Broderick, Brown, Chandler, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Doolittle, Douglas, Fitch, Foot, Gwin, Hale, Hammond, Harlan, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Jones, Kennedy, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, and Wright—34.

NAYS—Messrs. Clay, Fessenden, Fitzpatrick, Iverson, Johnson of Tennessee, King, and Toombs—7.

So the bill was passed.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announced that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act for the relief of Jennet H. McCall, only child of Captain James McCall of the revolutionary war; and

An act for the relief of Georgiana M. Lewis.

MAILS TO CALIFORNIA.

Mr. BRODERICK obtained the floor.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the honorable Senator from California will allow me to call up the bill for the relief of Mrs. Trumbull.

Mr. BRODERICK. After the passage of a resolution from the House of Representatives, which is on the table, I shall be very happy to vote for the Senator's bill. I move to take from the table the joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) in regard to carrying the United States mails from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, in California. The Senate, I believe, did not understand it half an hour since, when they refused to take it up.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution.

Inasmuch as the time allowed for carrying the mail from St. Joseph to Placerville is thirty-eight days, and thirty days would afford ample time in which to perform the service, and the increased expedition is demanded by the public interests, the joint resolution authorizes and directs the Postmaster General to order an increase of speed upon the route, so as to have the mail carried through in thirty days, upon a pro rata increase of compensation to the contractors.

Mr. BRODERICK. This resolution passed the House of Representatives by a very large vote. It is a measure of great importance to California. The Senator from Missouri and my colleague, I believe, are both better acquainted with the subject than I am. I have been spoken to by several gentlemen from Missouri who have an interest in this matter, and they believe it will be for the joint benefit of both States. I hope the Senate will consider it favorably.

Mr. HUNTER. As I understand it, this is a claim to give the contractors increased compensation under the pretense of increasing the speed. We already expend an immense amount of money for mails to California, and it seems to me that so far from increasing the amount, it ought to be diminished. I doubt whether these overland mails are going to be of any benefit to the people of California. They are too slow. The great mail communication will be by steamers. It will be by water that they will get their mails. They are not going to wait for these overland mails that will take thirty or thirty-eight days, when they can get the mails in two weeks by water.

Mr. BRODERICK. It takes but twenty-five days by water now from New York to California.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Tehuantepec route should answer the expectations of its friends, they will get their mails in much less time by that line. I am unwilling to spend more money in experiments of mail communication, which it is certain cannot be as rapid as those which now exist by water. I think the Senator from California told us the other day that the expenditure for mail communication was something like two million dollars a year.

Mr. BRODERICK. One million eight hundred thousand dollars, I was informed.

Mr. HUNTER. This is to increase it beyond that sum. In the present state of the Treasury, and of the Post Office Department, whose expenditures are so largely above their means, it seems to me it cannot be right to contract these increased liabilities.

Mr. BRODERICK. You can dispense with three fourths of the other routes, if you will give us this one.

Mr. GWIN. It will be recollected by the Senate that at the last session we passed a bill authorizing the Postmaster General to establish overland mail communication with California, from some point on the Mississippi river. The Postmaster General located that route from Memphis and St. Louis, by El Paso and the mouth of the Gila, to San Francisco. It is, I may say, an exclusively southern route. It is believed, not only by the people on this side but on the other side of the mountains, that the route named in this resolution, which is already established, and upon which it is proposed to increase the speed, is a better route, and one certainly where all the emigration, I may say, has gone to California. I hope that those who have heretofore sustained the policy of establishing a southern route will not now throw obstacles in the way of this route. I look upon it as a question of the most vital consequence. I have no doubt that letters will go as speedily over this mail line as any other route. I expect to see it run in twenty days.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator from California inform me what the present rate of compensation is?

Mr. GWIN. Three hundred and ten thousand dollars on this route; on the southern route it is $600,000. The increased price is to be pro rata.

Mr. HUNTER. We are to pay one third more.

Mr. GWIN. No; we only pay for the increase of stock rendered necessary.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think it is a matter of some consequence, in the present condition of the Post Office revenues, that we should know where we are drifting to. The Senator from California speaks of the route from St. Louis and from Memphis as a southern route. The last Congress passed the law, and a very bad law I think it was, for you had plenty of people to carry the mails from here to California, providing that the President and the Postmaster General should select the best and the cheapest route to carry the United States mail overland from the Mississippi river to San Francisco. On reviewing all the routes everywhere west of the Mississippi river, they have selected the one from St. Louis down by Preston to El Paso, and to San Francisco. It was not selected as a southern route, or a northern route, but as a United States route, upon the best, cheapest, and nearest way of getting the mail through. I presume they acted according to law. I have heard no complaint on that score. I suppose, if they had not done so, there would have been a commission of inquiry. I believe that is common now. If a trust is confided to a Department, and it is not done to suit gentlemen, they get up a commission of inquiry. There having been no commission of inquiry in this case, I take it the propriety of this action of the President and Postmaster General was generally acquiesced in. There was no cheating, no job, no swindling in it. I presume they selected the best route. I do not know whether they did or did not; but I believe so, from the fact that there has been no commission of inquiry.

Here is a point from which the contractors agreed to carry all the mails to San Francisco in thirty-eight days. They want to bring the time down to thirty days. If the Postmaster General thinks the public service requires that it should be expedited, he has the right, under the laws of the land, to provide for it. Why does he not do it? You want to pass this bill to make him do it, when he thinks the public interest does not require it. Why ought you to authorize him? I do not think many of you have inquired into it to know whether it is right or wrong; but I take it these contractors want to get a large additional compensation for carrying the mails on this route which the Postmaster General does not think they are entitled to, for if he thought the increased speed necessary, he could order it under the present law of the land, making the contractors a regular pro rata allowance. It is stated in the resolution that it is important to the public service. It may be; I do not know whether it is or not.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to my friend that the resolution not only says he shall be authorized, but directed. I move to strike out the words "and directed."

Mr. TOOMBS. He is authorized now, and the resolution was intended to cover a direction against the ideas of the officer at the head of this Department. He is now authorized to have this increased rate of speed if he thinks it proper, but you propose to direct him to do it whether the public interest requires it or not. That is all it is intended for. Well, will the Senate direct him when they do not know that what he has done is his duty, under existing laws? I am told as a reason for it, that the travel will go along this line. Really, I do not know any reason why the mail of the United States from this side to the Pacific, should go on a road because people do. If we can get a better road for the mails, let us do it. I do not see that the United States mail should necessarily be carried over a route because it is an emigrant route. I think there ought to be an overland mail, and it ought to be on the best route. It should be a route for the advantage of the whole country; it should in no sense be sectional. Gentlemen ought to show Congress which is the best route, and let us take that; or if you refer it to the Department, let them select it. We have got a route selected by the Department, and we have got the Tehuantepec route, and the Panama route, and as soon as we can get that free-nigger route through Nicaragua, we shall have a Nigger route, and we shall have a Honduras route, and so we are to have six or seven mails to San Francisco. I think we shall be paying too dear for the whistle.

Mr. BRODERICK. The Senator from Georgia is correct in saying that the Postmaster General has a right to reduce the time on this route; but he does not see fit to do it. The Postmaster General has a mail route from his city to California, on which the contractors have contracted to carry the mail in twenty-five days. It is an impossibility. I believe the mail can be carried over the route named in this resolution in thirty days; and, if so, you can dispense with your large $600,000 contract for the route from Memphis, and your $175,000 contract for the route from San Antonio in Texas, to San Diego in California; and you can dispense with all your small overland contracts. I shall vote at the next session for the Tehuantepec route. Give us this route and that across Tehuantepec, and I think the people of California will be satisfied. If the Postmaster General were disposed to encourage the contractors on this line, I presume he would reduce the time; but I believe he has more interest in Memphis than he has in St. Joseph, Missouri, or Placerville, California. This is a route that is very important to the people of my State. It is the middle route; it is not an extreme southern route. I hope the vote will be taken, and the resolution passed.

Mr. BAYARD. I wish to ask whether there is an existing contract to carry this mail in thirty-eight days?

Mr. BRODERICK. There is.

Mr. BAYARD. I should like to know what is the amount paid per annum, under that contract?

Mr. BRODERICK. Three hundred and ten thousand dollars.

Mr. BAYARD. Then this resolution proposes to increase that amount one fifth.

Mr. BRODERICK. Oh, no. The increase will only be for the additional stock required.

Mr. BAYARD. There is a pro rata increase, and if you bring the time down from thirty-eight to thirty days, it must be one fifth.

Mr. YULEE. There is a regulation of the Department on the subject:

"The Postmaster General may alter the contract, and alter the schedules, on allowing a pro rata increase of compensation within the restrictions imposed by law for the additional service required, or for increased speed, if the employment of additional stock or carriers is rendered necessary; but the contractor may, in case of increased expedition, relinquish the contract on timely notice (if he prefer it) of the change."

That is the regulation by which, I presume, the Department will be governed.

Mr. POLK. The honorable JAMES CRAIG, one of the Representatives in the other House from Missouri, addressed a letter to the First Assistant Postmaster, who is familiar with the subject, in reference to this matter of pro rata increase. To that letter he has received an answer, of which I will read the last sentence, as it is the only one that bears immediately on this point:

"If increased speed is ordered, the pro rata rule also governs, the contractor being paid for the additional stock, hands, &c., necessary to accomplish it, proof of which, of course, has to be furnished."

That is what the pro rata increase is. It is determined by the amount of increased stock and labor that is required to do the work. That is all that is meant.

Mr. GREEN. That explains to the Senate all the increased cost and expense this resolution will necessarily lead to. The Senator from Georgia, I think, is incorrect when he refers to the Tehuantepec, Nicaragua, and Panama routes as affording all the facilities that the people of the United States desire from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The North must have a route; they are entitled to it. It is not a sectional question.

Mr. TOOMBS. Will my friend allow me to ask him whether or not the route from New York to San Francisco is not a northern route?

Mr. GREEN. It is not. It may be for the city of New York; but it is not for Missouri, for Iowa, for northern Illinois, and for fifteen million people. If they are to send their correspondence down to that route, it will take longer than to send it across the continent on this northern route; for in order to get there from Chicago, they must send it to New York or New Orleans, and then after it gets there it must go to Tehuantepec, to Nicaragua, or to Panama, and from thence to San Francisco. While it might take the same length of time from the city of New York, it ought to be remembered by the Senate that in order to go by that route, the correspondence must first get to the city of New York. There is an immense scope of country in the whole Northwest, embracing Iowa, Missouri, Indiana, Ohio, Wisconsin, Michigan, Minnesota, and Illinois, all of which must have an outlet. Where are they to get that outlet if you dam up and stop the only route they have to the Pacific?

When we make routes, they are not merely for cities; they are for the great public. We have already established, under law, the route from St. Joseph across to Placerville, in California. This resolution is only to increase the speed on that route from thirty-eight days to thirty, which will make it a shorter and a quicker route than any other, and it will be a great benefit to the whole northwestern part of the Republic of the United States. How much will it cost? Nothing, as the letter read from the Assistant Postmaster General says, except the increase of the material in carrying it—the mules and wagons and wagon-masters. Shall we injure and keep back the Northwest because New York city has already accommodations? because Norfolk may already have accommodations? and because New Orleans may already have accommodations? I do not think it right. Give the same facilities to all sections of the country, without reference to locality. If the correspondence of Iowa is driven to the necessity of traveling to New York, and starting from there for California, it is placed behind New York; while, if you look at the topography of the country, you find it is one third of the way to California before it starts. Is it right? No. Let them have a straight exit. Let them go forward. They can do it; they prefer it.

The question has been asked, why say "authorize and direct?" I answer, I spoke to the Postmaster General myself, this evening, since the Senate took a recess, and he says that he would rather Congress would direct it than direct it himself. It is not to speak to the Postmaster General in arbitrary terms. He prefers it; he is in favor of it; but he wants the responsibility taken by the proper power. I think it right. Other Senators may not. It looks to me like extending the same facilities, the same accommodations to all sections of the Union, without reference to locality; and for that reason I shall vote for it, and I know it is agreeable to the Postmaster General in its present terms. I can see no propriety, I can see no necessity in compelling the interior, fifteen hundred miles from the coast, to go to the coast in order to start. I hope the question will be taken.

Mr. TOOMBS. I choose to put the country right against the remarks of the Senator from Missouri, and his appeal to what he calls the Northwest. I stated that there were already four routes to the Pacific; and two of them start in Missouri. Where is the injustice to the Northwest?

Mr. GREEN. What two routes start in Missouri?

Mr. TOOMBS. One from St. Louis, and the one on which you now want to increase the speed.

Mr. GREEN. The route that starts at St. Louis only taps the route from Memphis for the accommodation of St. Louis, not for the accommodation of the Northwest.

Mr. TOOMBS. It may be that the Memphis taps the St. Louis route. According to the contract, I believe the mails are to be carried from St. Louis and Memphis to Fort Smith, where they unite. I do not know which taps the other. One starts from Memphis—not the town of the Postmaster General, as the Senator from California [Mr. Broderick] stated, for he does not live there, but it is in his State—and the other from St. Louis. The great Northwest, including Missouri, has two routes to California, starting from within her own borders. I think that is sufficient for the Northwest, even if she was ten times as big—two out of the four routes. We now pay $2,000,000 for this mail service.

Mr. GREEN. Two millions to Missouri?

Mr. TOOMBS. Two millions for carrying the mails from this side to the other side.

Mr. GREEN. Name the routes that get the $2,000,000, and the amount that each gets.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is $310,000 for the St. Joseph route; $600,000 for the St. Louis and Memphis route; $260,000 for the Tehuantepec route; and about one million dollars for the route from Panama to San Francisco.

Mr. GREEN. How much does the Northwest get of all that?

Mr. TOOMBS. Three of the termini are in the West and Northwest. One of them starts from New Orleans; another from St. Louis and Memphis; and another from St. Joseph. The great Northwest has almost an exclusive advantage in this respect. Iowa has only to send her mails to St. Joseph or to St. Louis, to go from thence to California. If they want to go through Utah, they can do it. If they want to go by way of Fort Smith, they can do so by starting from St. Louis or Memphis. If they prefer to go by way of Tehuantepec, they can go down to New Orleans, and take that route; or they can go to Havana, and thence the route from New York to Chagres. The Northwest, therefore, has the advantage of all the four existing routes, for which we pay $2,000,000. Shall we pay more? The whole postal bill is $9,000,000, and that is $4,000,000 more than it ought to be. Two million dollars of this goes for carrying the mail to one town west of the Rocky Mountains. I suppose, however, it commends itself to the Senate, because it is extravagant and nonsensical.

Mr. BRODERICK. This resolution is in relation to the mail to Placerville, in California, which is some one hundred and seventy-five miles from San Francisco.

Mr. TOOMBS. There is another contract, I presume, from Placerville to San Francisco. Is there not?

Mr. BRODERICK. Not that I know of.

Mr. TOOMBS. I reckon they have mail communications. In fact, I will undertake to say so on general principles, without knowing anything about it. I presume there is a mail from Placerville to San Francisco.

Mr. BRODERICK. The mails are carried daily from San Francisco to Placerville, if that is what the Senator means.

Mr. TOOMBS. They have a mail fourteen times a fortnight to take to San Francisco from Placerville what arrives there once a fortnight. If the Postmaster General thinks it to the public advantage to increase the speed on this route, he can do it; but the Senator from Missouri says he would rather have Congress direct him to do it. Certainly. If he does it, he is responsible; and when the day of settlement comes for all these enormities, he would rather have the responsibility on anybody than Aaron V. Brown. He would rather have you Senators, on this last night of the session, take the responsibility than take it himself. He has already said it ought not to be done; for he has not done it; he has already said it is not wise to do it, because he has not done it; but if the Senate, the House of Representatives, and the President direct it, he will no doubt do it with the greatest pleasure.

Mr. POLK. I suppose that Congress had something to do with running the mail from New York to San Francisco by the way of Panama. I suppose that Congress took some responsibility about that. I suppose that the Post Office Department did not move in that in the first instance. I presume that Congress may take the responsibility of saying that it is proper to hasten this mail between St. Joseph and Placerville. There are some gentlemen, who live immediately on the Atlantic sea-board, who seem to think that there is no part of this country except what lies along the Atlantic sea-board; and the gentleman from Georgia seems to be one of those. If there is a mail-route established from New York, he thinks it is for the accommodation of the Northwest. If there is a mail-route that runs from New Orleans, "that is for the accommodation of the Northwest and Northeast," says the gentleman. Sir, I undertake to say that any sensible man who wished to go from New York to San Francisco, if he had a feasible and easy way of going through our own country, would never think of going down over the Isthmus of Panama, and encountering the heat, the disease, and the inconveniences that are on such a route, if he could go through the temperate latitude that this route proposes to take the mail over. This route is already established. The contract time is thirty-eight days. It is known by all those who have taken the trouble to inquire into it—and the Senator from Georgia might know it if he would take the trouble to inform himself—that that distance can be made very easily in thirty days, and even in twenty-five days. The question now is, shall not Congress shorten the time? Some say it is a job for contractors.

Mr. PUGH. Will my friend allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. POLK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. By whom was this period of thirty-eight days fixed? By the Postmaster General?

Mr. POLK. I so understand.

Mr. PUGH. What time is fixed for the route from Memphis?

Mr. POLK. Twenty-five days.

Mr. PUGH. By the Postmaster General?

Mr. POLK. Yes, sir.

Mr. PUGH. I understand it all now.

Mr. POLK. The Senator from Virginia said he supposed it was a pretense to draw money out of the Treasury. The Senator from Virginia is very much mistaken; for, if I understand this subject—and I believe I have a pretty good understanding of it—this is a movement that is not made at all by the contractors. The contractors have no desire to have the time shortened, for they get nothing by it except the additional expense they will be put to in the way of horses and hands that are necessary to produce the increased speed. It is not a movement made by those who are interested in the contract on the route. Well, says the Senator from Georgia, there has been already a route established; and he seems to labor under a false impression on this subject. The act of Congress to which he alludes, did not give, as I maintain, to the Postmaster General, or to the President, the right to fix the termini of that route, or the direction of it; but it says, in so many words, that the mails shall be carried from such point on the Mississippi to San Francisco, in California, as may be selected by the contractor. There has been no commission raised in either branch of Congress to inquire into that matter, and I am very glad there has not been. I am not undertaking to say that those who have established that route have not done what they thought to be right; and I have nothing to say in condemnation of what has been done here; but when this other route may be made so that a man can start from St. Joseph and reach Placerville, in California, inside of thirty days, and that with no additional expenditure of money, except what is necessary to purchase the wagons, the horses, and the mules required to produce this increased speed, I say Congress ought to adopt it. If a line can be run over that region of country in that time, it will not only be the route that will carry the mail matter, but also many of the passengers. Sir, who would go—

Mr. SEWARD. Will the honorable Senator excuse me for saying to him that I am in favor of the passage of his bill; and, if he will consent to yield, we will try and pass it if we can; and if we cannot, speaking will not help it.

Mr. POLK. I have nothing more to say.

Mr. HUNTER. I just wish to refer to the fact that, in California, the gross amount received from postage is $256,994, and the deficit, after paying for transportation in California and for commissions of the Post Office Department, is $102,859. In addition to that, the Senator from California [Mr. BRODERICK] assures us that it costs us $1,800,000 a year to transport the mails to the Pacific shore; and, besides all that, we are now asked to increase their pro rata allowance to this line, on which the time is to be diminished from thirty-eight to thirty days, which will be an increase, I understand, of something like one fifth.

Mr. GREEN. What is the cost of transporting the mail to Norfolk from all points?

Mr. HUNTER. Nobody can tell. There is no statement of it to Norfolk.

Mr. JONES. I have an amendment to offer if it is agreeable to the Senate:

And provided, That the Postmaster General be and he is hereby authorized, to cause said route to commence at Council Bluffs or Sioux City, in the State of Iowa.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the Senator will withdraw that amendment.

Mr. JONES. The adoption of this amendment will make the road one hundred and fifty miles shorter, and will give to the State of Iowa some interest in it, which she has not now. I believe that the first railroad which will be completed to the Missouri river, will run through the State of Iowa, and that the Government of the United States will be saved a considerable sum of money, and gain a great deal in time by agreeing to my proposition. It will be an immense accommodation to the State of Minnesota if it commences at Sioux City. It will be a saving of at least two hundred and fifty miles to the State of Minnesota, generally. It will especially accommodate the city of St. Paul in that State. I do not want to have any discussion on this subject. I am willing to take the vote at once upon it, and if it is voted down I shall be content.

Mr. BRODERICK. I will inform the Senator from Iowa that if his amendment prevails the resolution will have to go back to the House. It is a House resolution. I hope he will see the necessity of withdrawing it.

Mr. JONES. I am aware of that; and I believe the House will pass it in five minutes after it gets there with my amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. HUNTER. I now move to strike out the words "and directed," in the fourth line; so that the Postmaster General will be simply authorized to make this increase of speed if he thinks proper.

Mr. BRODERICK. I hope the Senate will see the necessity of voting the amendment down, because the Postmaster General will not increase the time if it is left to him. Congress will have to do it.

Mr. HUNTER called for the yeas and nays on his amendment; and they were ordered.

Mr. TRUMBULL. The whole question is involved in this word "directed." There is no use to pass the resolution with that word stricken out, and I think it of some importance that we should pass this resolution. It has transpired here in the Senate to-night, and we have learned, that the Postmaster General is sending a mail around by Memphis, Little Rock, Fort Smith, and in that direction off to California, at an expense of some six hundred thousand dollars a year. Here is a route from St. Joseph at an expense of $300,000 in round numbers, half that amount, and the time fixed on the St. Joseph route is thirty-eight days. The time fixed on the other route is twenty-five days. We are told here to-night by the Senator from California that the mail cannot be carried on that southern route in twenty-five days; and why a contract was ever made by the Postmaster General to carry the mail in that direction I could never conceive. The whole emigration to California overland goes by the St. Joseph route, or nearly the whole of it. Of the fifty thousand emigrants who have crossed the plains, how many, I ask, ever went over the southern route? That is the best evidence in the world which could be afforded that the proper route to California is from St. Joseph; and if the Postmaster General has made a contract to the prejudice of this route, and in favor of some other, at a higher price, I think it is proper that Congress should direct him to make the contract, to carry the mail over the route which private enterprise seeks, and which will accommodate the greatest number of people. It is for the people that mails are established.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask leave of the Senate to make a report from a conference committee.

Mr. TRUMBULL and Mr. BRODERICK. Let us take a vote on this resolution.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the report cannot be received. The question is on the amendment of the Senator from Virginia, to strike out the words "and directed."

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 21, nays 23; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Crittenden, Davis, Hammond, Hayne, Houston, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Pearce, Reid, Sidel, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wright—21.

NAYS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Colamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Iverson, Jones, King, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—23.

So the amendment was rejected.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and on the question "Shall the resolution pass?"

Mr. BAYARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered.

Mr. GWIN. I wish to say a single word in reply to what has been said in regard to the Postmaster General. We are indebted to nobody as much as we are to him for the establishment of this route and the other overland mail route to California, and I have no doubt he will make time on all his routes.

Mr. BAYARD. The objection to this joint resolution is to me very evident. You are altering your laws; you are directing the Postmaster General to do this, without leaving it to his own discretion as in other cases. Again, you have, within a year past, authorized the establishment of routes, by the Postmaster General, between California and the western States; and, when the contract is scarcely made, you are then asked at once to increase the service by legislative direction, to interfere without any statement of facts requiring it, without any evidence to show you that the amount of letters to be transported by a mail of that kind, on this route, would justify the expense of it, and to increase this expenditure, as far as I can see, some sixty thousand dollars a year. Within one year after you made a contract for about three hundred and twenty thousand dollars, you are asked to increase it about sixty thousand dollars, without one particle of evidence as to the extent of communication by letter over this route. There is no time to see what is its extent. Gentlemen speak of it as if it was necessary to quicken the time for the passage of the mail, with a view to travel. The mail has nothing to do with the question of traveling on the route. The route is a post route, and persons can travel on it. The question of the transportation of the mail, and paying for increased transportation of the mail, must depend on the quantity of mails to be transmitted. There is no evidence of that kind; nothing to justify this expense, nothing to show you that the whole postage on the route would amount to even the sum you are now asked to expend for quickening the transportation on this route, when you have two or three other routes.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 29, nays 17; as follow:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Doolittle, Douglas, Durkee, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Jones, King, Polk, Pugh, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—29.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Crittenden, Hammond, Hayne, Hunter, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Pearce, Reid, Sidel, Toombs, and Wright—17.

So the joint resolution was passed.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills; which were thereupon signed by the Vice President:

An act granting a pension to Mary A. M. Jones; and

An act to establish certain post roads.

NEW POST OFFICE BILL.

The message also announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 651) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

The bill was read a first time by its title.

Mr. PUGH and Mr. TOOMBS. I object to the second reading of that bill.

REVENUE COLLECTION BILL.

Mr. SEWARD obtained the floor.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask leave to make a conference report.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from New York yield to the conference report?

Mr. SEWARD. If it will take no time.

Mr. HUNTER. I cannot tell what time it will take.

Mr. SEWARD. I move to take up the bill for the relief of Jane Turnbull.

Mr. TOOMBS. I have a report to make from a conference committee.

Mr. HUNTER. The House has adopted the conference report on the revenue bill, and I want to make it here.

Mr. SEWARD. I will defer to the consideration of the report of the Senator from Virginia.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, announcing that the House had concurred in the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, have met, and after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend to the respective Houses, as follows:

That the House of Representatives recede from its disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and concur in the same with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all after the word "warehouses," in the fifth line, to the word "addition," in line eight, and insert, "or appraisers shall receive a compensation more than twenty-five per centum greater."

Mr. HUNTER. The effect of that amendment is this: we agree to strike out the provision in regard to the minor officers and employes. We apply the Senate amendment only to the officers who receive salaries under law; and we agree that they should not receive more than twenty-five per cent. more than the New York officers. It was stated by gentlemen who were familiar with it, that the compensation to the New York officers was not to be measured by salary only because they received much more from fines and forfeitures than the officers at any other port. That is the report of the committee of conference.

The report was concurred in.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House had concurred in the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 555) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian Department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1858.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. TOOMBS. I wish to make a report from a conference committee. The Senate charged me, with two others of its members, with a free conference with the House of Representatives, upon the Post Office appropriation bill. The bill belonged to the House. We disagreed, and the bill has not been returned; but it seems the House of Representatives have sent us an original bill. I wish to state to the Senate and the country, that the Senate was willing to yield to the House of Representatives all they asked, if the House would give up their privilege of encumbering the mails which charged the Treasury with $6,000,000. They refused it, and your committee have determined to recommend, through me, that this House adhere to its disagreement; and I trust that the Senate will not take up the new bill, at least until the other House send us the bill upon which the two Houses have disagreed. There are about five or six amendments, and they send us a new bill, and not the one they referred to the committee of conference.

The VICE PRESIDENT. What motion does the Senator make?

Mr. TOOMBS. I have none to make. I merely wished to make the report. When you get the bill, I will go further into the position of the two Houses.

Mr. STUART. There must be some question on the report, I apprehend. I want to say only one word, and that is, that I am disposed to join my friend from Georgia, and see whether the Senate is any part of the legislative power of the country.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not believe they are, and I do not believe they deserve to be. [Laughter.]

Mr. SEWARD. I move that the Senate take up the bill for the relief of Jane Turnbull.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope we shall decide this question.

The VICE PRESIDENT. There is no question before the Senate except the motion of the Senator from New York.

Mr. TOOMBS. I make the motion that the Senate adhere to their disagreement on the Post Office bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair asked the Senator, and he said he did not make any motion.

Mr. TOOMBS. I did not want immediate action, but I made that report.

Mr. PUGH. How can we adhere without having the bill? I should like to have that question decided. I make the point that a motion to adhere or insist is out of order unless we have the bill. I agree with the Senator from Georgia; I intend to be with him on the main question; but I dislike voting on a bill which is not before the Senate.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Both Houses cannot have the bill at the same time.

Mr. PUGH. The bill is in the other House. The report is in order, but I do not see that any other thing is in order in regard to the bill. We cannot act on the bill when it is not here.

Mr. HUNTER. I think I can state what are the difficulties in the case. The House of Representatives have certainly involved us in difficulty in regard to this bill. They have acted upon the supposition, which is not true in a parliamentary sense, that laying the bill on the table is defeating it. Whilst a bill which was originated in the House and returned to the House with amendments by the Senate, is still in existence and lying on their table, they have undertaken to originate another bill and send it to us. I have no doubt they did it from inadvertence. If they had possessed any means of putting an end to the bill, this other course would have been legitimate. Laying it on the table, although by their own rules it makes it almost impossible to get at it, yet does not in a parliamentary sense destroy the bill. The case is a new one—I suppose unknown in the history of parliamentary bodies; but it seems to me the proper course would be for a committee of conference to consult in regard to it, and get the House of Representatives to retrace its steps and reconsider them. They ought to reconsider the vote by which this new bill has been passed, and take the other bill from the table. If they do not, I do not see but that we are involved in difficulties that are almost inextricable.

Mr. STUART. Perhaps to avoid all misapprehension, I ought to remark, that I did not say what I said a few moments ago, under any feelings of excitement at all; but I feel that the time has arrived when it is best for the Senate to see whether their weight, as a legislative part of this country, can be felt or not. I think the proceedings of the House of Representatives most extraordinary. The Senator from Virginia is undoubtedly correct. When a bill is pending between the two Houses, with a committee of conference—a free conference between the two Houses—for one House to seize that bill and to place it on the table, or to do anything else with it which takes it out of the reach of both Houses, by the concurrent action of their committees, is certainly a most extraordinary event in the history of legislation. I think there is no difficulty in getting over this point, and it may be done by recommitting the report to our committee of conference, and let the committees notify each other, and meet again, and get possession of that bill. That they can do. They have a right to the possession of the bill. It is not in the power of either House to take it out of their possession. It is as much in the possession of our committee, for the purpose of disposing of the conference, as it is theirs. Of course, under the parliamentary law, it belongs in the first instance, for the purpose of making a report on it, to the House that asked the conference; but it does not belong to that House to seize it and put it beyond the reach of the other House. That cannot be done.

Now, sir, I think we get out of the difficulty in the way I propose. When the House come to see that they have assumed and practiced upon this most extraordinary and unjustifiable course, the committee will have the bill. I submit that in an extreme case, it would be competent for the committee to take the bill. The action of the House in laying it on the table goes for nothing. I want to get at this matter in the most peaceable manner; but I am prepared to say that, in my judgment, my duty calls upon me here to-night to declare that the bill sent here as a new bill cannot be got along with any further than the rules of order will coerce it against my judgment. I hope to agree with the Senate and with all the Senate on the question; but I cannot consent that the House of Representatives shall seize a bill while it is really before a committee of conference, lay it on the table outright without authority, and take it out of our reach. In this case it is remarkable that the House had agreed to a portion of our amendments by a fair vote of the House, and they had become a part of the bill; and yet they propose now to lay all that on the table, and to send us a new bill, commencing de novo where we began in legislation on this question. That will never do. I suggest, if the Senate agree with me, that we had better recommit the report, and have the committees reassemble, and see if they cannot by consultation relieve us of this difficulty. I move, therefore, to recommit the report to the committee of conference.

Mr. HUNTER. I suggest to the Senator from Michigan that the best motion would be that the Senate insist, and ask for another conference.

Mr. PUGH. We cannot insist without the bill.

Mr. STUART. I think the Senator from Virginia is mistaken. I believe we shall get along best by having a consultation between the committees.

Mr. HUNTER. Very well.

Mr. STUART. I make that motion.

Mr. SEWARD. I wish to know whether the committee of conference on the part of the House is not discharged, and it is not necessary to ask for a new committee of conference?

Mr. STUART. No, sir; the Senator will see that the committee could not be discharged in this manner. The House could act on the report, and on nothing else. It was not their bill. They could act on the report of the committee; but nothing else was in their reach.

Mr. SEWARD. Perhaps the honorable Senator is right, but I think he will find when he comes to have this bill recommitted to the same committee of conference, that the members of that committee, acting on the part of the House of Representatives, will consider themselves precluded from further action upon it, from the fact that the bill has been laid on the table in the House.

Mr. STUART. That is a proceeding which they had no authority to take—none in the world under parliamentary law. They might as well come to us saying they have left that bill down on the Potomac bridge. They have no such authority, and the committee of conference will relieve the two Houses of the whole difficulty, I am satisfied, if we recommit the report.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think the remedy proposed by—

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Georgia withdraw his motion for the motion of the Senator from Michigan?

Mr. TOOMBS. Yes, sir. I think the measure proposed by the honorable Senator from Michigan is a very appropriate and proper one.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Michigan.

Mr. BROWN. I do not think it will amount to anything. After the extreme action of the House of Representatives, they are not likely to send their committee to us again. There is a remedy for this state of things, and it will be effective. When the new bill is brought up, lay it on the table, and let it stay here; give up all idea of passing any appropriation bill for the Post Office Department until the session expires; then, at the expiration of the session, the President will reconvene you, and you will have plenty of time to discuss this whole matter over. The President will issue his proclamation, and do it instantly. Let us have a session next week, when we can take up business in regular order. I am not for patching up things in this way.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not think it is worth while for the Senate to act in a passion on any mere small point of difference between the Senate and House of Representatives at this hour of the session. We may as well take the matter into serious consideration and see how we can get out of the difficulty. I do not suppose that the House of Representatives want to insult the Senate, and I do not think there is any occasion for any indignation on the part of the Senate. It is a difficulty, and one that embarrasses us at this present time; the question is how best we can get out of that difficulty without infringing upon our own dignity, of which I think there is not any great danger in reference to such a matter as this. I think the original proposition of the Senator from Virginia is the best one, for the simple reason that it is the one which would be most likely to be acceded to. The House of Representatives have laid the bill on the table, in consequence of a report of a conference committee who, in my judgment, having made their report to the House, were discharged from any further consideration of the subject. They having reported the bill back to the House, placed it in the possession of the House, and the committee have nothing more to do with it.

If we take the suggestion of the Senator from Michigan, and send a message to the House saying that we have recommitted the bill to the same committee of conference, they will consider that probably a sort of imputation on their course, and will not be very likely to agree to it; but if we appoint a new committee of conference, and ask the House to do the same, it is a conciliatory course, and if the House agree to it, we are at once relieved of the difficulty in which we are placed; or we might send a message to them, asking them to take the bill from the table, and recommit it. We can take any form which will reach the object.

I do not think the last night of the session is a time to get up questions unnecessarily if they can be avoided by proceeding in a regular parliamentary course. With reference to the existing difficulty, I do not think it is a remedy which the Senate or the House will choose, or which anybody ought to choose, to say that we shall let the bill fall, and fall for a reassembling of Congress, in order to pass the same bill at an extra session, when we can as well do it to-night. It is only punishing ourselves for the sake of showing a little temper, and it amounts to nothing.

Therefore, as in my judgment, the course proposed by the Senator from Virginia is perfectly consistent with our own dignity, and perfectly respectful to the House of Representatives, and one which they would be likely to accede to, I see no difficulty at all in adopting it, and I hope it will be adopted in preference to the course suggested by the Senator from Michigan, which, I believe, will only lead to further difficulty, and complicate the matter still more.

Mr. STUART. I think that if my friend from Maine will listen to me a minute, I can satisfy him that there are two very serious objections to his proposition. It will only increase the difficulty. In the first place, you get into a difficulty on the question raised by my friend from Ohio.

Mr. PUGH. Let me suggest to the Senator how we can get out of all that. It is competent for us to ask a conference with the House on the subject of the bill. Leave out the word "insist," and then you take no action on the bill, but just ask for a conference.

Mr. STUART. I say, in the first place, you raise the question whether you can act on the report of a conference committee without the bill before you; and my own opinion is that you cannot do that; but, in the next place, the House of Representatives may say to you, "you have appointed a committee of conference on a bill that has not any existence." By their rules, the laying of a bill on the table, and reconsidering that vote and laying that motion on the table, is death to it. When they have the proper control of the bill, that is the effect of their rules. They may say to you, "you have asked a committee of conference on that bill; you have a new committee; but we do not propose to appoint a new committee."

Mr. PUGH. Cannot we appoint a committee of conference without any bill? I supposed that was never disputed.

Mr. STUART. I am aware of that.

Mr. PUGH. We can make complaint of them of a breach of privilege through a committee of conference.

Mr. STUART. I cannot make myself understood unless I have an opportunity to say what I desire to say. You may appoint a committee of conference without any bill; but that is a very different affair from our ordinary committees of conference. The Houses may confer together without any bill; but it is an entirely different affair, and treated in an entirely different way. If, now, we insist that our committee of conference is still in existence, and that the bill is still in existence, and our committee return with the notification that the Senate insists that that bill is in existence, and that this committee is in existence with it, they can confer together, and will have more chance to relieve us of the difficulty than if we appoint a new committee. We shall involve ourselves in both these difficulties if we undertake to proceed with a new committee.

I entertain no doubt that either body cannot proceed to act upon the report of a committee of conference without the bill, because, when the report is read you have the right to have the bill read, to see what it is. The report connects itself with the bill. It enumerates the amendments by numbers, one, two, three, &c. "What are they?" some Senator says, all the time. We cannot tell; we have not got the bill. The report has the same number as the bill. The report is as to Senate bill No. 369, for example. The question is on that. They are one and the same thing. You cannot proceed without the bill; but in this way we have as good a committee as we desire; we have a committee that is conversant with all the facts, knows how the difficulties have originated, can confer together a great deal better than a new one, and we can relieve ourselves.

I agree with the honorable Senator from Maine that there is no occasion for any offensive or exciting language; but there is an occasion for a deliberate assertion of what is the parliamentary law on our part, and we ought to say to the House of Representatives that they cannot seize a bill, in which bill they have agreed to several of our amendments by a vote of the House, so that they became a part of the bill, and lay that on the table and hand us something else. That can never be done. I wish to relieve ourselves of the difficulty, and I think the very best way to do it is to recommit the report, and then let the committees act.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The difficulty, in my mind, is one that the Senator from Michigan does not answer; it is that the committee of conference from the House having made their report, and the bill being out of their possession, there is an end of them.

Mr. COLLAMER. The committee of conference had no report to make. They merely reported that they could not make any.

Mr. FESSENDEN. If they report that they cannot make a report, that is a report, in one sense of the word, and my difficulty is the same. Their function is ended, so far as the bill is concerned, and it amounts to the same thing, whether you recommit the report to the same committee or appoint a new committee. It is, in fact, the same men appointed again a committee to do the same thing on which they have acted, in my judgment.

But leaving that, it is not to be presumed that the House of Representatives knew or supposed that they were doing anything unparliamentary or improper. The Senator from Michigan says that they had no right to do this by parliamentary law; that they have taken a very strange mode of proceeding, and one which cannot be justified under the parliamentary law. Be it so. That is a matter of opinion. They think they can justify it. It is not to be supposed, as I said, that they undertook to do a thing willfully and knowingly that they believed to be improper. But, having done so in the judgment of the Senate—and it seems the Senators who have spoken agree on that point—the only question is how we shall remind the House of that fact in a manner to settle the difficulty, and to accomplish what we want to accomplish—that is, to pass this necessary appropriation bill.

I say you will not accomplish that by merely sending a message to them, recommitting the report to the same committee. They will reply to you that the report is out of their hands. But if you take the course suggested by the Senator from Ohio, and simply ask a conference on the subject of the bill, that is a request to which they will be likely to accede, because it is not to be presumed that the House want a difficulty any more than we want one. It is to be presumed that they wish to pass the bill in a shape that may be satisfactory—to make the necessary appropriations. If, therefore, we send a message to the House, in proper terms, requesting them to appoint conferees to meet conferees on the part of the Senate, to take into consideration this existing difficulty, it is to be supposed they, as reasonable men, will be willing to do it. I hope, therefore, that course will be taken, because it is the only one which will get us out of the difficulty. I prefer the form suggested by the Senator from Ohio, because it removes his objections.

Another thing I do not think it is to be presumed that the House act on the principles suggested by the honorable Senator from Georgia in making his report; and that is, that they refuse to save the Treasury a large sum of money, for that is his idea, by giving up a privilege personal to themselves. It is not to be presumed they acted on such a principle. I think the House have some reason in the objection they make. They sent us an appropriation bill. In one of the last days of the session we put on that bill legislation, and legislation of very important character, and legislation that ought to be accompanied by discussion and investigation. We put on it legislation raising the rates of postage, a matter that is very interesting to all the people of this country. We put on that ordinary appropriation bill legislation abolishing a privilege which has existed almost from the foundation of the Government. We sent these amendments to them to be acted on in a moment. The House insist that that is not the proper place for them. It is important legislation—legislation which they have no time to consider properly, and they say that on this appropriation bill they will not agree to it. They say so by a very large majority, and they represent the people much more directly, in my judgment, than we do, and they sent us the bill originally. That is the theory of our Government, but I will not make an issue on that. However, they say so, and they say so by an overwhelming majority of the House.

We have conceded over and over again, and the Senator from Michigan has argued it on this floor many a time, that an appropriation bill, except in a case of necessity, is an improper place to put important legislation upon; and yet in this bill we have done that very thing in a most remarkable and striking manner, which he has contended himself so many times was improper in itself. Now, can we quarrel with the House for saying so? The House say nothing more in reference to the matter. They are not to be presumed as saying any thing more; they are not to be presumed as saying they would rather tax the Treasury a large sum than give up a personal privilege; but they are to be presumed to say—what they may with great propriety—that this legislation, being of very important character, ought not to be put on this bill. I would rather give a favorable than unfavorable construction to their action. Under these circumstances this difficulty arising, and everybody conceding that it is a difficulty out of which we ought to get if we can, and as soon as we can, why not take the most conciliatory course, and request them to appoint conferees to meet conferees on the part of the Senate to see how we can get out of it? It is perfectly respectful, perfectly peaceful, and I hope it will be done.

Mr. TOOMBS. I did not care to do more than state the facts when I made this report, as the organ of the Senate, and I must express my entire disapprobation of the speech of the Senator from Maine. I think it is due to the ordinary decency of this body and due to the Constitution, that we should maintain the rights committed to our hands by the fundamental law.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I agree to that.

Mr. TOOMBS. Well, sir, at no time in the history of our Government, at no time in the history of any deliberative body, with whose proceedings I am acquainted, has such a thing as this ever before been heard of. The Senator from Maine gives us no precedent. The House of Representatives, in the ordinary course of legislation, sent us a general appropriation bill, in which they proposed legislation, taking $3,500,000 out of the Treasury, without any authority of law on earth. Talk to me of legislating in appropriation bills, when this very bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, contained a distinct item of legislation appropriating $3,500,000 of the public treasure, not in pursuance of any previous law, for there was none, but to supply whatever deficiency there might be in carrying on the Post Office Department. There was no law for it, but it was legislation against the fundamental principles of the Government and its practice and policy for sixty years. That policy had been to make the Post Office Department support itself. The House of Representatives did not provide in the bill for the deficiency in this service in the ordinary way, but they took $3,500,000 out of the Treasury by independent legislation. Now, it is vain to talk about legislating on appropriation bills. The Senate put a job of $500,000 on one, and the other House gulped that down without a wry face, because it was a printing job. There was no law for that. The Senator from Maine did not complain of it. I rather think he backed it.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know to what the Senator refers.

Mr. TOOMBS. I mean the continuation of the State Papers.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Is that on the Post Office bill?

Mr. TOOMBS. No; but on one of the appropriation bills.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I voted against it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I thought you were for it. I know there was a very great majority for it—two to one—and I was rather addressing the majority.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I voted against it.

Mr. TOOMBS. I beg the gentleman's pardon; but there has not been an appropriation bill passed this session without independent legislation, and there never has been one since I have been a member of either branch of Congress. That has become the universal rule—the universal policy of the Government. The very reduction of postage, of which we complain, took place on the Post Office appropriation bill. We propose to raise the rates of postage just as they were reduced; and so we are following the precedents on this very point; and this talk of legislation on mere appropriation bills is a mere pretense. The committee of the Senate told the committee of the House that, in our opinion, the Post Office establishment should maintain itself; that when the three-cent rate was adopted, it was on the foolish calculation that it would bring revenue enough to support the Department. Experience has shown that to be false, and therefore we propose now to go back where we started. The other House said they would not do it. There were three or four amendments, and your committee offered to the committee of the other House that we would abandon all our amendments if they would give up the right of filling up the public mails with their franks. I am willing to meet them before the American people on that point. When the public Treasury is charged $6,000,000 for the Post Office establishment, ought we not to do something; and what so appropriate as to relieve the public, so far as we ourselves are concerned? I was willing to leave the other House the privilege of using their franks, the privilege of putting this additional weight on the mails, if they would allow this body to relieve the public from the burden of their franks; but they would not do that. I wanted to put our proposition in writing, and report the facts; but they would not agree to that. They took the bill back to their own Hall, laid it on the table, and sent us another bill.

Senators, are you ready to maintain the Constitution, and your rights and your duties under it? or have you become incapable of exercising those high constitutional powers committed to you by your fathers, committed to you by the sovereign people of your States? Are you ready to surrender those rights to whoever will ask for them? If you are, then, rather than see this Government broken down for such a cause, I could wish to God another Cromwell would come and tell you, "away with that bauble!"

What legislation did we propose on this bill? Was it to increase the burdens of the people of this great Republic? No; it was to lessen them. Was it to take to ourselves a privilege? No; it was to abandon it. The poor boon asked by this body of surrendering their privilege of franking, which is an onerous burden to the people, is denied by the House of Representatives. They not only grasp their own privilege, with a tenacity for which I desire to hold them to account before the freemen of this country, and on which I am willing to meet them anywhere, but they will not let you do it, because they do not like the discrimination. To get rid of the bill, instead of, according to parliamentary law, with manly firmness adhering to their position, they sneak off and lay the bill on the table, and send you a fresh one. That is the course of the House of Representatives. They would not say that they adhered to their disagreement because we brought them to the naked point; but they thought they would sham it and give us a clean bill; a clean bill—only taking from the public Treasury ten millions of money, and they ask us to spare them, oh spare their rights and privileges; let them put their correspondence as a burden on the people of the country, no matter what it costs the public. Then, against the usage, against parliamentary law, against precedent, against practice, in defiance of your rights, in derogation of your duty, you are called upon to surrender these high privileges to a coordinate branch. As God lives, I will never do it by any vote of mine.

Mr. PUGH. Mr. President—

Mr. FESSENDEN. Will the Senator allow me to say a few words in reply to the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. PUGH. Yes, sir.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Mr. President, I have to state, in reply to the Senator from Georgia, that what I said in reference to legislation was to be taken in the ordinary sense in which that term is used here. The House of Representatives sent us an appropriation bill, making appropriations to enable the Postmaster General to execute the laws with regard to the Post Office Department under his charge. I do not know that there was any other legislation on it. I am not aware that it contained any legislation on general subjects. If the bill did anything more than execute the laws as they existed, I suppose the Senator from Georgia can specify what further it did.

Mr. TOOMBS. It contained legislation to the amount of $3,500,000.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I do not know how that was. What was it for?

Mr. COLLAMER. That was only to supply deficiencies in the postages.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I am informed, by the Senator from Vermont that that provision was, in fact, to carry out the existing laws; because it was only a provision that, in case the postages did not amount to enough to execute those laws, the deficiency should be taken from the Treasury. Then the whole bill did nothing but make appropriations to carry out existing laws; and in that sense I spoke of it. I have not been one of those who have complained very much of putting legislation on appropriation bills in regard to subjects not applicable to those bills. That has been no complaint of mine, nor has it been of the Senator from Michigan; but I believe it has been very frequently of the Senator from Georgia. It is very well known that the other House, at this Congress, have been somewhat sensitive on this subject; they have objected, and objected strongly, to legislation on appropriation bills. I was commenting on their course; and I went no further than to say that, when the House of Representatives acted upon a subject of that kind, instead of being presumed to act from mean motives, and to be sneaks, as the Senator from Georgia calls them, in not a very parliamentary mode I must say, it was just as well to take it for granted that a coordinate branch of the Legislature acts from good motives, and on good and sufficient grounds, as from mean motives, and grounds that cannot be sustained. The Senator from Georgia talks about our high privileges under the Constitution. I value them as highly as he does, or as any other man does; but have not the House of Representatives their rights and their privileges, too? Are they not a coordinate branch of the Legislature with us?

Mr. TOOMBS. They are equals; no more.

Mr. FESSENDEN. Why, then, may they not assert their rights as well as we assert ours? We have equal rights; no more than they. We are elected for a little longer time, but that does not make us any better men or give us any higher rights. Now, what I complain of with reference to this matter, is, that simply because the Senate cannot carry its own points, feeling should arise here against the House of Representatives. Why should not they complain of us when we do not agree to some amendments which they make to bills? Why do they not say "we do not allow the Senate to dictate to us about our amendments?" We do not hear any such language from the other House that I know of; I never heard of their using it; and if they had used it, I should consider it wholly out of the ordinary course of things.

I ask again, why should we, because the House of Representatives do not choose to agree to some amendments of ours, impute mean motives to them, and use language which is calculated to excite them still more; which is calculated to produce the very effect we deprecate, and to result in the loss of an important bill simply for the reason that they act upon principles which they value, from motives that are sufficient to them? and they have a right to be presumed to be quite as honest men as we are, and to have the good of the country as much at heart as we have. I do not impute any such motives to the House of Representatives. They may have good reasons for saying that they will not agree to abolish the franking privilege. I voted for that abolition myself, and I must confess that I did it upon a somewhat selfish ground, and that was, to get rid of the immense labor which it entails. It would be a great relief, so far as I am concerned, to get rid of it; but I doubt very much (and if that doubt had been certainty, I should not have given the vote I did) whether it is doing the people so much good to abolish the franking privilege, as has been supposed. It has, however, been called for in some of the public prints—prints of importance, representing the people: it is said to be public opinion; and if the people think it is a privilege which ought to be abolished, I am willing to try it, for God knows I shall be happy to be rid of the labor which it entails upon me. The other House may judge differently. They are a much larger body than we are. It is to be presumed that, in so much larger a body, there is a greater amount of collective wisdom. We need not arrogate it all to ourselves. The Senator from Georgia will permit me to say that he has too often denounced the Senate, perhaps not exactly as corrupt, but as derelict to all its duties under the Constitution, to assume to stand forward as the organ of this body claiming any very great nicety of honor for it on this occasion, or any other, because we happen to differ from the House of Representatives.

I say as I said before, that I see no ground for making these charges against the House of Representatives. They are to be presumed to act, and I believe have acted, from as good motives as we have, and it does not become us as a Senate, because we happen to differ from them, to denounce them, and say we will take no course to make an agreement with them for the reason that they have happened to do a thing which we think is unparliamentary. We do unparliamentary things ourselves; but it is not to be presumed that we do them from bad motives or with bad intent. I wish to settle this difficulty. I wish the Senate to act like a dignified body, and instead of flying into a passion and denouncing the House of Representatives, to send a message to them in good temper, requesting a further conference. That is the course becoming to us, and I hope we shall adopt it.

LOAN BILL.

A message was received from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the House concurred in the Senate amendment to the bill (H. R. No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000, with amendments.

Mr. PUGH and Mr. HUNTER rose.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Virginia.

Mr. PUGH. I yielded the floor to the Senator from Maine. I did not know that I lost it.

Mr. HUNTER. I wish to ask for a pause in this business, that we may take up the loan bill. I want to get it through to send it to the President, and then we can resume this discussion, if there be no objection.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MASON.) It may be done by common consent. ["No objection!"] The Chair hears no objection.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House to the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000. The House concur in the amendments of the Senate with two amendments; first, in line four, strike out the word "fifteen," and insert "twenty," so that the amendment will read, "a sum not exceeding $20,000,000;" and next, in line sixteen, to strike out "five," and insert "six," so that it will read, "bearing a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum," instead of five per centum.

Mr. HUNTER. I will say, in regard to the proposed increase of the sum, that the Secretary of the Treasury is of opinion, from examining the appropriation bills, so far as they have passed, that it would not be safe to adjourn until we have provided him with the right to borrow $20,000,000. I will add that it was my original opinion, before the loan bill was introduced for $15,000,000, that the sum should have been $20,000,000 instead of $15,000,000. I hope the Senate will concur in the amendment of the House.

Mr. PUGH. I think this increase of $5,000,000 is a singular thing at this time of the session, and I am constrained to ask for the yeas and nays on that amendment.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask how long this loan is for?

Mr. HUNTER. The same length of time named in the original bill.

Mr. SIMMONS. Twenty million dollars, at six per cent., for fifteen years?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes. I ask that the question be taken separately on the different amendments.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question is on the amendment first read.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to ask the Senator from Virginia whether he proposes to move a concurrence in the other amendment of the House?

Mr. HUNTER. I am willing to concur in it. I always thought it was a matter of indifference. I think it unimportant. Let that be settled just as the Senate choose. I would advise them to concur in it by way of closing the bill. I have no doubt it will be a five per cent. loan if we fix the maximum at six per cent.; but if they prefer to adhere to five per cent. as a maximum, I am very willing. I make no point on that.

Mr. SIMMONS. I suppose the Secretary of the Treasury will get about two millions premium on a six per cent. loan for $20,000,000. That will make it $22,000,000 instead of the $15,000,000 originally asked for.

Mr. TOOMBS. As I have not concurred in the expenditures which have swollen this necessity, I simply wish to announce the reason why I shall not vote for this loan. I think the Government is right in demanding it, and I think Congress is bound to grant it; because it is utterly impossible for the Government to carry on the administration of the country without paying what is voted here; but as I am not responsible for the appropriations which I do not approve, I shall not borrow one dollar of the money, but let those who have voted the money raise it.

Mr. SIMMONS. What is the proposed amendment now?

Mr. HUNTER. Merely to add $5,000,000 to the loan.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no disposition to detain the Senate on this subject; but since the $15,000,000 was asked for we were, by a special message in regard to the Utah war, yesterday told that the Treasury was relieved from an appropriation of about four and a half million dollars that was estimated for when this bill was first introduced. I am utterly surprised at the course of things here. This is the fourth proposition for a loan in the last five months, and I do not know how people make estimates. Here is $4,500,000 diminution of the expenses by the abandonment of the three regiments, which are now said not to be desired. If I understood the message of the President yesterday, he said there would certainly be no occasion for calling out two of the regiments, and he did not desire the one for Texas; that is, $4,500,000 of the money that was estimated for by the Treasury Department when this loan was asked, will not be spent. That so-called Utah war was assigned as a reason for most of the items in the deficiency bill, which was nearly ten million dollars. I was at a loss then to understand why that was not apprehended when the former loan bill was asked for.

On the 8th day of December, when the Secretary made his annual report to Congress, he reported that he would have enough to go through the year, and have over four hundred thousand dollars left at the end of this fiscal year. Within a fortnight of the meeting of Congress he asked for a $20,000,000 loan, which you granted; and subsequently, by some sort of estimates that I could not comprehend, he asked for $15,000,000 more. Since that time we have lessened the appropriations to the amount of at least $4,500,000, and he asks a loan of $5,000,000 in addition to the $15,000,000. I do not know but that is all right. I certainly would not withhold it if I thought it would be needed; but I am utterly surprised at that system of financiering for a country.

Mr. HUNTER. All I have to say in regard to the appropriations is, it is true we do not propose to ask for the bill for volunteers. I think they will not be needed. But we have added to appropriation bills in other respects beyond the amounts estimated.

Mr. HOUSTON. I believe the understanding is that only two of the regiments are to be dispensed with. I am authorized by the Secretary of War to say that it is desirable to have the regiments of rangers for Texas.

Mr. HUNTER. If that was so, it would only increase the appropriations.

Mr. HOUSTON. I hope that regiment will not be dispensed with.

Mr. HUNTER. I will only add that the expenditures are to be measured by the appropriations, not by the loans. The Secretary is of the opinion—and I am inclined to think he is right—that there will be great danger of an extra session having to be called unless we enlarge the loan to this amount. But it will be for the Senate to determine. It is a late hour of the night, and I hope we shall determine it one way or the other.

Mr. SIMMONS. I should like to ask the Senator from Virginia, as he seems to understand this matter, whether the five millions we appropriated in what was called the deficiency bill, in consequence of the anticipated troubles in Utah, for the next fiscal year, will not now, a great deal of it, remain in the Treasury for other uses, inasmuch as the war is likely to cease?

Mr. HUNTER. On that subject I am not authorized to speak; but I should think the state of affairs in Utah justify us in hoping that the expenditures will be diminished.

Mr. SIMMONS. I have no doubt, myself, from the estimates made when this loan was called for, that, including the three regiments and the $5,000,000 appropriated for Army transportation, at least $9,000,000 will be remitted to the Treasury for other uses. I cannot conceive how it is possible that, within a fortnight, we are called upon to add $5,000,000 to the loan, though we have cut off $9,000,000 from the appropriations. I cannot conceive how people can expect the Government to go on with such calculations.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I simply want to inquire of the honorable Senator from Virginia what was the amount estimated by the Government itself for its expenses during the coming year? I think it was about seventy-four or seventy-five million dollars. Am I right?

Mr. HUNTER. Yes, sir. That was exclusive of the three regiments.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I understand it was exclusive of that. It has been intimated that we have carried up the expenditures of the Government far beyond the means of the Government. Now, I do not know in what particular we have done this. The Government originally estimated for $75,000,000, or more, exclusive of the regular regiments which they proposed should be permanently added to the Army, at an expense of four or five million dollars a year; and the Senate, for the sake of economy, provided volunteers. We should be credited for that much economy, at any rate. Now, we are told upon the part of the Government that we have swelled up the appropriations to a sum unexpected by them in the first instance. My friend from Georgia seems to think that we are bound to make this appropriation, because, he says, we have made the expenditure. I do not know in what way we have done it. We have not, in any case, gone beyond the ordinary appropriations made by Congress. Did not the Government anticipate and know that there were private claims against the Government, and that, to some extent, in justice, we were bound to allow them? Certainly. In what other particular have we surpassed the usual course of the precedents in Congress? We have prevented the Government from expending $4,000,000 at least more than they desired to do with respect to the Army. I do not see that we are entitled to such a charge at all.

Mr. HUNTER. I hope the Senator from Kentucky does not understand me as making any such charge against Congress.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. No, sir; I do not.

Mr. WILSON. We received, this morning, a message from the President of the United States, which, it seems to me, was sent in here for the purpose of giving the country to understand that the Congress of the United States had gone much beyond the requirements of the Government in appropriation. Now, sir, I have paid some little attention to the subject of appropriations and the finances of the Government this year, and I do not think that any man who has paid any attention to those things has been at all disappointed in the estimates and calculations. In all the reading I have given the public documents, I have never read or heard of such estimates as we have had made this year from the Secretary of the Treasury.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

MONDAY, JUNE 14, 1858.

NEW SERIES....No. 189.

Some of us said here, a few days ago, that this bill making a loan of $15,000,000 would not carry us to the 1st of January. Every man in the country who devoted any attention to the subject knew it. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. SIMMONS] knew it as well then as he knows it now. I do not rise at the present moment to debate this question, but to state that when you have footed up these estimates and the appropriations of Congress, you will find, sir, that the Congress of the United States has not appropriated so much money as the Administration demanded. They have asked for more than we have given. Four fifths of the additional appropriations the Administration had a right to expect Congress would appropriate for matters which were right in themselves. I say four fifths of those appropriations the Government have anticipated.

But with all this, we have not exceeded the appropriations they have demanded. Why, sir, they demanded five regiments, which would have cost $5,000,000 annually. They demanded ten vessels of war. Two million dollars more would have been required for that purpose. They demanded $2,000,000 for fortifications. I believe we have given a small amount for that object—some five or six hundred thousand dollars. We all know, Mr. President, that the deficiency bill was pressed through here with all the power of the Government, and those of us who did not join in its support, no matter to which side we belonged, received the censure of the official journal of the Government.

This is the fact of the matter. I say here to-night, and I want the country to understand it, that the Congress of the United States has not appropriated as much money as this Administration demanded; that this loan, and all the loans and all the means to raise money for this Government is only to supply the absolute imperative demands of this Administration, and we shall hold the Administration responsible for this entire sum of money. This is all I wish to say upon the subject. It is no time for debating it, but I protest against settling upon this Congress, by the President or anybody else, the responsibility of having rendered necessary the addition of $5,000,000 to this loan bill.

Mr. IVERSON. The Senator from Massachusetts is mistaken, I think, in regard to the amount of estimates made by the Administration. The Administration did not include, in the estimates for this session, anything for the five regiments. Those regiments were not raised. It became necessary, by act of Congress, to authorize them before they were estimated for. They were not part of the estimates; nor were there any estimates made for the ten sloops-of-war. They were not built, or authorized to be built, by Congress.

Mr. WILSON. They were demanded.

Mr. IVERSON. I know they were asked to be built, but their cost did not form a part of the original estimates.

Now, in relation to the present proposition, I will simply make this remark: if $20,000,000 are authorized to be borrowed, and the appropriations do not require the expenditure, then there is no harm done. If we only authorize a loan of $15,000,000, and the appropriations exceed the amount, then the Government must be embarrassed. If, on the other hand, we authorize a loan of $20,000,000, and the appropriations shall not reach that sum, then, as a matter of course, the loan not being called for or demanded, the money will not be expended. Neither the Secretary of the Treasury, nor the President, has any power to put his hands into the Treasury and take out money without an appropriation made by Congress. There is, therefore, no danger whatever in authorizing a loan of $20,000,000. No man understands what is or will be appropriated by Congress. The appropriations may exceed much beyond what gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber seem to anticipate. It is certainly the safest course to authorize a loan of $20,000,000, because no harm would come if it should exceed the amount necessary to be expended.

Mr. SEWARD. It is all very well for Senators to add $5,000,000 to this bill. I might possibly, under the circumstances of the case, as it is shown by the Administration to be imperatively necessary, agree to it myself. I should be the more inclined to think I could vote in favor of such a proposition at the request of the Administration, if the Administration itself was ingenious in its exposition of the finances, and of its own action and of Congress. But we are met here on the last day of the session with a lecture, and reproved for prodigality, for extravagance by Congress, from the President of the United States, and it is followed up by an additional application for a loan of $5,000,000. That causes me to review the whole of this subject, and I find that the Administration recommended, at the beginning of the session, provision for five regiments to be added to the standing Army, and for ten sloops-of-war to be added to the standing Navy of the United States. Both measures were submitted with a recommendation to Congress, and yet for neither did they estimate at all. Their calculations, therefore, fall short of their own demands for the public service, as they recommended Congress to provide for it by the immense amount of these provisions for additions to the Army and Navy.

Then, again, the Administration recommended to us, as a sacred duty, in order to maintain national faith, to pay the Amistad claim, which it was alleged was due to Spain, which Congress has made no provision to pay; and I suppose the Administration made no estimate for that amount. We shall have to complain of the Administration that it has recommended to us appropriations for which it has not estimated; and we have the merit of having reduced our appropriations for all these points within the limits which the Administration did recommend, and a great many other things of the same kind.

Then, Mr. President, in looking over the action of this Congress, I have been surprised to see the unanimity of both Houses in waiving and postponing large claims. There was a claim of $347,000, I think it was, that was recommended to us by the Committee on Military Affairs, to pay an alleged war debt in Florida. There is a claim of five, six, or seven million dollars for the defense of Washington Territory in the Indian wars, both of which were passed by. There has been recommended to the consideration of Congress, by a proper committee, the payment of the bill for indemnity for French spoils, amounting to $5,000,000, which Congress has omitted and refused to make any provision for. We have cut down our appropriations. A portion of us here—that portion with which I act—have asked Congress to amend the system for the collection of the revenue, by the substitution of domestic for foreign valuation of imports; which was refused by the friends of the Administration, upon the ground that its effect would be to raise an increased amount of revenue, and, therefore, that the Senate had no right to make such a bill under the Constitution. Sir, the Administration might well have reckoned that we should add to the appropriations made by Congress the sum of $565,000 which was necessary, as shown by the War Department, to preserve our ports, our piers, our harbors and our rivers, on the sea-coast and lakes; and yet Congress, under the pressure of the Treasury, has declined to make those appropriations.

Now why cannot this Administration be just? Why can it not be manly and own before the world that, owing to circumstances beyond its control and unforeseen by the financiers here, and unforeseen throughout the world, there has been a deficiency in our revenue; that their estimates were based on anticipations of revenue which have been disappointed, and they are obliged to depend for a season upon loans or else replenish the Treasury by the revision of the revenue laws? Either measures must be introduced for the revision of those laws, or else it is the intention to leave time to develop what shall be the necessary measures finally for the reimbursement of the loans. I should never have complained of the Administration under all the circumstances of the period if they had done that. I should never have complained of any deficiency in their estimates, but I cannot sit here contentedly and receive lectures from them for misjudgment or for extravagance in Congress.

Mr. BROWN. I think, Mr. President, it must be apparent to every one now, that this session can by no possibility close on Monday. It is utterly out of the question. I do not want to discuss the proposition under consideration. I am opposed to it. I do not think it can by any chance result in any good; and as the session must be prolonged, and it is now nearly twelve o'clock at night, I move that the Senate adjourn. ["Oh, no."]

The motion was not agreed to.

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. MASON.) The Chair will state that the question is on the first amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate to this bill, upon which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 24, nays 21; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Davis, Fitch, Green, Gwin, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Jones, Mason, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Slidell, Stuart, Wright, and Yulee—24.

NAYS—Messrs. Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Hale, Hamlin, Harlan, Houston, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Pugh, Seward, Simmons, Toombs, Trumbull, and Wilson—21.

So the amendment of the House to the amendment of the Senate was concurred in.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The question now is, on the next amendment of the House changing the rate of interest from five to six per cent. per annum.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope this second amendment will not be acceded to. I think it would be an equivalent to an increase of this loan for several millions beyond the apparent amount.

Mr. HUNTER. I prefer five to six per cent. myself. I concur in what the Senator from Louisiana has said. I am willing to vote down the amendment.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I trust it will be voted down.

The amendment was not agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER the title of the bill was amended so as to read: An act to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000.

PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. SLIDELL. I now renew my motion that the Senate adjourn. It is very evident that we can do nothing. We have passed all the appropriation bills.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope we shall not adjourn. We can pass a number of private bills.

Mr. SLIDELL. I make the motion.

Mr. SEWARD called for the yeas and nays; and they were ordered; and, being taken, resulted—yeas 17, nays 29; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Bright, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Harlan, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Mason, Polk, Slidell, Toombs, Trumbull, Wright, and Yulee—17.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Bell, Broderick, Chandler, Colamer, Crittenden, Davis, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Gwin, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Hunter, Iverson, Jones, Kennedy, King, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Sebastian, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, and Wilson—29.

So the Senate refused to adjourn.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bills and joint resolution; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

An act making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859;

An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1858; and

A resolution in regard to the carrying of the United States mail from St. Joseph, in Missouri, to Placerville, in California.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I hope the Senate will now consent to take up the bill for the relief of Jane Turnbull. I ask that it be taken up.

Mr. CLAY. I have been trying to make a report from a committee.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. And I have been trying to get up this bill for a long time.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order. It is this: that at the time the Senate agreed by common consent to take up the loan bill there was a question pending which was only suspended for that purpose, and is now the only thing in order.

Mr. STUART. It was on my motion to recommit the Post Office appropriation bill to the committee of conference. That was the pending question, when, by unanimous consent, the loan bill was taken up.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The opinion of the Chair is, that having been passed by, it gave precedence to the subject which has just been disposed of.

Mr. STUART. Oh, no, sir; the Post Office bill was simply passed over by unanimous consent, in order to consider the amendments to the loan bill, without displacing it at all.

Mr. BIGLER. I should like to ask the unanimous consent of the Senate to introduce a resolution.

Mr. BROWN. I object.

Mr. STUART. I think the Post Office bill is in the condition I have stated, that is on my motion to recommit the report to the committee of conference. I think it very important that the question should be disposed of. I hope the vote will be taken now.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The present occupant of the Chair was not in at the time, but he now recollects that the subject before the Senate passed over by unanimous consent was the Post Office bill.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. It was interrupted by other business. I am sure my friend from Michigan would not wish us to vote on that question without having the necessary information in relation to it. I think the subject would suffer nothing by being allowed to remain in the House of Representatives, and leaving it unacted upon. If it be in order, I move to postpone the Post Office appropriation bill, in order to take up the bill I have mentioned.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I hope not. When there is so much important business before the Senate, and so many things that must be attended to, it seems to me to be pressing very hard that everything should be laid aside for these pensions to widows. I am perfectly willing that they should take their course; but really these appropriation bills must be disposed of before we adjourn; and I do not think pension bills of sufficient importance to the country at large to displace all other business.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will state that it has been the usage of the Senate to lay aside any pending matter for the dispatch of public business, to take up something considered more pressing. The Chair understands that to be the condition of the bill making appropriations for the Post Office, and that is now the subject before the Senate. The Senator from Kentucky moves to postpone it with a view to take up the bill he indicates.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Yes, sir; I do.

The motion was not agreed to; there being, on a division—ayes twelve, noes not counted.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the following enrolled bill; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President:

An act making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the second committee of conference on the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859.

Mr. STUART. I hope the question will now be taken on the motion to recommit the report to the committee of conference.

Mr. PUGH. There was no such motion. The Senator got the floor, but there was a motion pending at the time. Then I made the point of order that the motion of the Senator from Michigan was not in order—

Mr. STUART. I dislike, exceedingly, to be engaged in disputation, but I certainly think—

Mr. PUGH. I gave way to the Senator from Maine a moment ago to make an explanation, and I lost the floor. If the Senator is going to make a speech, I do not give way.

Mr. STUART. I will not say anything until the Senator gets through, and then I shall ask the same privilege to be accorded to me, that he shall not say anything until I get through.

Mr. PUGH. The Senator from Georgia made his report from the committee of conference, and moved that the Senate adhere; and I do not understand how it is that the Senator from Michigan has got his motion ahead of anything else. It is not an amendment. I know he made the suggestion in his argument. I think the suggestion was completely dispelled by the Senator from Maine, and several other Senators, who responded to him. You cannot recommit to a committee that has not any existence. The committee of the House is gone; it is discharged by making its report; but that is not the question before the Senate. The Senator from Georgia moved that we adhere to our amendments to this bill; and I asked the then occupant of the chair, (the Vice President, I believe,) whether it was in order for the Senate to adhere to its amendments to a bill not in their possession? At that stage, I believe, the Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] the Senator from Maine, [Mr. FESSENDEN,] and several others, agreed that the better course would be simply to ask a conference. But if the motion of the Senator from Michigan is in order, that is, if he has the floor to make it, I make the question of order that we cannot recommit to a committee not in existence; but I submit that he cannot make his motion until the Senator from Georgia withdraws his.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. (Mr. MASON.) The Chair would state to the Senator from Ohio, that, as the Chair understands, the pending motion is to recommit the bill to the committee of conference.

Mr. PUGH. We have no bill.

Mr. STUART. Now, I beg the Senator to be as respectful to me as I was to him, and let me state what I would have stated to the Senator with great pleasure, if he had been at all willing to listen. When I suggested that the proper course was to move to recommit this question, the Senator from Georgia withdrew his motion to adhere, distinctly and readily; and the Chair—the Vice President being the occupant—stated it to the Senate, and stated the question to be on my motion to recommit.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair understands that that is the question.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. Let us have a vote on that motion.

Mr. PUGH. I move to amend the motion, by striking out all after the word "ordered" and inserting:

That a conference be requested of the House of Representatives touching the disagreement of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and on the failure of the House of Representatives to notify the Senate of any action upon the said amendments since the last conference.

Mr. STUART. A motion to recommit is not amendable. The motions are put to the Senate in the order in which they are made. Now, sir—

Mr. BIGLER. I hope the Senator will allow me to introduce a resolution in regard to the adjournment.

Mr. STUART. The Senator from Mississippi will object to it.

Mr. IVERSON. With the consent of the Senator from Michigan I desire to give notice that on to-morrow, or some subsequent day, I shall introduce a resolution to allow the clerk of the Committee on Military Affairs the same pay that is allowed the clerk to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. STUART. I am entirely disinclined to go into any lengthy discussion on this subject, and shall not do so. I was only about to say that such a motion as that submitted by the Senator from Ohio cannot be made. No proposition for a conference can be made except in the House that has possession of the bill. That rule applies to all cases. I think the subject has been amply discussed; and I hope the Senate will take the question upon my motion.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair does not consider the motion amendable as proposed by the Senator from Ohio. He does not consider such an amendment in order. The 11th rule of the Senate prescribes the order and precedence of these motions; and amongst them is the motion to commit.

Mr. PUGH. Then I ask the Chair whether he decides the motion of the Senator from Michigan to be in order? What are we to commit? We have no bill to commit, and we have no committee to which to commit it. I believe that is the end of the story, and I simply ask the Chair to decide the question; because if the Chair so decides I shall certainly take an appeal.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot decide that there is no committee to which the commitment can be made.

Mr. PUGH. This is a motion to commit to a committee of conference a bill which is not in our possession.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair cannot decide upon the question of order. The Senate may rule it according to its opinions; but the Chair cannot decide the question of order.

Mr. PUGH. I only ask the Chair whether the motion as made by the Senator is or is not in order? I have a right to a decision.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair entertained it as in order.

Mr. PUGH. Then I appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. IVERSON. I desire to ask the Chair whether it would be in order now to move that the Senate recede from the amendments to which the House disagree?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair considers the pending question to be on the motion of the Senator from Michigan to commit the bill.

Mr. IVERSON. This question has been argued all on one side, and I propose to submit a few remarks on the other. My opinion is, that the best, quickest, and easiest way to get out of this difficulty, in which we now seem to be involved, is by yielding to the House, and giving up the question. That is the easiest mode of getting rid of it. If the proposition of the Senator from Michigan prevails, what will it avail? He recommit the subject to the committee of conference. Well, that may be very proper so far as our committee is concerned; but how will it reach a committee of conference in the House of Representatives? That committee have already made their report to the House, it is understood. The bill has been sent back, or carried back, by that committee to the House of Representatives, and there laid upon the table. Now, sir, can that committee come together again without a reinvestment of power from the House of Representatives? That committee has expended its functions. It can no more have possession of that bill, and come back and meet the committee upon the part of the Senate, than it can go to the moon to-night. It has no such parliamentary power. The committee is functus officio, as the Senator from Ohio very properly observed. The committee of the House cannot meet the committee of the Senate again on the action of the House of Representatives, unless the House of Representatives shall give them additional power, and either create a new committee, or give the old committee additional power to meet and act in conference. It will, therefore, result in nothing.

If the motion of the Senator from Virginia to raise a new conference committee should prevail, what would it result in? The House of Representatives have already indicated their determination on this question. They have, upon two occasions, determined that they would not agree to the amendments of the Senate. They have acted upon the original question of concurring in the amendments; they voted down the amendments by a very decided majority; and, upon concurring with the report of the committee of conference, they stated the same opinion, and gave the same decision.

Now, sir, is it at all probable, is it possible, if you make this issue between the House of Representatives and the Senate upon these amendments, that the House of Representatives will yield? And which ought to yield, the Senate or the House, upon a question of this sort? In my opinion, the Senate ought to yield, if one or the other is to yield. Sir, the House of Representatives come directly from the people; they reflect the voice of the people; they speak the sentiments and wishes of the people; and it is to be supposed that in this expression of opinion they represent what the people of the United States want in relation to this question of franking, and this raising of Post Office revenue. If either House must yield, I think the House of Representatives has a right to hold out, and the Senate to yield. What will come of it if the Senate are obstinate and the House obstinate? Why, undoubtedly, the bill must fall. This bill, which is absolutely essential to carry on the business of the Post Office Department, must fall between the two Houses unless one or the other does yield. What will be the result if the bill fails? The President will issue a proclamation, and call Congress together again. If the House of Representatives are fixed upon this question, and will not yield to these obnoxious amendments, I want to know whether the call of another session will be likely to accomplish a different result?

Mr. STUART. Will the Senator allow me to interrupt him?

Mr. IVERSON. For what purpose?

Mr. STUART. Simply to make a suggestion; that is all.

Mr. IVERSON. Make it.

Mr. STUART. If we had the bill we could vote to recede; but we cannot vote to recede until we get possession of the bill.

Mr. IVERSON. I will tell you what we can do. We can reach the same object in a different method, by taking up the bill which the House of Representatives has sent us, and passing it.

Mr. STUART. I object to that being done.

Mr. BROWN. We cannot do that.

Mr. IVERSON. My dear sir, we can do it; and that, in my opinion, is the course for us to pursue. I understand it is parliamentary. I do not profess to know much about parliamentary law, but I understand, from more experienced Senators than myself, that it has been done frequently. When the House gets possession of the bill they can dispose of it by laying it on the table, if they choose to do so, and then reenacting a bill of precisely a similar character to the other. That is what the House of Representatives has done. The committee of conference carried the bill, which originated in the House of Representatives, back to the House; and being in the possession of the House, the House laid it on the table. Laying it on the table is the end of the bill, and you cannot reach it; all the parliamentary powers of earth cannot resurrect that bill, in my opinion. It is dead and gone; and the only mode by which this question can be revived is by a new bill, such as the House of Representatives has sent to us. Let us take it up and act upon it, and amend it if we choose.

I wish to say, as my colleague announces a determination to go to the people against the members of the House on this question, that if he desires it he can do it just as well in the present position as to force an expression from the House of Representatives a dozen more times upon this question. They have already expressed their opinion upon them. Their votes upon those amendments are upon the record; and if any public odium attaches to their course they can be reached before the people just as well as if we force them to another record. They will certainly bear the responsibility, as they are entitled to bear it; and if any public odium is attached to their conduct I apprehend they are willing to meet it.

Mr. BIGLER. I now renew my application to the Senate to be permitted to introduce a joint resolution in relation to the final adjournment. The Senator from Mississippi has withdrawn his objection to it.

Mr. GREEN. I object.

Mr. BIGLER. I desire to state that the resolution proposes to rescind the resolution for an adjournment on Monday.

Mr. GREEN and Mr. PUGH. I object to the resolution.

Mr. BIGLER. Then I will give notice—

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I object to the gentleman going on. He has no right to the floor.

Mr. BIGLER. I think that after a few moments' reflection gentlemen will agree to let this resolution be introduced—

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I call the Senator to order.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator can only proceed by common consent.

Mr. PUGH. I object.

Mr. BIGLER. Then I give notice that I shall ask leave to introduce it on Monday.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I move that the Senate do now adjourn.

Mr. CHANDLER called for the yeas and nays, and they were ordered.

The Secretary proceeded to call the roll.

Mr. HUNTER. Before the vote is announced, I wish to ask general consent to submit a motion that when the Senate adjourn, it be to meet at ten o'clock on Monday.

Several SENATORS. Say nine o'clock.

Mr. HUNTER. Very well; I will say nine o'clock.

Mr. BROWN. I hope not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Is there objection?

Mr. BROWN and Mr. TOOMBS. I object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Before the vote is announced, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the adoption of a motion to print a paper.

Mr. PUGH. I object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I wish merely to enter the motion to reconsider.

Mr. PUGH. I have no objection, if it will not delay it.

Mr. TRUMBULL. Objection being withdrawn, I desire to enter a motion to reconsider the motion to print a paper—

Mr. TOOMBS. I object.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I give notice that I shall make the motion whenever I get the opportunity.

The vote on the adjournment was then announced—yeas 23, nays 22; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Benjamin, Bigler, Brown, Clay, Clingman, Harlan, Hunter, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Kennedy, King, Mason, Polk, Rice, Seward, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Wright, and Yulee—23.

NAYS—Messrs. Bayard, Broderick, Chandler, Collamer, Crittenden, Davis, Fessenden, Fitch, Foot, Foster, Green, Hale, Hamlin, Houston, Jones, Pugh, Reid, Sebastian, Simmons, Trumbull, Wade, and Wilson—22.

So the motion was agreed to; and the Senate adjourned.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, June 12, 1858.

The House met at eleven o'clock, a. m.

The Journal of yesterday was read and approved.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The SPEAKER, by unanimous consent, laid before the House a message from the President of the United States, transmitting a report from the Secretary of War, with the accompanying papers, in obedience to the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 2d of June, 1858, inclosing copies of contracts entered into between the United States and Craig & Righter, for deepening the channel of the Southwest Pass and Pass à l'Ouvre of the Mississippi river, and the report of the board of engineers thereon, &c.; which was laid on the table, and ordered to be printed.

SUSPENSION OF JOINT RULES.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to call the attention of the House to a joint resolution of the Senate providing for a suspension of the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses for the remainder of the present session of Congress.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Does that resolution propose to suspend them entirely?

The SPEAKER. For the remainder of the session.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think we had better suspend them as each special case shall require. It is at least not now necessary to suspend the 17th joint rule, as we may get through to-day, and there may be no bill to send to the President on Monday, the last day of the session.

Mr. BARKSDALE. No harm will be done by suspending the rules.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I prefer that the suspension shall take place upon each particular bill.

Mr. CLAY. That will only occasion delay.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to taking up this resolution?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. EDIE. I move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. We had better pass the bills, and suspend the joint rules at the same time.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. That will consume too much time.

Mr. MASON. I rise to a privileged question. Yesterday I obtained the floor, and asked the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the consideration of the pension bill for the old soldiers of the war of 1812. The request was unanimously agreed to. I yielded the floor to a report of a committee of conference; and it was agreed by the Speaker and the whole House that I should have the floor again as soon as that business was disposed of. I now claim the floor under that understanding.

Mr. DAVIS, of Indiana. I did not so understand it.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I heard unanimous consent given.

The SPEAKER. The Chair does not understand the facts as the gentleman from Kentucky does. The gentleman from Kentucky was recognized, and was about to submit his motion that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of a private bill.

Mr. MASON. I named the bill specifically.

The SPEAKER. Before the Chair propounded the question to the House, the gentleman from Virginia stated he had a privileged report to submit. The Chair, and members upon the floor, suggested to the gentleman from Kentucky to waive his right to the floor till the report of the gentleman could be disposed of.

Mr. MASON. And that I should have it again as soon as that report was disposed of.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that the liberality which was extended by the gentleman from Kentucky, to enable the public business to go on at that time, gives him a right to be recognized by the Chair at an early period.

Mr. CLEMENS. I was waiting for the question to be propounded to the House, in order to make an objection, and therefore I made no objection at the time the gentleman asked unanimous consent. The gentleman from Kentucky is mistaken in supposing that he had the unanimous consent of the House for his motion.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania to suspend the rules, so as to take up the message of the Senate in reference to suspending the 16th and 17th joint rules of the two Houses.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded tellers.

Tellers were refused.

The motion was agreed to—two thirds voting in favor thereof—and the resolution was taken up for consideration.

Mr. EDIE demanded the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. If the gentleman will withdraw his call for the previous question, I will move that the 16th and 17th joint rules be expunged altogether.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

PENSION TO SOLDIERS OF WAR OF 1812.

Mr. MASON. I now move that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be discharged from the further consideration of the bill granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. MASON. Then I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays.

Mr. MASON. If the House will allow me, I will make a statement in reference to this matter. I propose, at the pleasure of the House, either to put this bill upon its passage, with the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. GARTRELL,] or, if the House prefer, to make it the special order for some early day next session.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to debate.

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask the indulgence of the House for a moment. I think this matter can be satisfactorily disposed of.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. JEWETT demanded the yeas and nays upon the suspension of the rules; and also called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. MAYNARD. I call for tellers on the question.

Tellers were not ordered.

The rules were not suspended, (two thirds not having voted in favor thereof.)

JOHN DONALDSON AND OTHERS.

Mr. CLAY. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table two Senate bills of a private character. I make this request under peculiar circumstances. The State of Arkansas—as gentlemen are aware—is, at this time, wholly unrepresented on this floor; and these bills, which will not occupy five minutes, are for the benefit of citizens of that State. The first bill is Senate bill (No. 54) for the relief of the representatives of John Donaldson, Stephen Hurd, and others.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I beg to say a word here. If the House will give as much time to taking up all the bills on the Speaker's table in order, as will be consumed in efforts to take them up out of their order, we can dispose of them all.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object to debate.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask the gentleman from Kentucky whether these bills appropriate any money?

Mr. CLAY. No, sir.

Mr. EDIE. I understand they are in relation to holding courts.

Mr. CLAY. Under the peculiar circumstances I hope there will be no objection.

Mr. BINGHAM. I object.

Mr. CLAY. I move to suspend the rules, so as to enable me to take up the bills.

Mr. PHELPS, of Minnesota. Can I amend that motion, so as to make it include another bill which I wish to have taken from the Speaker's table?

The SPEAKER. Not if there be objection.

Objection was made.

The question was taken; and the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Senate amendments to the Army appropriation bill.

REVENUE BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. COMINS. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to yield me the floor that I may move to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the light-house bill, that it may be put upon its passage, and that it may be sent to the Senate for action by that body.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES declined to yield the floor.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I hope the gentleman from Pennsylvania will accede to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES declined.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

So the rules were suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BARKSDALE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, with the amendments of the Senate thereto.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee having risen informally, a message was received from the Senate by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the Indian supplemental appropriation bill.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message, in writing, was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary.

The message was read, as follows:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I feel it to be an indispensable duty to call your attention to the condition of the Treasury. On the 19th day of May last the Secretary of the Treasury submitted a report to Congress "on the present condition of the finances of the Government." In this report he states that, after a call upon the heads of the Departments, he had received official information that the sum of $37,000,000 would probably be required during the first two quarters of the next fiscal year, from the 1st of July until the 1st of January. "This sum," the Secretary says, "does not include such amounts as may be appropriated by Congress over and above the estimates submitted to them by the Departments, and I have no data on which to estimate for such expenditures. Upon this point Congress is better able to form a correct opinion than I am."

The Secretary then estimates that the receipts into the Treasury from all sources, between the 1st of July and the 1st of January, would amount to $25,000,000, leaving a deficit of $15,000,000; inclusive of the sum of about three million dollars, the least amount required to be in the Treasury at all times, to secure its successful operation. For this amount he recommends a loan. This loan, it will be observed, was required, after a close calculation, to meet the estimates from the different Departments, and not such appropriations as might be made by Congress over and above these estimates.

There were embraced in this sum of $15,000,000, estimates to the amount of about one million seven hundred and fifty thousand dollars for the three volunteer regiments authorized by the act of Congress approved April 7, 1858; for two of which, if not for the third, no appropriation will now be required. To this extent a portion of the loan of $15,000,000 may be applied to pay the appropriations made by Congress beyond the estimates from the different Departments, referred to in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury.

To what extent a probable deficiency may exist in the Treasury between the 1st of July and the 1st of January next, cannot be ascertained until the appropriation bills, as well as the private bills containing appropriations, shall have finally passed.

Adversity teaches useful lessons to nations as well as individuals. The habit of extravagant expenditures fostered by a large surplus in the Treasury must now be corrected, or the country will be involved in serious financial difficulties.

Under any form of government, extravagance in expenditure must be the natural consequence, when those who authorize the expenditure feel no responsibility in providing the means of payment. Such had been for a number of years our condition, previously to the late monetary revolution in the country. Fortunately, at least for the cause of public economy, the case is now reversed; and to the extent of the appropriations, whatever these may be, ingrafted on the different appropriation bills, as well as those made by private bills, over and above the estimates of the different Departments, it will be necessary for Congress to provide the means of payment before their adjournment. Without this, the Treasury will be exhausted before the 1st of January, and the public credit will be seriously impaired. This disgrace must not fall upon the country.

It is impossible for me, however, now to ascertain this amount, nor does there at present seem to be the least probability that this can be done, and the necessary means provided by Congress, to meet any deficiency which may exist in the Treasury, before Monday next at twelve o'clock, the hour fixed for adjournment, it being now Saturday morning at half past eleven o'clock. To accomplish this object, the appropriation bills, as they shall have finally passed Congress, must be before me, and time must be allowed to ascertain the amount of the moneys appropriated, and to enable Congress to provide the necessary means. At this writing it is understood that several of these bills are yet before the committees of conference, and the amendments to some of them have not even been printed.

Foreseeing that such a state of things must exist at the close of the session, I stated, in the annual message to Congress of December last, that, "from the practice of Congress, such an examination of each bill as the Constitution requires has been rendered impossible. The most important business of each session is generally crowded into its last hours, and the alternative presented to the President is either to violate the constitutional duty which he owes to the people, and approve bills which, for want of time, it is impossible he should have examined, or, by his refusal to do this, subject the country and individuals to great loss and inconvenience."

"For my own part, I have deliberately determined that I shall approve no bills which I have not examined; and it will be a case of extreme and most urgent necessity which shall ever induce me to depart from this rule."

The present condition of the Treasury absolutely requires that I should adhere to this resolution on the present occasion for the reasons which I have heretofore presented.

In former times, it was believed to be the true character of an appropriation bill simply to carry into effect existing laws and the established policy of the country. A practice, has, however, grown up of late years to ingraft on such bills at the last hours of the session large appropriations for new and important objects not provided for by preëxisting laws, and when no time is left to the Executive for their examination and investigation. No alternative is thus left to the President but either to approve measures without examination, or, by vetoing an appropriation bill, seriously to embarrass the operations of the Government. This practice could never have prevailed without a surplus in the Treasury sufficiently large to cover an indefinite amount of appropriations. Necessity now compels us to arrest it, at least so far as to afford time to ascertain the amount appropriated, and to provide the means of its payment.

For all these reasons, I recommend to Congress to postpone the day of adjournment for a brief period. I promise that not an hour shall be lost in ascertaining the amount of appropriations made by them for which it will be necessary to provide. I know it will be inconvenient for the members to attend a called session, and this, above all things, I desire to avoid. JAMES BUCHANAN.

WASHINGTON CITY, June 12, 1858.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the message of the President be laid on the table and ordered to be printed. I will remark in connection with it that the message is based on the supposition that the House will not finish the appropriation bills till, perhaps, some late hour to-night. There are yet unfinished the Indian supplemental bill, the naval bill, (on which the House disagreed to the report of the committee of conference,) the revenue bill, (which need not occupy twenty-five minutes,) the post office bill, (which is passed by the House and the amendments acted on by the House,) the mail steamer bill, (which is now before a committee of conference,) the bill for the three regiments of volunteers, and the loan bill.

Mr. COMINS. And the light-house bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not include that. That belongs to the gentleman from Massachusetts. The loan bill has been kept back for one simple purpose. It is the desire of the Executive branch of the Government to ascertain, outside of the estimates of the Secretary of the Treasury based on existing laws, what will be required for the public expenditures. There is a contingency left open for the legislation of Congress on private bills, and on such public bills as may appropriate more than the estimates. Now, I propose, if it be the will of the House, to adjourn on Monday at twelve o'clock. [Cries of "Good!"] I think it can be done. But in order to do it, this programme will have to be adhered to. In the first place, I propose to take up the loan bill to-day, and pass it at $15,000,000. I propose to take up not the Senate bill, but the House bill, and on its being sent back it will be open to amendment in the Senate and can be kept there long enough to permit the appropriation bills to be figured up, so that the Administration may know the amount of contingencies arising from increased appropriations. I propose, therefore, to take action on the revenue bill, and on the loan bill, and on a bill to amend the sub-Treasury law, and on the balance of the appropriation bills. My opinion is, that the House can pass intelligently on all these bills before four o'clock to-day, and if that is done, I believe that we can adjourn on Monday at twelve o'clock. [General shouts of "Good!"]

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask leave to make a suggestion.

Mr. REAGAN. I desire to say a word to the House.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a question of order. I wish to know whether there is not an order of the House to go into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and whether the committee did not informally rise for the purpose of receiving a message from the President of the United States.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust the gentleman will not interrupt me now. I desire to call the attention of the House to that part of the President's message which refers to the organization of a regiment of volunteers for Texas.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I object.

Mr. REAGAN. I trust the gentleman will not take the floor from me by this means.

[A message from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, announced that the Senate had passed a bill (S. No. 278) concerning the courts of the United States in the district of Arkansas; and a resolution (S. No. 26) for the benefit of the nearest male heir of the late Major General Towson, United States Army; in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

The SPEAKER. In reference to the point of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, while it is true that the Speaker resumed the chair informally, the message from the President was, by unanimous consent of the House, received and read, and the Chair is of opinion that it must be disposed of.

[A message from the Senate, by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, announced that the Senate insisted on its amendments, disagreed to by the House, to the Post Office appropriation bill, and asked for a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.]

Mr. REAGAN. Mr. Speaker, I know the impatience of the House, and nothing but a sense of duty which I dare not shrink from, in view of the condition of my State, would warrant me in rising now to occupy the attention of the House for a few moments. In the special message the President sent in to the House a day or two ago, notifying us of the probable termination of the Mormon war, he informed us that there would be no necessity for the appropriation for the two regiments of volunteers authorized by the bill which lately passed Congress. He then suggested also that it might not be necessary to appropriate for the regiment of mounted volunteers for the defense of Texas. In the message just read, he again makes the same suggestion in a manner which must attract the attention of the House, and which, I fear, might influence the action of the House upon the subject, unless some statement were made by me or by some other gentleman who knows the condition of the frontier of Texas.

The special message which was sent in a few days ago seemed to contemplate the fact that the troops which had heretofore been assigned for the protection of the frontiers of Texas were still there. I desire to say that that must have been based upon very inaccurate information. The infantry regiment is still upon the frontier of Texas, but the mounted regiment of regulars heretofore upon the frontier (the most efficient portion of the force there for the protection of that frontier) has long since been ordered from the frontier. I have been informed, in conversation with the Secretary of War, that that order has been countermanded; but my colleague and myself have been receiving information from the Governor and citizens of the State, and through the newspapers of the State, and through every other medium through which we could expect information, of the fact that this force has already gone from the frontier, and left it entirely unprotected.

A few days ago I received a letter from a distinguished citizen of my State, General Tarrant, informing me that in consequence of the withdrawal of the troops of the United States—

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the gentleman will allow me, I desire to say to him that the House has already passed the bill just as he desires it, and if the Senate will only take up the bill they can act on it as they see fit.

Mr. REAGAN. I was going on to say that the frontier settlements are now being assailed by the Indians; that quite a number of citizens have been killed, and that about a thousand horses have been stolen. Two families have been lately murdered in the vicinity of Fort Belknap.

Mr. BRYAN. Will my colleague yield to me for a moment?

Mr. REAGAN. No, sir; not now. My colleague can be heard when I have concluded what I desire to say.

I desire, also, to say that, for the purpose of securing the protection of the frontier, the Governor of Texas has had to assume the responsibility of ordering out, upon his own motion, a corps of volunteers.

Mr. GRANGER. How many?

Mr. REAGAN. One hundred and ten men, under the command of Colonel John S. Ford, who, in connection with a like number of friendly Indians, have pursued the Camanches to their haunts on the Canada river, and have recently had a battle with them, in which seventy-six were killed, eighteen taken prisoners, and over three hundred horses retaken. A more decisive blow has been stricken by those one hundred and ten volunteers and a like number of friendly Indians, in the short time during which they have been in the service, and more has been done for the protection of the frontier than, I venture to say, has been done by the regular Army of the United States, three thousand in number, during the last five years.

Mr. Speaker, the people of Texas have a right to expect protection; and not only that, but it is the opinion, expressed decidedly, now, as heretofore, by the Secretary of War, that this additional regiment is indispensable, not only for the protection of the frontier, but for the protection of the overland mail route to the Pacific, running through Texas and the southern portion of New Mexico, as well as the route by Albuquerque, authorized the other day. Both those routes must be protected, and the frontier must be protected; and I understand that a force is to be retained in Utah to retain the people in subjection.

I trust that, if this question comes up for the action of the House, in view of the suffering condition of the frontier, and in view of the necessity of protecting those mail routes, and routes of travel, the House will sustain the proposition.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I now move the previous question.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask the gentleman to allow me to make a single remark.

Mr. PHILLIPS. If I yield to one I must yield to all.

Mr. BARKSDALE. It is with reference to the public business that I desire to speak.

Mr. PHILLIPS. And so does the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. SAVAGE.]

Mr. SAVAGE. I only want to say that I shall object to the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means opening his mouth unless an opportunity is given to reply to what he says.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means will open his mouth whenever he pleases, when he is in order.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I insist on the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under the operation thereof the message was laid upon the table and ordered to be printed.

COLLECTION OF THE REVENUE.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then resumed its session and the consideration of the bill making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The debate has been terminated on this bill in five minutes. I do not wish to consume my hour, and will forbear saying anything now, with the understanding, that if it becomes necessary, I may avail myself of a portion of my time as the amendments come up.

The amendments were read.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. When this bill was before the House, on a former occasion, I explained its provisions; and the committee will recollect the facts I stated on that occasion. The original system was for the collecting officers to collect the revenue, and to deduct out of it the amount of their compensation, and then pay the balance into the Treasury. In 1846, if my memory serves me right, this law was so far modified as to provide for the payment into the Treasury of the entire revenue, including the revenue of the Post Office; and then that appropriations for the expenses of its collection should be made. It will hardly be necessary for me to debate the propriety and necessity of this system. It has proved itself to be correct. No exception, I believe, has been taken to it.

The question which arose on the former consideration of this bill was as to the amount. A question was also raised by my friend from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] as to whether it should be permanent or annual. The whole question of an annual or permanent appropriation bill for the purpose of collecting the revenue was discussed at great length when this system was adopted by Congress. It is utterly impossible for this Government to adopt a good, self-maintaining, and working system for the collection of its revenue if the appropriations are made from year to year. The only system which enables the Department to work well, efficiently, and economically, is a permanent appropriation. But a permanent appropriation does not mean, as many gentlemen seem to understand it, an appropriation out of the reach of Congress. It is within the reach of Congress every session. Every time you pass upon your appropriation bill, you can modify, repeal, or change this system. It does not require legislation to be enabled to do that. It is simply a permanent appropriation until otherwise ordered by Congress. I make this remark for the purpose of removing from the minds of any members of the House, who may be under it, the impression that a permanent appropriation puts it beyond the control of Congress. It is just as absolutely within the control of Congress as any other measure. It enables the Secretary of the Treasury to adopt a general system founded upon some permanent principles. It is subject, from session to session, to the control of Congress.

Now, as to the amount. It was ascertained by the Secretary of the Treasury—as will be seen by reference to the finance report—that it cost this Government $3,600,000 during the last fiscal year to collect the revenue. The collection of the revenue is based upon a system under the law. It is not based upon the arbitrary will of the Secretary of the Treasury. It is not the creature of any man's fancy. The Secretary of the Treasury is the mere executive officer to carry out the law. And I will say that I stand ready to cooperate with gentlemen in judicious reform, not coming in conflict with the operations of existing law. I say here in my place, that it is utterly impossible for the Executive Department to collect the revenue with a less sum than $3,600,000. That amount was required and expended last year. It is difficult, and almost impossible, to make an approximate estimate for the future. We all know the rapid expansion of this country. Our progress has been so great that no Secretary could safely take a past year's expenditure for the next year's appropriation.

You will find, by the estimates, that it requires $2,500,000 to collect the revenue. Add to that the amount which was deducted for collecting the revenue upon the Pacific coast, and you have the sum of $3,600,000; and that is the sum which will be required for the next year. With a view to a permanent system, the Secretary of the Treasury stated that $400,000 more would be required as a margin to go upon, to provide for an expansion of the system, so as not to require additional legislation next session. The Senate amendment strikes out $4,000,000, and inserts $3,000,000. That amount will not answer. The Committee of Ways and Means, not being desirous of raising an issue with the Senate, and admitting that we may get along with less than four million dollars, and remembering that Congress will be again in session in less than six months, recommend an amendment to the Senate amendment. The Senate amendment strikes out "$4,000,000," and inserts "$3,000,000." The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in the Senate amendment, with an amendment striking out "$3,000,000," and inserting in lieu thereof "$3,600,000."

Mr. COLFAX. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of concurring with the Senate in their amendment, by which they reduce the appropriation in our original bill for collecting the revenue from $4,000,000 to $3,000,000 a year; and I sincerely trust, when the Senate now sends us the first proposition for retrenchment which we have seen here this session, that the House will disregard the opposition of party leaders on the other side, and cordially concur in it. A fortnight since, when the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means was pressing this bill upon the House, I took issue with him as to the necessity of so large an appropriation, and endeavored to reduce it to $3,000,000; but the House concurred with the chairman, and by nine majority passed the bill, appropriating $4,000,000 annually as a permanent fund for this purpose. The Senate, however, have affixed the seal of their approval upon the retrenching proposition which I felt it a duty to offer; and, with only seven votes in the negative, have adopted it in lieu of the extravagant bill which this House sent them. In that discussion, it will be remembered that I declared—

1. That never before, by any Administration, had such an amount been asked in any year, or ever expended in any year, for this purpose; and that the demand for an increased appropriation, under our present financial circumstances, was extraordinary.

2. That in 1850 it cost but $2,000,000 to collect the revenue, and that to double it in so few years as have elapsed since then was certainly unjustifiable and wasteful.

3. That the probable revenue from the tariff this year will not exceed forty or forty-five million dollars; and that to pay ten per cent. for collecting it was needless, unwise, and extravagant.

The chairman of the Ways and Means Committee took issue with me, insisted that this bill did not increase the expenses of the Government, and declared, as found in the report of the debate in the Globe, that "precisely this sum of $4,000,000 will be required;" that the law could not be administered without this amount; and that $1,250,000 was required for the Pacific coast alone. I replied then, from memory, (for the bill was passed in the House at an unexpected time,) that $440,000 was the amount spent in that region; but the issue on this point of fact was left unsettled in consequence of the official reports not being here at the moment.

I have now the official documents before me; and I read from page 40 of the tables accompanying the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury that the expense of collection on the Pacific coast in 1857 was $464,344; a very different sum from $1,250,000 which the chairman so incorrectly stated it. The same tables show that from 1852 to the present year, except the last one, the total cost of collecting the revenue, including the Pacific as well as the Atlantic and Gulf coasts, varied from three to three and a half millions in the aggregate. Last year, after the opening of this Administration, and when a still higher degree of extravagance seemed to prevail, the total expenses were a little over three million six hundred thousand dollars; and thus I prove that I was strictly correct in saying that never before had such a sum as $4,000,000 been expended for this purpose. Now, this same Committee of Ways and Means, fearing a concurrence by the House with the Senate in their reduction to $3,000,000, have abandoned their old ground that $4,000,000 were necessary, and offer to take $400,000 less. This is good so far as it goes; but it is no reduction. On the contrary, it keeps up the expenses to the same amount spent in the most extravagant year in our national history; and I am, as before, for a reduction to $3,000,000, which I previously declared ample, and which declaration the Senate have unanimously ratified and confirmed by their votes.

I wish now to call attention to a system which this mode of making permanent appropriations fosters. In the first place, it removes from Congress their legitimate annual supervision of the expenses of the Government; but even worse, if possible, than this, while unexpended balances of annual appropriations, after two years, are by law wisely required to revert to the general fund in the Treasury, balances of permanent appropriations, which really ought to go back into the common Treasury every year, remain, on the contrary, under the control of the Treasury Department from year to year, to be used, without check by Congress, in any subsequent year, with the most lavish profusion. And this has been done in the present case, as I shall prove by the official documents before me.

The last annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on page 10, says:

"The joint resolution approved 14th of February, 1850, makes a permanent appropriation for the expenses of collecting the customs of $1,225,000 for each half year, together with such sums as may be received for storage, &c., until Congress shall act upon the subject. During the first four years of the operation of the act of 3d March, 1849, the expenses did not equal the amount of this appropriation, and a considerable balance had accumulated, which has enabled this Department to defray the expenses of the last four years, which have considerably exceeded the amount so appropriated, as is shown by statement marked 'four.'"

"This accumulation having become entirely exhausted, this Department will not be able longer to defray the expenses of collecting the customs unless Congress shall now act upon the subject."

for, in confirmation of the above concession made by the Secretary, the figures of his tables, on page 40, show as follows:

Saved out of annual fund.	Spent in excess of annual fund.
In 1850.....$516,000	In 1854.....$250,000
1851.....568,000	1855.....330,000
1852.....350,000	1856.....400,000
1853.....214,000	1857.....712,000
$1,648,000	$1,692,000

Leaving a small balance of $44,000 excess, which was probably paid by the Treasury system of transfer from some other unexpended annual appropriation. But this shows that, last year, this Administration spent $750,000 in this single item of expenses over and above the amount authorized by law, scattering in a single twelve month nearly half the savings of four economical years.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. COLFAX. Those five minutes were rather short ones. I was only half way through.

The question recurred upon the amendment to strike out of the Senate amendment "$1,500,000," and insert "$1,800,000," for the half-yearly expenses of collecting the revenue.

Mr. HOUSTON. The amendment proposed by the Committee of Ways and Means makes the amount precisely what was expended last year.

Mr. GROW. And the Senate propose to cut it down.

Mr. HOUSTON. Yes; to $3,000,000 yearly, and the Committee of Ways and Means propose to make it $3,600,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded tellers upon agreeing to the amendment to the amendment.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and BLISS were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 81, noes 58.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COLFAX. I move to amend the amendment by inserting a provision that the expenses of the collection on the Atlantic and Gulf coast shall not exceed $2,500,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I rise to a point of order. It is not in order for the House to legislate on this subject.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the question of order, and decides the amendment to be in order.

Mr. COLFAX. I desire, now, Mr. Chairman, to conclude the remarks which your inexorable hammer interrupted a few moments ago.

The usual answer to all attempts to retrench the expenses of the Government is, "that they have been authorized by law," and hence that the appropriations must be voted; and this is the argument which is made in the present case. But the fact is, that hundreds upon hundreds of subordinates in the various custom-houses and in the revenue service of the country are appointed, as a matter of discretion, under laws which do not command their employment, but are permissive in their character, merely authorizing the employment of such force as the public service requires. In the past three or four years no less than six hundred persons have been thus added to the office-holders of this Government in this single branch of its service. And I do not doubt that, with the present diminution in our revenues, and the fact that fewer persons will be needed to perform the manual and clerical labor of all kinds connected therewith, nearly a thousand persons could be dispensed with, without the slightest injury to the efficiency of the service, saving at least half a million of dollars per year—an important item, when the Government is plunging so rapidly into an abyss of debt, keeping its head above water, from day to day, by postponing many of its debts, and obtaining fully half of its receipts by shipplasters and loans. Certainly, at such a time as this the most rigid economy should be practiced; but when, in spite of the dilapidated condition of our finances, the Departments send us estimates, asking $80,000,000 for one year's expenses, there remains to this Congress, or, if they refuse to perform it, to another less wedded to the Administration, which the people will elect this fall, the duty of inaugurating the retrenchment which both necessity and true policy command. The Secretary of the Treasury could look, if he would, over the whole country, and see where officers could be dispensed with; but, instead of reduction, he has demanded in his estimates a larger amount by far for this branch of his service than ever before was expended, when fifty per cent. more revenue was collected than will be received this year; and the Committee of Ways and Means, finding that the Senate will not concur in this, still insist on having as much as was expended last year—the most extravagant year, except the present one, ever known in our national expenditures. I know how strongly a dominant majority incline to follow the lead of their Ways and Means Committee, and their Secretary of the Treasury; but I appeal to them, when appropriations for rivers and harbors, for old soldiers, for private claimants, &c., are denied for lack of means, to apply the pruning-hook of retrenchment in the service provided for by this bill. Never was there a better opportunity, for this is an appropriation bill for office-holders alone; and this House, which by the Constitution is made a special guard on the Treasury, as no other authority can originate an appropriation bill, is the very body to insist that the Administration should, in regard to the number and cost of its subordinates, practice an economy which as yet appears to be unknown.

I will not detain the House further, except to say that the official tables before me show that, in 1850, the cost of collecting the revenue was less than five per cent., and that, from 1850 up to 1857, it did not exceed six per cent.; while we are asked, in this bill, to appropriate nine per cent. If we "progress" in this way for a few years, I fear that the toll will exceed the grist; and I again appeal to the House not to accept this misnamed compromise, which, instead of reducing, keeps up undiminished the extravagant expenses of last year, and retains in Government employ an army of office-holders, one third of whom could be dispensed with actual benefit to the service itself.

Mr. LETCHER. Mr. Chairman, the expenditures for the collection of the revenue grow out of laws passed by the two Houses of Congress, and approved by the President. If reform is necessary in reference to this branch of the public service, let it be effected in a proper mode. We have been here for a period of nearly six months, and gentlemen on the other side have had opportunities of introducing bills for the purpose of bringing about this reform in the abolition of what they say are useless offices. It will be recollected that, in the early part of the session, one of the gentlemen on the other side of the House called attention to this subject, and stated that, at the place of his residence, there were useless offices, and that he intended to introduce a bill for the purpose of cutting them down. Other gentlemen made pretty much the same statement; but now, when we come to pass upon a bill for the expenses of collecting the revenue, predicated on the laws as they stand on the statute-books, we find that no efforts of that sort have been made during the entire session that is now about to come to a close.

Mr. GROW. Will the gentleman allow me a word here?

Mr. LETCHER. Not just now. The amount required to collect the revenue under the laws, on the Atlantic slope of the country, is $3,200,000. The amount required on the Pacific slope is $464,812. Now this bill is reduced to the very lowest amount. We have brought it down $64,812 below the actual amount required for the purpose, so that we might put it at the very lowest point which it is possible to get along with. If it can be done below this sum, no doubt it will be done. If these expenses are high, and are still increasing, this House is censurable; for, by the multiplication of ports of entry and ports of delivery, it has made the necessity for those officers whose salaries are provided for under this bill. If reform is to begin, let it begin with particular items. Let these items be presented to this House, and to the country; let a bill be predicated upon them; and let that bill be passed. Whenever the number of officers is reduced, in that way there will be a corresponding reduction in the estimates.

The question being on Mr. COLFAX's amendment,

Mr. COLFAX withdrew it.

ENROLLED BILLS.

The committee informally rose, and Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as duly enrolled the following bills; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 243) making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th June, 1859.

An act (H. R. No. 557) making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1859.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Senate having returned the Post Office appropriation bill with amendments, and asked for a conference, I move that the House insist on its disagreeing votes thereto, and agree to a committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. BURNETT, BILLINGHURST, and CORNING, were appointed as such committee on the part of the House.

The committee then resumed its session, and the consideration of the REVENUE BILL.

Mr. GROW. I move to reduce the amount ten dollars, for the purpose of saying a word or two. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. LETCHER] lectures members upon this side of the House because they have not proposed some reform of the abuses that have grown up in the collection of the revenue. The gentleman knows very well that it is not in the power of this House to determine what employes are useless, at different points, in collecting the revenue of the country. It belongs to the Department; and while the force has been increased five hundred in five years, most of the increase has been made under laws that were permissive, and not obligatory upon the Secretary. He can reduce the force under the law. Last year they collected $65,000,000, and this year they will collect only $40,000,000, and certainly the same force cannot be necessary. Let the Secretary, then, make the reduction where he thinks it can be done without injury to the public service. He is the only man who can do it. This House cannot tell what employes might be dispensed with, without detriment to the public service. I hope the amendment of the Senate will be concurred in.

[Loud and continued cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

Mr. HOUSTON. I want to say but a word or two. I want to say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that, if he will reflect a moment, he will see that the increased expense of collecting the revenue does not grow exclusively or mainly out of the causes which have been referred to. All over the country, at almost every point where a steamer can float a hundred bales of cotton, you have made ports of delivery; and thereby created the necessity of appointing officers and establishing all the machinery and paraphernalia at an increased expense to the Government. Congress has done this, and the Secretary of the Treasury has no control whatever over it. [Cries of "Question!"]

Mr. GROW. I withdraw my amendment.

The Senate amendment, as amended, was concurred in.

Second amendment:

And be it further enacted, That from and after the 1st of July, 1858, all laws and parts of laws which authorize the payment of the expenses, or any portion of the expenses, of collecting the revenue from customs at any port or ports on the Pacific coast of the United States, out of the accruing revenue, before the same is paid into the Treasury, shall be, and hereby are, repealed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in that amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Third amendment:

And be it further enacted, That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized, at his discretion, to discontinue all ports of delivery, the revenue received at each of which does not amount to the sum of $10,000.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was concurred in.

Fourth amendment:

And be it further enacted, That no collector of the customs, deputy collector, naval officer, deputy naval officer, surveyor, deputy surveyor, general appraiser, superintendent of warehouses, or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenue, shall receive a greater compensation than is now paid to the officers and persons engaged in the said service at the port of New York: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to increase the compensation of any officer of the customs or of any person engaged in the collection thereof.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means recommend a non-concurrence in this amendment.

The amendment was non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee rise and report the amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARKSDALE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the amendments of the Senate to House bill (No. 466) making appropriation for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, and had directed him to report the same to the House, with a recommendation that one of said amendments be concurred in with an amendment; that others be concurred in, and that one be non-concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES demanded the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The first amendment of the Senate was then read, as follows:

Strike out the first two sections of the bill, and insert, in lieu thereof, the following:

That there be, and hereby is, appropriated, for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs for each half year, the sum of $1,500,000, payable out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, together with such sum as may be received for storage, cartage, wharfage, and labor for said half years.

The Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union recommended an amendment to this amendment; to strike out "five" and insert "eight," so as to make the sum $1,800,000.

Mr. COLFAX demanded the yeas and nays on the amendment to the amendment.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to—yeas 79, noes 59.

The amendment of the Senate, as amended, was then concurred in.

The action of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the remaining amendments of the Senate was concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote taken on concurring in the amendments of the Senate; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SUB-TREASURY LAW.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that House bill (No. 467) modifying the first section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue,'" be made the special order in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and that all general debate on it be closed within five minutes after its consideration shall be resumed.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I ask the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means [Mr. JONES] to suspend for a moment. The House will remember that several days since my colleague [Mr. DAVIS] offered a resolution with reference to the outrages which have recently been committed upon our merchant vessels and commerce in the Gulf of Mexico and ports of Cuba, and that the resolution was referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs.

The committee is now ready to report a bill, and I ask the unanimous consent of the House to do so, merely that it may be referred to the Committee of the Whole House and printed. I do not ask action upon it at this time. I know too well that such a request would be refused; but I desire to say, so far as I am concerned, I believe that Congress would fail to discharge the high duty it owes to the people of this country if it should adjourn without arming the President with full authority and the amplest means to resent and resist these outrages. On our own waters, within sight of our own shores, our vessels have been boarded and searched, our commerce intercepted, and our flag insulted by the naval officers of a haughty and insolent Power, and we are, and ought to be, disgraced in the estimation of all civilized nations if immediate reparation, full and complete, is not demanded and enforced. The asserted right of visitation and search, on the part of England, has never been admitted by this Government. On the contrary, we have ever unequivocally denied it. It was denied in 1812, and Great Britain was taught a lesson then which she ought never to forget. It was denied by Mr. Stevenson, our Minister to England, in his luminous correspondence with that Government. It was denied by General Cass when the five great Powers of Europe entered into the quintuple treaty, and invited the cooperation of this Government; and Mr. Clay, in his great speech on the new Army bill, in 1813, declared that "the colors that float from the mast-head should be the credentials of our seamen."

The President, with a promptness which commands itself to the applause and admiration of the country, has ordered a squadron to the scene of these outrages to prevent their repetition, but he is powerless to redress past offenses, unless sustained by Congress.

I know that a war would be a great calamity to this country, and particularly to the section from which I come, but it would be a greater calamity still to England. With her national debt palsying the energies of her people, her difficulties with France and China, and a rebellion raging in India, she is in no condition to engage in a war with this country; but if she was, rather than submit to these aggressions upon our commerce, I would prefer war, with all its consequences.

I am not allowed, under the rules of the House, to discuss the bill before it has been reported, but I must be permitted to say that a bolder foreign policy ought to be adopted by this Government; and that wherever an American citizen may go, upon the land or upon the sea, in the prosecution of lawful enterprises, he is entitled to the protection of the Government, and ought to have it. But I am trespassing upon the time of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, and I yield the floor.

Several MEMBERS called for the question on Mr. J. GLANCY JONES's motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I insist on my motion.

Mr. SICKLES. If the gentleman will allow me, I will make a motion that is in order.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BARKSDALE in the chair.)

The CHAIRMAN stated the business in order to be the special order; which was the bill making an amendment to the sub-Treasury law.

The bill was read in extenso.

It provides that so much of the first section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue,'" approved March 3, 1857, as provides "that each and every disbursing officer or agent of the United States, having any money of the United States intrusted to him for disbursement, shall be, and he is hereby, required to deposit the same with the Treasurer of the United States, or with some one of the Assistant Treasurers or public depositaries, and draw for the same only in favor of the persons to whom payment is to be made in pursuance of law and instructions," be modified and amended, so that whenever the Secretary or other officer at the head of any Executive Department to which any disbursing officer or agent is attached or shall belong, to whom money of the United States is or may be intrusted for disbursement, shall deem it necessary or expedient to order and direct that such money intrusted to such disbursing officer or agent shall be held by him, and paid directly to the person to whom payment is to be made in pursuance of law and instructions, without depositing the same in the manner required in said first section, such custody and payment of the money of the United States by such disbursing officer or agent, under the express order and direction of such head of the Department to which such disbursing officer or agent is attached or shall belong, shall be taken and deemed to be a sufficient compliance with that part of said first section of the act above mentioned.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The law to which this is an amendment was passed in the last hours of the session of March 4, 1857. It forbids any disbursing officer of this Government from drawing more than twenty dollars in money out of the Treasury at any one time. I approve of that law where it is possible to execute it. The Executive Department asks no modification of it, except the extension of just such a discretionary power as will enable them to execute the law. Under the law as it is, disbursing money in the Mediterranean squadron, paying officers in Utah, and paying public debts in California and elsewhere, is utterly impossible. The amendment only proposes this: let the law stand as it is, except where a head of a Department certifies to the Secretary of the Treasury that it is absolutely necessary to allow a disbursing officer to draw out more in money than is fixed, instead of checking. He has the power to check for it now. It simply enables him to take the money instead of checking. Now, I cannot deny that there will exist some prejudice against giving any disbursing officer power to draw out more money than the law of 1857 allows. That is not the effect of the amendment. This allows him to draw more than twenty dollars only where the Secretary or the head of a Department certifies and reports to Congress that it is absolutely impossible for the disbursing officer to get along without doing so. That is the whole of it.

Mr. MORGAN. This is a bill which has been discussed here in a very full House; and by a very decided vote the House laid it aside; and I hope it will not be pressed again. If it is, I object to it.

No amendment being offered,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House with a recommendation that the bill do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARKSDALE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly House bill (No. 467) modifying the first section of the act entitled "An act to amend an act entitled 'An act to provide for the better organization of the Treasury, and for the collection, safe-keeping, transfer, and disbursement of the public revenue;'" and had directed him to report the same to the House with a recommendation that it do pass.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I demand the previous question on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and, being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. MORGAN. I move to lay the bill upon the table.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I demand the yeas and nays upon the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 71, nays 90; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Aht, Arnold, Boyce, Branch, Burns, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochran, Corning, Cox, James Craig, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Dowdell, Edmundson, Elliott, Faulstich, Florence, Giffis, Goode, Gregg, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hill, Hoard, Horton, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, Knapp, Leiter, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Matieson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Potter, Poutle, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Savage, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, William Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Elihu B. Washburne, Wood, Woodson, and John V. Wright—90.

So the bill was not passed.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, stated, pending the call of the roll, that he had paired off with Mr. SHERMAN, of Ohio.

Mr. HILL. I desire to state that last evening, on account of the illness of Mr. EDMUNDSON, I paired off with him. I believe he is present now, and I vote "no" on this question.

Mr. BURNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was rejected; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. REILLY demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were refused.

The motion to lay the motion to reconsider on the table was agreed to.

MAIL STEAMER BILL.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a privileged question. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses upon the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail, by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, have met, and after a full and free conference have been utterly unable to agree upon any one of the provisions of the bill.

Mr. HOUSTON. I would ask the gentleman what number of Senate amendments there are to that bill?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. There were four amendments upon which the two Houses disagreed. There was one authorizing the Postmaster General, with the consent of the contractors, to change the terminus of the Collins line from Liverpool to Southampton. We might perhaps have agreed to that one, if we could have agreed upon the others. The others authorize the Postmaster General to make contracts to carry the mails from any port of the United States to any ports in any part of the world if he can get them carried for the United States inland and sea postage.

Mr. SICKLES. I move that the committee be discharged, and that another be appointed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would move, if it is in order, that the House adhere to its disagreeing votes.

Mr. SICKLES. I insist upon my motion, and move the previous question upon its adoption.

Mr. HOUSTON. Would it be in order to move that the House agree to the amendments last referred to by the gentleman from Tennessee?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Has not the previous question been called?

Mr. HOUSTON. I am only asking a question for information.

The SPEAKER. The bill is not technically in possession of the House.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof Mr. SICKLES's motion was agreed to; and Mr. SICKLES, Mr. GARNETT, and Mr. KUNKEL of Pennsylvania, were appointed as such committee on the part of the House.

Mr. SICKLES moved to reconsider the vote by which the House insisted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

RECIPROCITY TREATY.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. There are but two measures now that I have to bring forward: one before we go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and the other in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. There is a joint resolution, which will not occupy five minutes, relative to the reciprocity treaty, and which I ask leave to report to the House from the Committee of Ways and Means, that it may be put upon its passage.

The joint resolution authorizes the President of the United States, whenever he shall receive satisfactory information that hay and hops, being the products of the United States, and exported thence to any of the British North American Provinces, are admitted free of duty, to issue his proclamation declaring that hay and hops, the products of those Provinces, shall be admitted free of duty.

Mr. STANTON. I object to the introduction of the joint resolution.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended. I send up a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury to have read.

Mr. STANTON. Is debate in order on a motion to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. STANTON. Well, I object, unless we have it on both sides.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I call for tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes seventy-one; not two thirds of a quorum.

So the rules were not suspended.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Debate has not been closed on the loan bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union. I have indicated, on a former occasion, my disposition to leave that bill open for a reasonable length of debate. I wish to ascertain the sense of the House, and propose now to move that all debate shall close on that bill in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union in two hours after it shall have been taken up in committee.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by closing debate in thirty minutes.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I accept the amendment, and call for the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the Senate amendments to the naval appropriation bill.

LOAN BILL—AGAIN.

The amendment of Mr. WASHBURN was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BARKSDALE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of House bill (No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000.

The bill was read.

Mr. BURLINGAME. Mr. Chairman, I shall ask the indulgence of the committee for a short time only, while I shall bring to its consideration the recent outrages committed upon our flag in the Gulf of Mexico. I do so, sir, at this time, because it seems to me that no other opportunity may offer for that purpose.

Mr. BRANCH. I rise to a question of order. My impression is that this bill has been made the special order in committee by order of the House; and if so, the debate must be confined to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The bill has not been made a special order. The gentleman from Massachusetts is in order, and will proceed.

Mr. BURLINGAME. I had hoped that this subject would have been referred to the Committee on Foreign Affairs, (of which I am a humble member,) so that the committee might have taken official action upon it. It was not until recently, however, that it was so referred, and the committee have had an important report in relation to it, which they have desired to submit, but no opportunity has been afforded them.

It seems to me, sir, that the subject is of sufficient importance to demand the consideration of this House. The Senate has taken action. Why should the immediate Representatives of the people remain silent? That these outrages have been committed, nobody can deny. Twelve times in the waters of a foreign nation our flag has been insulted in the presence of a foreign people! More than twenty times within the last two months our ships have been stopped, searched, and (in some cases) fired into; and all this in violation of good faith, and in violation of the plain law of nations, as expounded by Webster and Calhoun, as decided by Stowell and Story. The rule which has been violated I take to be this, and I shall be brief: that on the sea all nations are equal—that every flag is sacred which symbolizes an honest nationality—and, therefore, it is not for one nation or for many nations to arrogate to itself or to themselves the right to act as the police of the seas. This rule consists well with the doctrine which permits any one of them or all of them to take the pirate wherever he may be found. The same rule, I take it, governs on the sea as governs on land. You may pursue the murderer into the freeman's home, if you will; but you must be sure of his character in that respect. You may take the pirate on the sea wherever you can find him; but you must be sure, in taking him, not to touch the rights of the man who is not a pirate. Now, our citizens, who have been insulted did not look like pirates, did not act like pirates, and did not prove to be pirates. Therefore, an outrage has been committed on them. Now, those who committed it acted under instructions, or they did not. If they acted under instructions, an act of war has been committed, if we choose so to consider it. If they did not act under instructions, then, sir, they fall into the category of thieves and robbers of the sea, to be dealt with accordingly. Look at it as you will, it seems that gross outrages have been committed, which demand instant reparation, and justify instant retaliation.

Now, sir, in the presence of these facts—all agreeing as to the nature of the outrages, all agreeing as to the law violated by them—what is the attitude of the Administration? Does it resent the insult? It admits that the law has been violated. Does it seek, by any action, to vindicate the violated law? Sir, inferring from its acts and its words, it takes this position—it tells us to pause, wait, negotiate. What on earth is there to negotiate about? Does not every man see that by taking this position the Administration yields the point of honor? Does not every man see that it takes a position of disadvantage? England will have a right to infer that the question is an open one. Wait to hear from England? What for? What can England say? The insult has been offered, and who is to resent it? Is England to resent it? The law has been violated; and is England to vindicate the violated law? If we sink her ships, or bring them into port, can England complain? Is it not England's hereditary policy to promote those who show zeal in her cause, even when they pass the bounds of law? Where is Crampton? Did he suffer? Ought she not rather to thank us? If she avows the act, then it is an act of war; and if she does not, let us punish her officers who do it, in such a way that they will never do it again.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I should like to ask the gentleman from Massachusetts, whether he would plunge the country in war, (as he seems to be condemning the Administration for not doing it,) without waiting until we know whether these acts of outrage are authorized by the British Government or not?

Mr. BURLINGAME. The course I indicate is the way to peace and honor. I plunge this country into war! No, sir, I want no war; but I want no insult. England will thank us for vindicating the law, if she holds to the decisions of her great judge.

Mr. GRANGER. How long are we allowed to debate a loan bill of $15,000,000?

The CHAIRMAN. Thirty minutes is the time allotted for general debate.

Mr. GRANGER. So I thought.

Mr. BURLINGAME. The House knows that

I have not pressed myself upon its deliberation often during this session. I have not asked many favors of the House. [Cries of "Go on!"]

It seems to me, sir, that the Administration is not up to the mark in this matter—that it does not reflect the real spirit of the people. I detect a shrinking back from responsibility—from a vindication of our rights—on every hand. The people ask it not to be rash, but firm—to stand to its declarations; that it shall be good in its deeds as in its words. I fear, from the signs, that we are to have the "fifty-four forty or fight" over again, and then back down to forty-nine—yielding up Vancouver's Island, the finest in the Pacific. I detect this shrinking back, in the long time taken by the President to respond to the call of the House for information; and when he did respond with startling facts, why did he not make a request or a recommendation? I detect it in the letter of your Secretary of State to Mr. Dallas, the sting of which is for Spain, and not for England. Weak Spain, that cannot, with her shriveled arm respond to our blow, is to be punished for an insult committed upon our shipping, which she could not prevent, and did not approve! I detect it in the general and mystical orders given by the Secretary of the Navy to the Gulf squadron—more general and mystical, if possible, than those under which Captain Chatard was recalled for not doing an act, and Paulding censured for doing the very same act, in the very same place. I detect it in the resolutions of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate. Those resolutions were properly characterized by Senator Toombs. The report going before them contains good doctrine, but the resolutions are pointless and aimless.

If all this did not convince me of the feeble policy of the Government, I could no longer doubt, after the demand, by bill, by the friends of the President, for power to war upon the little dying States of Central America. Yet, sir, when the question was put by a friend of the Administration, as to whether they desired the power to resent the insult by England, the response was emphatic, that they did not. Why not ask for power to resent the insult against that nation as well as against a small nation? If the President has not the power to resent it, why does he not ask us for it? I have no doubt at all, that if there is cause for it, the people's Representatives will respond, with every dime and every man in this country, to vindicate the freedom of the seas. We all remember that, when one man was imprisoned, in Maine, the Senate unanimously, and the House with only a few dissenting votes, responded very promptly—the gallant Clay leading the patriotic feeling of the Senate; and John Quincy Adams, who never gave his voice or never gave his vote against his country in his life, led the patriotic fervor in this House. I will not dwell on that point.

Are we sure that the President has used all the power he has, for the purpose of repelling invasion and resenting insult? If he could use the marines to shoot down American citizens in the streets of Washington, could he not repel the foreign foe? If he could pursue and assault Walker upon a foreign soil, and bring him back to this country, could he not assault and beat back an enemy that invaded the sacred soil of our country? For I take it, that the deck of an American vessel is the soil of the country.

But, if there is any doubt as to his power, let him ask for it, and we will respond. I do not propose that we shall give him general, wandering, vagrant power to attack nations, weak and small; but if England insult us, I will give him specific power, at our hand, to strike England; if Paraguay insult us, I will give him specific power, as the hand of the Union, to strike Paraguay. I am jealous of the assumption of power by the President; I think that he has assumed it; I think that he has intervened to trample down the rights of American citizens upon American soil; but I am constrained to say that he has not at any time exhibited any special activity in vindicating the rights of the country against a foreign foe. I voted to give him the power in the case of Paraguay. I did it, because the citizens of my own section—not because they belonged to New England, for I would have done it as well if they were from Mississippi or South Carolina—had outrages committed upon them. Their property had been destroyed; they had been driven by the tyrant, Lopez, out of a country to which they had been invited; one of our national vessels, too, had been fired into.

Mr. COX. Did the gentleman vote for the ten sloops?

Mr. BURLINGAME. I would like to answer that question; I will do so, if I have time.

Our ship of war, on a peaceful expedition, in neutral waters, was fired upon, and an American citizen killed upon her deck. And when we sent commissioner after commissioner there, they were spurned away by the tyrant, Lopez, without redress. It was because of this destruction of the property of my countrymen, it was because of this insult to our dignity and our pride, it was because the blood of American citizens had for years cried for vengeance from the waters of the distant Parana, that I voted to bestow upon the President of the United States, not a discretion to make war—for that we did ourselves—but a discretion only in favorem vite—in favor of humanity—to make peace. I voted in favor of granting that discretion, and would vote to do it again. I am proud of that vote. The President has done right in reference to that matter. Though I may differ with him, and do differ with him radically, upon many points of his policy, I shall not be so recreant to the interests of my country, so blinded by party zeal, as not to give him the assistance of my vote, and my hand, if need be, when I see him honestly seeking to vindicate the honor of my country, and the dignity of my native land.

Mr. HILL. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. BURLINGAME. I cannot yield to my friend from Georgia. I know that his question would be pertinent and friendly, but I cannot, for I have not the time.

Mr. COX. I would like to have the gentleman answer my question.

Mr. BURLINGAME. I should be pleased, had I time, to answer all your questions, but my time is nearly up.

I can only say, in general terms, that the foreign policy of this Government has been weak and vacillating. Its agents have been of such a character as to cause the weak nations to hate us, and the great nations to despise us. This weakness and vacillation have invited all these insults—for everybody insults us now. Chili does it; and Paraguay, and New Granada, and China, insult us; Spain has fired into the El Dorado; the Dutch imprisoned Captain Gibson, and destroyed his property; and after the Government undertook to redress his wrongs, it backed out. Look at New Granada! They kill our citizens by the score, violate our rights and the laws of nations; and yet our people are asked to pause and negotiate! And what does negotiation accomplish? Where now is your Cass-Herran treaty? If we are to credit the last report, a treaty with New Granada has been defeated.

And what is the state of things in Central America—a point where we need all the skill and diplomacy of our Government. Is there a member of this House who can recall the name of a single distinguished agent of this Government who has been sent to that delicate point, where our interests are in greatest danger? The genius of France is at work there; she is molding that people into a confederacy; she has obtained grants from the Central American States, which will shut down the gates directly in the way to our own great Pacific possessions.

But last, and worse than all, England in our own waters is committing insults on our flag; and it seems to me the time has come, and the fullness of time, for this people to put forth its energies and manifest its power; and I would treat England precisely as I would treat the meanest Power upon the face of the earth.

But it may be said we shall have a war. I say, not so. If England does not mean to vindicate for herself the right of search, these difficulties can lead to no war. If she does, I ask if there is an American citizen anywhere who is willing to yield up the freedom of the seas? Then there can be no war.

I make no crusade against England. I honor her for her courage, and I respect her because she vindicates the rights of her citizens upon every land and every sea. She is now about to go to war for two of her citizens who were taken by the Neapolitan Government. They have been discharged, and reparation is demanded; and the last news from England (in the language of the London Times) is, that she will fire a shot against Naples, which will resound from the Straits of Messina to the Alps. I glory in her ancient renown, and joy in the tidings of her present might. But whatever she was before, or however great she may be, in remembrance of Waterloo, of Balacava, of Delhi, of Lucknow, of Trafalgar, and the Nile, I would say to her, that though she may beat with her sturdy valor the well-trained soldier of Europe, and trample down under her cruel feet the fierce sepoy of the Orient, the heroic children of her loins beyond the western waves, standing for their unquestioned rights, dare cast down the gage of battle even to her, and will convince her, and convince the world,

"That there is one great clime
Which still rears its crest unconquered and sublime."

But it is said we are not prepared for war. And I am asked by the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. Cox,] why I did not vote for the construction of the war sloops. Of what use, I ask, would they be in case of war with England? I say we are better prepared for war, in proportion to the least amount we cast into the sea, and into hulks which soon will only be fit to gather barnacles upon their keels. In the last war we took trees green from the forest, and in seven months constructed vessels, and took the British fleet on Lake Erie. If we are to have war, say but the word, and the hardy fishermen, now so maligned in some quarters, will go forth from the bays of Massachusetts, and, as in other days, bring home prizes and victory with all the winds.

Let the order go forth, and New England will respond with her commercial marine. Say but the word, and the genius of my own people will manifest itself in war steamers, "whose thunders shall shake the Philip of the seas!" Say the word, and the men of the north end of Boston, in my own district, would again rig out the Constitution, as in other days, and man her with those north-end sailors, whose boast it is that they can whip the sailors of the world in all the ports of the world, and once more

"Nail to the mast her holy flag,
And give her to the God of storms, the lightning, and the gale."

If we must have war for our rights, it would not be without its compensations as well as its disasters. We have not everything to lose. The war upon the fishermen would stop; the navigation laws would not be repealed for the benefit of England; the British free-trade tariff of 1846 would not operate; the forges in Pennsylvania would again glow; and every brawling stream in New England would work its way to the sea through the cunning machinery of our artisans; the interests of agriculture would again revive; sectional strife would cease; King Cotton would become Republican Cotton; new lands would be acquired, and the Republic consolidated and strengthened. Yes, there is a question of land here. There is other land besides Cuba. There is a land, sir, worthy of our attention—a land lying up under the north star. It is a rich land, and has a rich and prosperous people. It will furnish to our councils eight Senators and forty Representatives. Sir, I give these compensation suggestions not more for England than as thought-breeders for some of our people at home. I think we should issue from such a war with the whole continent under our sway. No man would have to indicate on what part of it he dwelt, to establish his nationality. By whatever distant river he should stand, whatever mountain he should climb, or whatever desert he should traverse, or whatever climate he might endure, he would exult in the thought that he was a citizen of a mighty Union, and a member of the great unconquered and unconquerable western Republic.

Mr. HILL. I desire to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts, that he has, in the last few sentences he has pronounced, answered the interrogatory which I intended to put to him; which was, whether, in his zeal for getting his country into a war with Great Britain, there had been any such thing as a calculation of the probable advantage which might accrue to his section? He has answered the inquiry to my satisfaction.

Mr. BURLINGAME. I say frankly to the gentleman from Georgia, that I believe there would be compensation to my own section; and, not only to my section, but to the whole country; for my heart is large enough to embrace the whole country. But I should lament and deplore a war; and I think there will be none while the present party remains in power, judging from the signs on every hand, unless it shall result from the weakness and want of spirit of those in authority.

Mr. PURVIANCE. Does the gentleman from Massachusetts intend to say that the sentiment upon this side of the House, in reference to an immediate declaration of war, differs in any material respect from that of the other side of the House?

Mr. BURLINGAME. I cannot speak for any side of the House on this question. I do not wish to be complimentary to this side of the House, but I think that, if the call be made upon the country, this side will respond with as much alacrity and unanimity as the other side. And I have faith to believe that all of us, as against a foreign foe, would stand together, and give out one united shout of defiance, from the lakes of the North to the Gulf, and from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Mr. COX. The gentleman has not yet told us why he voted against the sloops-of-war.

Mr. BURLINGAME. I have answered once, I think; but I will tell the gentleman again why I voted against the sloops of war, and why I would vote against the expenditure of money in any similar way. In case of war, both nations must begin to build anew, on account of the important modern improvements in steam machinery and ordnance. Both nations would at once build after the latest models, and arm with the most modern armaments. England, with her old ships, could do nothing, in her late war with Russia, against Cronstadt and Sebastopol. She commenced building new vessels with which to meet the requirements of the time. The genius of Todleben taught us how to defend our cities, standing in the foam of the sea, by earthworks. The nation which does not cast its money away on war vessels, which must soon become obsolete, but strengthens its commercial marine, is fittest for war. If we should use the $13,000,000 we now yearly spend on our war vessels, to stimulate individual enterprise, and in establishing postal routes, in five years we should have a navy before which the war vessels of England would "pale their ineffectual fires."

[Here the Chairman's hammer fell—the time allowed for general debate having expired.]

Mr. LETCHER. I intended to have spoken an hour on the subject of Government expenditures, in connection with the loan bill; but, as I do not wish now to occupy the time of the committee, I shall avail myself of the privilege to write out my remarks, if agreeable to the committee.

General assent was given.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. I have prepared some remarks on this subject, but I do not desire to fatigue the committee with delivering them, if they will give me permission to publish them.

General assent was given.

Mr. SICKLES. I desire to ask leave to print some remarks on this subject, in case I have not an opportunity to make them.

General assent was given.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the committee will indulge me for a short time, I will endeavor to confine myself to a few sober facts in relation to the finances of the country. It might not, perhaps, be inappropriate to say to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURLINGAME] that, as he has made a war speech, I shall expect him, when called upon, to respond to all claims for expenditures for such a purpose. I do not propose now, Mr. Chairman, to make a lengthy speech on the question. I know that the House is impatient to get through public business, with a view to an early adjournment. I shall content myself now with a simple statement, availing myself of the privilege of adding to it in print, if I see proper. [Cries of "Agreed."]

Mr. SICKLES. I beg to ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to give me a portion of his time, that I may make a few remarks in reply to the gentleman from Massachusetts. [Cries of "No, no!" "Object!"]

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. If the gentleman makes a war speech, we want all around to make war speeches.

Mr. SICKLES. I want to make a peace speech.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I object; and hope my colleague will not yield.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. At the opening of this session of Congress, the Secretary of the Treasury, in submitting his estimates and his reports, referred to the condition of the finances of the country generally, and particularly to the recent revulsion. From a full Treasury with a surplus of twenty or thirty millions of dollars on the 4th of March last, we have now a deficiency of $20,000,000. I do not propose to go into an argument to show the causes which produced this very extraordinary result. There are a great many different theories on the subject. I simply wish to confine myself to facts, and leave every gentleman to make up his own mind, or to adopt his own theory, and carry it into practice if he can.

I had intended, if this bill had come up at an earlier day, to have occupied the full extent of my hour in debating fully and frankly in all its bearings a revenue system—a subject which some gentlemen seem to think there is a disposition to avoid upon this side of the House. It is said that we have an empty Treasury; that we have borrowed $20,000,000, and are about to borrow $15,000,000 more, and yet that the Committee of Ways and Means is entirely silent as to the mode of replenishing the Treasury. I would be the last man to be guilty of an omission of this kind if it were in the power of the Committee of Ways and Means at this particular period to remedy this evil. But I know, every gentleman in this House knows, and the country knows, that an adjustment of the tariff at this particular juncture would not add a dollar to the revenue, and we know the additional fact that if a protective tariff were imposed at this particular period upon the people, so far from benefiting either the revenue or any interest of the country, it would entail evils upon us that gentlemen upon the other side of the House would be the first to disavow and to hold us responsible for. If the tariff at this session were put at sixty per cent., it would not yield one dollar of revenue. In consequence of the cessation of imports, no tariff could affect either the revenue or the manufacturing interests. The attempt and failure would only unsettle and confuse instead of giving stability, or inspiring well-founded hopes for the future.

But it is sent forth to the country that we are unwilling to afford relief, even on our own principle. We have often proclaimed to the whole country that we are not in favor of a tariff for protection alone, but that we are in favor of a tariff for revenue; and that under such a tariff, with revenue for its object, we will at all times do everything that we can consistently with this principle to incidentally benefit our domestic interests. That is our position, and if any gentleman will show me, now, how any adjustment of the tariff can be made upon that principle that will yield revenue and benefit the country, I am ready this moment to act on it. I have seen no such practical suggestion anywhere. There must be a revival of trade; we must have importations before any tariff of any kind whatever can produce any effect; and it is for this reason, and this alone, that I have proposed that we shall wait until there is a sufficient revival of trade, that we may see how to adjust the tariff with a view to secure revenue, give stability to the system, and encourage our own domestic industry, before we attempt to tinker with it. I have no hesitation in saying now that I shall not favor any tariff hereafter that is alone for protection in any of its features, without revenue for its object; but if I find, after a revival of trade, that the present tariff will not fulfill our expectations, then, and not till then, I shall be ready to go into a movement that will give us, on that principle and on that basis, sufficient revenue to meet—not, as some of my friends have intimated, extravagant expenditures—but the legitimate expenses of a Government economically administered.

I suppose it is hardly necessary for me to say that I am in favor of the postal system being generally self-supporting. I am willing to go, by judicious legislation, for a self-supporting system, both inland and foreign, and this can be effected without increasing the rates of postage, by reforming the abuse of the franking privilege. The reason why I do not propose it now, is precisely the same reason as that for which I am not willing to act upon the tariff. I am not willing to run pell-mell into a system of legislation, at the heel of the session, changing laws in appropriation bills. But I am willing, in the regular mode of legislation, to reform and revise the postal system, foreign and inland, and to establish them upon a self-supporting basis. Having thus given my views, I will not now enlarge upon them. I have said this much because it was perhaps due to the position which I occupy, and because hints have been thrown out from various quarters, coming, too, from my own State, that I had the power but lacked the inclination to come to the relief of the country, and was disposed to allow Congress to adjourn without even expressing my sentiments in regard to the amount of the loan now asked for.

The revulsion of the current fiscal year, I have already remarked, was very sudden and unexpected. No man could foresee it in all its bearings. Under our laws the Secretary of the Treasury is required to report to Congress, each session, the acts of the past, and to estimate for the expenditures of the coming fiscal year. He is required to render an annual report to Congress, of the expenditures and disbursements of the Government, and to submit to Congress, at each session, printed estimates in detail, of all expenditures that will be required to carry on the Government for the next fiscal year. Our Government, from its very foundation, has looked for revenue to a system of indirect taxation, by the adjustment of a scale of duties on imports, known as the tariff. Equity requires that we should, in adjusting it, throw the burdens on property, and exempt, as much as possible, the evil of capitation taxation. Direct taxation would impose nearly the whole burden upon the personal, real, and mixed estate of the Confederacy, relieving production and persons comparatively free, upon the generally-recognized principle in free government, that property shall bear the burdens of government as a consideration for the guarantees of inviolability and protection. We should, then, if we adopt the indirect-taxation system, adjust it so as to throw its burden on property. The tariff should discriminate with revenue for its object; it should bear lightly on articles of necessity—of general consumption—and heavily on luxuries and articles consumed by capitalists, or requiring capital for their production. The revenue of the country, under any tariff, necessarily depends mainly upon the crops and production generally, (I mean, of course, a safe, steady revenue,) and our capacity for exporting these staples. Steady exportation will increase importation, and safely, too, in that ratio, and consequently enlarge the revenue by the receipt of imposts. Disaster, however, is sure to follow the loss of their equilibrium, as bitter experience is now teaching us. Of late years, our imports have vastly exceeded the safe standard, both in quantity and quality, and, thus engendering overtrading and a bloated credit system, have brought us to a dead halt. This apparently overflow of means has led the Government into a scale of expenditures which never would have been brought about if it had not been for the great apparent prosperity of the country.

In this condition of things, the Secretary of the Treasury has been compelled to submit his estimates to Congress, based upon the condition of trade for the last twelve months—he must calculate for the future. Amid the existing fluctuations of trade, the derangement of currency, and a hundred other perplexities arising out of the panic we have just passed through, it was impossible for human foresight to prepare for all contingencies. He asked at the opening of the session for $20,000,000. He asked for that amount in Treasury notes, and not as a permanent loan, because he hoped that trade would revive and sufficient revenue flow into the Treasury to supersede the necessity of relying upon anything but the current receipts to provide for the current expenditures of the Government—a temporary credit relieving a temporary revulsion. He hoped that, in another quarter, trade would revive to such an extent as to enable him to say to the country that he wanted no more money outside of the receipts. Money was plenty in the country, and, being only panic-stricken, it was supposed the paralysis would be temporary. That hope has been disappointed; not in the abundance of money, the crops, nor exports, but in the revival of trade. The statements I will lay before the House will show that not only has trade not revived, but that it has fallen off; and that, while the revenue has been diminishing for the last three quarters, the expenditures have been increased by the Utah war, and the demand for payment of debts incurred when the Treasury was full. It has thus become the duty of the Secretary of the Treasury to bring these facts to our attention, and to ask for this additional loan. In his estimates presented at the opening of the session, he did not include or anticipate the appropriations of $10,000,000 of deficiencies, which became necessary to be supplied to the Utah expedition.

In submitting his letter asking for this loan, with the estimates, &c., all of which I will have read, you will perceive that he states that he has called upon the several Departments of the Government to ascertain the probable expenditures for the portion of the next fiscal year commencing with July and ending with December, and the result has been, that the amount required will be $37,000,000.

This loan bill has been kept back by me in order to see what provision would be necessary, in view of the appropriation bills, and other bills requiring money which might pass Congress. The Secretary of the Treasury estimates the receipts from customs and other services for the two quarters of the next fiscal year, at $25,000,000. This, added to a loan of $15,000,000, would give $40,000,000 to meet $37,000,000 of expenditures; but that $37,000,000 is based upon the estimates of the Department, exclusive of any appropriation made by Congress in the way of private bills, or increased appropriations beyond the estimates of the Department. It is for the purpose of ascertaining what the difference may be that the loan bill has been held back by me; but inasmuch as the House is so far in advance of the Senate, I think it proper to submit the bill in the form in which it originated in the Committee of Ways and Means. It authorizes $15,000,000 to be borrowed on the credit of the Government for fifteen years. If it passes this House, it will then go to the Senate, and between this time and the action of the Senate, the appropriation bills being passed, the accounting officers of the Treasury will be enabled to ascertain very nearly the amount which will be required; whatever above fifteen million dollars it reaches, will be sent to us as an amendment, and when it comes here, it will be understood that the increase is demanded to meet the requisition of our recent legislation. I send to the Clerk to be read, the letter of the Secretary on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, May 19, 1858.

SIR: In view of the early adjournment, I desire to call the attention of Congress to the present condition of the finances of the Government.

In my annual report I estimated that there would be a balance in the Treasury, at the end of the present fiscal year, of $426,875 67, which would have required a deficiency in our resources of $5,000,000 to be provided for; as that amount is necessary, at all times, to be in the Treasury for its prompt and successful operation. This estimate was based upon an expenditure limited to the appropriation then authorized by law. Since that time the demands upon the Treasury for the present fiscal year have been increased by legislation to an amount not far below $10,000,000. Another important element of that estimate was the probable receipts from customs and other sources during the then three remaining quarters of the fiscal year.

The actual receipts for that period, it is now believed, will fall $10,000,000 below that estimate: attributable to the fact that the trade and business of the country have not recovered as rapidly from the effects of the late revulsion as was then anticipated.

Owing to these causes, the $20,000,000 loan of Treasury notes authorized by the act of December 23, 1857, will be exhausted in supplying the deficiencies in the Treasury for the present fiscal year.

We shall commence the next fiscal year dependent entirely upon the current receipts into the Treasury to meet all demands from it.

In reply to a call upon the heads of the different Departments, I have received official information that the sum of $37,000,000 will be probably called for during the first two quarters of the next fiscal year. This sum does not include such amounts as may be appropriated by Congress over and above the estimates submitted to them by the Departments, and I have no data upon which to estimate for such expenditures. Upon this point Congress is better able to form a correct opinion than I am.

To meet these expenditures, it is not prudent to rely upon receipts into the Treasury, estimated upon the too rapid revival of trade and business. I believe that we may safely calculate upon receipts, during that period, from all sources, of $25,000,000. Looking to this state of things, I recommend that authority be given to this Department to supply any deficiencies that may arise in meeting the demands upon the Treasury by an additional loan not exceeding $15,000,000.

In view of the amount of Treasury notes already issued, I recommend a loan for that amount, to be negotiated for a period of not more than ten years, at a rate of interest not exceeding six per centum.

I have confined this inquiry to the two first quarters of the next fiscal year, as Congress will reassemble before the close of the second quarter, to provide for future contingencies that cannot now be foreseen.

I do not recommend any measure for increased taxation. It would be unwise at this time to attempt a modification of the tariff act of March 3, 1857, for the reasons given in my annual report to Congress. Sufficient time has not elapsed to test the effects of that act upon the revenue, considering the condition of the country during the period of its operation. In addition to this consideration, neither the receipts nor the expenditures of the Government should be estimated for in the future, upon the basis of its present receipts and expenditures. The former have been, and still are, too seriously affected by the late revulsion, to justify a policy of legislation based upon a probable continuance of things for any considerable period of time.

The latter have been so greatly increased by causes of a like temporary character as to preclude, with equal propriety, the policy of considering them as a basis for estimating future expenditures. The most prominent of these temporary causes is the Utah expedition, which, it is hoped, will not reach beyond the end of the next fiscal year. During the period of an overflowing Treasury, a system of expenditure was inaugurated in the building of custom-houses, post offices, court-houses, and other public works, which, fortunately for the country, has been checked by the exhausted condition of the Treasury. The time thus given for a more thorough and rigid inquiry into the necessity and propriety of these expenditures, it is confidently believed, will lead to wise and salutary reforms. Retrenchments in other branches of the public service can, and I have no doubt will, be effected. Attention should be directed more to the reduction of expenditures than to an increase of taxation, to remedy the evils of an excess of expenditures over the means of the Government. A full Treasury is an unpropitious element in the work of retrenchment and reform. If measures should be now adopted to provide the Treasury permanently with a sum equal to the present demands upon it, it might relieve the Government from some of its embarrassments, but would greatly weaken the effort to restrain the Government to an economical expenditure of the public money.

The revival of business, which cannot be much longer delayed, will, I am confident, insure from the present tariff a sufficient revenue for the support of the Government in ordinary times.

Extraordinary expenses rendered necessary by causes equally extraordinary, always being of a temporary character, should be provided for a like temporary manner.

This principle is too plain to require argument or illustration; it is only necessary to call attention to it to command the approval of every intelligent mind.

I am, very respectfully,
HOWELL COBB,
Secretary of the Treasury.

HON. JAMES L. ORR,
Speaker of the House of Representatives.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I submit, also, an estimate and tabular statement, showing the amount of the public debt on the 21st of May, 1858. It will be seen that the $15,000,000 loan is made payable at the end of fifteen years, so that the bonds may fall due beyond the day on which the present funded debt falls due:

Statement showing the amount of the Public Debt on the 21st of May, 1858:

Loans, &c.	Amount.	When redeemable.
Loan of 1842.....	$2,883,354 41	December 31, 1862.
Loan of 1846.....	7,630 00	November 12, 1856.
Loan of 1847.....	9,412,790 00	January 1, 1868.
Loan of 1848.....	8,995,341 80	July 1, 1868.
Texas indemnity.....	3,451,000 00	January 1, 1865.
Texas debt.....	261,972 82	On presentation.
Old funded and unfunded debt.....	114,118 54	On presentation.
Treasury notes.....	107,961 00	On presentation.
	$25,157,038 27

This public debt, amounting to upwards of twenty-five million dollars, all falls due between the present time and the year 1868. The present loan is purposed to be made for fifteen years, which will be five years beyond the period when our present public debt falls due.

The following is a statement of the Treasury notes issued under the act of 23d December, 1857:

Treasury Notes under act 23d December, 1857.

First issue, $6,000,000, redeemable from 26th December, 1858, to 31st December, 1859; second issue, $5,000,000, redeemable from 15th March, 1859, to 6th April, 1859; third issue, $5,000,000, redeemable from 11th May, 1859, to —; fourth issue, $4,000,000, redeemable from June, 1859, to —; making $20,000,000.

I have thus given an exhibit of the public debt up to the 21st of May, 1858.

I have also a statement of the receipts into the Treasury for the first three quarters of the fiscal year ending the 30th June, 1858, from all sources. It is as follows:

Receipts into the Treasury for the first, second, and third quarters fiscal year ending 30th June, 1858.

	First quarter, 1858. July, August, and September, 1857.	Second quarter, 1858. October, November, and December, 1857.	Third quarter, 1858. January, February, and March, 1858.
Customs.....	$18,573,729 37	$6,237,723 69	$7,127,900 69
Sales of public lands....	2,059,449 39	498,781 53	480,936 88
Incidental....	296,641 05	356,159 78	393,610 78
Treas. notes, act Dec. 23, 1857.....	-	-	11,087,600 00
Loan, act of Jan. 28, 1847.....	150 00	-	-
Trust funds: Smithsonian Institution.....	3,463 85	-	26,724 64
Chickasaw fund.....	33,058 44	-	34,549 44
	$20,966,492 10	$7,092,665 00	$19,151,402 43

Thus it appears that the receipts for the first quarter of the fiscal year were $20,928,819 81, while in the second quarter of the same year they were only $7,092,665—a falling off from twenty millions to seven millions in one quarter of the same fiscal year.

I have also prepared a statement showing the amount of imports and exports for the first three quarters of the same fiscal year. It is as follows:

IMPORTS.
	First quarter, 1858. July, August, and September, 1857.	Second quarter, 1858. October, November, and December, 1857.	Third quarter, 1858. January, February, and March, 1858.

	$60,814,058	$84,420,513	$88,394,316

I have also prepared another table showing the estimated receipts and expenditures from the 1st of July, 1858, to the 31st of December, 1858, and also one for the four quarters of the fiscal year ending the 31st of June, 1858. It is understood that the loan asked for now, together with the estimated receipts, is to cover the expenses of the first two quarters of the next fiscal year, commencing July 1. In consequence of the unsettled state of trade, we have no reliable basis upon which to make the estimate; but we can approximate to the sum. By the 1st of January next we will have light enough to know just how we stand; and then will be the time to raise our tariff, and everything connected with it, according to the exigencies of the times and the indications of the future.

The appropriations made at the present session of Congress will amount to probably $63,000,000. Of this, however, but $58,000,000 will be required for the fiscal year 1859, the residue being incident to the fiscal year 1858.

This nine millions and upwards for deficiency of 1858, is no part of the ordinary expenses of the Government. We can come back in time to the ordinary standard without any great difficulty, by retrenchment and reform. That retrenchment and reform only begun at this session of Congress cannot be effective. It must be determined on at the next session of Congress by legislation. There is no man in the country so wanting in intelligence as not to know that under the system of enormous land grants for railroad purposes, and under the system of squandering the public money in building custom-house monuments all over the country, inaugurated under a plethoric Treasury, we can never reduce the expenditures of the Government. We have now gone on from something like fifty million dollars a year, to an expenditure of seventy or eighty million dollars, over two thirds of which is legitimately expended for the purpose simply of conducting the Government. I believe it is in the power of the Democratic party—and it will be responsible for it—to bring us back to a proper condition of economical expenditure; but to enable us to do this we must first pay off the legacy entailed upon us of old debts incurred by this system of unwise legislation, and begin our reform by discontinuing the practice. Our foreign relations now require an expansion in only one direction—the increase of our Navy. That is a legitimate exercise of the powers of Government, and necessary to maintain our proper position in the family of nations. When the Government has ceased to build custom-houses and to multiply them all over the land, and ceased also to convert every depot in the country into ports of delivery; when the Capitol extension is completed, which may be in a year, and the other Public Buildings, Patent Office, Post Office extension, Treasury, the aqueduct, and when all these incidental expenses are got rid of, it will be within the power of the Democratic party, under the counsels of our present President, to bring down the expenses of the Government to $55,000,000 a year. I hope to see this realized in 1860. I am in favor of this reduction. It is utterly impossible for any party to bring about this reform at once. The great point to be aimed at is not to exhibit a parsimonious economy in repudiating our past debts, no matter how recklessly contracted, nor in changing laws in appropriation bills; it must be done deliberately and systematically. It is not to be done by beginning at the heel of the session to exhibit a spirit of wonderful reform in scaling the public debt; but we must begin at the beginning. Let the Democratic party, which certainly holds power in this House one session more, (and if it will not go for reform, it does not deserve to be in power any longer, and holds the Executive and Senate for several years to come,) commence at the beginning of the session, and we will cure this evil. It will not do to exhibit a wonderful display of economy just one or two days before the adjournment of the session in filibustering on appropriation bills. I have to say, with all due deference to my friends on both sides of the House, that the country understands exactly what that is worth. Much capital is not made by it by any parties.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Will the gentleman from Pennsylvania let me say a word here?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I cannot yield now, as my time is short.

Mr. LOVEJOY. Then I hope the gentleman does not charge us with filibustering.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have seen a good deal of it on both sides of the House, and not a little this morning in the war speech of my friend from Massachusetts, [Mr. BURLINGAME.]

Mr. LOVEJOY. You have not seen it on this side of the House on any single appropriation bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I have heard, within the last half hour, a most tremendous demonstration of what I call filibustering—a war speech on the loan bill, while I know that the gentleman who made it will not go for paying expenses. There is not a constituency of five men on that side of the House who would support a war measure before the country, or vote money to pay for it, if I were to bring in a bill to-morrow asking for the money, and men to use it. I do not blame them for it. Experience has taught us that the best way to get along is to insist upon our rights at all hazards, and to ask for nothing but what is right. A war speech in time of peace is very safe, and naturally, like froth, works itself off. I will hold myself ready to vote for war, and to vote for supplies to maintain it, whenever I think the honor of the country is assailed or touched.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. So will we.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. But you would not now be found voting to give the President of the United States authority to redress instantly the first insult offered to our flag on every sea. I am ready to give the President money and men to do both, but I know such a position could not be carried in this House, and hence I refrain from making war speeches, only to end in words, and find fault with such of my friends on the other side of the House who indulge in this harmless amusement for Buncombe. I could not let the opportunity pass without this remark, that it is rather inconsistent in a gentleman to rise here in this body—and the country will fully appreciate it—and assail the Executive of the United States, no matter to what party he may belong, for not prosecuting a war, when that gentleman, by virtue of his being a member of Congress, is expected to know that, under the jealous reserve of the Constitution of the United States, the Executive has not the power to lift one finger in hostility without the action of Congress; and still worse is it when that gentleman would not vote to give him that power to-day. If the gentleman means what he says, why does he not vote to give the Executive power? The idea of finding fault with the Executive for not waging war, resenting insults, &c., when he has neither power or money given him by Congress to do either, is a species of demonstration which I should be sorry to see often exhibited here by friend or foe, and must certainly (I say it with all due personal regard for my friend) bring Congress into ultimate contempt at home and abroad, wherever it is understood.

I now send to the Clerk's desk the referred to tabular statement of the estimated receipts and expenditures for the next two quarters—that is, from now until the 1st of January next; and also for the four quarters of the current fiscal year—actual and estimated:

Receipts.
Estimated from customs, public lands, and miscellaneous, from July 1, 1858, to December 31, 1858.....	$25,000,000 00
From proceeds of loan.....	15,000,000 00

Total receipts.....	$63,735,047 43
Probable deficit on July 1, 1858.....	$932,220 87

Thus it appears that if the loan of $15,000,000 is granted, and you do not increase the expenses by legislation at this session, either in appropriation bills or by the passage of private bills requiring money, there will be a little over two million dollars in the Treasury on the 1st of January next. Experience has taught us, however, especially under our present Mint system, that we ought at all times to have a balance of $5,000,000 on hand in the Treasury in order to work the machinery of the Treasury Department. We shall, therefore, be short $3,000,000 of a good working balance; but it will be safe for months to rest it. I propose that the House pass this bill in its present shape, providing for a not exceeding six per cent. loan of $15,000,000 for fifteen years, and send it to the Senate. By the time the Senate takes action upon it will be able to figure up the exact amount of the appropriations that have been made; and if it shall be needed, the Senate can increase it, and I shall ask the House to concur in such increase as they may propose on this basis. I have submitted these remarks hastily, and may modify them somewhat hereafter, in order to enforce and explain more fully the positions taken.

Mr. ANDREWS. I offer the following amendment:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the sum of $1,170,000 of the amount so authorized to be loaned as aforesaid is hereby appropriated, and shall be devoted to the following uses and purposes:

For improving Cape Fear river, in the State of North Carolina, $30,000.
 For improving Appalachicola river, Louisiana, $15,000.
 For improving the raft region, Red river, $30,000.
 For improving Mobile harbor, Alabama, $30,000.
 For improving Milneburg harbor, Louisiana, $15,000.
 For removing obstructions at Bayou La Fouché, $15,000.
 For improvement on Keedy Island, Delaware, $30,000.
 For improvement on White river, Missouri, and Arkansas, $20,000.
 For improvement on New harbor, New Jersey, $40,000.
 For preserving and repairing Chicago harbor, Illinois, $50,000.
 For preserving and repairing Racine harbor, Illinois, $18,000.
 For preserving and repairing Milwaukee harbor, Illinois, $40,341.
 For preserving and repairing St. Joseph's harbor, Michigan, $25,000.
 For preserving and repairing Clinton River harbor, Michigan, $15,000.
 For preserving and repairing Monroe harbor, Michigan, $13,857.
 For preserving and repairing Sandusky harbor, Ohio, $15,000.
 For preserving and repairing Conest harbor, Ohio, $15,000.
 For preserving and repairing Huron harbor, Ohio, $15,000.
 For preserving and repairing Black River harbor, Ohio, $15,000.
 For preserving and repairing Cleveland harbor, Ohio, $40,000.
 For preserving and repairing Fairport harbor, Ohio, $15,000.
 For preserving and repairing Erie harbor, Pennsylvania, $8,638.
 For preserving and repairing Buffalo harbor, New York, $27,679.
 For repairs on the harbor of Genesee, New York, $41,052.
 For repairs on the harbor of Sodus, New York, $20,000.
 For repairs on the harbor of Oswego, New York, $35,000.
 For repairs on the harbor of Burlington, Vermont, $14,000.
 For repairs on the harbor of Oak Orchard, New York, $9,736 43.
 For repairs on the harbor of Whitehall, New York, $10,000.
 For improving Hudson river, New York, $75,000.
 For improving Galena river, Illinois, $25,000.
 For improving Waukauken river, Illinois, $25,000.
 For improving Illinois river, $35,000.
 For improving St. Clair flats, $100,000.
 For improving Plymouth harbor, Massachusetts, $20,000.
 For improving Cape Cod, Massachusetts, $10,000.
 For improving Great Wood Hole, Massachusetts, $2,166.
 For improving New Bedford, Massachusetts, $10,000.
 For improving Boston harbor, Massachusetts, $50,000.
 For improving the navigation of the Ohio, Mississippi, and Missouri rivers, by removing snags and sawyers from the same, $150,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. This is not an appropriation bill; and I submit that that amendment is not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. ANDREWS. May I inquire upon what grounds?

The CHAIRMAN. This is a bill to raise money, not to appropriate it. The amendment is, therefore, not germane to the bill, and is out of order.

Mr. ANDREWS. If the amendment should be adopted, that difficulty would be obviated. But the bill sets forth that the money shall be appropriated and paid out for the expenses of the public service; and there are no greater necessities of the public service than these.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is not debatable. The Chair rules the amendment out of order.

Mr. SICKLES. I move to strike out "fifteen millions," in the first line of the bill, and to insert "twenty millions."

Mr. Chairman, I listened, I must say, with some surprise to the somewhat remarkable speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURLINGAME] in reference to the pending relations between this country and England. I am aware that I am restricted to five minutes in any reply that I may attempt.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I rise to a question of order. I will remark that I would gladly hear the gentleman from New York, for I concur with him in the view he takes of this question; but it is not in order to answer the speech of the gentleman from Massachusetts on an amendment to this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York must confine himself to his amendment.

Mr. SICKLES. I propose to confine my remarks, during the five minutes to which I am restricted, to the amendment I have offered. I presume it is competent for me to show the condition in which the Treasury will be found in case the advice of the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. BURLINGAME] be followed, or in case some of the fearful contingencies which are foreseen by my friend from Massachusetts should happen. That gentleman made a speech, which, if its views be adopted, renders necessary not only a loan of $15,000,000 but of $100,000,000. His speech seemed to be about equally divided between the shafts which he hurled at the Administration and the laurels which he placed at the feet of Great Britain for her conduct with reference to her difficulties with Naples, China, France, and other Powers; and I propose very briefly to state, without going into an argument, wherein he has done injustice to the manner in which this grave question has been dealt with by the Administration.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. If this thing is to be opened up, and gone into by the gentleman from New York, the debate may last for an hour. I make the point that the gentleman's remarks are not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Pennsylvania. I take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

The committee was divided; and there were—ayes eighty, noes not counted.

So the decision of the Chair was sustained.

Mr. SICKLES. The gentleman from Massachusetts complains that, while the President and this House recommend proceedings against Paraguay for the insults which she has put upon our citizens, nothing has been done in reference to the insults which we have received from England. Sir, I would beg to remind the gentleman that, while he voted for the expedition against Paraguay, he has not voted for one of the appropriations that would enable the President to make a successful stand against the right of search and visitation as asserted by Great Britain.

I desire further to state, Mr. Chairman, that the Administration has done its whole duty in this question. It has not gone to war, for it had not the authority under the Constitution to go to war, and Congress has not delegated any portion of its authority, or any specific authority, to the President in reference to this question. But, sir, the President has promptly called upon Great Britain to disavow the acts of her squadron in the Gulf. We are now only waiting for the response to that demand. The Secretary of the Navy has sent a fleet into the Gulf strong enough to drive the British squadron from those waters in case Great Britain persists in asserting and practicing the right of visitation and search. I have obtained, from an official source, a statement of the force now under orders in the Gulf to protect our merchant vessels from this species of encroachment. It is as follows:

Colorado, 46 guns—2 10-inch pivot guns, 24 9-inch, and 14 8-inch.
 Wabash, 40 guns—2 10-inch pivot guns, 24 9-inch, and 14 8-inch.
 Macedonian, 23 guns—2 10-inch pivot guns, 16 8-inch, and 4 32-pounders.
 Constellation, 23 guns—2 10-inch pivot guns, 16 8-inch, and 4 32-pounders.
 Saratoga, 20 guns—6 8-inch, and 14 32-pounders.
 Jamestown, 22 guns—6 8-inch, and 16 32-pounders.
 Plymouth, 9 guns—1 11-inch, 4 9-inch, 4 8-inch, and 2 24-pounders, and 4 12-pound howitzers.
 Dolphin, 6 guns—6 32-pounders and 1 heavy howitzer.
 Water Witch, 3 guns—1 24-pounder, 2 12-pounders, and 3 howitzers.
 Despatch, 2 guns—2 32-pounders.
 Arctic, 2 guns—2 32-pounders.
 Fulton, 5 guns—4 32-pounders and 1 8-inch pivot gun.
 Savannah, 40 guns—2 10-inch pivot guns, 24 9-inch, and 14 8-inch.

In all, two hundred and thirty-three guns. And, sir, the venerable Secretary of State, also impugned by the gentleman from Massachusetts as lukewarm and laggard upon this question, has shown himself consistent with the bold and statesmanlike attitude that he has always occupied in reference to it, by sending at once to every port on our Atlantic coast for official information in regard to each and every one of these offenses on the part of English cruisers; and, as the correspondence upon our tables shows, he has promptly dispatched these official accounts to our envoy at London, with instructions to demand immediate reparation for the past, and the most certain guarantees against any repetition of these offenses in future.

The gentleman from Massachusetts says that the Administration proposes to negotiate—to talk, and not to act. Not a word about negotiation has been uttered or written by the President or the Secretary of State, either to the British Minister at Washington or to Mr. Dallas at London. So far as our diplomatic action is concerned, it looks only to ascertain whether the conduct of the British officers is approved or disapproved by their Government. When this is known the question will be ready for the action of Congress, in case Great Britain persists in enforcing her assumed right of visitation or search. In the mean time, protection to our vessels is the object of the Secretary of the Navy, and this is the order which has been given to our squadron in the Gulf. And I venture to say that the position of this Government has been so long and so definitely taken, and will be so steadfastly adhered to by the President, upon this question, that the Government and people of Great Britain will at once see that they have but one alternative—the immediate abandonment of this practice and an ample reparation for recent injuries—or else a war with this country for freedom and equality on the seas. Several days ago the Committee on Foreign Relations instructed me to make a report, embodying their views upon this subject, and I have repeatedly, but in vain, sought to get the floor to report the bill which that committee has matured, and which, in my judgment, properly places the whole matter in the hands of the President, with ample means and power to act as circumstances may require.

Mr. BLAIR. I ask the gentleman from New York, who has spoken in such laudatory terms of the Secretary of State, whether it was not upon the invitation of that Secretary that the operations against the slave trade were transferred from the other continent to this?

Mr. SICKLES. It was not.

Mr. BLAIR. Then, sir, I have been very much mistaken in my reading of the correspondence between the Secretary and Lord Napier.

Mr. SICKLES. I suppose the gentleman from Missouri refers to the recent correspondence between Lord Napier and General Cass, and to the note of the latter, in which he suggests to Lord Napier that more can be done to restrain the slave trade, by proper measures, at the ports in the Gulf, to prevent the landing of slave cargoes, than by anything that can be done upon the coast of Africa. General Cass, in that letter, recognizes no right of search, no right of visitation, no right of seizure, so far as American vessels are concerned, to be exercised by Great Britain, in the Gulf of Mexico or anywhere else.

Mr. BLAIR. It is stated in the public prints that the British commanders are acting upon the coast of this continent under precisely the same instructions that they have acted under upon the coast of Africa. And I consider that acting under instructions to which no objection whatever was before taken by our Government, upon the invitation of our Government to transfer their operations to this continent they have come here and done all they have done on the invitation of our own Government. That I consider to be the case made out.

Mr. SICKLES. The gentleman's argument implies that we have recognized the right of Great Britain to visit, search, and detain our vessels upon the coast of Africa. It is not so.

Mr. BLAIR. No, sir; the gentleman cannot consume my time in misrepresenting my views. I have not recognized the right of Great Britain to search or to detain our vessels in any remarks I have made.

Mr. SICKLES. I said that the gentleman's argument implies that this Government has recognized the right of Great Britain to search our vessels. This right we have never conceded to any Power upon any sea.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I rise to a question of order. The amendment is to strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty;" and the gentleman must confine his remarks to that amendment.

Mr. BLAIR. I hope that what is made sauce for the goose will be made sauce for the gander.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. Exactly; I want to make sauce for both goose and gander. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair gives notice that in future he will sustain such points of order. [Laughter.]

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. That is neither sauce for the goose nor for the gander.

Mr. BLAIR. I wish simply, now, before taking my seat, to reply to the statement of the gentleman from New York, who says that my remarks implied that the Government of the United States had admitted the claim of Great Britain to the right to search and detain our vessels. On the contrary, my remark was that they had invited the same practice upon this coast that had been practiced upon the African coast.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SICKLES, by unanimous consent, withdrew his amendment.

Mr. EDIE. With a view of terminating this debate, I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask the gentleman to allow me first to offer an amendment.

Mr. EDIE. I will withdraw my motion for the purpose of admitting the gentleman's amendment.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer the following amendment:

Section one, line six, strike out "fifteen," and insert "fifty," and in line eight, after the word "require," insert the following:

Twenty millions of which shall be used only in the payment of Treasury notes, issued under authority of the act of December 23, 1857.

The effect will be simply this: it will give authority to loan $50,000,000 instead of $15,000,000, and will apply $20,000,000 of the loan so made only to the payment of Treasury notes already issued, whenever they are matured.

I offer the amendment in good faith; and in the remarks I shall make I shall confine myself to it. I believe that every dollar of the $30,000,000 which will remain after paying the Treasury notes will be required for the ordinary expenses of the Government, between this time and the 1st of January next; at all events, it will be needed as early as February. It is not statesmanlike to trifle with the present state of the finances. I have not one word to say as to whose fault has produced this state of things. I propose to meet the difficulty as we find it; and I assert that that amount of money has got to be borrowed between this and the 1st of February, or the honor of our Government will be tarnished. It is vain for us to sit here discussing the question whether the present condition of our Government will require the amount of just $19,000,000, or just $25,000,000, or $29,000,000, when we know that it will require $30,000,000 between this and January.

Besides that, if we now meet this question like men, and provide for redeeming the Treasury notes which have been issued when they become due, the credit of the Government will be sustained, and we can borrow upon better terms than we could if we only sit here and talk about this matter in this slipshod manner, without taking positive action. This is a more favorable time for borrowing money than we have seen for twenty years, or shall see for twenty years to come. The Government will not be obliged to borrow all this amount unless they want it. If they do borrow the whole, they cannot expend one dollar except in conformity to appropriations made by us. We give no dangerous power in any way.

Besides that, I am unwilling that this bill should go to the Senate to be amended by them. They have no right to originate a loan bill. They did assume the power to get up a $15,000,000 loan bill, but the Committee of Ways and Means of this House, instead of taking up that bill, introduced one of their own. And yet it is now proposed by the chairman of that committee to send this bill over there, knowing that the amount is not sufficient, leaving them to increase it, and in effect to originate such a bill.

I hope the amendment will be adopted, and allow the discussion of the question as to what cause has produced the necessity to go over to a more appropriate time. It will be a matter of economy to take this bill by the horns, instead of dragging along by its tail any longer. Let us provide for redeeming these Treasury notes. Away with these rags, and let us go into the market upon a basis on which you can get money upon terms honorable to us.

Mr. CLEMENS. I have esteemed it my duty, since the commencement of this Congress, as a member of the Democratic party, to vote against many appropriation bills proposed to this House; and now, as a member of the same party, I am willing to vote for a loan, if necessary, of $50,000,000, to meet the accruing liabilities of the Government. I saw, some time ago, a course of legislation inaugurated here, by the passage of private bills and gratuities for many obnoxious purposes, useless printing among the rest, in the face of a bankrupt Treasury, by which we would be driven to the condition in which we now find ourselves. I am willing to accord to the gentleman from Michigan, as far as I am concerned, full praise for the patriotism and magnanimity which he has shown in meeting the severe ordeal through which we are compelled to pass. If we have to pay the money estimated before the end of the fiscal year, I am willing to give the authority of this House now to borrow it. We may as well do it now as at the next session of Congress. If there is no other reason than that stated by the gentleman from Michigan in his amendment, it is sufficient, upon my part, to say that the money on Treasury notes was contracted for at four and five per cent. It is evidently bad policy, therefore, to contract a loan at six per cent. now to pay off the Treasury notes outstanding, the money on which was obtained at between four and five per cent.

I am willing to leave this money, borrowed by the pending bill, in the hands of the Government, and let it use its discretion in the redemption of these Treasury notes. Why is it necessary to hamper the hands of the Government, and say that these outstanding debts, contracted by Treasury notes at reduced rates of interest, must be met out of this loan at increased rates of interest? Who can tell the exigencies to which this Government may be driven within the next few months? We are leaving here without knowing the complications of our foreign relations. A dark and heavy cloud hangs even now on the edge of the horizon. [Laughter, and shouts of "No, no!"] Gentlemen may cry "no, no," and talk of it lightly.

"He jests at wounds who never felt a scar."

Mr. Chairman, I had no lot or part in contracting the existing debt. You have, in effect, authorized a debt to Gales & Seaton of $850,000, although, at present, limited to $340,000. The responsibility of that does not belong to me. You have contracted debts here for purposes not connected with the ordinary expenses of the Government, amounting to seven or eight million dollars, against my vote.

"Shake not thy gory locks at me;
Thou canst not say I did it."

But I am willing to come forward now, in a spirit of magnanimity, and vote you $50,000,000 to meet your liabilities. I can go before the people and say that I voted against these appropriations; that they did not meet my concurrence, and that I could not conscientiously give them my support; but that, as a member of the Democratic party, when I was called upon to decide whether I would give my vote for maintaining the principles of that party, maintaining the President of my choice by supporting the Government in his hands, I was willing to grant fifty or one hundred million dollars if necessary, but not one cent, unjustly, for tribute to party presses, or the bounty of the horse-leech to pauper partisans.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move that the committee do now rise, for the purpose of closing the five-minute debate.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARKSDALE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the state of the Union generally, and particularly House bill (No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding $15,000,000, and had come to no conclusion thereon.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to suspend the rule which allows five minutes debate on the loan bill.

Mr. MILLSON. I have seen that done once, and I never want to see it done again. I object.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Then I move to suspend the rules so as to enable me to offer a resolution suspending the rule allowing five minutes debate on House bill No. 582.

Mr. MAYNARD. Inasmuch as there are several gentlemen around me (I am not on the list) who desire to say something on this bill, I ask the gentleman from Illinois to modify his motion so as to terminate the five-minute debate in an hour, or half an hour.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois, declined to accept the modification.

Tellers were called for, and ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and BUFFINTON were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 100, noes 38.

Mr. FLORENCE. I demand the yeas and nays, and protest against this system of legislation. I call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered; and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

So (two thirds voting in the affirmative) the rules were suspended.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now move a resolution suspending the five-minute debate on House bill No. 582, in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the rules be suspended, and the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BARKSDALE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of the LOAN BILL.

The question was then taken on Mr. HOWARD's amendment; and it was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to strike out the enacting clause of the bill. It is not worth while to vote on amendments which we cannot explain.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a question of order. I would inquire if the motion is to strike out the enacting clause of the bill?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the motion.

Mr. MILLSON. Will the Chair, if the motion prevails, report to the House that the committee has stricken out the enacting clause?

The CHAIRMAN. If the motion prevails, the bill will be reported to the House with the recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out.

Mr. MILLSON. Is that the motion of my colleague?

The CHAIRMAN. That is the effect of it.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not want to go through this farce.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia, demanded tellers on Mr. LETCHER's motion.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. SMITH of Tennessee and BUFFINTON, were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 68, noes 58.

So Mr. LETCHER's motion was agreed to.

Mr. KEITT moved that the committee do now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARKSDALE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the bill of the House to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000, and had directed him to report the same back to the House with a recommendation that the enacting clause of the bill be stricken out.

Mr. MILLSON. I rise to a question of order on the reception of the report of the committee, and I ask that the 131st and 132d rules may be read.

The Clerk read the rules, as follows:

"131. No motion or proposition for a tax or charge upon the people shall be discussed the day on which it is made or offered; and every such proposition shall receive its first discussion in a Committee of the Whole House.

"132. No sum or quantum of tax or duty, voted by a Committee of the Whole House, shall be increased in the House until the motion or proposition for such increase shall be first discussed and voted in a Committee of the Whole House; and so in respect to the time of its continuance."

Mr. MILLSON. My point of order is, that it is not competent for the committee to make such a report as a recommendation that the enacting clause be stricken out, the bill having had no consideration or discussion in Committee of the Whole.

[A message was received from the President, informing the House that he had approved and signed a bill granting a pension to Beriah Wright, of New York.]

The SPEAKER. The fact appears, officially, from a former report made from the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that the bill has been considered and discussed. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Virginia. The Chair examined the rule, having some doubt as to whether the proposition to strike out the enacting clause could be entertained. The Chair finds, within six or seven days after this rule was adopted, that the same course was pursued to get a bill out of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union into the House; and that the same thing was done several times afterwards. So that the members who made the rule seemed to understand that it was as well applicable to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union as to the House.

Mr. MILLSON. As this question may be important in the future history of the country, I feel it to be my duty to take an appeal from the decision of the Chair.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to lay the appeal upon the table.

The motion was agreed to.

The Chairman of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union then made his report as above stated.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If the recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union be voted down, will not the question then come up on the engrossment and third reading of the bill?

The SPEAKER. It will.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I call for the previous question.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means to let me offer an amendment before he moves the previous question.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I prefer that we should vote on the naked bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The recommendation of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to strike out the enacting words was rejected.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES obtained the floor.

Mr. HOWARD. I ask my colleague on the Committee of Ways and Means to let me offer an amendment.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. If my colleague proposes to strike out "fifteen," and insert "thirty" without the latter provision which he offered in committee, I will yield to him.

The SPEAKER. The Chair could not entertain a proposition to increase the amount. It would have first, under the rule, to be considered in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

Mr. HOWARD. My amendment is the same as adopted in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and cut off by the motion to strike out the enacting words.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I must call the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NAVY APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. WINSLOW. I submit the following report from the committee of conference on the Navy appropriation bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill of the House (No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, have met, and after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House do recede from their disagreement to the tenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to said amendment with an amendment, as follows: Insert the word "and" between the words "clerks" and "messengers" and strike out the words "and watchmen," in the fourth line.

That the House do recede from their amendment to the fourteenth amendment of the Senate, and agree to said amendment with an amendment, as follows: Strike out the word "five," in the third line, and insert the word "seven."

J. A. PEARCE,

L. F. S. FOSTER,

JOHN R. THOMSON,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

WARREN WINSLOW,

E. B. WASHBURN,

W. S. GROESBECK,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. WINSLOW. Mr. Speaker, there were but two points left in contest between the two Houses. Those were the tenth and fourteenth amendments, the Senate having receded from the previous amendment in which this House did not concur. The tenth amendment allowed certain pay to the clerks of the navy-yard and marine barracks. By the act of April 22, 1854, the clerks at the navy-yard and marine barracks in this city were allowed twenty per cent. addition to their then compensation. By the act of August 5, 1854, the messengers at the navy-yard and marine barracks were included and allowed the same twenty per cent. additional compensation. By inadvertence on the part of the bureau in making the annual estimates, the amount of money necessary to cover this increased compensation was omitted. The amendment of the Senate only proposes to do what the House and the Senate ought to have done in the year 1856—it appropriates the money which, by inadvertence, was omitted to be appropriated on that occasion. But the Senate went further than the act of 1854, and, in addition to the clerks and messengers, included watchmen at the navy-yard and marine barracks. Neither of the acts of 1854 included watchmen, and therefore the managers on the part of the House thought it was not right to pay these watchmen two or three years back extra pay. The Senate agreed to strike out the word "watchmen," and leave the section confined to clerks and messengers. It became necessary for the grammatical construction of the sentence to insert the word "and" between "clerks" and "messengers."

The next point of contest was in reference to the increase of the Navy. The Senate had put upon the bill, as it passed the House, an amendment providing for an increase of the Navy, by adding thereto five sloops of a draught not exceeding fourteen feet. The House amended the Senate amendment by striking out "five" and inserting "ten." The committee of conference, both on the part of the House and the Senate, unanimously concur in recommending that the House recede from its amendment, striking out "five" and inserting "ten," and agree to the Senate amendment with an amendment striking out "five" and inserting "seven."

That is the whole of it. I demand the previous question.

Mr. BARKSDALE. I hope the House will not second the demand for the previous question. For one, I am anxious to debate this matter further.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. KUNKEL, of Maryland. I ask the yeas and nays upon concurring in the report.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report was concurred in.

Mr. DAVIDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL.

Mr. COMINS asked the unanimous consent of the House to discharge the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union from the further consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 550) making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes, and that it be now put upon its passage.

Mr. LETCHER. Does not that bill make an appropriation, and has it been considered in Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union at all yet?

Mr. RUFFIN. Will that bill be subject to amendment at all unless it is sent to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union?

Mr. STANTON. Certainly not.

Mr. RUFFIN. There are many amendments which should be made to that bill; and it is wrong for a bill of that importance to be considered in the House, where it cannot be amended.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up this bill.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Before that question is put, I hope the gentleman from Massachusetts will move to close debate upon this bill in five minutes after the committee shall take it up for consideration.

Mr. COMINS. I make that motion.

Mr. STANTON. Has the bill ever been considered in committee at all?

The SPEAKER. It has not.

Mr. STANTON. Is that motion to close debate in order?

The SPEAKER. It is not if it is objected to. Mr. COMINS. Then I move to suspend the rules to enable me to introduce a motion to close debate.

The rules were suspended, (two thirds voting in favor thereof.)

The motion to close debate was then agreed to.

Mr. KEITT. I now move that the committee take a recess until six o'clock.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COMINS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union.

GEORGIANA M. LEWIS.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to appeal to the gentleman from Massachusetts to give way to me for a moment. I shall be compelled to be absent from the House all the remainder of the day upon the Committee on Enrolled Bills, and I desire to ask the House to take up a small bill.

Mr. COMINS. I will yield to the gentleman a moment.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take from the Speaker's table and put upon its passage Senate bill (No. 424) for the relief of Georgiana M. Lewis.

No objection being made, the bill was taken up for consideration.

The bill provides for the payment to Georgiana M. Lewis of the five years' half pay to which her husband would have been entitled if living.

The bill was ordered to be read a third time.

It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. DAVIDSON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. COMINS. I now renew my motion to go into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, for the purpose of taking up the light-house bill.

Mr. KEITT. How long will it take to dispose of this bill?

Mr. COMINS. It will not take more than thirty minutes to consider it; and it is necessary to have it disposed of at once and sent to the Senate.

The question was taken on Mr. COMINS's motion; and it was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BARKSDALE in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. No. 550) making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes.

Mr. COMINS. I do not propose to occupy the full time to which those who report bills from committees are entitled. Fifteen or twenty minutes will answer my purpose. In calling up the light-house appropriation bill for the consideration of the Committee of the Whole, I wish, first, to acknowledge my indebtedness to the Light-House department for its uniform courtesy in extending every facility within its power to enable the Committee on Commerce to come to correct conclusions upon the numerous petitions which have been submitted for their consideration. Books, maps, charts, and an extensive official correspondence between the department and its agents, have been at our command.

With the establishment of the Light-House Board, in 1852, a new impulse was given to this branch of the public service. A system was introduced and is being perfected, which will, in a short time, place the United States at the head of maritime nations in respect to light-house illumination. A well organized, efficient, and systematic plan of construction, and improved system of illumination, inspection, and superintendence of lights, has been introduced. Localities are being selected with greater care. Towers and keepers' dwellings are being constructed with especial reference to durability, safety, and convenience. The introduction of the Fresnel, or lens-illuminating apparatus, one of the most valuable inventions developed by science and mechanic art, and which has for many years been in use in France and England, is an improvement upon the old and imperfect common lamp and reflector lights, which is yet far from being fully appreciated in this country.

In 1838 Congress directed the Secretary of the Treasury to import certain lens apparatus to test the question of comparative economy and efficiency of the lens and reflector apparatus. The Secretary accordingly purchased one first and one second order lens of the Fresnel system, which were placed on the towers of Navesink light-station, at the entrance of the bay of New York. In 1848-49, a third order Fresnel lens was purchased for Brandywine shoal light, and at about the same time a fourth order apparatus of the same kind was purchased for another light-house. Both were erected under the superintendence of the War Department. In 1849 Congress directed that another important sea-coast light should be built and fitted with the Fresnel apparatus. In 1851 Congress directed that in all new light-houses, and in light-houses to be refitted with new illuminating apparatus, the Fresnel system should be adopted if, in the opinion of the Secretary of the Treasury, the public interest would be subserved thereby.

The matter was in this state when the Light-House Board was organized in 1852; previous to which five lens lights had been erected at four light stations. At this time three hundred and twenty-five light-houses were in existence on the Atlantic, Gulf, and lake coasts. There were none at this time on the Pacific. In November, 1857, there were, on the Atlantic, Gulf, and lake coasts, five hundred and thirty-three light stations, and fifteen on the Pacific which have been erected since 1852; in all five hundred and forty-eight. Of this number all have been fitted and furnished with the lens light except six, which will, at an early day, be renovated, and fitted with the improved apparatus, under the direction of the Light-House Board, and for which appropriations have been asked.

The expense of renovating and refitting so many old light-houses with the Fresnel improvement has been large, but it has been an expenditure of the public money which meets the approbation of all practical and scientific men. The average first cost of the lens apparatus is about thirteen hundred and fifty dollars for each light-house on the coast of the United States. They are nearly indestructible, and the annual cost for repairs is trifling. The average first cost of the reflector apparatus, for each light, is $1,200. The reflectors require renewal at the end of six or seven years, and the annual cost for repairs is large, amounting to a replacement of the apparatus every ten years. But the comparisons of economy, as between the two systems, should not rest upon first cost and repairs. A careful examination of official statements, made both in this country and in Europe, prove that the value of the lens system is eight times as great as that of the reflector system, taking into consideration economy of maintenance and quantity of light produced.

The quantity of oil estimated for the supply of three hundred and thirty-one light-houses in 1853, was one hundred and eight thousand two hundred and fifty-five gallons. The quantity estimated for in 1857, to supply the five hundred and fifty-six lights now in existence, is forty-eight thousand one hundred and fifty gallons—sixty thousand one hundred and five gallons less than that estimated for three hundred and thirty-one lights in 1853, and one hundred and seventy-four thousand two hundred and fifty gallons less than the amount which would have been required for the whole number now in operation, had the old reflector system remained in force. The expense per annum for the item of oil, therefore, has been diminished from $278,000—which would have been the cost of oil for five hundred and fifty-six lights, at $1.60 per gallon—to $77,040, the cost estimated for the next fiscal year; showing an annual saving of over two hundred thousand dollars in that item alone. The cost of cleaning material, wicks, chimneys, &c., has been reduced in a corresponding degree.

I have been thus particular to give items of expenditure, both with regard to construction, refitting with the lens apparatus, and supplies, to disabuse the public mind relative to increased expenditure in the Light-House department under the superintendence of the Light-House Board.

The United States may well take pride in being one of the first among the maritime nations of the world in establishing a free system of light-house illumination. There are no data to determine what is the exact light-due charged per ton in England; it varies according to the port entered, and the lights passed. It is large, however, and a charge that should not be put upon the tonnage of a nation that exhibits lights free to all who navigate the seas. France, Russia, the United States, and some of the South American Republics, do not charge light dues.

There is no public structure in the United States which will more contribute to the credit and pride of the nation than the tower at Minot's ledge, when it shall have been completed. This work is progressing steadily and well. Two thirds of the stone cutting is finished, and the foundation on the rock only needs a few more stones to be completed. When the first course is laid, the difficulties of the work will be virtually overcome. The funds available for this work will suffice to carry it through the next fiscal year, and no appropriation is asked for its prosecution at this time. The work will, if no unforeseen disaster occur, be finished in the season of 1860.

There is sufficient evidence before the committee, that several towers at some of the most important light stations should be rebuilt at an early day—among which are the Boston light, on the Little Brewster, at the entrance of the Boston harbor; the two towers on Thatcher's Island, Cape Ann; the Navesink, at the entrance of New York bay; Cape Henry, Virginia; and Cape Canaveral light-house, Florida.

A strict regard to that economy, suggested by the present condition of the Treasury, has induced the Committee on Commerce to confine the appropriations contained in the bill now under consideration, to the rebuilding of Thatcher's Island light-house, Cape Canaveral, Florida, and an additional appropriation for the construction of Southwest Pass light-house, at the mouth of the Mississippi, a work appropriated for in 1854, and very important to the commerce of the whole country; but which has not been commenced on account of the insufficiency of the amount appropriated. These works have all been estimated for in detail, as may be seen by consulting the estimates of appropriations for 1858-59.

Mr. Chairman, in taking charge of the light-house appropriation bills for the Thirty-Fourth and Thirty-Fifth Congresses, I have had an opportunity to learn much of the present, and to possess myself of much valuable information relative to the future commercial wants of the whole Union. And what study can be more interesting? In examining the basis and merits of the numerous memorials and communications which have been placed in my hands, I have endeavored to do my duty. The wants of the southern coast, the lakes of the North and West, the Gulf, and of the far Pacific, have been of equal interest to me. To hear gentlemen upon this floor speak of the commerce of the North, and the commerce of the South, is always painful to me. With five million tons of shipping owned in all sections of the nation, and an internal commerce of a far greater amount, we should never say the commerce of the North, the commerce of the South, or the commerce of the West, but the commerce of our country.

I may be at fault, but in my judgment, appropriations of this nature are eminently in keeping with the principles upon which the institutions of our country are founded, and the true spirit which animates the patriotic and the wise. The examination of these questions, and all questions which tend to a closer union of nations, and contribute to the harmony of the world, are not only in accordance with my own feelings, but in unison with the spirit of peace which pervade the people of my State, and I trust of the Union. Sir, we want not war, but peace; not only peace at home, but peace throughout the world. Whilst we talk about the value of the union of the States, let us not undervalue the union of nations. The honor of our country and our country's flag must be maintained; but, sir, it must be for others to calculate the material value of war. If, finally, we must have war, let it not be upon our impulses, but upon the convictions of statesmen. I beg pardon for this digression. I will now call the attention of the committee directly to the bill before us.

Perhaps, Mr. Chairman, I feel more than an ordinary interest in the passage of the pending bill, and the objects to which it applies, from the fact that it is the last time these appropriations will be under my charge. I shall not again be a candidate for membership of this House.

I now move that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and that it be read by sections for amendment.

The first reading of the bill was dispensed with.

The bill was then read by sections for amendment.

Mr. COMINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer the following amendment:

For repairing and securing the pier connected with the light house at Oat-ago, New York, so as to prevent the destruction of said light-house, $10,000.

Mr. COX. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts what is the amount of appropriations required by this bill?

Mr. COMINS. About three hundred thousand dollars.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. OLIN. I offer the following amendment:

After amendment No. 1, insert:

For two range lights, to be placed on the Hudson river between Troy and Albany, $1,000.

To every one familiar with the navigation of the Hudson river, it will be known that the channel between the cities of Troy and Albany is narrower, and more difficult of navigation, than any other portion of the river; that a larger amount of produce is floated over the Hudson river between these two points than over any other portion of the navigable waters of the United States. This appropriation is rendered necessary by reason of the narrowness of the channel, and the difficulties of navigation in that portion of the river. There are more goods lost annually by reason of this difficulty in the navigation of the Hudson, between these two points, than would support this whole light-house system on the Hudson river. This amendment simply asks for an appropriation of $1,000 to establish two lights. The merchants and navigators of that river would esteem it a great favor if Congress would grant that small pitance.

Mr. COMINS. This amendment was before the Committee on Commerce. It was deemed inconsistent with the principles upon which the bill is founded. On examination it was found that it would be just as consistent to place lights on every other river in the country within two or three miles of each other, as upon the river between Albany and Troy; and the committee did not think it expedient to be put in the bill.

The question was taken on Mr. OLIN's amendment, and it was rejected.

THE CONGRESSIONAL GLOBE.

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1st Session.

TUESDAY, JUNE 15, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 190.

Mr. HOWARD. I offer the following amendment:

That $5,000 be, and the same is hereby appropriated, to repair the light-house pier at Vermillion, Ohio.

I want simply to state that a recent storm has broken the passage way by which they get to the light-house. The light-house cannot be kept in operation except by boats unless this appropriation is granted. There was no time to place it before the Light-House Board, as it is the result of recent storms.

The question was taken on Mr. Howard's amendment, and it was agreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I offer the following amendment:

For lighting up and buoying the snags in the Mississippi river, $100,000.

The CHAIRMAN. That amendment seems clearly out of order.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I trust that it may be discussed.

The CHAIRMAN. It is clearly out of order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Do I understand the Chair to decide that it is not in order to offer such an amendment when there is a proposition in this bill to light up the St. Lawrence river?

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. BLISS. I offer the following amendment:

For repairs upon the piers and works for the protection of the light-house just erected at the mouth of Black river, upon Lake Erie, Ohio, $10,000.

Last year we appropriated money to build this light-house, and also to build the works to connect it with the main land. Most of the light-houses upon the shores of Lake Erie are placed out in the lake, and it is necessary that they should be connected with the main land. This light-house has been built, and the wall connecting it with the main land has been built, but the pier opposite to it is old and dilapidated, and at the commencement of the winter storms a portion of it was swept away, so that the work as it now stands is exposed upon both sides to the storms of the lake; and I am informed by Mr. Whipple, who is the engineer of the work, that there is imminent danger, unless the pier be repaired, that the whole thing will be swept into the lake in a short time, and hence I offer this amendment.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I want to call the attention of the committee to one thing. We have a Light-House Board, and all these matters have been examined by that board, and also by the Committee on Commerce, and it cannot be expected that all these amendments which gentlemen bring forward here can be put in the bill upon the mere representation of members.

From the statement made by the gentleman from Michigan, [Mr. Howard], in regard to the recent disaster to the light-house at Vermillion, I did not oppose that amendment, but I am opposed to this method of bringing in amendments at the eleventh hour.

Mr. BLISS. The Light-House Board pay no attention except to the construction of light-houses.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. It is their duty to examine and report not only in relation to the construction of light-houses, but also in relation to all necessary repairs.

The amendment was rejected.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the following paragraph:

"Michigan.—For a light-house on the north point of the peninsula dividing Grand Traverse bay, $6,000."

I want to ask the gentleman who reported this bill whether a light-house has been built upon the north point of the peninsula dividing Grand Traverse bay.

It will be observed that this bill provides for the mode of condemning real estate for light-house purposes; it proposes to carry all the appropriations that may now be made beyond the time when they would be subsisting according to law, so as to prevent them from reverting to the Treasury, in order to keep up these light-house appropriations. Now I want to know how many of these appropriations are for the rebuilding or repair of light-houses heretofore constructed by law, and how far this bill proposes to extend the system, and to create new light-houses at new points? For although I am in a small minority here, still I want it to be understood by the country that, while the voice of the Congress of the United States is determinedly set against any improvement of the western rivers and the channels of commerce of the great interior, you give any sort of extension, at the instance of any sort of a committee, to anything that is intended for the benefit of the sea-board or lake commerce.

Mr. COMINS. In reply to the gentleman from Kentucky, I will say that the light-house provided for in this paragraph, at the entrance of Grand Traverse bay, was inserted upon evidence in the possession of the committee, and is required by the increasing commerce at that point.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Then this light-house has not been provided for heretofore. The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I move to strike out the next item, which is as follows:

"For a light-house on the east side of Middle Island harbor, West Marquette, $5,000."

I shall move to strike out each particular item in the bill, in order that we may understand, and the country may understand, what we are about. I ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if this light-house has been provided for by law?

Mr. COMINS. This bill itself, as the gentleman from Kentucky will see, if he will read it through, is to be the law upon which all the appropriations made by it are to be based.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. PALMER. I offer the following amendment:

For constructing a light-house on the breakwater in the harbor at Plattsburg, New York, $5,900.

I do not wish to debate it, but I hope it will be adopted.

Mr. COMINS. We have passed that section of the bill relating to New York, and the amendment is, therefore, not in order.

The CHAIRMAN. It is not in order.

The following paragraph of the bill was then read:

"Wisconsin.—For a light-house on Green Island, or on one of the adjacent islands, Green bay, $8,000."

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I would ask the gentleman from Massachusetts if that is provided for by law?

Mr. COMINS. As I have before replied to a question of this kind, and as the gentleman has given us to understand that he intends to move to strike out each item in the bill, I think it unnecessary to consume time in answering these questions.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Well, I move to strike out the paragraph.

Mr. LETCHER. I am opposed to that amendment for several reasons, not the least important of which is that I find that Massachusetts gets $81,000, Florida $68,000, and Louisiana $69,000; being a little upwards of $300,000 for those three States out of the $295,000 provided for in this bill. Now, my idea is that as this is a very small amount for Wisconsin—only $6,000—it is well enough, if we are going to pass the bill, not to take what Wisconsin has from her.

Mr. COMINS. I rise to a question of order. We have passed the section of the bill making appropriations for Massachusetts, and it is not therefore in order now to discuss that item. If the gentleman from Virginia had spoken upon it when it was open to discussion, I would have replied to him, and defended that, as I am prepared to defend every item contained in this bill.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not think that the State of Massachusetts has passed through this committee. It may have passed so far as reading is concerned, but there is a time coming when there will be a vote on Massachusetts. I say that I do not understand exactly how this thing is that two or three States are the only ones provided for in a light-house bill. They get all the money, and little amounts are only thrown out here and there to some few other States.

The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. I move to increase the appropriation $1,000, and I do so in order to say a few words in reply to the gentleman from Virginia, who seems to think that these appropriations are made to each State named. I presume that this bill has been made up from estimates of the Treasury Department, under the recommendation of the Light-House Board. They have ascertained, with the means at their command, just what appropriations are necessary at this time. There is the State of Maine, with a coast of one thousand five hundred miles, and not a dollar is appropriated for it. There is on the contrary a provision that some two or three lights shall be discontinued. I do not object, because I presume that the Light-House Board and the Committee on Commerce are informed on the subject, and know where lights are wanted, and where they need repair; and it is for the interest of the commerce of Maine and the commerce of the whole country, that these light-houses shall be maintained where they are needed. These men have been appointed as experts, and as proper and judicious men, and I think that unless it can be shown that they have acted unwisely, we cannot do better than follow their recommendations.

This is a small light-house bill; much smaller, I believe, than any bill reported to this House for the last seven years. I think that we ought to pass it, and send it to the Senate.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Maine tells us that this thing is done by experts; that these recommendations are all made by the Light-House Board, which has been created for the purpose of advising us on the subject. He takes great credit to himself that he goes for this bill, when there is not a dollar for the State of Maine, although she has a large coast. How much the State of Maine has heretofore got, in the way of light-houses, I do not know. I cannot tell without examination; but I tell you this, sir, and I tell the country, that under the pretense of lighting up the approaches of commerce at points at which commerce should be guarded, we are now entering upon a system that will become permanent by reason of the very expenses which we now incur under the auspices of your Light-House Board.

Look at the reports of your Department of the Interior. Look at the reports of the supervising inspectors. See that millions of the property of the people of the interior are sunk year by year upon the great channels of internal commerce. Yet that is passed by without a word. It is considered almost impudence in a Representative from the interior to ask for anything. Sir, I tell gentlemen who live upon the sea-board, or wherever else they may live in the country, that the great interior has heretofore been considered an infant settlement, but, thank God! the time is coming when its representation in these Halls will take this Government into their own hands. Then you men who live upon the sea-board will know the rules that we will put down upon you for the purpose of ameliorating and prospering commerce. I see the dawn ahead. I tell you that you may take from the top of the Blue Ridge to the top of the Rocky Mountains, and dominion dawns over that which is now the great heart of the Republic. We have been oppressed. We have been oppressed long enough. We will stand it no longer. [Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Did not the gentleman vote against the river and harbor bill last year?

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order. The amendment was disagreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I move that the committee rise, with a view of taking a recess. Several MEMBERS objected.

Mr. CLAY withdrew his motion.
The Clerk read the following paragraph of the bill:

"North Carolina.—For a beacon-range light at Ocracoke, $750; and that a light be established at a suitable point at or near Hatteras inlet: Provided, That the light-house at Beacon Island, and the Ocracoke and Nine-foot Shoal light-vessels, be discontinued after the erection and exhibition of the aforesaid beacon light."

Mr. RUFFIN. I move to strike from that paragraph the words "and Nine-foot Shoal light-vessels," and in lieu thereof insert the words "light-vessel."

Mr. Chairman, I have not occupied the attention of the House with a single Buncombe speech, this session. My amendment applies particularly to my district. North Carolina, although with an extensive sea-board and a dangerous coast, has never, during the five years I have been here, been represented upon the Committee on Commerce; and in this bill there is a provision to take from her the little that she has. I do not ask by my amendment that any appropriation shall be made. I merely ask that a certain light-boat stationed in my district years ago, shall be permitted to remain.

The amendment of Mr. RUFFIN was agreed to.

Mr. RUFFIN. I move to add at the end of the following paragraph the words, "at the discretion of the Secretary of the Treasury:"

"For a beacon-range light at Ocracoke, $750; and that a light be established at a suitable point at or near Hatteras inlet: Provided, That the light-house at Beacon Island, and the Ocracoke light-vessel, be discontinued after the erection and exhibition of the aforesaid beacon-lights."

The amendment was agreed-to.

Mr. COMINS. I am instructed by the Committee on Commerce to offer the following amendment, to come in at this place:

Georgia.—For a light-house at the proper point in St. Andrew's sound, and for one in St. Catharine's sound, Georgia, $20,000.

Mr. OLIN. I desire to know of the gentleman from Massachusetts if these lights are recommended by the Light-House Board?

Mr. COMINS. The information that the committee have been able to obtain in relation to St. Andrew's and St. Catharine's Sound, Georgia, is, that the navigation is difficult, and the channels tortuous. The trade and commerce over these waters is considerable, and the committee have recommended the amendment. I hope it will be agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

[A message was here received from the Senate—the committee having informally rose for that purpose—by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of the House to the first amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 406) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue, insisted upon their fourth amendment disagreed to by the House to said bill, and asked a committee of conference thereon.

Also, that the Senate had passed, without amendment, the bill of the House (No. 345) for the relief of Nancy Magill, of Ohio.]

Mr. CLAY. I move to strike out the enacting clause of this bill. I think we are legislating here without due consideration.

The CHAIRMAN. The motion is not debatable.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. COX. I move to strike out, from lines sixty-six to seventy-four, inclusive, as follows:

"Louisiana.—For the commencement and completion of an iron screw-pile light-house at or near the entrance to the channel of the Mississippi river, at the Southwest Pass, authorized August 3, 1854, in addition to the former appropriations as per estimate J, page 103, (general estimate of appropriations for 1858 and 1859,) $69,900."

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. CLAY. I insist upon a count.

Mr. LETCHER. We do not know whether there is a quorum here, and I ask for a count.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that but eleven gentlemen voted in favor of the amendment, which was not one fifth of a quorum.

Mr. LETCHER. The object is to ascertain whether there is a quorum present.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the committee rise for the purpose of taking a recess.

Mr. LETCHER. I call for tellers upon that motion, and then we shall know whether there is a quorum or not present.

Tellers were not ordered.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARKSDALE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had had under consideration the Union generally, and particularly House bill (No. 550) making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed, with amendments, a bill of this House, making appropriations for deficiencies in the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask leave to refer that bill, with the amendments, to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, that it be made a special order, and that all debate thereon shall terminate in five minutes after the committee shall have taken it up for consideration. The motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURNETT. I ask leave to make a report from the committee of conference appointed on the part of the House on House bill (No. 556) making appropriations for the Post Office Department. The committee have been unable to agree on a report, and ask that they be discharged.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that the House insist on its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate, and ask for another committee of conference.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. PHILLIPS, WOOD, and BOYCE, were appointed managers on the part of the House.

RECESS.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the House take a recess till seven o'clock.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I move to amend by substituting half past six o'clock.

Mr. KEITT. Why, it is half past five o'clock now.

Several MEMBERS. "No, no; it is only five minutes past five."

Mr. HOUSTON. While members are disputing about the time, I would like to offer a bill which ought to be passed, for the punishment of forgeries of land warrants, and that class of offenses.

Several members objected.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I withdraw my amendment.

The question was taken on Mr. KEITT's motion, and it was agreed to; there being, on division—ayes 66, nays 55.

So the House (at ten minutes past five o'clock, p. m.) took a recess till seven o'clock, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at seven o'clock, p. m.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled the following bills; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (S. No. 424) for the relief of Georgiana M. Lewis; and

An act (H. R. No. 345) for the relief of Nancy Magill, of Ohio.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL.

Mr. COMINS. I move that the rules be suspended, and that the House resolve itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union on the light-house bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The rules were accordingly suspended; and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. BARKSDALE in the chair,) and resumed the consideration of House bill (No. 550) making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes, the question being on the amendment of Mr. Cox to strike out the following words:

"Louisiana.—For the commencement and completion of an iron screw-pile light-house at or near the entrance to the channel of the Mississippi river, at the Southwest Pass, authorized August 3, 1854, in addition to the former appropriation, as per estimate J, page 103, (general estimate of appropriations for 1858 and 1859,) $69,900."

Mr. COX. I desire to say, that while I did not intend to show any special hostility to this improvement in Louisiana—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I wish to give notice that I shall insist on gentlemen confining themselves to the subject of their amendments.

Mr. COX. The gentleman's notice will come in, perhaps, after I get through, if it has any pertinency to my remarks. I am not opposed to this special improvement that I have moved to strike out, any more than I am to any other item in the bill; but I wish to say in this connection, that I think this whole bill is got up from a sectional point of view. I do not think it is based upon any fair equalization of the expenditures for this purpose throughout the whole country. I have no special complaints to make as to any improvements of that character for the State of Ohio—

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I now insist on my point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to his amendment.

Mr. COX. I notice that this special improvement calls for $69,000 for an iron screw-pile light-house.

A MEMBER. What is that?

Mr. COX. I do not know. I would like to have it explained. This bill, amounting to $290,000, is rushed through so fast, and read so rapidly, that none but a scientific man can get an intelligent idea of it. I do not know why it is that so large an amount is appropriated for this place in Louisiana. I know there are necessities in the West, not only for light-houses, but for other purposes, that have not been provided for by this or other bills; and I am free to say here, as a member from the West, that that part of the Confederacy has not been properly cared for in legislation of this character. When bills are sent to the Senate to improve harbors and rivers that are not for the benefit of the Atlantic sea-board, they are ruled out, and the Atlantic interest is voted up, and carried out with a high hand, even when great complaints are made as to the expenditures of the Treasury, and although we have had complaints about the lankness of the Federal fob. All along, the Democratic party has been held responsible for all these expenses; while gentlemen on the other side have been very prompt to vote them when it suits their localities.

Now, I am willing to bear my share in the burden of every vote here. I voted against the water-works, the Capitol extension, and all schemes of that kind which were not indispensable; and I have moved to strike out this appropriation because I do not believe it to be indispensable at the present time and in the present condition of the Treasury, when we are borrowing money and have no money in the Treasury. I know we want light-houses. We wanted them last year, but no appropriations, as I am informed, of any consequence, were made for light-houses such as these. I voted—if I may depart from the question for a moment for the purpose of returning to it again—for the ten sloops for the purpose of keeping the peace.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I call the gentleman to order.

Mr. COX. I shall take a sheer round, and come into order directly.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman must confine himself to his amendment.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, it is the policy of a good Government—

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. DAVIDSON. Mr. Chairman, I do not like to consume the time of the House, but the gentleman from Ohio has thought it necessary to follow the example of other gentlemen who think it fashionable, or that they may gain something, by pitching into New Orleans. Now, I want to ask you, sir, or any other member of the House, how the light-house is to benefit New Orleans? We have no people that deal in vessels. We are an agricultural people; and if there is commerce there, it is the commerce of you gentlemen in the North, the East, and the West; and the light-house is for the protection of your commerce, your flat-boats, and your vessels. When the gentleman talks about no money having been appropriated for light-houses, it only shows that the gentleman may be very learned in many things, and not in the particular thing he is endeavoring to discuss; for if he will look at the book, he will find that every year appropriations have been made for light-houses; and I am informed that only last year $20,000 was appropriated for Ohio.

Let me tell the gentleman one thing: that I am here representing a portion of the people of Louisiana, and no member of this House has ever heard or ever will hear me, until I become demoted, bring it up as a reproach to the prejudice of any appropriation that it is intended for a particular point. I would just as lief vote for a light-house in Vermont as for one in Florida, or for one in Florida as for one in Vermont. It makes no difference to me. If it is to advance the interests of the country and the prosperity of the nation, I am for it; and whenever the Democratic party fails to indorse measures that are for the advancement of the prosperity of the country, I, sir, a child of that party, will cease to belong to it. I will always be responsible for what is right; and the slogan cry of party or of New Orleans, and Boston, and New York, will never prevent me from doing justice to the commercial and agricultural interests of the country.

Mr. COX. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to its withdrawal.

Mr. GILMAN. I have but one word to say in reply to the gentleman from Ohio.

The CHAIRMAN. Further debate is not in order.

Mr. CLAY. I call for tellers on the amendment, because I do not believe that there is a quorum here.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLEMENS and SPINER were appointed.

The committee divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 4, noes 121.

So the amendment was rejected.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee here informally rose, and a message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate further insist on their amendments disagreed to by the House to the bill of the House (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, and ask a further conference with the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon; and have appointed Mr. PEARCE, Mr. TOOMBS, and Mr. COLLAMER, the committee on their part.

Also, that the Senate had passed bills of the House of the following titles:

A bill (No. 585) to establish certain post roads; and

A bill (No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000; with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 199) making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th June, 1859; when the Speaker signed the same.

POST ROAD BILL.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move that the House take up the amendments of the Senate to the post road bill.

There being no objection, the amendments were taken up.

Mr. ENGLISH. I move that the amendments be concurred in.

Mr. LETCHER. Let us hear what the amendments are.

Mr. ENGLISH. The Senate amendments only refer, as I am informed by the chairman of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads of the Senate, to matters pertaining to post roads, nothing else, as I understand them; but I have not had time to examine all the amendments.

The Senate amendments were concurred in.

Mr. ENGLISH moved to reconsider the vote just taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOAN BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the Senate amendments to the loan bill be referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, and made the special order.

The motion was agreed to.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL—AGAIN.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read the following paragraph:

"California.—For a light-house on Mare Island, San Francisco bay, $9,989."

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to inquire of the chairman of the Committee on Commerce, whether the title to Mare Island has been settled?

Mr. COMINS. There is a provision of law, and it is also provided in this bill, that wherever there is doubt of the title to the land, any money appropriated shall go into the surplus fund until the title shall be substantiated.

Mr. LETCHER. That is an important matter to ascertain.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. LETCHER. I move to strike out the paragraph which has just been read, and I will give my reason for it. It will be recollected that some month or six weeks ago a communication came here from the Attorney General, in which it was stated that a controversy had sprung up in regard to the ground upon which the public buildings were located at San Francisco. Now whether this is the portion of the public land referred to I cannot tell. The object of my inquiry is to ascertain that fact. For, sir, if it is, I take it that the House will not appropriate money for the purpose of locating a light-house, or any other improvement, upon land the title to which is in controversy.

Mr. COMINS. A joint resolution of 1842 makes it incumbent upon the Executive to obtain cession of jurisdiction from the States on all light-house and other sites, and also that no money shall be expended upon any land until the title is approved by the Attorney General of the United States; money appropriated for light-houses and all public buildings goes into the surplus fund until the matter of title is settled.

Mr. LETCHER. I think that the Committee on Commerce, before locating light-houses, ought to be sure of the title to the land. If we are to go on locating at random and upon lands with disputed titles, we may incur heavy expenditures of the public money—we may not find out the fact until these expenditures have been incurred. I want to avoid a conclusion of this sort, and get rid of the difficulties heretofore attending the construction of public buildings so far as California is concerned.

Mr. McKIBBIN. The title to this land has been passed upon by the Attorney General, and it is no longer in controversy; and therefore the objection of the gentleman from Virginia is without foundation.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that it is part and parcel of the land in controversy.

Mr. McKIBBIN. The House has already appropriated between two and three hundred thousand dollars, to be expended upon Mare Island, and if the question should be raised at all, then was the time to have done it.

Mr. LETCHER. I withdraw my amendment, and move to add to the paragraph the following proviso:

Provided, That no part of this money shall be paid until the Secretary of the Treasury is satisfied that the United States has a perfect title to this land.

Mr. COMINS. The amendment is unnecessary, but I will not further object to it.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desire to ask the gentleman who reported this bill a question.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. Does the gentleman offer an amendment?

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. Well, I move to strike out the fifth section. I move the amendment simply to say that I am not opposed to the passage of this bill, but I desire to know whether it has received the unanimous consent of the Committee on Commerce?

Mr. COMINS. It has.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York. I desired to know that fact, because I am ready to support the committees in their reports. I withdraw my amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to amend the last section by striking out "shall," in the sixth and thirteenth lines severally, and insert instead thereof the word "may." My object is to leave the matters of the surveys for these light-houses and other matters contained in this section discretionary with the Secretary of the Treasury. As the section now stands these matters are made compulsory, and he has no alternative but to go on and make the surveys, and commence the building of these light-houses.

The amendments were agreed to.

Mr. COMINS. I offer the following as an additional section:

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That authority is hereby given to exhibit a light from the light-house tower upon the hill at Cleveland, Ohio.

After the erection of a light-house on one of the piers at Cleveland, Ohio, in place of a small beacon light, it seemed to be the general opinion of navigators on the lakes that the light on the hill was of no further use. It was so officially reported for two years previous to the passage of the act of 1856, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury, at his discretion, to discontinue it as unnecessary. Some time after the light was extinguished, in the summer of 1857, complaints were made to the Secretary of the Treasury that the light on the pier was frequently obscured by fogs. Fogs or mists are supposed to arise from the town, from the mingling of the warm water of the river with the cold water of the lake. This difficulty was not fully realized until after the light on the hill was discontinued. The tower and apparatus are in good condition, and it is recommended that the Secretary of the Treasury be authorized to relight the same.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. COMINS. I now move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House, with a recommendation that it do pass.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. BARKSDALE reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly a bill of the House (No. 550) making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes; and had directed him to report the same to the House with amendments, with a recommendation that they do pass.

Mr. COMINS moved the previous question upon the amendments.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and under the operation thereof the several amendments recommended by the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union were concurred in.

The bill was then ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. COMINS moved the previous question upon the passage of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

Mr. LETCHER. I demand the yeas and nays on the passage of the bill.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken, and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 61; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Andrews, Arnold, Billingshurst, Bingham, Blair, Bliss, Bowie, Brayton, Bryan, Bullfinch, Burns, Case, Carraugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Coffax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Giddings, Gilman, Goodrich, Grovesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Hoyer, Kellogg, Kelly, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Miles, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mort, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, William W. Phelps, Potter, Pottier, Purviance, Reilly, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Searing, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, Whiteley, Winslow, Wood, and Wortendyke—99.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Avery, Barksdale, Bennett, Bo-cock, Bonham, Branch, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Cox, James Craig, Burton Craige, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dean, Dewart, Dimmick, Dowdell, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Foley, Garrell, Gregg, Thomas L. Harris, Hopkins, Houston, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Lumar, Leiter, Letcher, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Millson, Niblack, Olin, Pendleton, Peyton, Powell, Ricaud, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, William Smith, Stanton, Stevenson, Talbot, Trippe, John V. Wright, and Zollcoffer—61.

So the bill was passed.

Pending the vote by yeas and nays,

Mr. ATKINS stated that if he had been in when his name was called he would have voted "no."

Mr. COCKERILL stated that he had paired off with his colleague, Mr. HARLAN.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, and Mr. ADRAIN asked leave to vote, not being present when their names were called.

Objection was made.

Mr. COMINS moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to a further committee of conference on the Post Office appropriation bill.

Also, that the Senate had agreed to a committee of conference on the mail steamer appropriation bill.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled the following bills; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 56) making an appropriation for the completion of the military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory;

An act (H. R. No. 650) granting an invalid pension to William Randolph;

An act (H. R. No. 631) granting an invalid pension to John Holland, of Arkansas; and

An act (H. R. No. 513) granting an invalid pension to William Howell, of Tennessee.

MAIL STEAMER APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. SICKLES. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the ocean mail steamer bill.

The report was read, as follows:

The committee of further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the United States ocean mail service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859, having met, have, after a full and free conference, agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the Senate do recede from its first amendment.

That the House do recede from its non-concurrence in the third amendment of the Senate, and concur in said amendment, with amendments, as follows:

Insert the word "new" between the word "other" and the word "contract," at the end of the third line of said amendment.

Strike out the word "five," in the fifth line of said third amendment, and insert the word "two" in lieu thereof; and add at the end of said amendments the words, "nor for any other compensation than the sea and inland postages on the mails so transported."

That the House do recede from its non-concurrence in the fourth amendment of the Senate.

That the Senate do recede from its fifth amendment.

J. H. HAMMOND,
S. R. MALLORY,
JOHN P. HALE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

D. E. SICKLES,
M. R. H. GARNETT,
JOHN C. KUNKEL,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. SICKLES. The first amendment of the Senate was to strike out the following:

"For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, $346,500; and it is hereby provided that there be paid to the Post Office Department, out of said appropriation, such sums as may be required to procure the transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, on such days as the Collins line may fail to take them from New York."

And to insert, as follows:

For transportation of the mails from New York to Liverpool, and back, in pursuance of the contract with E. K. Collins and others, $346,500. And it is hereby provided, That for such days as the said Collins and others shall fail to perform said service, the Postmaster General is authorized to contract with the owner or owners of any other steam vessel or vessels to perform said service, by transporting the mails from such port in the United States to such port in Great Britain as he may select, and that the cost thereof be deducted from any amount which may be due, or may become due, to E. K. Collins & Co. for services actually performed. And the Postmaster General may, with the consent of the contractors, change the European termination of said route, under the contract aforesaid, from Liverpool to Southampton.

The Senate recede from the whole of that amendment.

The next amendment of the Senate was as follows:

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any steamship or other contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than five years.

The committee of conference recommend a concurrence in that with three amendments:

1. Strike out "five" (years) and insert "two" (years.)

2. Insert the word "new" after the word "any."

3. Add at the end: "Nor for any other compensation than the sea and inland postage on the mails so transported."

So that the section will read:

That it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any steamship or other new contract for carrying the mails on the sea for a longer period than two years, nor for any other compensation than the sea and inland postage on the mails so transported.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it intended by this to give the Postmaster General authority to make contracts for two years, so as to deny to Congress the right to regulate this matter next session?

Mr. SICKLES. Certainly not.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Does that provision apply exclusively to the foreign mail service, or does it apply to the coast service?

Mr. SICKLES. The provision is so comprehensive as to include any and all service on the sea.

Mr. CLARK, of New York. Then it embraces the route from Charleston to Savannah?

Mr. SICKLES. It applies to all new contracts for any service performed by sea, no matter whether it be performed between this country and Europe, or between two ports of this country, provided it is done over sea.

Mr. LETCHER. Then it takes away from Congress for two years to come all power over the subject. If the Postmaster General chooses to make a contract for two years, Congress cannot meddle with it.

Mr. SICKLES. That is not the effect, as the gentleman will see if he will look more carefully to the phraseology of the section. It is a prohibitory section—that it shall not be lawful for him to make any contract for a longer period than two years.

Mr. LETCHER. Exactly; but he may make any contract for two years.

Mr. SICKLES. The contract, whatever it may be, is restricted in point of compensation to postages alone. The Postmaster General gets no further or other power than he now has under the laws of 1836, 1845, and 1851.

Mr. LETCHER. But, as I understand, the Postmaster General has in view the rearrangement of this whole matter at the next session of Congress. At least, that is the information that I have, as a member of the Committee of Ways and Means. Now, the terms employed there, that he shall make no contract for longer than two years, necessarily imply that he may make contracts for that period.

Mr. SICKLES. The argument of the gentleman from Virginia, it seems to me, is a non sequitur. By existing laws the Postmaster General is authorized to make contracts for a longer period for this service, provided parties will perform the service for postages. He does not claim that he is authorized to make contracts which require appropriations; but he does claim that he has the power to make contracts with the current receipts of the service. Now, this provision operates as a limitation over that power in two ways. It limits the duration of the contract to two years, as the maximum duration of the contract in any event, and prescribes absolutely that the compensation can, in no event, exceed postages. Some doubt has existed as to whether or no the Postmaster General may go beyond the postages; and to remove that doubt the conferees have fixed this positive limitation.

Mr. LETCHER. Will my friend be kind enough to say to me whether, if the Postmaster General makes a contract for two years, Congress has any power to abrogate it?

Mr. SICKLES. I would say, in answer to my friend from Virginia, that the only way, as the law now stands, to stop the Postmaster General from making contracts for more than two years, is to enact this provision.

Mr. LETCHER. Does not the provision enlarge the power of the Postmaster General?

Mr. SICKLES. No; on the contrary, it limits his power.

Mr. CLEMENS. I find that by the act of 1845 it is provided that every contract entered into under the provisions of that act, shall contain, besides the usual stipulations of the right of the Postmaster General to discontinue the same, the further stipulation that it may at any time be terminated by joint resolution of the two Houses of Congress. That applies to existing laws with regard to the foreign mail service. Now I ask the gentleman from New York whether, if this provision were inserted, it would not operate as a repeal of the act of 1845, and put it out of the power of Congress to repeal any contract that might be subsequently made by the Postmaster General? Whereas if we reject this provision it leaves the act of 1845 operative, and allows Congress, at the next session, to remodel the whole mail service of the country.

Mr. SICKLES. I yielded only for an inquiry, not for an argument. I will answer the inquiry, which is: Will the clause operate as a repeal of that statute? I say that it clearly will not, but that that statute will still operate and control this act. This provision adds no new powers whatever, but operates as a limitation upon the authority which the Postmaster General exercises under that statute.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I would like to make an inquiry of the gentleman from New York about this matter. I understand the gentleman to say that this clause will authorize the Postmaster General to make a contract for the coasting service, that is to say, from the Atlantic through the Gulf, to the Isthmus, and then up the other side to California, Oregon, and Washington, for the inland and ocean postages. Our postage is ten cents over three thousand miles, and the Postmaster General, under this provision, may give all the postages on mail matter between this country and California, for the mere transportation of the mails on the ocean. If that is the understanding, what is to pay for the balance of the service?

Mr. SICKLES. I have to say, in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, that the section referred to makes no distinction whatever between home or foreign service. It is a restriction upon the length of time and the compensation for which contracts may be entered into under the existing laws. The authority to make such contracts, if it exists anywhere, exists under the laws of 1845 and 1836, and whatever limitations those laws impose as to the area or location of the service, of course are equally applicable to this clause; and as I understand it, those statutes are for foreign service.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. For ocean service, and under this provision the Postmaster General may give all the postages for this one line on the ocean.

Mr. SICKLES. If that is the case, it is not attributable to anything in the bill now under consideration, and it is, and must be, the result of existing statutes, which were not all under the control of the committee of conference, and for which they are not responsible.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It enables the Postmaster General to give them all the inland and ocean postages.

Mr. SICKLES. It does not require that he shall do it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It says he may give them all.

Mr. SICKLES. No; it does not. It says he shall not exceed that amount, and what he does give must pay for the whole service between the given points.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Exactly; and he may give them all.

Mr. TAYLOR, of Louisiana. It seems to me that there is no necessity for any difficulty in relation to this matter. We all know that the Postmaster General can make no contract unless he has been authorized to make it. Whatever power exists now can be exercised to the extent that it has been conferred upon him; and it seems to me that the plain and simple import of this clause is to impose a limitation upon the powers already given. So far as it relates to the construction of the clause, in respect to the amount which the Postmaster General is authorized to give, it seems to me that it would be doing violence to language to give it any other interpretation than this, that the Postmaster General, in making contracts that he is now authorized to make by law, shall not be authorized to give a sum beyond what would be covered by the postages accruing from the mails transported over the particular route. It seems to me, therefore, useless to be splitting hairs about what is so manifest.

Mr. SICKLES. The fourth amendment of the Senate is as follows:

And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause the mails to be transported between the United States and any foreign port or ports by steamships, allowing and paying therefor out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated; if by an American vessel, the sea and United States inland postages, and if by a foreign vessel, the sea postages only on the mails so conveyed: Provided, That the preference shall always be given to an American over a foreign steamship when departing from the same port for the same destination within three days of each other.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to ask the gentleman another question. The aggregate amount of postages paid last year between San Francisco and New York—

Mr. SICKLES. That inquiry can throw no possible light on this section, because it relates entirely to foreign service.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I desire to ask the gentleman from New York a question. I want information upon this subject so as to know how to vote. I have a paper in my hand, and I desire to call the attention of the gentleman to some of the facts stated in it. Perhaps he can tell me if they are true or not. I read from that paper:

"The Pacific Mail Steamship Company under contract for ten years, from October 1, 1848, to October 1, 1858, to carry the mail between Panama and California twice a month for the annual pay of $338,000, which expires October, 1858, and wish it continued for one year; they do not ask it to be renewed, but the Postmaster General requests the Committee of Ways and Means to put the appropriation into the mail steamer bill.

"These companies, in order to prevent all competition to their line, and to enable them, as they do, to charge passengers double fare, have actually paid Vanderbilt $30,000 per month, and the United States Mail Steamship Company, carrying the mail between New York and Aspinwall, an additional sum of $10,000 per month, making $40,000 per month to Vanderbilt since May, 1856, which they continue to do. This $40,000 are paid to Vanderbilt per annum simply to give these two companies the entire monopoly of their lines—which sum, and much more, is charged over to passengers and freight."

Mr. SICKLES. I yielded for an inquiry. I did not yield to the gentleman to read an essay.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I am asking the gentleman a question.

Mr. SICKLES. If the gentleman will propound a question, I will answer it; but he is reading from an anonymous document.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. It is not anonymous. I have seen the same statement in the New York Herald, and I ask the gentleman if he can deny its correctness?

Mr. SICKLES. If the gentleman will propound a distinct question, I will answer it; but I do not yield to him to read an unofficial publication.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman if the Pacific Mail Steamship Company, whose contract expires in October next, are not paying $40,000 a month to Mr. Vanderbilt to prevent him from running an opposition line to them, and if they are not making upon this contract now thirty per cent. upon the amount which they have invested?

Mr. SICKLES. I am surprised that the gentleman from Mississippi should propound a question of that kind with reference to this report; for whatever answer might be given could in no way affect the vote of a single member upon any proposition agreed to by the managers of the conference. I presume there are no appropriations in the bill with reference to the line to which the gentleman refers, except those necessary to fulfill existing obligations of the Government under pending contracts. As to the facts to which the gentleman refers, if they are facts, they will become applicable and useful if called to the attention of Congress, or of the Post Office Department, when the contract to which he refers shall expire.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. The anonymous document from which the gentleman from Mississippi has read, coming from what quarter I do not know, has been brought in here and laid upon our desks, with this caption written in pencil: "kill mail steamer bill—a new bill can be prepared without Pacific swindle." This document has been distributed here for the purpose of influencing the votes of members. Now, I voted against the bill before, but I think that this attempt to influence the votes of members by the circulation of anonymous documents deserves the severest condemnation.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. And that document emanates from a man who has been endeavoring to levy black mail out of this steamship company.

Mr. SICKLES. I decline to yield further.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I ask the gentleman to allow me to say a few words.

Mr. SICKLES. No, sir; I will not.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. It is unfair to the House and the country.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has a right to decline to yield.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I hope the House will vote down the previous question.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to ask the gentleman this question: whether the conferees considered fairly the act of 1851—not of 1845—which regulates the power of the Postmaster General, when providing for the transmission of the mails from one point in the United States to another point in the United States, through a foreign country? Will the gentleman permit me to read an abstract of that act?

Mr. SICKLES. I would rather the gentleman would state the point.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. The point is this: that by existing law the Postmaster General now has authority to make contracts under certain limitations, for the transmission of the mails from one point in the United States to another point in the United States, through foreign countries, and it is limited to a term of four years; and he has the authority now, whenever a speedier route can be ascertained, to abrogate all the existing contracts, and to take that new and speedier route upon arranging a just indemnity to the contractors on the routes he discards. It is provided further, that he shall advertise, and give the new route to the lowest bidder. It occurs to my mind that the law, as you propose to put it, will involve the country in the adjustment of indemnity, and will probably make a war by the Post Office Department upon existing routes by the substitution of a new route; whereas, if I understood the vote of the House of Representatives, they intended to stop this power altogether.

Mr. SICKLES. The point made by the gentleman from Kentucky is, in substance, that made heretofore by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES.] It was fully answered, I think, by what I said in reference to the objection of the gentleman from Tennessee; and certainly, sir, after the lucid explanation of the gentleman from Louisiana, [Mr. TAYLOR,] I think that nothing remains to be added. The point is here: whatever authority the Postmaster General may have, as the gentleman from Kentucky claims, with reference to the class of contracts to which he refers, he possesses under the law to which the gentleman called the attention of the House.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. With modifications which your law dispenses with.

Mr. SICKLES. Not at all. I put it to the gentleman from Kentucky, in all fairness, that not a word in this bill can be construed as modifying, or repealing, or affecting, excepting by way of limitation or restriction, any of the existing laws relating to this subject. The phraseology, in its legal as well as in its ordinary import, means that. Look again at the language, "that it shall not be lawful for the Postmaster General to make any contract, &c., for a longer period than for two years, or for a greater compensation than postages." Now, there would be no sense in employing such phraseology, except as a limitation upon existing powers conferred by antecedent laws.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. Before the chairman passes from this point, I desire to call his attention to the fact that if there be a prohibitory clause, if there be a provision of law giving the Postmaster General power to do thus and so for four years under limitation, and you afterwards pass a prohibitory clause that it shall not be lawful for him to do thus and so for more than two years, except on a specified condition, notwithstanding your prohibition your clause becomes a positive one, that confers all power upon him. There can be no doubt about it.

Mr. SICKLES. Of course this limitation cannot retroact upon any contract already made; but it does act upon any new contract, both by its own force and effect and by the qualifications it imposes upon powers conferred by existing laws; and this is all the answer that it is necessary to make to this new point of the gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I think it is perfectly intelligible to this House, or ought to be, that the provision in this bill refers to the act of 1845. This provision is clearly a restriction to the extent of two years; for, by the terms of the act of 1845, the Postmaster General cannot only do what, under this bill, he can do for two years, but he can make a contract extending ten years. This, then, is a restriction. It restricts his power to make a contract for ocean service to two years, whereas, by existing law, he can make a contract for ten years.

To sum up the whole matter briefly, this bill, as it went from the House, was a mere appropriation bill; it would have been better, perhaps, if it could have remained so. But the Senate added several sections of general legislation with reference to the service. All these have been abandoned, except in two particulars; in the first place, we have agreed upon certain clauses which operate to control the expenditure of the appropriations made; and next, we agree to a provision which insures a fair trial of an experiment to carry ocean mails for postages, wherever the service is performed, and whether wholly or in part by sea.

It is evident that the country looks to Congress and to the Administration to give this experiment a fair trial; and although, in my opinion, it would have been better to leave the whole question to the next session, I am prepared to go as far now as is proposed in this report, to give the system a fair trial upon the basis of postages as a compensation. At the end of two years all existing contracts will have expired, and then Congress, in view of the abundant information it will have upon the subject, will be prepared to establish a policy for this service, so important in its relations to commerce, as well as to the Post Office, that will be at once enlightened and permanent.

Mr. Speaker, I move the report be accepted; and demand the previous question.

Mr. SICKLES. The fifth amendment of the Senate was as follows:

Sec. 6. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be, and he is hereby, directed to provide for and maintain, if practicable, at a cost not to exceed, in any instance, the sea and United States inland postage on the mails conveyed, a weekly mail to and from Europe, by United States mail packets, to alternate at regular intervals with the British mail packets, living between New York and Liverpool, and Boston and Liverpool, the preference to be given to such line or lines of American steamships, suitable in all respects for the service, as shall offer the best permanent contract: Provided, that no contract shall be made under the provisions of this act for the same service on the same week for which E. K. Collins and others have contracted during the continuance of that engagement.

The Senate receded from that amendment.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I move to lay the report upon the table.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIGE of North Carolina, and CLEMENS, were appointed.

Mr. PHELPS, of Missouri. I desire to inquire whether if the report is laid on the table it will not carry the bill with it?

The SPEAKER. It will.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-seven; a sufficient number; and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 49, nays 116; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Barksdale, Bliss, Bockock, Bonham, Burnett, Caskey, Clemens, Cobb, Covode, Burton, Craig, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dean, Dewart, Edie, Elliott, Faulkner, Florence, Gilmer, Hopkins, Jewett, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Maynard, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Powell, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, Talbot, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Elihu B. Washburne, Whiteley, and Woodson—49.

YAYS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Billingham, Bingham, Bowie, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Corning, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dick, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, English, Eustis, Fenton, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gooch, Gregg, Groebeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, J. Glancy Jones, Kellogg, Kelly, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Maclay, McKibbin, Mason, Matteson, Miles, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olm, Palmer, Parker, John S. Phelps, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Reagan, Reilly, Ricaud, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Sickles, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Walbridge, Walton, Ward, Israel Washburn, White, Wortendyke, and Zollicoffer—116.

So the House refused to lay the report on the table.

Mr. HOWARD stated, pending the call of the yeas and nays, that he had paired off with Mr. GREENWOOD.

[A message was received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House for the benefit of the captors of the British brig Caledonia, in the war of 1812, with amendments, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.]

The previous question was then seconded, and the main question was ordered to be put.

Mr. DEAN demanded the yeas and nays upon agreeing to the report.

Mr. CLEMENS called for tellers upon the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLARK of Connecticut, and CRAIG of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes thirty-three, a sufficient number; and the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 98, nays 57; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Billingham, Bingham, Bowie, Branch, Brayton, Bryan, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaffee, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Colfax, Corning, Cox, Crawford, Curry, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dick, Dimmick, Dowdell, Durfee, English, Eustis, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Giddings, Gillis, Gilman, Grainger, Robert B. Hall, Hatch, Hawkins, Horton, Huyler, J. Glancy Jones, Kelly, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Leidy, Maclay, McKibbin, Matteson, Maynard, Milson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Nichols, Olm, Palmer, Parker, Pottle, Purviance, Reagan, Reilly, Ricaud, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Searing, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, Stanton, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Walton, Ward, Israel Washburn, White, Winstow, Wood, and Wortendyke—98.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Barksdale, Bennett, Blair, Bliss, Bocock, Bonham, Burnett, Caskie, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Burton Craig, Curtis, Davis of Mississippi, Dawes, Dean, Dewar, Dodd, Elliott, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Gilmer, Gregg, Groebeck, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Jackson, Jewett, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Ruffin, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tompkins, Trippie, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Elihu B. Washburne, Whiteley, Woodson, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—57.

So the report was concurred in.

Mr. GARNETT moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVENUE BILL.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise to a privileged question. I desire to make a report from the committee of conference on the bill of the House No. 466, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows:

That the House recede from its disagreement to the fourth amendment of the Senate, and concur with an amendment, as follows: Strike out all after the word "warehouses;" in line five, to the word "than," in line eight, and insert, "or appraisers shall receive a compensation more than twenty-five per cent. greater."

R. M. T. HUNTER,
J. D. BRIGHT,
B. F. WADE.

Managers on the part of the Senate.

JOHN COCHRANE,

W. L. UNDERWOOD,

Managers on the part of the House.

There were but four amendments proposed by the Senate to this bill. In two of those amendments the House concurred. To one of them they disagreed, but concurred in it with an amendment, to which the Senate agreed, leaving thereby only the fourth amendment in which the House non-concurred. The Senate insisted, and asked a committee of conference, and it was upon that amendment that the conference was had. I will read the amendment of the Senate, so that the House may understand the action of the committee of conference. It is as follows:

"And be it further enacted, That no collector of the customs, deputy collector, naval officer, deputy naval officer, surveyor, deputy surveyor, general appraiser, superintendent of warehouses, or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenue, shall receive a greater compensation than is now paid to the officers and persons engaged in said service at the port of New York: Provided, That this section shall not be so construed as to increase the compensation of any officer of the customs, or of any person engaged in the collection thereof."

The House should understand that there is but one collection district at which the compensation of officers is greater than the compensation of officers at the port of New York. That district is the district of California. Of course this Senate amendment operates, and was intended to operate, upon the compensation of officers in that district. The effect of the amendment was to cut down the compensation of all officers and employees engaged in the collection of the revenue in that district. The House non-concurred in the amendment. The subject has been freely discussed by the committee of conference, and they came to the conclusion—with but one exception, and that was the gentleman from California, [Mr. SCOTT]—that the amendment of the Senate should be concurred in, with an amendment to strike the words "or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenue shall receive a greater compensation," and insert the words "or appraisers shall receive a compensation more than twenty-five per cent. greater;" so that the amendment, if the recommendation of the committee is concurred in, will read:

"That no collector of the customs, deputy collector, naval officer, deputy naval officer, surveyor, deputy surveyor, general appraiser, superintendent of warehouses, or appraisers, shall receive a compensation more than twenty-five per cent. greater than is now paid to the officers and persons engaged in said service at the port of New York: Provided, &c."

A few words in this connection are perhaps necessary to a full understanding by the House of the reasons of the action of the committee in the premises. The following statement will show the comparative compensation of the several officers at the port of New York, and at the port of San Francisco:

	New York.	California.
Collector.....	$6,400	$10,000
Deputy collector.....	2,500	4,000
Naval officer.....	5,000	8,000
Deputy naval officer.....	2,000	3,600
Surveyor.....	4,900	7,000
Deputy surveyor.....	2,000	4,000
Warehouse superintendent.....	2,000	3,600
General appraiser.....	2,500	6,000
Appraiser.....	2,000	6,000

This scale of compensation, so much greater in San Francisco than in New York, was adopted in reference to high prices current and high rates of rent in San Francisco, compared with what they then were at any other port of the United States. It was averred in the committee, and with truth, that the scale of prices for living, rent, &c., in San Francisco was now nearly that of New York and other ports of the Union; but it was conceded that it was still somewhat greater, though not as great as formerly. In reference to that it was that the committee thought that if they adopted a rate of compensation to the superior officers in San Francisco engaged in the collection of revenue twenty-five per cent. greater than that of the same class of officers in New York, the amendment would meet the case and adjust itself to the greater expense of living. They, under the same considerations, also came to the conclusion that it would not be justifiable to extend the force of this amendment to that class of officers designated in the words of the Senate amendment, "or any other officer or person engaged in the collection of the revenue," and which we propose to strike out. So the words referring to all those lesser officers, the manipularies—if I may so term them—of the custom-house and revenue laws, were stricken out, and the amendment left as valid and applicable only as to superior officers. It is proper to say, however, that the third manager on the part of the House, the member from California, did not assent to that agreement or report, thinking that the compensation ought to be greater.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed an act for the relief of Myra Clark Gaines, and a bill from the House granting a pension to Mary A. M. Jones.

REVENUE BILL—AGAIN.

Mr. SCOTT. At this late hour of the night I would not trespass on the time of the House, but a sense of duty constrains me to make a statement to this House. Lest some might construe my opposition to the report of the committee of conference as a fictitious one, I desire to say that so far as my action in the committee of conference was concerned, it was based on personal experience and personal knowledge. It was not my desire, even if it lay in my power, to endanger or jeopardize the bill making appropriations for the collection of the revenue. I did believe that the compensation of the custom-house officers in California was far below that which their efficiency, capacity, constancy, and worth deserve. Still I was willing to agree to a moderate deduction, and went so far as to concede a deduction of fifty per cent. When that amendment was introduced in the Senate, a superficial observer might have arrived at the conclusion that it was intended to extend over all the revenue districts of the country; but when you come to examine it, you find that the salaries of these officers are all equalized, except in the State of California. Now, I say that that is unfair and ungenerous legislation, especially when the Secretary of the Treasury has in contemplation a revision of the expenditures for the collection of the revenue. I saw that, to my astonishment, when it came to the House, the Committee of Ways and Means recommended a disagreement, and the House rejected the Senate amendment by a decisive vote. It was shown by a gentleman on the committee of conference that the cost of living and of clothing was almost twice as great in California as it is on this side. The salaries of our custom-house officers have, nevertheless, been reduced to one fourth more than those in the Atlantic States.

I do not intend to trespass on the time of the House further in this matter. I have done my duty. My action has sprung from no factious opposition, nor from a disposition to retard the action of this body, so far as this bill was concerned, but to do justice to those who are far distant, and who cannot come around Congress to show the difference between their expenses in the city of San Francisco and those in New York. I believe that this is an unfair, unequal, and unjust discrimination between the officers in San Francisco and the officers in New York.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move the previous question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to reply to the gentleman from California. [Cries of "Question!" "Question!"]

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the report of the committee of conference was adopted.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the report of the committee of conference was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a privileged question. The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill have met and, after a full and free conference, have been unable to agree.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Committee of Ways and Means reported the usual annual appropriation bill for the Post Office Department; it passed this House precisely as the Committee of Ways and Means reported it; it went to the Senate, and was there loaded down with amendments. Two committees of conference have now acted on it, and could not agree; and my present information is, that they never will agree. I now move that the bill be laid on the table; and I ask unanimous consent to report from the Committee of Ways and Means, immediately, a bill the same as it was passed by the House.

Mr. ENGLISH. I understand that the only ground of difference is in regard to the abolition of the franking privilege.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to lay the Senate amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill on the table.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I now ask the unanimous consent of the House to report from the Committee of Ways and Means a new Post Office appropriation bill, being, in fact, the bill that was originally reported from that committee, and that was passed by the House without the alteration of a dot to an "i," or a cross to a "t."

There being no objection, a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859, was reported from the Committee of Ways and Means, and read a first and second time.

Mr. GROW. I desire to inquire of my colleague if that is the same as the bill that came from the Senate, with the exception of the provisions for the abolition of the franking privilege and for the increase of the postage rates?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It is identically the same bill as that reported originally by the Committee of Ways and Means, according to the regular estimates, and passed by the House without a solitary alteration.

Mr. GROW. How does it differ from the one that came from the Senate?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It omits the Senate amendments.

Mr. KEITT. Is it the same bill as the one the Senate amended?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Precisely the same.

Mr. KEITT. Then it is a question whether the House or the Senate will yield?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. Let the Senate take the responsibility of amending it, if they choose.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments of the Senate to the former Post Office appropriation bill were laid upon the table; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

CLOSE OF DEBATE ON THE LOAN BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the amendments of the Senate to the loan bill be made the special order in the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union until disposed of, and that all debate thereon be closed in five minutes after the committee should proceed to the consideration of the same.

The motion was agreed to.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

On motion of Mr. J. GLANCY JONES the rules were suspended, and the House resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, (Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, in the chair,) and proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the House bill (No. 555) to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1858.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The amendments of the Senate to this bill do not increase the appropriations, but are restrictions upon them. Those members of the Committee of Ways and Means with whom I have been able to confer informally, recommend a concurrence in the amendments.

The amendments of the Senate were read and concurred in, as follows:

Sec. 2. And be it further enacted, That none of the moneys hereby appropriated to the Indian service in the Territories of Oregon and Washington shall be paid until the claims which they are intended to satisfy shall have been audited and stated by a commissioner to be sent to the said Territories by the said Secretary of the Interior, and approved by said Secretary; said commissioner shall be appointed, as soon as practicable, by the Secretary of the Interior, to receive a compensation of eight dollars a day and his actual traveling expenses whilst engaged in the service hereby prescribed; and it shall be the duty of said commissioner to examine the vouchers, and to take testimony, if necessary, in regard to the claims or accounts which may be presented against the Government, and to report the result of his investigation, and his opinions thereupon, to the Secretary of the Interior, who shall pay such claims, if he approve them, so far as the appropriation herein made shall be sufficient for the purpose.

Sec. 3. And be it further enacted, That in executing process in the Indian country, the marshal be authorized to employ a posse comitatus, not exceeding three persons in any of the States respectively, to assist in executing the process, by arresting and bringing in prisoners from the Indian country, and to allow them three dollars per diem, in lieu of all expenses and services.

Sec. 4. And be it further enacted, That the superintendents and agents within the superintendency of Texas, shall be hereafter appointed in the same manner as other superintendents and agents are appointed and confirmed.

The amendments were then laid aside to be reported to the House, with the recommendation that they be concurred in.

LOAN BILL.

The committee proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Senate to the loan bill.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Senate have amended this bill by striking out all after the enacting clause, and substituting therefor their own bill. That bill differs from the House bill in three particulars only. The first is that it makes the maximum of interest five per cent. instead of six per cent.; the second is that it makes it compulsory on the Secretary of the Treasury to have coupons attached to the bonds instead of leaving it discretionary with him; and the third is that it reduces the appropriation for the expenses of getting up this stock from twenty to five thousand dollars. I move to amend the Senate amendment by striking out "fifteen," and inserting "twenty," so as to make the loan $20,000,000, which will be sufficient to cover all expenses up to the 1st of January next.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that "five" be stricken from the Senate substitute, and that "six" be inserted in lieu of it, so as to make the interest six instead of five per centum.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Here the committee informally rose, and Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bills of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same:

An act (H. R. No. 585) to establish certain post roads; and

An act (H. R. No. 42) granting a pension to Mary A. M. Jones.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President, by J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, notifying the House that he had approved and signed sundry bills.

LOAN BILL.

The committee then resumed its session.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I demand tellers on the amendment moved by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, to strike out five per cent., and insert six per cent. in lieu thereof.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. JOHN COCHRANE and BUFFINGTON were appointed.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 72, noes 47; so the amendment was agreed to.

The Senate's amendment as amended was concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the committee rise, and report the bill to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

So the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois, reported that the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union had, according to order, had the state of the Union generally under consideration, and particularly the Senate amendments to a bill of the House (No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000; and had instructed him to report the same to the House, with a recommendation that the House concur therein with two amendments. Also, that they had had under consideration the Senate amendments to a bill of the House (No. 555) making appropriations to supply deficiencies in the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations, for the year ending 30th June, 1858; which they had directed him to report to the House, with a recommendation that they be concurred in.

INDIAN DEFICIENCY BILL.

The House having proceeded to the consideration of the Senate amendments to the bill of the House No. 555,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the said amendments were agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved that the vote last taken be reconsidered; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

LOAN BILL.

The House having proceeded to the consideration of the amendments of the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000,

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved the previous question; which was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The first amendment was to strike out, in line four, the word "fifteen," and insert "twenty." The amendment was concurred in.

The next amendment was, in line sixteen, to strike out "five" and insert "six," so as to make the maximum rate of interest six per cent.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky, demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Senate amendment as amended was then concurred in.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote last taken, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. LETCHER. I move to reconsider the vote by which the third amendment to the Indian bill was concurred in.

The SPEAKER. The vote was reconsidered and laid upon the table immediately after the amendment was disposed of.

Mr. LETCHER. The amendment was wrong, and ought not to have been adopted.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported as truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 558) making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers or otherwise during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859; when the Speaker signed the same.

COAST SURVEY REPORT.

Mr. NICHOLS. I propose now to introduce a resolution which was voted down by this House at an early stage of the session, because members could not then reconcile their conflicting ideas on the question. It is for the printing of the Coast Survey report, and is reported on the petition of fifty or sixty shipping merchants of the city of New York.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. NICHOLS. You have no right to object.

The resolution of the Committee on Printing, to whom was referred the petition of Grinnell, Minturn, & Co., and certain other shipping merchants and underwriters of the city of New York, asking for the continued publication of the Coast Survey report, was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed of the said report, for the year 1837, five thousand copies; three thousand for the use of the Coast Survey office, and two thousand for the use of the House of Representatives.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move the previous question on the passage of the resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I ask the gentleman from Ohio what the Coast Survey office needs with three thousand copies?

Mr. NICHOLS. I believe I called the previous question; but—

Cries of "Question!" "Question!"

Mr. CLEMENS. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to lay on the table. This is a gratuity, and I could expose it if the gentleman had not called the previous question.

Mr. NICHOLS. The gentleman cannot expose me.

Mr. CLEMENS, (amid calls to "Order!" and shouts of "Question!" "Question!") It is a gratuity for the benefit of Cornelius Wendell.

Mr. NICHOLS. What does the gentleman say?

Mr. CLEMENS, (amid continued calls to "Order!") It is a fit proposition for the dying hours of the session.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to inquire of the Chair whether there was not a report on this subject from the Committee on Printing at an early day of the session, and whether the House did not refuse to print an extra number of copies.

Mr. NICHOLS. Such is the fact, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MILES. But does not the House often change its opinion?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. If the question of printing an extra number of copies of this report was referred to the Committee on Printing, and they reported a resolution in favor of it, and that resolution was rejected by the House, what right has that committee to report it again?

Mr. NICHOLS. It is a different resolution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But was there a different motion to print an extra number referred to that committee?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio stated that a memorial had been referred to his committee, signed by upwards of fifty ship-owners and underwriters of the city of New York, and that the resolution reported by him from the committee is predicated on that memorial. The Chair is of the opinion that the committee have the right to make the report.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then anybody can send a memorial here, and have it referred to the Committee on Printing.

Mr. STANTON. Must not resolutions to print extra copies go, under the rules, to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. Yes.

Mr. STANTON. Then, I suppose this resolution should go now to that committee, as this is the first time the House has heard of this resolution.

Mr. SANDIDGE. I would ask the Chair whether or not this is a privileged motion?

The SPEAKER. It is. The Committee on Printing have the right to report at any time.

The yeas and nays were ordered on the motion to lay on the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I ask the Chair whether the law does not require that all motions to print extra numbers of documents shall be referred to the Committee on Printing?

The SPEAKER. It does.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Then this is the first motion since the defeat of the resolution to print an extra number.

The SPEAKER. Is this a motion to print?

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think so.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it is a resolution from the Committee on Printing, and is in order.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And one, I think, which they reported without authority.

Mr. SINGLETON. As a member of the committee, I would like to say a word in justification of that committee.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order if there is any objection.

Mr. CLEMENS. My mouth is closed. I object.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by

Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a joint resolution of the House in relation to the carrying of the mail between St. Joseph, Missouri, and Placerville, California; and that it had agreed to the report of the conference committee on the disagreeing votes to the Senate's amendments on the bill making appropriations for collecting the revenue from customs.

COAST SURVEY REPORT—AGAIN.

The question was taken on the motion to lay on the table; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 56, nays 88; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Bennett, Billingshurst, Blair, Bonham, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clay, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Cox, Burton, Craig, Curry, Davis of Mississippi, Dimmick, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gregg, Hoard, Houston, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, Kellogg, John C. Kunkel, Letcher, Mason, Niblack, Palmer, Pendleton, Peyton, William W. Phelps, Powell, Reilly, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Stevenson, Trippe, Woodson, and John V. Wright—56.

NAYS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Bingham, Bliss, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Case, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goodwin, Grow, Robert B. Stewart, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Wood, and Wortendyke—88.

So the resolution was not laid on the table.

Mr. COVODE stated (pending the vote) that Mr. KILGORE and Mr. MCQUEEN had paired off.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to the consideration of this resolution under the 61st rule, which I ask to have read.

The rule was read, as follows:

"A proposition requesting information from the President of the United States, or directing it to be furnished by the head of the Executive Departments, or by the Postmaster General; or to print an extra number of any document or other matter, excepting messages of the President to both Houses at the commencement of each session of Congress, and the reports and documents connected with or referred to in it, shall lie on the table one day for consideration, unless otherwise ordered by the unanimous consent of the House; and all such propositions shall be taken up for consideration in the order they were presented, immediately after reports are called for from select committees; and when adopted, the Clerk shall cause the same to be delivered."

Mr. LETCHER. My point is this: that under the rule of the House a resolution to print an extra number of copies shall be referred to the House one day, at least, before it is considered, except there be unanimous consent to consider it.

Mr. MILES. I suppose that this objection comes too late, after the House has voted on the resolution to lay on the table.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that if there is anything at all in the point taken by the gentleman from Virginia, he is too late now in making the point. The Chair has entertained the motion for the previous question, and a subsequent motion to lay on the table, on which the yeas and nays were called. The point is too late now, after the House has proceeded to its consideration.

Mr. LETCHER. The point I make is this: The proposition to print this book is now to come up, and I want to know whether it is too late to save the money?

The SPEAKER. The House has been considering the report; but beyond that the Chair is of opinion that the rule has no application to a report from the Committee on Printing.

Mr. LETCHER. Why not?

Mr. NICHOLS. The law allows that committee to report at any time.

Mr. MILES. We expend hundreds of thousands of dollars in collecting the information contained in this work; and I hope it is not too late to save money by putting that information on record for the good of commerce, and for the good of the country.

Mr. LETCHER. Particularly as the interests of employes require that it should be kept up.

The SPEAKER. The original proposition was the memorial presented under the rules and reported back by the committee. There have been many precedents established in the House that the right of the Committee on Printing to report at any time carries with it the right to have their report thus disposed of; and the gentleman from Virginia will not be able to call the attention of the Chair to a single instance in which that practice has been departed from. The rule evidently contemplated a proposition coming from an individual member. The law which was passed in 1852—many years after this rule was originally adopted—provides that all motions to print extra copies of any bill, report, or other document, shall be referred to the members of the Committee on Printing of the House, in which the same shall be made. When this rule was adopted, there was no such regulation as that, and its object was to protect the House against hurried action upon propositions which had not been indorsed by the action of any committee.

Mr. LETCHER. Well, I should like to hear this memorial read, to see whether there is an application in it to print extra copies of this report, and when and how it was referred to the committee, and by whom.

The SPEAKER. The memorial was presented by Mr. TRIPPE, of Georgia, and is from underwriters, ship-masters, ship-owners, and others interested in navigation, representing that the reports of the Coast Survey are valuable as diffusing correct and useful nautical knowledge, and asking that their publication may be continued.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not understand that to be a proposition to print extra copies.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. Is debate in order, the previous question having been called?

The SPEAKER. It is not.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine, called for tellers on seconding the demand for the previous question.

Tellers were ordered; and MESSRS. CLEMENS and LOVEJOY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 88, noes 32.

The previous question was seconded.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee, demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the main question.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. STEWART, of Maryland, (at seven minutes to eleven o'clock, p. m.) moved that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was disagreed to.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 96, nays 46; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Bennett, Billingshurst, Bingham, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Chaffee, Horace F. Clark, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Corning, Covode, Cragin, James Craig, Davidson, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Eustis, Fenton, Florence, Foster, Gillis, Gooch, Goodwin, Groesbeck, Grow, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Keitt, Kellogg, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Lamar, Landy, Leiter, Lovejoy, Maclay, Humphrey Marshall, Matteson, Maynard, Miles, Millson, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Phillips, Potter, Pottle, Purviance, Ricaut, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Russell, Judson W. Sherman, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, James A. Stewart, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Winslow, Wood, and Wortendyke—96.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Avery, Blair, Bonham, Boyce, Branch, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Colfax, Burton, Craig, Curtis, Davis of Mississippi, Faulkner, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gregg, Hoard, Hopkins, Houston, Jewett, George W. Jones, John C. Kunkel, Letcher, Mason, Niblack, Pendleton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Powell, Reilly, Ruffin, Sandidge, Savage, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Trippe, and John V. Wright—46.

So the main question was ordered.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi, stated that Mr. QUITMAN was absent in consequence of indisposition.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. NICHOLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and continuing expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1858; when the Speaker signed the same.

PRINTING OF TARIFF, ETC., REPORT.

Mr. NICHOLS. I have another report which I am instructed to make by the Committee on Printing, and I desire only to say that the matter was referred to us by the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] in whose judgment I have great confidence. I hope, therefore, there will be no objection to it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Well, I have no doubt it is right.

The report was read as follows:

The Joint Committee on Printing, on the part of the House of Representatives, to whom was referred the resolution of George W. Jones, to inquire into the expediency of printing five thousand extra copies of the report of the select committee on the reduction of the expenditures of the Government, the navigation laws, the existing duties on imports, &c., submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the members of the House of Representatives, five thousand extra copies of the report of the select committee on the reduction of the expenditures of the Government, the navigation laws, and the existing duties on imports, &c.

Mr. NICHOLS. I move the previous question.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object. [Laughter.]

Mr. NICHOLS. I will only say that the printing of the five thousand copies will cost $150.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Since they are so cheap, I should like to have a few more of them.

Mr. CLEMENS. How did this resolution get before the House? Has the Chair entertained it?

The SPEAKER. It is a report from the Committee on Printing.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. CLEMENS demanded the yeas and nays on the resolution, and tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were not ordered, and the yeas and nays were not ordered.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask leave of the House to file a written protest.

Mr. KEITT. I move that the gentleman have leave to file a written protest generally. [Laughter.]

Mr. CLEMENS. I accept the gentleman's modification. I would like to spread upon the Journal my reasons in detail against the preceding resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Virginia?

Several MEMBERS objected.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 102, noes 26.

So the resolution was adopted.

Mr. NICHOLS moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

BANK REPORT.

Mr. NICHOLS. I am instructed by the Committee on Printing to submit another report on a subject referred to them on motion of the gentleman from Virginia, [Mr. LETCHER.] The cost of printing will be $250.

The resolution reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed, for the use of the Treasury Department, two thousand extra copies of the report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the banks of the Union.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I am in favor of that.

Mr. NICHOLS. It is recommended by the Secretary of the Treasury. I call for the previous question on the adoption of the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. NICHOLS moved to reconsider the vote adopting the resolution; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SMITHSONIAN REPORT.

Mr. NICHOLS, from the Committee on Printing, submitted the following report:

The Joint Committee on Printing on the part of the House, to whom it was referred to inquire into the expediency of printing ten thousand copies of the report on the condition of the Smithsonian Institution, report the following:

Resolved, That there be printed of said report seven thousand copies for the use of the members of the House of Representatives and two thousand for the use of the Institution.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. How much will that cost?

Mr. NICHOLS. The cost will be $3,500, according to an estimate made by myself. It is a large reduction on the number heretofore ordered. I call for the previous question.

Mr. BURNETT. I move to lay the resolution upon the table.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays.

Mr. KEITT. I rise to a question of privilege. The SPEAKER. The Chair cannot entertain the motion pending the call for the previous question.

The House divided on ordering the yeas and nays; and there were—ayes 25, noes 109.

The SPEAKER. The yeas and nays are not ordered.

Mr. BURNETT. I want tellers on the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the call comes too late. The Chair stated the vote, and paused some time before he announced the result.

Mr. BURNETT. The Speaker stooped over a moment, and as soon as he rose to an erect position, I rose and called for tellers upon the yeas and nays, and the result was announced.

The SPEAKER. Did not the gentleman hear the announcement before he addressed the Chair?

Mr. BURNETT. Yes, sir. I heard the announcement, 109 and 25.

The SPEAKER. The application comes too late.

The question was then taken upon the motion to lay the resolution upon the table; and it was not agreed to—ayes 30, noes 97.

Mr. BURNETT demanded the yeas and nays upon the adoption of the resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 84, nays 50; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Billinghurst, Bingham, Bliss, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Cavanaugh, Chaflin, Chapman, Ezra Clark, Clawson, Clark B. Cochrane, Cockrell, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Curtis, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Eddie, Fenton, Foster, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Groesbeck, Grow, Hatch, Horton, Owen Jones, Keitt, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Landy, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Maynard, Moore, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Olin, Parker, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Phillips, Pottle, Purviance, Reagan, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Judson W. Sherman, Stokess, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stanton, Tappan, Underwood, Walbridge, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, and Wood—84.

NAYS—Messrs. Atkins, Barksdale, Bennett, Blair, Bonham, Branch, Burnett, Caskey, Clemens, Cobb, John Cochrane, James Craig, Curry, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Dowdell, Eustis, Faulkner, Garnett, Gregg, Hopkins, Houston, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, George W. Jones, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, McClay, McKibbin, Miles, Niblack, Peyton, Potter, Powell, Royce, Ruffin, Russell, Sandidge, Savage, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Spinner, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Tompkins, Trippe, Winslow, and John V. Wright—50.

So the resolution was agreed to.

Pending the call of the roll,

Mr. KEITT said: I do not often ask favors of the House, and I do not mean to ask another. While they are calling the yeas and nays, I ask, as a side measure, that the House put a little bill through for me. [Laughter.]

Mr. LETCHER. That is a new idea.

Mr. EDMUNDSON stated that he had paired off with Mr. HILL.

Mr. NICHOLS moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I move that the House do now adjourn.

STEPHEN R. ROWAN.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that motion, and allow me to call up a Senate resolution for correcting an error in a bill which has passed both Houses, and which correction is absolutely necessary to give effect to the bill as it was passed.

Mr. DAVIS, of Mississippi. I withdraw my motion for that purpose.

No objection being made, Senate resolution (No. 49) to correct an error in an act for the relief of Stephen R. Rowan, approved June 1, 1858, was taken up.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois. I will simply state that the act, as passed, recites the judgment against which the bill provides relief, as passed at the June term of the court for the southern district of Illinois, in 1856. It should have been 1857. This resolution makes that correction.

The resolution received its several readings, and was passed.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Illinois, moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

SHERLOCK AND SHIRLEY.

Mr. HORTON. I ask unanimous consent to report a Senate bill from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, for the purpose of putting it on its passage. It is for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to report a bill too. I have a case which is awful. [Laughter.]

LOAN BILL.

A message was received from the Senate by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the first amendment of the House, and disagreed to the second amendment of the House, to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000, and have amended the title of the said bill so as to read, "An act to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000;" in which amendment of the title he was directed ask the concurrence of the House.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to take up the Senate amendments to the loan bill which have just been sent to us.

No objection was made, and the amendments were taken up.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. The Senate have concurred in our amendments with one exception. They have stricken out "six" and inserted "five," so as to make the maximum of interest five per cent. I hope the House will concur in that, and also agree to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill. I make that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote last taken; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that the committee had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 466) making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs; when the Speaker signed the same.

[Much disorder and confusion prevailed in the House.]

Mr. LETCHER. As it is impossible to have order, I move that the House do now (five minutes before twelve o'clock, p. m.) adjourn.

The motion was not agreed to.

Mr. KEITT. Is it in order to move that these gentlemen who make motions to adjourn shall not make any other motion? [Laughter.]

SHERLOCK AND SHIRLEY—AGAIN.

Mr. HORTON. I now renew my request for leave to report, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, the bill of the Senate for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley.

Mr. SAVAGE. I would inquire whether this bill has not been already, this session, voted on?

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. No vote has been taken on it.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. HORTON. I move to suspend the rules, so as to enable the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to report back this bill.

The rules were suspended; there being, on a division—ayes 107, noes 24; and the bill was reported back.

Mr. HORTON moved the previous question on the third reading of the bill.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and under its operation the bill was read a third time.

Mr. HORTON moved the previous question on its passage.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the bill was passed.

Mr. HORTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

MEMBER EXCUSED FROM ATTENDANCE.

Mr. CLEMENS, (five minutes past twelve o'clock, a. m.) I most respectfully ask a personal favor from the House. I beg leave to request the consent of the House to absent myself from its session from now till the hour of meeting on Monday morning.

Mr. KEITT. You may leave it, provided you keep to prayer and watchfulness. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CLEMENS left the Hall amid shouts of "Object," and great laughter.

JAMES H. GLANDING.

Mr. AHL. I move to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of Senate bill (No. 292) for the relief of James H. Glanding, and that it may be considered at this time.

Mr. FLORENCE. If I can get the floor I will move that the House do now adjourn. It is not right to sit here on the Sabbath morning.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. Is there any way in the world of getting at the Calendar, so that everybody here may take his chance? I am willing to go on with the Calendar and take my chance.

Mr. BARKSDALE. It is now past twelve o'clock, and is the Sabbath day. I believe this House ought to adjourn. The Christian sentiment and good taste of the country is averse to legislation on the Sabbath day.

Mr. KEITT. I object to discussion.

The SPEAKER. Neither the gentleman from Mississippi nor the gentleman from South Carolina is in order.

ENROLLED RESOLUTION.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution (H. R. No. 37) in regard to the carrying the United States mails from St. Joseph, Missouri, to Placerville, California; when the Speaker signed the same.

Mr. BARKSDALE. Would it be in order to make an inquiry of the Chair?

Mr. KEITT. I object to any inquiry.

Mr. AHL. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to move that the Committee of the Whole House be discharged from the further consideration of Senate bill (No. 292) for the relief of James H. Glanding.

Mr. STANTON. I learn that the Senate have adjourned; and I move that when this House adjourns, it adjourn to meet at ten o'clock on Monday.

The motion was agreed to.

And then, on motion of Mr. SICKLES (at twelve o'clock and fifteen minutes, a. m.) the House adjourned.

IN SENATE.

Monday, June 14, 1858.

Prayer by Rev. S. D. FINCKEL.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, and by unanimous consent, the reading of the Journal was dispensed with.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had receded from its second amendment to the amendment of the Senate to the bill of the House (H. R. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $15,000,000, and agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the title of the bill.

Also, that the House had passed the following bill and resolution of the Senate:

A bill (S. No. 287) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley; and

A joint resolution (S. R. No. 49) to correct an error in the "Act for the relief of Stephen R. Rowan," approved June 1, 1858.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

The message further announced that the House had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the time for the adjournment of the present session of Congress shall be, and is, extended from twelve o'clock, m., to half past two o'clock, p. m., this day.

Mr. HUNTER. I ask that the resolution be taken up at once.

The Senate proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. BROWN. I move to amend the resolution by striking out "half past two o'clock, p. m., this day," and inserting "twelve o'clock, m., tomorrow."

Mr. HUNTER. I hope that will not prevail, for I believe the House will not consent to it, and we shall lose time by the interchange of messages. At twelve o'clock we shall have to adjourn unless we do something. It is better to settle it at once.

The amendment was agreed to—ayes twenty-six, noes not counted.

The resolution, as amended, was adopted.

CREDENTIALS.

The VICE PRESIDENT presented the credentials of Hon. JOHN P. HALE, elected a Senator by the Legislature of New Hampshire for the term of six years from the 4th day of March, 1859; which were read, and ordered to be filed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announcing that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 582) entitled "An act to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000; which thereupon received the signature of the Vice President.

EXECUTIVE COMMUNICATION.

The VICE PRESIDENT laid before the Senate a letter of the Secretary of the Interior, transmitting a report from the Indian office in reply to the resolution of the Senate of June 2, in relation to the claim of the St. Regis Indians to land in Kansas; which was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

PETITION.

Mr. BIGLER presented the petition of Richard Imlay, praying an extension of his patent for an improvement in the mode of supporting the bodies of railroad cars and carriages; which was referred to the Committee on Patents and the Patent Office.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. DAVIS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of War transmitting information in relation to the North Carolina arsenal, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been acted upon in the Army appropriation bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate relative to the adoption of Captain Ward's improvement in fire-arms, asked to be discharged from its consideration for the same reason; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate relative to the condition of Forts Jefferson and Taylor, asked to be discharged from its consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate relative to the construction of a wagon road from Fort Benton to the Columbia river, at or near Fort Walla-Walla, asked to be discharged from its consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate relative to the adoption of the priming apparatus invented by Jesse S. Butterfield, of Philadelphia, asked to be discharged from its consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the Senate relative to the construction of a wagon road from Fort Smith, Arkansas, to Albuquerque, in New Mexico, and from Fulton, in Arkansas, to El Paso, in New Mexico, asked to be discharged from its further consideration, the subject having been provided for in the Army appropriation bill; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom was referred the joint resolution (S. No. 14) authorizing the appointment of commissioners to examine into the difficulties in the Territory of Utah with a view to their settlement, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, reported a bill (S. No. 458) for the relief of John Rogers; which was read and passed to a second reading.

Mr. SEBASTIAN. I wish to appeal to the Senate to consider this bill now. It is a small amount ascertained to be due, which was reported by the Committee on Indian Affairs as an amendment to one of the Indian appropriation bills, but ruled out by the Chair as being a private claim. As there can be no objection to it, I ask that it be considered now.

Mr. STUART. It is hardly worth while to pass a Senate bill now.

Mr. SLIDELL. I object to it.

The VICE PRESIDENT. Objection being made, the bill cannot now be considered.

Mr. SEBASTIAN, from the Committee on Indian Affairs, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 372) to settle the titles to certain lands belonging to the half-breed Kansas Indians, in Kansas Territory, asked to be discharged from its present consideration; which was agreed to.

Mr. STUART, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. No. 302) to continue the office of register of the land office at Vincennes, Indiana, reported it without amendment.

Mr. IVERSON submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Committee on Claims be discharged from the further consideration of all the adverse reports of the Court of Claims which have been referred to that committee.

LIGHT-HOUSE BILL.

Mr. CLAY, from the Committee on Commerce, to whom was referred House bill (No. 550) making appropriations for light-houses, light-boats, buoys, &c., and providing for the erection and establishment of the same, and for other purposes, reported it without amendment.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope that bill will not be taken up now.

Mr. CLAY. I do not propose to take it up now; and I will take this occasion to say that I do not approve the bill; and if it is taken up, I shall assign the reasons for my opposition to it.

Mr. TOOMBS. There are substantial reasons why that bill should not pass in its present form, and I did not know that the committee had agreed to report it.

AFRICAN SETTLEMENTS IN AMERICA.

Mr. DOOLITTLE submitted the following resolution, which lies over under the rule:

Whereas, the numerous disabilities to which free persons of color of African descent are subjected in many of the free States have made it desirable, on the part of large numbers of them, to seek elsewhere a more favorable field for their labor and enterprise; and whereas, the same class of persons is regarded with still greater disfavor in the slaveholding States from considerations deemed so controlling that further emancipation in many of them has been prohibited by law unless the persons emancipated shall be at the same time removed beyond the jurisdiction of the State, and in some of them the graver question is seriously entertained whether persons of African descent who are now free shall not be again reduced to slavery if they continue to remain within their jurisdictions; and whereas, in Yucatan and Central and South America there are vast regions almost uninhabited of the most beautiful and productive countries in the world, in a climate well adapted to the constitution of the African race to develop its greatest power and highest activity: Therefore,

Resolved, That the Committee on Foreign Relations inquire into the expediency of acquiring by treaty in Yucatan, Central or South America, the rights and privileges of settlement and of citizenship for the benefit of such persons of color, of African descent, as may voluntarily desire to emigrate from the United States, and form themselves into a colony or colonies, under the laws of the State or States to which they emigrate; the United States, in consideration of the commercial advantages of free trade with such colony or colonies, making and securing the necessary and proper engagements to maintain them in the enjoyment of the rights and privileges acquired by such treaty or treaties.

ENROLLED BILLS SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (S. No. 287) for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley; and an enrolled joint resolution (S. No. 49) to correct an error in the act for the relief of Stephen R. Rowan, approved June 1, 1858; and they were signed by the Vice President.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President of the United States, on the 12th instant, approved and signed the following acts:

An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859;

An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of the Government for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859;

An act granting a pension to Beriah Wright, of New York;

An act making appropriations for the support of the Army for the year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and

An act making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes for the year ending June 30, 1859.

Also, that he had approved and signed this day the following acts:

An act granting a pension to Mary A. M. Jones;

An act making an appropriation for the completion of the military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory;

An act making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs;

An act granting an invalid pension to William Howell, of Tennessee;

An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the year ending June 30, 1859;

An act making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail by ocean steamers, and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859;

An act to establish certain post roads;

An act granting an invalid pension to John Holland, of Arkansas; and

An act granting an invalid pension to William Randolph.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

The following message was received from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk:

The House of Representatives disagrees to the amendments of the Senate numbered four, five, six, seven, and ten, heretofore agreed to; and insists upon its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered one, two, three, eight, and nine, to the bill of the House of Representatives (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department for the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, heretofore disagreed to, and asks a further conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the said bill; and has appointed Mr. HENRY M. PHILLIPS, Mr. ELLIHU B. WASHBURN, and Mr. JAMES F. DOWDELL, managers of the same on its part.

On motion of Mr. HUNTER, the Senate further insisted on all its amendments, and agreed to the conference asked for by the House of Representatives. The Vice President was, by unanimous consent, authorized to appoint the committee; and Messrs. HUNTER, YULEE, and COLLAMER, were appointed.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

The message also announced that the House of Representatives agreed to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House, extending the time for the adjournment of Congress, with an amendment to fix the hour of final adjournment at six o'clock, p. m., this day.

The amendment was concurred in.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. FITZPATRICK, the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and after some time spent therein, the doors were reopened.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

A message was received from the President of the United States, by Mr. HENRY, his Secretary, announcing that the President had this day approved and signed the following acts:

An act for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley; and

A resolution to correct an error in the act for the relief of Stephen R. Rowan, approved June 1, 1858.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HUNTER submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses as follows: That the Senate recede from their first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth amendments.

R. M. T. HUNTER,

D. L. YULEE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

H. M. PHILLIPS,

E. B. WASHBURN,

J. F. DOWDELL,

Managers on the part of the House.

Mr. HUNTER. In presenting this report, I beg leave simply to say that the amendments of the Senate are principally the addition of matters of legislation to an appropriation bill, to which the House of Representatives object, and I always yield to such an objection. I have nearly always gone against the practice of legislation on the appropriation bills. I am inclined to think that the better course is to yield to the principle on which the House is acting, and which is undoubtedly generally correct.

Mr. TOOMBS. I hope this report will not be agreed to. There has not been a general appropriation bill passed at this session without independent substantial legislation, except one or two small bills. There has been not one of the important appropriation bills which has not had at least fifteen or twenty amendments added to it. These amendments are germane to the bill; they relate to the Post Office establishment, and are intended to make it self-supporting.

Mr. HUNTER. I did not mean to say that I never had voted for a legislative measure on an appropriation bill, but I have voted for very few of them. The point I always made, and to which I adhere now, is, that I might vote on an appropriation bill for legislation which was known to be agreeable to the other House, under the reservation that if they protested against it, I would recede from it, and not attempt to force it on them through an appropriation bill.

Mr. TOOMBS. I do not think my friend can stand on that. There never were two subjects more germane to the Post Office bill than the amendments of the Senate. Seeing that there was a deficiency of $3,500,000 in the Post Office revenue, besides what comes under the Navy Department, amounting altogether to probably five millions, the Senate proposed to increase the rate of postage, and to take off the franking privilege from this body and the other House. As I stated the other night, a former committee of conference on the part of the Senate, proposed to the House committee that if they would allow the Senate to strike off their own franking privilege, we would agree to everything else, but they would not consent to that. If the other House had pretended to act on that principle, I should not have said a word. I believe the principle of the Senator from Virginia is generally a sound principle; but when it is offered to me as a pretext for preserving abuses, let the bill go, so far as I am concerned.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I understand, sir, that the reduction of postage to a point which it has now become evident is insufficient to meet the demands of the service, took place on an appropriation bill. Now the Post Office appropriation bill comes before us, from the Department, evincing that that Department is unable to pay its own expenses, and asking us to devote three or four million dollars from the public Treasury to support it. Finding that to be the state of the case, and desiring to conform to the time-honored policy of the Government, the Senate says, "we will agree to make the appropriations which have become necessary by the former amendment put upon an appropriation bill; but we will now recall our assent to that former amendment, and put the postage back where it was, to prevent a recurrence of this deficiency."

Mr. HUNTER. Is the Senator certain that the reduction was on an appropriation bill?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I am told so. I hold myself to a principle which I do not find shared by my brother Senators to any great extent. I consider that in this Government it is the duty of the House of Representatives, or of that branch of Congress which proposes an appropriation, to recede from it if the other branch persists in its rejection. According to the theory of our Government, no money ought to be expended except with the concurrence of the two branches of Congress. Consequently, whenever one branch desires a particular expenditure to be made, and the other has a persistent objection to it, the House that proposes the expenditure is in all cases bound to yield. Such is my judgment—and I put it forward with great diffidence—in regard to the amendments which are usually tacked to appropriation bills, including particular items of expenditure. If this were a proposition on the part of the Senate to expend any money, and the other House declined to expend that money, I hold that it would be violative of the true theory of the Constitution for us to insist that the House should abandon its judgment, which was opposed to the expenditure of the money, or lose an appropriation bill. Under such circumstances, I should always be in favor of a motion that the Senate recede. But, sir, we are asked now to spend money in the Treasury to the extent of millions of dollars, and to leave the system as it is, so that we shall be asked next winter to appropriate four or five millions more. The object of the Senate now is, not to refuse the appropriation this year, but to grant it on such conditions as shall prohibit or preclude the possibility of its being asked of us again next year.

Now we do not propose to the other House, as a matter of legislation to be forced upon them, that they augment the postage, or that they abandon the franking privilege, if they will offer some amendment to our amendment, which will save us next year from an appropriation of $5,000,000. We all say we must stop this appropriation; we all say that the Government is extravagant. We say now to the House: "Stop this extravagance; the revenues of the country will not suffice to do what you demand. We agree to the urgency of the claim at the present moment, but we can consent to it only upon condition that we are secured against the recurrence of a similar claim next year." Consequently, I think nothing can be more reasonable, nothing can be more in accordance with our theory of constitutional government, than for us to insist that the House of Representatives shall agree to diminish the expenses of the Post Office Department by relieving it from the burden of the franking privilege; or, if they desire to retain the franking privilege, that they shall increase the revenue of the Department so as to support that burden by increasing the postage on letters. I do not consider this legislation, strictly speaking, on an appropriation bill; but I consider it is a guard against the recurrence of this appropriation next year. It is a condition put upon the appropriation of the present year—"we will appropriate for the fiscal year between July 1, 1858, and July 1, 1859, on condition that we are not to be called upon for the following year."

Now, after all, Mr. President, what does the whole matter amount to? The two or three million dollars are to be paid, must be paid, for service we have ordered. It is to be raised in one of two ways: either by general taxation, or by a tax of two cents on every letter written in the United States. Shall this additional sum of three or four million dollars be raised by a general tax upon everybody in the country, or shall it be raised upon those who are willing to pay for the service to be rendered, by paying two cents per letter more? I will say, in relation to this raising of the postage, that, in my judgment, nothing can be more eminently just or proper. The reduction of postage to three cents was for the benefit, exclusively, of one class in this country, and that the smallest class of the country, for the benefit of the merchants in four or five large cities. It was for the benefit of the vast mercantile correspondence between four or five large cities, that postage was reduced to three cents. Take the people of the country at large in their daily avocations, in their communications on family matters, and on friendly matters, and not one man in ten thousand cares whether he pays three or five cents for his letter; but in the large cities where people write a hundred letters a day in great commercial transactions, they make a strenuous opposition to the increase of postage, slight to the individual, but important to the Government.

I hope the Senate will not recede from both these amendments. The result inevitably is, that when we come back here next winter, at the short session, we shall not be able to perfect any system in a separate bill; there will be no time—that will be the cry; we shall have another deficiency bill of four or five millions more for the Post Office Department and yet gentlemen on all sides cry out for reform, retrenchment and economy. There is this single method left to us. I hope the Senate will not abandon it.

Mr. BAYARD. If I could agree with the honorable Senator from Louisiana that this was a mere condition, and not legislation upon an appropriation, I might arrive at the same conclusions that he does. I admit that, in my opinion, it was unwise, originally, to reduce the postage to three cents; and I think it is wise now to put it at five cents again. I have no objection to such a proposition brought properly before us; but if I understand the fair theory of our Government, an appropriation bill is made to give the means to carry out existing laws. Now, it is proposed to go a step further, and provide on an appropriation bill for altering those laws. I do not think either House is ever justified in placing on an appropriation bill, with a view to coercion, a condition saying to the other House, "we will not grant the supplies demanded by existing laws, unless, in a case in which you differ from us as to the propriety of the law remaining as it is, you will change it." The attempt here is on the part of the Senate to impose a condition, if you choose to use that term, on the House of Representatives, that the law shall be altered, or else that the Senate will not make the appropriation called for by the existing law. If the cases were reversed, and the proposition came from the House of Representatives to the Senate, I should equally object to it. I object to the theory and to the practice of enforced legislation by one branch against the other. I have done it hitherto in many cases when the House of Representatives has attempted to force legislation on the Senate. I do so now, though I think the postage ought to be raised, when the Senate attempts to force legislation on the House of Representatives in an appropriation bill.

The theory of our Constitution must be, that both Houses are coördinate and of equal authority. The assent of both must be given to make a law or to alter a law. Under existing laws, however, there is an implied faith as regards the appropriation bills, that we shall carry out those laws until they are changed. If you suffer one House to attach to an appropriation bill provisions which change existing laws, you alter the whole theory of the Government, because you no longer have the consent of the two Houses; but you have the enforced action of one House, agreeing to it rather than stop the wheels of Government by denying the appropriations called for by existing laws. Whether you call these amendments a condition or not, I regard them as an attempt to change existing laws by enforced legislation on the part of the Senate as against the House of Representatives. Whether these laws ought to be changed or not is perfectly immaterial to this question. I can never accede to the doctrine of enforced legislation in this way.

Mr. SIMMONS. I hope the Senate will recede from these amendments, and I have a word to say in response to the Senator from Louisiana as to the propriety of resorting to an increase of the letter postage to make up the deficiency in the Post Office Department. Any Senator who will examine the question will find that letters at three cents postage pay four-fold, and it may be as much as ten-fold, what any other description of matter carried in the mail pays. At three cents postage, letters pay a dollar a pound, and when you come to look at the newspapers and the vast matter carried by the mail, it generally does not pay twelve cents a pound. I agree that newspapers may be regarded as a means of educating the people, and it may be proper to avoid levying on them such a postage as would restrict their circulation; but is it not right that all the franked matter should pay postage? That was the law when you reduced the postage.

Mr. PUGH. That was excepted. There was a proviso in the law that it should not affect the franking privilege.

Mr. SIMMONS. At the time the law passed, reducing the postage, there was a provision in the old law that all letters franked by members of Congress and public officers should be charged with postage.

Mr. PUGH. There was a proviso in the act "that nothing herein contained shall be so construed as to alter the laws in relation to the franking privilege," so that there was no attempt to charge the franking privilege on the Treasury. It just amounts to an appropriation out of the Post Office revenues to carry on the business of franking.

Mr. SIMMONS. I desire to know whether the Treasury does not now pay for the mail matter that is franked?

Mr. PUGH. No.

Mr. SIMMONS. Then you propose to tax the letter writers for the transportation of your public documents all over this country, in order to keep up the revenues of the Post Office Department. You now charge three cents for a letter of half an ounce, which is at the rate of a dollar a pound, and I venture to say that you do not get ten cents a pound for any other mail matter carried in the mails.

Mr. HUNTER. Will the Senator allow me to state that there is a mistake as to a fact? The reduction of postage from five to three cents was by a separate act, which the Senator from Kentucky has been kind enough to show me. It was not done on an appropriation bill. It was a separate act, entitled "An act further to amend an act entitled, 'An act to reduce and modify the rates of postage, and for other purposes,'" passed March 3, 1851.

Mr. SIMMONS. I merely wanted to bring the attention of the Senate to the fact that if we are going to resort to the mail matter to make up the deficiency in the Post Office revenues, the letter postage is the last place to which we can resort, in justice, for letters pay ten-fold the postage that anything else does now, and I should like to know if it is not as much to the public convenience, prosperity, and happiness, to have this social correspondence exist, as it is to circulate newspapers, and pamphlets, and documents, which do not pay one tenth as much as letters? If you resort to anything, go to the franked matter and pay postage for that.

Mr. SEWARD. I do not want to make a speech, but to say a single word, so as to be distinctly understood by the country in regard to this subject. I am against the increase of the rate of postage, and for the abolition of the franking privilege; and I desire to have the question divided, in order that I may so vote.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report of the committee cannot be divided.

Mr. SEWARD. Then I can only say that it is unfortunate that these amendments were introduced at so late a stage of the session. I believe that, if you abolish the franking privilege, the Post Office revenues will be sufficient to sustain the Department.

Mr. YULEE. There is a misapprehension and mistake as to the manner in which the postage was reduced from five to three cents. It was not by an amendment to an appropriation bill, but by a special act directed to that and other subjects appertaining to the administration of the Post Office Department. Perhaps the mistake occurs from another fact which I will state, which answers the purpose of gentlemen who have referred to that as an illustration of the previous practice—the legislation by which prepayment was required and postage stamps authorized to be issued, was by an amendment to a post-route bill.

I agreed, upon the committee of conference, to the report which has been made for a general recession on the part of the Senate; and my reason for it was this: it was perfectly evident that the House of Representatives had resolved not to enter with us into legislation on the subject of the rates of postage and of the franking privilege at this session, and it seemed to me that it was the disposition of the Senate to postpone that point until the next session, rather than to prolong the present session to any very great extent; and I believed that it was useless, and not worthy of this body, to continue a contest with the other House upon any of the lesser points involved in the difference between the two Houses. I preferred to yield entirely rather than to yield on these two leading points, and carry on a contest upon minor amendments, none of which were material, and either of which might be postponed without any serious injury to the public interests, until next session. Now, as I understood the position of the House of Representatives, they were prepared to yield upon the points on which the House had already concurred, but were not prepared to go further.

Mr. PUGH. Allow me to ask, how did the conference committee get jurisdiction of amendments to which the House of Representatives had agreed?

Mr. YULEE. If the Senator will look at the message from the House, he will see that the House reconsidered all their agreements, and non-concurred generally in all the amendments of the Senate. It was for us to consider whether we would enter with them into a controversy on all these amendments, which were minor points of difference, or whether we would report to the Senate a general concession to the House, which might be agreed to or not, as the Senate pleased; and if the Senate should determine not to recede they would then still have the whole subject before them, untrammelled by any concessions on the part of the Senate committee on minor points, while these two principal points remained. We thought it better that the Senate should have it in its power either to recede altogether, or, by maintaining its position altogether, to urge those points which it might consider material yet to maintain in its controversy with the House, and not to narrow the grounds by putting the Senate, through a recommendation of its committee, upon minor points as to the basis of its controversy with the House. It was better, if the controversy was to continue, that the Senate should refuse altogether to recede, and carry on the controversy on the basis on which it has heretofore rested.

Mr. BROWN. I shall vote against this report for several reasons. In the first place, I see nothing in the idea of objecting to general legislation on an appropriation bill. How often during this session, and every other session of Congress, has it been done by both Houses? This is an objection urged to a measure which is distasteful to gentlemen, just as the same argument has been urged a hundred times before; and it is only urged by those to whom the measure is distasteful. If it were pleasant to them they would swallow it in both Houses, of course without a word; but it is an argument lugged in by the ears and shaken in the face of the Senate, every time anything is proposed which chances to be a little distasteful to gentlemen. If we could get back to the original principle, and put nothing but appropriations on appropriation bills, I should be very willing to stand upon that principle now and through all time to come; but we have not done it, and we are not going to do it.

Then what is there in the argument about prolonging the session? Suppose the House of Representatives do bring the session abruptly to a close by the loss of this bill: the President has the power, and he will exercise it, to tell them to come back, take their seats, and discharge the duty for which they are paid. The session can as well last to the 1st Monday of December, as come abruptly to a close when the clock points to the hour of six this evening; and it will not cost the Government a sixpence to prolong it to that time. I protest against the argument, that gentlemen who are paid by the year to transact the public business must hasten abruptly to close the session of Congress, and that, upon the declaration that they cannot stay any longer, we are to give up important measures. Are public and private rights to be trampled under foot because gentlemen do not choose to stay here, and do what they are paid to do? Such an argument rather inclines me to stand upon the Senate amendments, let the bill fail, and let the President call gentlemen back, and teach them their duty by the strong arm of constitutional power.

Then it is said: "these are small points; we can give them up; it will not cost anything to give them up." A small point, sir, not to increase the rate of postage, when your Post Office Department is costing you more than two million dollars over its revenue!

Mr. TOOMBS. I will mention to my friend that there are $3,500,000 appropriated in this very bill, out of the Treasury, independent of what goes through the Navy Department.

Mr. BROWN. I was not very accurate about the figures. I knew it was a large sum. Gentlemen speak of this as a small thing; they say it amounts to little. You are going into the market to borrow money. You borrowed $20,000,000 at the opening of the session, and now you are to borrow $20,000,000 at the close. There is an executive message on the table, telling you that these loans can by no possibility keep you going until beyond the 1st of January next; and yet you refuse to increase the rates of postage, when your Post Office establishment is thrown on the Treasury at an annual expense of $3,500,000 above its revenue. I think it is rather a large point. I do not think $3,500,000 are thus to be lightly thrown aside.

Now let me ask you, Mr. President, how is a large portion of the deficiency in the Post Office revenue created? It is on account of the franking privilege, to which gentlemen adhere with the tenacity of a dying man, and which it seems they will, under no circumstances, agree to surrender. They would sacrifice an important bill, compel the President to reconvene Congress, do anything, rather than give up this sacred privilege, as I suppose they regard it—a privilege which, to most members of Congress, is a burden. But, sir, I ask again, whether the franking privilege does not create a large portion of the deficiency in the Post Office revenues? I assert that it does, and I will tell you why. Within the last eighteen months, more than eighteen hundred tons of free matter have passed through the Washington city post office from members of Congress alone—enough to load a large-sized ship, enough to load two ordinary steamboats. This free matter has gone out; and where has it gone to? So long as it is upon your railroads and upon your four-horse stage coach lines, it gets along, I grant you, without much additional cost; but it gets to a point where it must necessarily be packed on horse-back, and it accumulates there to the extent of five or six hundred pounds. It does not take a great many of your eight large volumes of Pacific railroad surveys, Congressional Globes, and other heavy books, to amount to a large weight. What happens then? The horse mail cannot carry them; there is a complaint to the Postmaster General that mail matter is piled up there and the service is insufficient. He sends out a printed circular to have the mail weighed. They always weigh it about the time these big documents get there. The report is made that three or four or five hundred pounds have accumulated, which the mail-carrier cannot lug away. It stays there for a month or two; the postmaster weighs it again and sends back another report; and, finally, the Postmaster General, or one of his subordinates, is satisfied that an increase of service is necessary; and on that little horse route, where a pony could take the whole of the paying matter, you put on four-horse coaches to carry your documents, at an increased cost of thousands of dollars where the service was before performed amply for hundreds. It is done in my State, done in every State of the Union; and you have to-day not less than five thousand miles of coach service which was established for nothing on God's earth but to pack your franked documents. They run backwards with a little amount of paid matter that any man could carry in his hat. That happens in every State in the Union; you sum up at the end of the year five or six million dollars for carrying the mails. Take your free matter out of that; reduce your coach service, by giving one month's extra pay provided by law to an inferior grade of service; increase your postage to five cents instead of three; and the Post Office Department, in two years, will support itself and probably have a surplus; and yet, in the face of these things, gentlemen say, "this is a small matter, not worth controversy about; it is vastly less than compelling Congress to sit here a day or two longer." I think it is worth a contest which should compel Congress to sit here until the first Monday of December next. It costs your Treasury nothing to make them stay. Therefore it was that, on Saturday night, when my friend from Pennsylvania [Mr. BIGLER] proposed to introduce a resolution fixing another hour of adjournment, I objected to it. Introduce a resolution to abrogate any time of adjournment, and I shall have no objection. The House this morning took a different course, and we have agreed to adjourn at six o'clock. I hope we shall do so, and I hope we shall do it without this bill having seen daylight. Let it die, and let the President exercise his constitutional prerogative of reconvening Congress; and when gentlemen are brought back here, they will sit down in sober earnestness to the discharge of those great legislative duties imposed upon them by the Constitution, and which, in their compact with the people who sent them here, they have agreed faithfully, and as efficiently as they could, to perform.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I desire, Mr. President, to enter my dissent to the doctrines of the Senator from Mississippi. They proceed entirely upon the ground that, in this matter of difference between the House of Representatives and the Senate, we must necessarily be right and they must necessarily be wrong. We say, "increase the postage; strike off the franking privilege." They say, "keep the postage as it is, and the franking privilege as it is." Now, why is it concluded that necessarily they are wrong and we are right? The Senator says, "stay here from this time to December next, until they learn their duty." Suppose they say, "stay here until December next, until the Senate learns its duty."

Mr. BROWN. Very well; let us stay.

Mr. FESSENDEN. What do you gain by that? What does the country gain by it? If, after all, we do not agree, what does the country gain by our staying here? The House of Representatives have as much right to hold out as we have, and they are as likely to be right as we are. I have as good an opinion of myself, and of my judgment, as most men; but I really do not go so far as to say that I cannot be mistaken, and that everybody who differs from me must be wrong. If we had any power to coerce the House of Representatives to come to our conclusion by staying here until December, there might be something in it; or, if the President had any power to coerce Congress to come to a particular conclusion by calling them together again, there might be something in it; but we cannot ignore the fact that the House of Representatives utterly refused to agree to our opinions. Very well; the responsibility is upon them, and not upon us. If I could see, in the first place, to a dead certainty, that we were infallible in our judgments, and in the next place, that the House would agree to our infallibility, I should be willing to stay; but when the House have expressed their opinion as decidedly as we have expressed ours—and at any rate we can claim no more infallibility than they can—what is the use of staying here to fight about it?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Will the Senator permit me one word?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I notice in the Intelligencer of this morning that the vote in relation to the franking privilege was—73 to 83. There was a majority of ten in a House of one hundred and fifty-six members. A full House consists of two hundred and thirty-six members; and when, in so thin a House, there was a majority of but ten against it, what right have we to conclude that the House will not reconsider its action on the franking privilege? because that, I assure the Senate, will of itself form an economy in our mail service of several millions of dollars.

Mr. FESSENDEN. That is a state of things I am not talking about. I am speaking of the arguments of the Senator from Mississippi, [Mr. Brown.] He did not speak of the probability of the other House passing it; he put it upon the broad ground that we were right and they were wrong, and that we should stay here until they came to their senses, and compel them to do right. I beg leave to say that that is a conclusion to which I cannot come, because they are just as likely to be right as we are, and just as likely to be obstinate as we are.

Mr. FOSTER. More so, if they are wrong. Mr. FESSENDEN. Certainly, as my friend from Connecticut suggests, they are more likely to be obstinate if they are wrong. Taking the premises which I have laid down, I ask what in the world is the use of our staying here until they have receded? because they will not be likely to do it. Or what will be gained by our fighting this out, and letting the President call an extra session, if they will stand out then just as well as now? Therefore I say it is entirely inconclusive; it is talking for anything but a result, to talk about sitting here for the purpose of coercing a set of men to come to our conclusion; for they will not be more likely to be governed by us than we shall be to be governed by them. If you have an extra session, avowing that the object is to compel them to submit to your views, do you think they will be likely to do so? I would not, if I was in their case, if I staid here from July to January, and from January to July again. If I were in the other House, I would say, "I will teach the Senate that I will not do what they want to compel me to do;" and that is very likely to be what they will say. If there was a probability that they would recede, I grant it might be well to make the trial. There is, however, no probability of that. The vote in the House was not a very large one; but I am informed that it was a decisive one, and the committee of conference expressed the opinion of the House on that point. If that committee on the part of the House thought the House would recede, probably a different report would have been made; but the committee of conference has come to the conclusion, upon proper grounds, in the first place, that we gain nothing by the struggle; and in the next place, that we are struggling upon a principle which we cannot very well maintain. That being the case, there is but one sensible course to take, in my judgment; and that is, to adopt this report. What is the use of having continual committees of conference, one after another, each House standing out, and then having another session and fighting the battle over again?

Sir, what we cannot accomplish, and see we cannot accomplish, it is good sense to yield, and place the responsibility upon that body which is willing to take it. If they are wrong, the country will judge them, and not us; hold them responsible, and not us. We have done all we can. No man is bound to do more than he can, even to effect a good object. He must struggle until he sees that effort is useless, and then, as a sensible man, he will yield the point, and take some other and better opportunity to accomplish that which he desires, and which he thinks the good of the country requires.

Mr. FOSTER. I agree with the honorable Senator from Virginia, with regard to the principles on which the Senate should act, considering the relations in which the two Houses stand together at this time. I think we are in great danger of placing ourselves in a false position if we take the opposite ground. I think, in regard to the two questions about which the two Houses differ, if we are in the right, and have made up our minds that Congress ought not to adjourn until the franking privilege is abolished, and until the rate of postage is increased, it was our duty to have brought in a bill, at least, embodying one of these principles—namely, the abolition of the franking privilege—and passed it, and sent it to the House of Representatives; and also a bill raising the postage, if we are at liberty to originate such a bill in this body, which is perhaps questionable. We are, at all events, authorized to abolish the franking privilege by a bill introduced into this body originally. If we had done that, and sent it to the other House, and they had refused to pass it, we might have stood upon that bill until the Congress expired under the Constitution, and we should have stood properly before the country, if that was our opinion. But to put these two amendments on this appropriation bill, and insist that we will not adjourn until the other House adopts them, is placing ourselves in a false position. I think the honorable Senator from Virginia is right, and I shall vote with him to accept this report of the committee of conference.

Mr. PUGH. I am not in favor of coercing the House of Representatives, nor am I in favor of general legislation upon an appropriation bill; but this case presents neither of these questions. The House of Representatives has sent us a bill appropriating given sums of money for the service of the Post Office Department. The House of Representatives sent us on Saturday night an amendment to the loan bill, increasing the loan from $15,000,000 to $20,000,000, making $40,000,000 that we have borrowed at this session, besides the surplus of $17,000,000 which was on hand on the 1st of July last, and has been consumed during the fiscal year. Now, unless we can provide a revenue we cannot, in justice to the country, pass the House bill. It is our duty not to pass that bill until we provide the means of payment. Where is the money to come from to make all these appropriations? You must retrench the expenses of the Post Office Department, or you must reduce the amount appropriated by the House in their bill. We proposed four amendments, each one of them calculated to reduce largely the expenses of the Post Office Department, or largely to increase its revenue. The House agreed to two of these amendments after solemn argument, by a test vote. One was a proposition to give out the printing of certain blanks connected with that Department to the lowest bidder. It was a very great reduction. They also agreed to the proposition to give the advertisement of the letter list to the lowest bidder. The House discovered no general legislation, no incongruity in these amendments. They agreed to both of them, and only disagreed to the two amendments abolishing the franking privilege and increasing the rates of postage.

The bill went to a conference. What then? The committee of conference did not agree on these two amendments. It went to a second conference, and the conference again did not agree. Then the House go back and rescind their agreement to amendments to which they had already consented, refuse to give up two abuses, and insist upon perpetuating two more. What is the consequence? We know that with the appropriations contained in this bill, unless we provide the means of payment, there will be a deficiency in the revenue; and how is it to be made up? By another loan bill? If so, it is our duty to sit here and pass the loan bill. We ought not to appropriate more money than the Government has on hand.

We have proposed, in addition to the two amendments to which the House at one time agreed, and which are material in reducing the expenses of the Government, to abolish the franking privilege. It is a great convenience to us individually, and it will be more expensive to us individually if we do not abolish it; but what is the case on the other hand? The Senator from Mississippi has told us the truth, and we know it. I have no doubt that the abolition of the franking privilege will reduce the expenses of the Government between five and six millions a year, taken in all its ramifications. It puts a stop to the increased mail service which is only necessary to carry the free matter. It will put a stop to the extravagant printing of books by Congress. It will put an end to all this matter that is loading down the mails in every direction. My own judgment was, that that one reform put upon this bill would have been sufficient. If the House had agreed to that, we should have given up the increased rates of postage. In fact, I thought the increase was rather too sudden, although, in my opinion, there ought to be some increase.

The position of the Senate therefore is, that the appropriations recommended by the House in this bill are too large, unless we provide a reduction of the expenses. It is not a case of general legislation; it is not a case of foreign matter put on an appropriation bill; it is simply carrying out the very just views of the President, so admirably expressed in his message, that if Congress makes the appropriations, it is the duty of Congress to provide the money; and we must either provide it by a new loan, or by adhering to our amendments, which reduce the expenses of the Post Office Department. Suppose we pass the House bill, and recede from all our amendments, as recommended by the committee of conference, and go home: what is the consequence? At the next session there will be a deficiency; we shall have to make a new loan. We had better make it now; we had better let the House of Representatives and everybody else see that, if they reject our amendments, they must increase the revenue of the Government from some other source.

While I adhere to the proposition on which I stood in the case of the Army appropriation bill two years ago, that neither House has a right to coerce the other to general legislation on an appropriation bill, I say that when the appropriations for the Post Office Department (the true doctrine in reference to which has always been that it should support itself) are too large for our present means, it is our duty either to reduce the appropriations or to adhere to our amendments. I think the House have behaved very badly, at all events—I say it with all due respect—in going back and striking off amendments to which they had once consented, which amendments were calculated to reduce expenses. This is the reason why, although I am very anxious to go home, and anxious to see an end to this bill, I cannot vote for the report of the conference committee, because it involves the responsibility of taking more money than the Government has to spend.

Mr. PEARCE. Mr. President, it is some seven or eight years since the present rates of postage were established. That was done by the concurrence of the two Houses of Congress, with the assent of the then President of the United States. From that day down to this, I think not a year has passed without a deficiency in the Post Office revenue; and that which was the policy of the country before, that the Post Office should be self-supporting, that its revenues should not exceed in cost the amount of its revenues, has, from that day down to this time, been departed from; and it seems as if the country, certainly as if Congress, had sanctioned the new idea that it should be no longer required that the Post Office should be self-supporting. We have, without any objection, so far as I now, certainly without any great effort to prevent that state of things, every year since 1851, appropriated additional sums of money to supply the deficiency in the revenues of the Post Office; and it would seem almost (as we have heard nothing like a serious proposition to change this state of things) as if it were the settled policy of Congress, sustained by the people, that that should be the case.

I am very ready to admit that I dissent from all that. I thought when the reduction was made, that we were doing a rash and unwise thing; that we were adopting an English system not adapted to the extent and circumstances of this country, and which, in the end, would prove to be entirely too onerous. I think so now. I voted very cheerfully the other day for the proposition of the Senator from Arkansas to increase the rates of postage; but I cannot disguise from myself the fact that it is a sudden movement. After seven years of acquiescence in this policy, without notice early in the session, without any formal proposition introduced and submitted to a committee, as ought to have been the case, in the very last week of the session, and, I believe, in the last three days of the session, by surprise, suddenly, by a sort of stampede, we determined to break down that system which we had sustained for some seven or eight years, and which had met with no great complaint in the country. I cannot but believe that an appeal to the country and a thorough discussion of this subject would have an effect upon the public sentiment, and would bring about a change in the rates of postage, for which I was prepared the other day, and shall be prepared at the next session of Congress.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The Senator says the act was passed seven or eight years ago. The act to which my attention is called, is dated March 3, 1855.

Mr. PEARCE. I thought it was passed in 1851.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. The act before me is dated March 3, 1855, three years ago. I am not aware when the three-cent postage was established before that.

Mr. PEARCE. Is not that a supplementary act? I am sure the general rates now prevailing were established in 1851.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I would be glad if the Senator would turn himself to that original act.

Mr. PEARCE. I think I am right. Now, in regard to the franking privilege, how long it has prevailed I do not know. I know it has prevailed for nearly thirty years—how much longer I will not undertake to say. We modified it in 1845. It was but a slight modification. Before that it was not exactly understood, and was construed differently in different parts of the country. Some slight inconvenience was felt by gentlemen who had to pay postage in one part of the country as I had, while others, in other portions of the country did not pay postage on their letters; and the result was, that an act at the next session of Congress, restored the franking privilege precisely to the condition in which it had been about twenty years before, to my knowledge.

In regard to that, I am perfectly ready to say that I am willing to give it up. It is to most members of the Senate, and I presume of the House, productive of much more labor than benefit. A small amount of postage upon our letters, I presume, would scarcely be inconvenient for any member of Congress to pay; and I am sure that that little disadvantage, if we are to consider it at all, would be far overbalanced by the dispensation with all this labor which is now most oppressive to Senators, if they undertake to perform it. For my own part, I do not undertake to perform it. I do not send out a tenth part of the documents which I receive; and I could not, unless I devoted myself to the business of a clerk, and gave up all idea of studying the great measures which are before the country. I generally give them away by the cart-load to institutions who make a better use of them, I suppose, than I can. I should be very glad to get rid of all the burden in that regard, and give up every part and parcel of the franking system; but it is the law long established and long practiced upon; and I do not think that, on an appropriation bill, the object of which is to provide the ways and means of carrying on the existing establishment, and paying for the service which by law the Postmaster General is to see performed throughout the country, upon a sudden amendment sprung upon the Senate in the last three days of the session, it is right to endeavor to coerce the House.

I do not consider this a case resembling that which the Senator from Louisiana mentions, and which, I think, the Senator from Georgia mentioned. I do not liken the Senate of the United States to the House of Commons of England; the House of Commons stand in a very different relation, either to the House of Lords or to the Crown, from that which we maintain to the House of Representatives. They hold the money strings, and it is the only mode by which they can coerce the Government when they think they are suffering grievances. If, when the House of Representatives send us a bill supplying the means for defraying the ordinary expenses of the service of one branch of the Government, we choose to put additional and new legislation on it, altering the system which has prevailed for years, and if we are justified in saying we will adhere to this and compel the House to do its duty, as one gentleman said, I beg to be understood as not joining in the idea of announcing what is the duty of the House. If we are to do that, if we are to say, "we will not give you the means for the support of the ordinary expenditures of this branch of the public service, unless we couple it with a condition suddenly sent to you," I do not see what appropriation the House can send to us, which we may not treat in the same way; and I do not see then but that we shall be undertaking to direct and control the whole legislation of the country, as we seem now to think the House is endeavoring to do in regard to us.

I hope, therefore, sir, that we shall not persist in these amendments, but at the next session of Congress let the appropriate committees take the subject into consideration, let them inquire into all the items in regard to this service, which, perhaps, would require some little time; let a report be made upon the whole subject, exhibiting the effect of the proposed change upon the condition of the Post Office, and after passing such a measure, let us adhere to it in the Senate until the very last measure of parliamentary means is exhausted. Then I think we may go to the country safely, if we must needs have a quarrel with the House of Representatives; but do not let us have a quarrel with the House at this stage of the session on a measure which, however wise and advantageous we may think it, we have proposed to them only two days before the adjournment. This bill, I think, passed the Senate on Friday night. Saturday and Monday morning were all that were left to the House to consider it, and surely, if on no other ground, they have on the ground of time, a right to say they will not be thus forced in such haste as this.

Mr. WADE. Is the question susceptible of division? I am desirous of voting for that portion of the amendment which proposes to abolish the franking privilege, and to vote against the increase of postage.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The report of the committee cannot be altered or amended or divided.

Mr. PUGH. But if we vote down the report, it will be open for us to insist or recede from any of our amendments, will it not?

The VICE PRESIDENT. Certainly.

Mr. WADE. This is an unfruitful debate. I am conscious that if the proposition had been made at an early portion of the session, it would have elicited debate at great length; but there is no time to indulge in discussion now on this subject. I presume every Senator's mind is made up on it, and as there is so much business to be done, I hope a vote will be taken.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I desire to say a word upon the point which has been suggested to the Chair in relation to the right of dividing the vote. I understand perfectly well that by the rules of parliamentary order the report of a committee of conference is indivisible; but I submit to the Chair and to the Senate whether this be really the report of a committee of conference. I will explain what I mean: in ordinary circumstances a committee of conference between the two Houses, meeting together on their disagreeing votes, comes to some terms of compromise by which each House granting and each House insisting upon something, an agreement is entered into, which, in its very nature, is indivisible; because what is asked by one is conceded by the other only in consideration of some concession in return. But now three gentlemen have been appointed from each House, and have met together; they are called a committee of conference, and our members come back here to report to us, and the members from the House go back to report to the House. What has the House got to vote on? If it is a report of a committee of conference, each House must have to vote upon it. The House of Representatives has nothing to vote upon. Can the House be asked to vote that the Senate recede from its amendments?

Mr. FESSENDEN. It votes to accept the report.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Is not that pure mockery? Is it not clear that this is not in the true sense of the word the report of a committee of conference, but rather the return to us of our committee of conference, with a recommendation that in their judgment we ought to recede from the amendments which we have tendered to the House. The House has nothing to vote upon. Nothing is recommended to the House. The proposition is to the Senate to recede from all its amendments, and leave the bill as it was. That is essentially divisible in its very nature.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to ask him a question. What is more common than one single amendment made to a bill? One House or the other must recede. Is not that something to vote upon?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The House that has not to recede has nothing to vote upon. Does not the Senator see at once that if we vote, on the recommendation of this committee, to recede from our amendments, the bill is passed; there is nothing for the other House to vote upon?

Mr. HUNTER. Would not that be the case if there was only one amendment?

Mr. BENJAMIN. Undoubtedly.

Mr. HUNTER. Would you say there could be no report from a committee of conference where there was one amendment?

Mr. BENJAMIN. I do not say that a committee of conference does not come in and report what it has done; but I say that here, what has been done in committee is a matter on which one House alone has to act; that is to say, whether it will or will not recede from its own amendments, and that, from the very nature of the case, is divisible. I cannot conceive upon what ground we are called upon to vote upon three or four amendments in block, under some supposed exigency of a parliamentary rule. I want a vote on these amendments separately. I agree with gentlemen that if the House insists that it will not increase the rate of postage for the purpose of raising the revenue, we cannot insist on our part that the House shall agree to that; but if the House call upon us to vote $3,500,000 out of the public Treasury for the purpose of carrying the mail, we have a right to say we want less mail-matter carried that does not pay, so that this deficiency may not exist hereafter. We have a right to say that we desire that the Postmaster General shall have a chance of reducing the expenditure by reducing, as the Senator from Mississippi has explained to us, the service from four-horse post-coach service to horseback service in many parts of the country where the mail is used for no other purpose than for carrying franked documents.

Upon that I am willing to make a stand, and desirous of making a stand, that the House shall increase the revenue or diminish the expenditure as we propose, or that they shall propose some mode themselves. I think we ought to vote upon these distinct propositions, for each proposition is as distinct as it can be. An ordinary report from a committee of conference cannot be divided into distinct propositions, and that is the reason it is indivisible; it is put together; in its very nature it is indivisible. You cannot make a compromise by voting that you will take what is granted to you, and reject what you are to give up in return. But when the proposition to the Senate is to recede from all its amendments, it appears to me that a rule of that kind, to use a legal phrase, perhaps not exactly intelligible in ordinary language, is insensible; that is, it has no sense in it. I cannot conceive why we shall not be allowed to insist on one of our amendments and recede from the other.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In regard to the point of order, the Chair will suggest that it is unnecessary to debate it further. Unless some action by the Senate shall be taken, the Chair decides that this report of the committee of conference cannot, at this time, be altered or divided, but must be accepted or rejected. If voted down it will be in the power of the Senate to vote on the amendments separately.

Mr. HUNTER. If the Senate vote down the report, they can then vote on the separate propositions.

Mr. BAYARD. No one knows better than myself the resources of the honorable Senator from Louisiana. He has shifted his ground entirely, and gone off on a collateral question as to the separation of the report of a committee of conference, a thing never heard of before in this body.

Mr. FESSENDEN. The Senator will allow me to suggest that the Chair has decided that question.

Mr. BAYARD. I understand that precisely. I know exactly what he has decided, and I do not mean to continue the debate unnecessarily at all; and the Chair having decided that, it is not necessary to enter into the fallacy, which I think derogates from the argument of the Senator from Louisiana on that point—the assumption that the committee of conference is solely founded on the idea of a compromise. It is founded on comparison of opinion, with a view to bring about a result.

I shall not attempt to enter into that now; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to the fallacy of the argument connected with the importance of these questions. If they were so important as they are deemed to be—and I do not mean to underrate them—and if it was so necessary to coerce the House of Representatives, why is it that, in the course of this session, no one member of this body has thought it necessary, until the last day of the session but two, to make any motion in reference to the increase of postage or the abandonment of the franking privilege?

Mr. BENJAMIN. The Senator is mistaken. The Senator from Virginia, [Mr. HUNTER,] in the early part of the session, introduced a bill, which was referred to the Post Office Committee, and they have never got at it yet.

Mr. BAYARD. It was never reported on, I think.

Mr. BENJAMIN. Not at all.

Mr. BAYARD. It was only introduced by a single member.

Mr. BENJAMIN. It was a bill to modify the franking privilege and increase the rates of postage.

Mr. BAYARD. The subject was worthy of attention in a separate bill. The franking privilege has stood from the foundation of the Government, and therefore it cannot be that there are no arguments in support of it. The system of reduced postages has stood for many years past. On the last day but one of the session the Senate insists that the House of Representatives shall, as a condition for passing a necessary bill for the support of the Government, enter into and discuss all these matters. I stated before that I think there ought to be some increase of postage; but it ought to come before us in a proper bill by itself. I know of no more dangerous doctrine than I have heard Senators advocate on this bill—that it is proper for us to tell the House of Representatives that they are not performing their duty, and that it is our right to coerce the House of Representatives. A more dangerous precedent cannot be set by this body than to refuse to adopt this report of the committee of conference in that view of the case.

Mr. YULEE. I consider it due to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to make an explanation in reference to a remark made by the Senator from Louisiana. I understand the Senator from Louisiana to call attention to the fact that the subject of the increase of postage had been referred to the Committee on the Post Office, and had laid there.

Mr. BENJAMIN. So I understand.

Mr. YULEE. I think it proper, in behalf of the committee, to state that the subject was considered by the committee, and the judgment they came to was, that it was not expedient to propose action at the present session; but, inasmuch as they did design to consider the subject further, and to report at some time, they preferred to retain the bill with a view to action at the next session.

I will say, also, that the same course was adopted in reference to the abolition of the franking privilege. I introduced myself, at an early period of the session, a resolution calling the attention of the committee to the propriety of reporting a bill for the repeal of the franking privilege. It was referred to the committee; and they took the same view in respect to that as in regard to the other—that it would be better to consider it further, and wait until the next session.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 33, nays 17; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Bigler, Bright, Chandler, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Dixon, Doolittle, Durkee, Fessenden, Foot, Foster, Gwin, Hale, Harlan, Houston, Hunter, Kennedy, King, Mallory, Mason, Pearce, Polk, Reid, Seward, Simmons, Thompson of Kentucky, Trumbull, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—33.

NAYS—Messrs. Benjamin, Broderick, Brown, Clay, Davis, Douglas, Fitch, Hammond, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Pugh, Slidell, Stuart, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, and Wade—17.

So the report was agreed to.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a bill (H. R. No. 652) to repeal the second section of the act entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," approved June 14, 1858; in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS.

Mr. SLIDELL. I offer a resolution which I hope may be immediately considered. It is one that has been passed for three or four years, and has been found very much to facilitate business.

Mr. MASON. I rise to preserve the order of the Senate. I understood we were in executive session, and the doors were opened for the time only.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The doors were opened on motion, and we are in open session.

The resolution of Mr. SLIDELL was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That all subjects before the Senate at the close of the present session, including those before committees, shall be continued to the next session, and shall then be proceeded with in the same manner as if no adjournment of the Senate had taken place, and the papers which have been referred to the committees, and may be in their possession, at the close of the session, shall be returned informally to the Secretary, and by him restored to the committees when appointed at the next session.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. MASON. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BAYARD. I hope the Senator will give way, to allow the passage of a House bill.

Mr. MASON. I should be glad to ask for the passage of House bills myself.

Mr. BAYARD. It will not take two minutes, and it is important for the administration of justice in the Territories of the United States.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

Mr. COLLAMER. I wish to inquire in relation to the light-house appropriation bill.

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is upon the table.

Mr. CLAY. I will inform the Senator from Vermont, that it cannot pass, and he need not waste time by taking it up. There will be no new light-house established this year.

Mr. COLLAMER. It is not for new light-houses. It is for the support of the Light-House department, I understand.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Virginia to proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was not agreed to.

TERRITORIAL COURTS.

Mr. BAYARD. I desire to ask the Senate to take up the bill (H. R. No. 59) in relation to courts, and the holding of the terms thereof in the several Territories of the United States. It is reported without amendment from the Committee on the Judiciary, and I presume there can be no objection to its passage. It is a very short bill.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will state, for the information of the Senator from Delaware, that I was in the House of Representatives a few minutes ago, and heard the chairman of the Enrolling Committee of the House, when they were about to take up and pass a bill, inform them that he was authorized by the President to say that he would sign no bill which had not been presented to him on Saturday, except the regular appropriation bills. I therefore suggest to the Senator that the consequence will be that if the bill be not signed, it will be in a worse position than if it be left as it is.

Mr. CRITTENDEN. I wish simply to say a word. It is unusual altogether for the Senate to receive any communication of the character which has just been made to us as to what the President will or will not do. It is against the privileges and the rights of this body. Is it intended to operate upon us and to make us conform our action to the irregular edicts that may be brought in and pronounced by anybody here? I say this with great respect, and merely in order to make known my protest at any rate as one Senator against it as an infringement of the rights of the Senate.

The question being put on the motion, there were—yeas 22, nays 7; no quorum voting.

Mr. MASON. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business; and I ask for a division on that vote.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope the Senate will pass this bill before it goes into executive session. It is evident that there is a large majority of the Senate who wish to do it; and that will ought to be respected.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will state, moreover, that there is another bill on the table which has come from the House, to repeal a section of law which passed both Houses on Saturday, and which, I am told, makes a very large appropriation of money, and was passed without having been understood either by the House or the Senate, and contrary to the intention of both. It came in this morning.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The Chair will suggest to the Senator from Maine that no business can be transacted until measures are taken to ascertain the presence of a quorum.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I would only—

Mr. STUART. The Senator will allow me to suggest that we can take no question until we ascertain that there is a quorum here. I therefore ask for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Delaware.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HALE. I wish to suggest, in reference to the intimation made by the Senator from Maine, that there has been no such bill passed as he has described, which that bill undertakes to repeal.

The question being taken by yeas and nays, resulted—yeas 41, nays 5; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen, Bayard, Benjamin, Bigler, Broderick, Chandler, Clay, Clingman, Collamer, Crittenden, Doolittle, Fessenden, Fitch, Fitzpatrick, Foot, Foster, Harlan, Houston, Iverson, Johnson of Arkansas, Johnson of Tennessee, Jones, Kennedy, King, Mallory, Pearce, Polk, Pugh, Reid, Rice, Seward, Simmons, Stuart, Thompson of Kentucky, Thomson of New Jersey, Toombs, Trumbull, Wade, Wilson, Wright, and Yulee—41.

NAYS—Messrs. Brown, Hale, Hammond, Mason, and Slidell—5.

So the motion was agreed to; and the bill (H. R. No. 59) in relation to courts and the holding of the terms thereof in the several Territories of the United States, was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

It proposes to authorize the judges of the supreme court of each Territory of the United States to hold court within their respective districts, in the counties wherein, by the territorial laws, courts have been or may be established, for the purpose of hearing and determining all matters and causes, except those in which the United States is a party; but the expenses are to be paid by the Territory, or by the counties in which the courts may be held.

The bill was reported to the Senate, ordered to a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the Speaker had signed the enrolled bill (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and it was signed by the Vice President.

POST ROADS.

The bill (H. R. No. 652) to repeal the second section of an act entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," approved June 14, 1858, was read twice by its title.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I shall object to the consideration of this bill unless I can understand what it proposes.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The bill has been read twice as a matter of form for reference, and will go to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. MASON. I move an executive session.

Mr. YULEE. Before the bill is committed, which I think will be a very proper disposition of it, and the committee will immediately report to the Senate, I desire to call the attention of the Senator from Maine [Mr. FESSENDEN] to a remark which I understood or misunderstood him to make just now. I may have misunderstood him; but I understood him to say that legislation had been taken on the post route bill which involved an appropriation of $1,000,000, and it was not understood by the Senate at the time of its passage. Did I so understand him correctly?

Mr. FESSENDEN. A large sum of money, I said.

Mr. YULEE. I wish to say, in reply to that, that the Senator is entirely mistaken. There is no such legislation.

Mr. MASON. I rise to a question of order.

Mr. YULEE. The Senator will not object to an explanation?

Mr. MASON. If it is a matter of personal explanation, I shall not object.

Mr. YULEE. Most undoubtedly it is. I will state that the Senator from Maine is under a total mistake, as the House of Representatives has been in its action on this matter. The section to which this bill refers was read to the Senator from Maine himself personally, before it was introduced; and I am satisfied that he cannot know to what this bill relates. It was read to the Senator. It had been determined by the Post Office Committee unanimously that it should be reported; and when I reported the post route bill, I stated to the Senate—and the reporters, I dare say, took notes of what I said—that the first section related entirely to post routes; that the second section might be deemed to be somewhat more of a legislative character than the establishment of a post route, and that I would therefore read it to the Senate; and I read it from my place. I afterwards called the attention of the chairman of the Post Office Committee of the House to the section, and read it to him, it being a little more than the establishment of a route.

Now, I will state what it is. It has been objected to, I believe, in the House on the ground that it authorizes the establishment of an ocean mail service from Portland to New Orleans—the most absurd idea in the world. The committee had no idea of the sort; never dreamed of any such thing; nor did they dream of authorizing the establishment of any route not now existing or established. The whole purpose of it I will state. It was not to oblige anything, but simply to authorize the Postmaster General, and call his attention to, and impress upon him the importance of, the quick transit of the mail between New Orleans and Portland. The object was to enable him to make arrangements, or to call his attention to the importance of making arrangements, for expediting the mails in the winter season, when, in consequence of the snows, especially in the snowy region, and of freshets at other times, the mails are liable to be delayed upon a single link for an hour or two, which causes a break in the whole connection all the way through, causing the mail to lie over twelve or twenty-four hours, at the point at which it stops, according to the frequency of the mail on the route. The idea of the committee was, that we should, if it could be done without much expense, make arrangement for extra trains to take up the mail at the point at which it stopped, and carry it on, in order to prevent the delay upon the way. The section merely calls his attention to the subject; it obliges him to nothing. That is the whole of the matter. Now, sir, I propose that the motion be put on the reference of this bill to the committee, and we will report it directly.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will only say, in answer, that when I called the attention of the Senate to the subject, I did not know what the provision was. It was stated to me that a section had passed authorizing a new route, which would cost a large amount of money, and that that section had inadvertently escaped the attention of the House and the Senate. That being the case, I deemed it important that it should be taken up. I did not know what the matter was. I remember distinctly now that the Senator from Florida brought a section of a bill to me, and asked me a question in relation to it, with reference to Boston and Portland, which I answered.

Mr. CLINGMAN. I hope the clause will be read.

Mr. HALE. Can this bill be taken up without unanimous consent?

The VICE PRESIDENT. It is a House bill, which has been read twice, and will lie on the table or be referred, unless some other motion be made.

Mr. KING, and others. Let us have the section read which it proposes to repeal.

The Secretary read it, as follows:

SEC. 2. And be it further enacted, That the Postmaster General be authorized to make such arrangement for the transmission of the great through mails between Portland and New Orleans, as will insure the most speedy and certain connection, including in the route, for one of the daily mails, as many of the sea-board commercial cities as may be consistent with the greatest dispatch.

Mr. FESSENDEN. I will only say that the statement which I have mentioned being made to me, and knowing that this bill was lying on the table, if the fact existed I was desirous that the bill should be passed in order to prevent what otherwise would have been a surprise on Congress. I had reference to that, and that alone. The Senator from Florida afterwards told me that it was no such thing; and I said to him that if it was no such thing, I had no objection to the legislation which this bill proposes to repeal.

Mr. YULEE. Does the Senator recognize that section as the one I showed him?

Mr. FESSENDEN. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. I want simply in—

Mr. MASON. I insist on my motion. Let the bill be referred.

Mr. BIGLER. I hope the Senator from New Hampshire will allow me one word of explanation.

Mr. HALE. It is very seldom you hear my voice here. [Laughter.]

The VICE PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Virginia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. MASON. I do not.

The VICE PRESIDENT. We have become involved in a little confusion. The Chair had recognized the Senator from Virginia, who gave the floor to the Senator from Florida for a personal explanation. The Chair would be happy to recognize the Senator from New Hampshire if the Senator from Virginia—

Mr. MASON. If it extends to the same personal matter, and not the merits of this controversy, I shall yield.

Mr. HALE. I want simply to say, as an act of justice to the honorable Senator from Florida, that I was in the House of Representatives when this bill was called up there, and remarks were made—I do not know that it was on the floor, but among members—that were derogatory to the good faith of the Senator. This matter was called to the attention of the Postmaster General, by a vote of the Senate, at my instance, in the early

THE OFFICIAL PROCEEDINGS OF CONGRESS, PUBLISHED BY JOHN C. RIVES, WASHINGTON, D. C.

THIRTY-FIFTH CONGRESS, 1ST SESSION.

WEDNESDAY, JUNE 16, 1858.

NEW SERIES...No. 191.

part of the session. The Post Office Committee have had frequent conferences about it. We have conferred with the Postmaster General and several of the superintendents of railroads on this route; and instead of being a surprise or a trick, it has been a thing long considered by the committee, in perfect fairness and in an earnest and honest desire to increase the mail facilities without expense. I will do the honorable chairman of the Post Office Committee the credit to say that he has volunteered a good deal of anxiety to expedite mails in the West, and far beyond the circle of his immediate influence and action, and nothing could be fairer than this proposition, and nothing more unfounded and unjust than an intimation that there was anything unfair and dishonest, or concealed, about it.

Mr. BIGLER. I want to say a word of explanation, in justice to the Senator from Florida as well as myself. I was present in the House of Representatives this morning when this subject was discussed in a circle of members. Being known as a member of the Post Office Committee, I was appealed to to know whether I understood the subject. I was bound to reply that I did not; that I was not present when it was considered. The Senator from Florida remarked that the committee unanimously agreed to the report. He means, of course, those who were present.

Mr. YULEE. They were all present, except yourself, sir.

Mr. BIGLER. I was not present, and I so stated on the occasion referred to. I was engaged on a committee of conference, and knew nothing of the session. This much is due in justice to myself.

The VICE PRESIDENT. If no other motion be made, the bill from the House of Representatives will be referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. GWIN. As a member of the Post Office Committee, I should like to say a word.

Mr. MASON. If it is by way of personal explanation, I yield.

Mr. GWIN. I want to say that this matter was before the committee. It was new to me when it was discussed before, and I thought it referred entirely to expediting mails by the railroads touching at New York and the other cities going down.

Mr. YULEE. Exactly. That is the whole of it.

The bill was referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. YULEE subsequently submitted the following report:

That the section referred to was intended to call the attention of the Postmaster General to providing for the most speedy and certain transportation of the great commercial mail between the extremes of the Union; that it did not propose to prescribe any route to the Department, nor to create any route, but simply to recommend expedition of the mail upon such routes as may be employed by the Department, in conformity with the law for transporting mails, wherever the points designated may be.

The committee report further that the purpose of the provision of the section which required one of the daily mails to pass through as many sea-board commercial cities as might be consistent with the greatest dispatch, was to include in the benefits of such improvements as the Department might adopt as many commercial cities as might be consistent with the leading design of expedition. Such provision was deemed advisable because the great mass of foreign exchange is created in these cities, and every hour of delay in the transmission of such matter is a commercial loss; and inasmuch as the foreign mails depart from New York, Boston, and Portland, and a large part of foreign bills originate at New Orleans and the other southern cities, regularity and certainty in the communication between these points (including Portland, Portsmouth, Salem, Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, Norfolk, Alexandria, Richmond, Petersburg, Wilmington, Charleston, and Savannah) were of great public interest.

The legislation proposed to be repealed they consider advisable, and unanimously recommend that the bill do not pass.

EXECUTIVE BUSINESS.

Mr. MASON. I renew the motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I ask the Senator from Virginia to permit me to offer a resolution of inquiry.

Mr. MASON. I have been obliged to decline a like request from the Senator from Mississippi.

Mr. BENJAMIN. I hope we shall suspend going into executive session for five minutes, to let us offer these little resolutions.

The motion for an executive session was not agreed to.

CLAIMS AGAINST FOREIGN GOVERNMENTS.

Mr. BENJAMIN submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be prepared and submitted to the Senate, at the commencement of the next session, a list in tabular form setting forth—

1st. The names of such complainants or claimants, citizens of the United States, as have preferred complaints or claims against foreign Governments to the executive department of the Government for aggressions or spoliation or other demands against such Governments.

2d. The amount claimed.

3d. A brief abstract of the nature of the claim and the action of the Executive in relation thereto.

4th. The result of such action, and the amount of the satisfaction obtained, if any; said list to commence on the 1st of January, 1816.

COMMITTEE TO WAIT ON THE PRESIDENT.

A message from the House of Representatives by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed a resolution for the appointment of a committee to join such committee as may be appointed by the Senate to wait on the President of the United States and inform him that, unless he may have some further communication to make, Congress has finished the business before it, and is ready to close its present session by an adjournment sine die; and had appointed Mr. SAMUEL A. SMITH, Mr. JOHN C. KUNKEL, and Mr. LAWRENCE M. KEITT the committee on its part.

On motion of Mr. BIGLER the resolution was concurred in, and the Vice President was authorized to appoint the committee on the part of the Senate. Mr. BIGLER and Mr. FOOT were appointed.

SENATORIAL ELECTIONS.

Mr. DAVIS. I present the following resolution, and ask that it may be now considered:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of legislation by Congress to regulate the election of Senators of the United States, and that they report by bill or otherwise.

The reason for offering the resolution appears on its face, and I will therefore merely say that I am restrained from inquiring as freely as I desire into such questions as arise in relation to the election of Senators, by the respect I have for the voice of a State whenever she speaks. Congress has heretofore forborne to legislate, and Senators have been elected in such a contrariety of methods, that it can hardly now be said that we have a precedent. I think it desirable, therefore, that there should be legislation; that there should be some uniformity of rules; that hereafter we may not have questions conflicting with the authority of the State, or destructive of the rights of the Senate.

Mr. SEWARD. I hope the resolution will be taken up for immediate consideration, by unanimous consent.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution; which was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the papers in the following cases be withdrawn from the files of the Senate, and referred to the office of the Commissioner of Pensions, as they are provided for in the recent act of Congress "continuing half pay to certain widows and orphans"—Catharine Deany, Katharine M. Hamer, Elizabeth Monroe, Louisa Merrill, Margaret McGuire, Sarah Smead, Elizabeth Spear, Hannah Thompson, Sarah A. Watson, Mary Walsh.

On motion of Mr. MALLORY, it was Ordered, That Samuel James, Ignatius Lucas, Charles Tiley, and Thomas S. Binge, have leave to withdraw their petitions and papers.

On motion of Mr. BRIGHT, it was Ordered, That Sherlock & Shirley have leave to withdraw their petition and papers.

STATIONERY OF SENATORS.

Mr. IVERSON. I offer the following resolution, and ask for its consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Senate be directed to inquire into, and prepare, during the recess, a statement of the amount of stationery, and the cost thereof, which was furnished to each member of the Senate during the last Congress and the present session, and report the same to the Senate at the commencement of the next session; and that he also report the amount of stationery purchased for the use of the Senate at each session of the last and present Congresses.

I will simply state my object in this resolution. It is not to make capital out of anything of this kind, but to found upon it a proposition, at the next session, to make a commutation for postage as well as the stationery of each member.

The resolution was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. STUART, (at one o'clock and forty-five minutes, p. m.,) the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and the doors were reopened at two o'clock and fifteen minutes.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. ALLEN, its Clerk, announced that the House had passed the following resolution, in which the concurrence of the Senate was requested:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses, sine die, this day, at half past two o'clock, p. m.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

The message further announced that the Speaker had signed an enrolled bill (H. R. No. 59) entitled, "An act in relation to courts and the holding of the terms thereof, in the several Territories of the United States;" and it was signed by the Vice President.

BILLS BECOME LAWS.

The message further announced that the President had signed and approved, on the 11th instant, the following acts:

An act for the relief of certain purchasers of lands within the limits of the Choctaw cession of 1830;

An act for the relief of settlers on certain lands in the State of Illinois;

An act for the relief of John Sawyer, a soldier of the war of the Revolution;

An act for the relief of William S. Bradford; and

An act to change the times of holding the spring term of the district court of the United States for the western district of the State of Texas.

He, also, on the 12th instant, approved "An act for the relief of Nancy Magill, of Ohio."

And on this day the following acts:

An act making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859; and

An act to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000.

THANKS TO THE VICE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SEWARD, (Mr. MASON occupying the chair,) submitted the following resolution; which was unanimously agreed to:

Resolved, That the thanks of the Senate be unanimously tendered to the Hon. JOHN C. BRECKINRIDGE for the dignity and impartiality with which he has discharged the duties of Presiding Officer of this body.

ELECTION OF PRESIDENT PRO TEMPORE.

Mr. SLIDELL. Understanding that, according to custom, the Vice President has vacated the chair, I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (The Vice President being absent,) That the Senate now proceed to the election of a President of the Senate pro tempore.

The resolution was agreed to.

Mr. PUGH. I move that the Hon. BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK be President of the Senate unless some Senator demands a ballot.

Mr. SLIDELL. I will merely state for the information of the Senator from Ohio, that it was, after full consideration, deemed desirable in this case that the Senate should adhere to the established rule upon the subject. I have no sort of objection, however, to dispensing with a ballot.

Mr. PUGH. If any Senator demands a ballot I shall not object. ["Ballot!" "Ballot!"]

The PRESIDING OFFICER, (Mr. TOOMBS in the chair.) Senators will prepare their ballots. The ballots having been collected and canvassed, the result was declared as follows:

Whole number of votes cast, 48; necessary to a choice, 25; of which—

Hon. Benjamin Fitzpatrick received 37
Hon. William Pitt Fessenden..... 9
Hon. David C. Broderick..... 2

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Mr. FITZPATRICK having received thirty-seven votes, a majority of the whole number of votes cast, is therefore duly elected President pro tempore of the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore having been conducted to the chair by Mr. CRITTENDEN and Mr. BRIGHT, said: Senators, I am gratified by this renewal of your confidence; and I assure you that I will endeavor, to the best of my ability, to discharge the duties of the chair faithfully and impartially.

Mr. SLIDELL submitted the following resolution; which was considered, by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary inform the President of the United States and the House of Representatives that (the Vice President being absent) the Senate has chosen the Hon. BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK President of the Senate pro tempore.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. BROWN. The House of Representatives have passed a resolution to adjourn at half past two o'clock. It is that hour now. They are exceedingly anxious to get away. The President, it is understood, will call us together to-morrow for executive business. We cannot to-day, by any possibility, transact any other public business. I hope the Senate will concur in that resolution, and let them off. They are almost crazy to get away.

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order.

Mr. JONES. I made a privileged motion some time since which I desire—

Mr. IVERSON. I rise to a point of order.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia rises to a point of order.* He will state his point of order.

Mr. IVERSON. If it requires unanimous consent to consider the resolution of the House of Representatives, I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Then the Chair thinks it cannot be considered.

COMMITTEE CLERK.

Mr. STUART. We only went temporarily into open session for the purpose of making this election, and I suppose we may now resume the consideration of executive business.

Mr. IVERSON. We are now in open session, and I want to offer a resolution of which I gave notice on a former occasion, and I ask for its present consideration:

Resolved, That the annual compensation of the clerk to the Committee on Military Affairs and Militia shall be the same as that of the clerk to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. MASON. I move to lay the resolution on the table.

Mr. IVERSON. I hope not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution lies over under the rule.

Mr. IVERSON. I call for the yeas and nays on the motion of the Senator from Virginia.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution lies over under the rule.

Mr. IVERSON. No, sir; I gave notice previously that I would offer the resolution; and therefore it does not come under the rule. I have a right to have it considered at the present time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Georgia that all resolutions appropriating money are required to be considered on three separate days, if insisted on.

Mr. TOOMBS. It is insisted on.

Mr. IVERSON. It does not appropriate any money. It increases a salary.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. It proposes to increase the salary of an officer.

The resolution was laid over.

ACTION OF THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. HALE submitted the following preamble and resolution:

Whereas, the President of the United States has informed the Senate that he would approve no bills which he had not examined, and recommended that two days previous to the adjournment of each session should be allowed to the President within which no new bill should be presented to him for his approval, and at the same time has reserved the nomination of many officers (who have for months been in the offices for which they have been nominated) until the last two days of the session:

Resolved, That the President be respectfully informed that it will be agreeable to the Senate if, in his future executive communications to the Senate, he would accord to them the same time for deliberation which he deems necessary for himself.

Mr. SLIDELL. Is it in order to consider that? The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not if objected to.

Mr. SLIDELL. I object to it.

COMMITTEE CLERKS.

Mr. JONES submitted the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the clerks of the standing committee of the Senate, who are temporary, be continued for sixty days after the close of the present session.

Mr. TRUMBULL. I object.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Objection being made, the resolution cannot be considered to-day.

REGIMENT OF VOLUNTEERS.

Mr. DAVIS. I feel that it is my duty to call the attention of the Senate to a House bill lying on the table, and which frequent applications are made to me to take up. It is the bill (H. R. No. 567) to provide for the defense of Texas.

Mr. IVERSON. I think it unnecessary that the Senate should proceed to the consideration of that bill. It is a bill to appropriate $4,000,000 for the payment of three regiments of volunteers authorized by a previous act of Congress. The Senator from Mississippi will move to strike out "two," and leave it an appropriation only for the regiment of Texas rangers. For my own part, I consider that unnecessary. The President has intimated in very strong language that it is unnecessary to have even that regiment. The war with Utah is closed; the war with the Florida Indians is closed; and we can send to Texas as many regiments as we desire. We can cover over that whole State with regiments of the regular Army if necessary. It is unnecessary to consider the bill. I am opposed to it.

Mr. DAVIS. I will not consume the time of the Senate by arguing the merits of the bill on the question of taking it up. Senators are as well informed as I am. If they do not choose to take it up, very well. If they do, I can answer the remarks of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. TOOMBS. I think, myself, if they could get this regiment of Texas rangers, and dispense with that many regulars, it would be a great advantage to the country. I hope the Senate will take up the bill. We have nearly four hours left, and I think there is time enough to devote some time to the defense of the country.

Mr. IVERSON. How should we dispense with the regular troops by raising a regiment of volunteers?

Mr. HOUSTON. I will make but one observation. The Indians from above us cross the boundary of Texas, and depredate on our citizens. With a proper force of rangers on our frontiers, they could not cross over, and steal horses and commit depredations. Texas has remonstrated against this condition of things, and regular troops cannot prevent it. Those troops are in forts or stations, and the Indians pass a few miles beyond them, and go into the settlements, commit their depredations, and return with their plunder and with their scalps. That is the situation in which we are placed. We want a regiment of rangers to pursue them, and try to remedy the evil. That is the object. It is necessary to our salvation.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion to take up the bill indicated by the Senator from Mississippi.

The motion was not agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

On motion of Mr. JONES, the Senate again proceeded to the consideration of executive business; and an hour having been spent therein, the doors were reopened.

RECONSIDERATION.

On motion of Mr. TRUMBULL, the vote ordering the printing of the communications of the Postmaster General, with respect to the charges against the San Francisco postmaster, was reconsidered.

REPORTS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. FOSTER, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill (S. No. 66) to amend an act entitled "An act to continue half pay to certain widows and orphans," approved February 3, 1853, asked to be discharged from its further consideration; which was agreed to.

He also, from the same committee, to whom were referred the petition of George S. Seton, the petition of J. M. Morrill, in behalf of the Bangor City Greys, and the petition of the surviving soldiers of the third regiment, second brigade, of Massachusetts militia of the war of 1812, asked to be discharged from their further consideration; which was agreed to.

ARIZONA TERRITORY.

Mr. DOUGLAS. I move that the bill (S. No. 8) to organize the Territory of Arizona and to create the office of surveyor general therein; to provide for the examination of private land claims, to grant donations to actual settlers, to survey the public and private lands, and for other purposes, be postponed to and made the special order of the day for the second Monday of December next, with the understanding that the Dacotah and Nevada bills shall then also come up.

The motion was agreed to.

HOMESTEAD BILL.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I rise to a privileged question, to take up the motion to reconsider the vote postponing the homestead bill until January next.

Mr. MASON. As a question of order, I submit to the Chair that we went out of executive session only to receive the proposition from the Senator from Illinois, and that we are now again in executive session. We had better proceed with the business in executive session.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair so understands. The officers will close the doors. The doors were again reopened at thirty-five minutes past five o'clock, p. m.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I call up the motion to reconsider the postponement of the homestead bill.

Mr. FITCH. I wish to make a few remarks on a question which, I presume, is a privileged one. In executive session my question must be mentioned.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. We are now in open session.

Mr. FITCH. I was not aware of that.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is the motion of the Senator from Tennessee to proceed to the reconsideration of the homestead bill?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Mr. President—

Mr. YULEE. If the Senator will excuse me I will say that I apprehend it would be very important and desirable to the Senate to close the doors again upon the subject to which the Senator from Indiana refers. I believe it is always in order to move to close the doors.

Mr. KING. Not when somebody has the floor. The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Not when a Senator has the floor.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I understand I have the floor.

Mr. YULEE. Will not the Senator give way for that purpose?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. No, sir.

Mr. YULEE. I must object then to taking up his motion. I understand that the motion is to take up the homestead bill. I hope that it will be voted down.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The motion is to reconsider, which is a privileged question.

Mr. MASON. I understand—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. How does the gentleman get the floor?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Virginia, is not entitled to the floor except by the courtesy of the Senator from Tennessee.

Mr. MASON. I rise to a question of order. I understand that the Senator from Tennessee, some days ago moved to reconsider the vote upon the homestead bill, and he now asks the Senate to take up the bill for the purpose of reconsidering.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I did not move to take up the bill. It is a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was postponed.

Mr. MASON. That is the question of order which I present. There was a vote on the homestead bill which the Senator, on a former day, moved to reconsider; and the question now is, not on the motion to reconsider, but, "Will the Senate take up the homestead bill for the purpose of reconsidering?"

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The question is to reconsider.

Mr. MASON. I submit to the Presiding Officer that the only question on which the reconsideration can act is the bill; and, therefore, the motion is to take up the bill with a view to consider the motion heretofore made to reconsider the vote on the bill. You cannot reconsider it unless it is taken up. I submit that as a question of order.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. A motion to reconsider is a privileged question. The motion is made, and I have the floor.

Mr. MASON. I stand, sir, upon the question of order still.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator state his question of order?

Mr. MASON. The point of order is that the question presented by the Senator from Tennessee is a motion to take up the homestead bill, as it is called, with a view to its reconsideration.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I make no such motion.

Mr. MASON. I say there can be no reconsideration until the bill is before the Senate. I make that question of order, that unless the Senator moves to take up the bill for reconsideration, there is no motion before the Senate.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. The bill cannot be got before the Senate until it is reconsidered. The motion to reconsider, being a privileged question, can be called up at any time by the mover, or by any other member of the Senate. The motion has been made, the question is before the Senate, and I have the floor upon it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. I will call the attention of the Senator from Tennessee to the fact that, whilst there are now but five minutes before the time when the House meets, there is a matter here which the Senator himself, perhaps, would prefer should be explained, to avoid trouble hereafter. The Senator from Indiana calls attention to a clerical error that involves the confirmation of two gentlemen, which, I suppose, when we have adjourned, cannot be corrected at all.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I will conclude my remarks in sufficient time to go into executive session.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Arkansas. Before six o'clock?

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Before six o'clock. It is only twenty minutes of six now. I will give sufficient time.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair decides, on the question of order raised by the Senator from Virginia that the motion of the Senator from Tennessee is to proceed to the consideration of a motion he made, upon which a vote was taken, postponing the homestead bill to a certain day. Upon that motion the Chair determines that it is in order for the Senator to submit his remarks.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I do not intend to consume the time of the Senate, and I should not say a word now if I thought the time would be occupied more profitably; but I deem the homestead bill one of great importance to the country; and I wish to set right some statements which were made in reference to the origin and history of the measure on the discussion which took place upon its postponement a few weeks ago. On that occasion, my friend from Alabama, [Mr. CLAY,] in assigning some reasons why the bill should be postponed, made the following statement:

fallen from the Senator from Tennessee, before the vote is taken on this bill. He argues that public opinion is in favor of this measure, and therefore it ought to be passed; but, admitting his premises, I do not agree that his conclusion is necessary. I do not think it is the business of this Senate, or of the House of Representatives, merely to reflect public opinion, whether right or wrong. I do not think it becomes us, as representatives of sovereign States, to run after public opinion; but I think we should rather lead it; we should correct it when it is wrong, and should only follow it when it accords with our judgment, and when it is right.

"Now, in respect to this homestead policy, which the Senator says has been approved by public opinion. I dissent from him as to that conclusion. I deny that it is approved by public judgment. Why, sir, fourteen years ago, an unfortunate son of genius, who represented one of the districts in my own State, originated the idea in this country of giving homes to the homeless. Felix G. McConnell, of the State of Alabama, was in the habit, I believe, on all occasions when he rose to address the Speaker of the House of Representatives, of suggesting his proposition for a homestead for every man, matron, and maid in the United States, who was the head of a family. [Laughter.]

"Mr. HAMLIN. And widow.

"Mr. CLAY. Then it was treated with derision. About eight years ago, the Senator from New York, who perhaps is entitled to the credit of originating this measure in the Senate, offered a bill, of which this is a substantial copy, perhaps a literal one, and it received but two votes."

It was stated by my friend from Alabama—and a former Senator from Mississippi (Mr. Adams) fell into the same error—that Felix G. McConnell, with whom I served in the House of Representatives, and for whom I entertained a great deal of respect, originated this homestead policy in that House. It is as far from me as it would be from any one, to detract aught from that individual. The Senator from Alabama calls him an unfortunate son of genius, from his own State. Sir, if there ever was a man who was a Democrat by instinct and by nature, it was Felix Grundy McConnell. Even when he was in one of those unfortunate moods—one of those unfortunate spells that he occasionally fell into—you might wake him up out of a reverie and present to him a question that involved Democracy on the one hand, and its opposite on the other, and by instinct or intuition he was always on the side of Democracy.

But I wish to set the facts right; as there seems to have been some controversy as to who was the originator of this great measure. So far as I am concerned, whenever I have alluded to this subject, from first to last, I have never claimed its paternity. In the speech which I made a short time since, I showed that the policy was inaugurated by Washington, that it had been approved and indorsed by the most distinguished men of the country, from that period down to the present time. As, however, there seems to have been some contest as to the origin of the measure in this particular form, I intend to state the facts without regard to what may be said in reference to myself.

It appears from the Journal of the House of Representatives, that on March 12, 1846, "Mr. A. Johnson asked leave to introduce a bill entitled 'A bill to authorize every poor man in the United States who is the head of a family to enter one hundred and sixty acres of the public domain, without money and without price.' Objection being made, it was not introduced."

On March 27, 1846, "Mr. A. Johnson, in pursuance of previous notice, asked and obtained leave to introduce 'A bill to authorize every poor man in the United States to enter one hundred and sixty acres of land,' &c.; which bill was read twice, and committed."

In the House of Representatives, August 5, 1846, the French spoliation bill being under consideration, "Mr. McConnell moved to add to the bill a section granting one hundred and sixty acres of land to every man, maid, or widow, in the United States. Ruled out of order."

August 6, 1846, the Oregon bill being under consideration "Mr. McConnell wished to offer as an amendment, an additional section authorizing every man, maid, or widow, &c., to enter one hundred and sixty acres of land in any portion of the territory of the United States. The Chairman decided the amendment out of order at that time."

Thus I find that on the 12th of March, 1846, notice of the bill was given, and on the 27th of March, 1846, the bill was introduced and committed; and on the 5th of August, 1846, Mr. McConnell offered it as an amendment to some other bill. My friend from Alabama was disposed to give the credit of it, if any credit attached to it, to a former Representative from Alabama, and he spoke of him as an unfortunate son of genius. If he was entitled to it, I should have no objection. He was for the measure; he was a Democrat; he loved his country; and if there was ever a man devoted to the people, it was Felix Grundy McConnell.

My honorable friend in arguing why it should be postponed, said that this measure had its origin in the Senate about eight years ago, when it was introduced by the honorable Senator from the State of New York, [Mr. SEWARD,] and said that his bill only received two votes in 1850. When we come to examine the facts, it seems a little strange that my friend from Alabama should fix upon the honorable Senator from New York as the introducer of his proposition. Why the Senator from New York was selected as the introducer of the bill, and the allegation made that then it only received two votes, I cannot tell, unless it was to convey prejudice to the South, on the supposition that owing to his peculiar relations to some of the States, his name would be calculated to prejudice, in the southern section of the country, a measure he introduced. A reference to the Journal of the Senate for 1850, will show that Daniel Webster and General Houston introduced the proposition then. STEPHEN A. DOUGLAS—I call him not as a Senator, but as Stephen A. Douglas from the State of Illinois, introduced two homestead bills, one in 1850 and 1851. Thus the proposition was brought forward by various distinguished individuals at about the same period of time; but somehow or other my friend from Alabama has the idea that the measure was then presented by the Senator from New York. It is not strange, when it was introduced by so many distinguished men, that my honorable friend did not think that some of them had introduced it; but how does the fact stand? I call on my honorable friend from Alabama to make his statement good. I want him to show when the Senator from New York ever introduced a homestead bill at all. I have examined the Journal and I cannot find it. If he has the reply ready, I will take it.

Mr. CLAY. I refer to the Senator from New York himself. I learned what I stated from him.

Mr. SEWARD. The honorable Senator from Tennessee, I suppose, will state the result of his researches. He knows more about it than I do.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. Upon a bill to establish a surveyor general's office in the Territory of Oregon, there was an amendment offered preventing the land that was granted in that bill to actual settlers from forced sale of one hundred and sixty or three hundred and twenty acres, and upon that the yeas and nays were called, and there were only two votes for the amendment—not this proposition at all—the vote of the honorable Senator from New York and of the honorable Senator from Wisconsin, (Mr. Walker.) The honorable Senator from New York never introduced a homestead bill; but he did in 1850 introduce a bill grounded partially on the same principles, granting land to the Hungarian refugees who were coming to this country, as will be seen by referring to the Journal of that year, page 119. True, the distinguished Senator from New York—and I thank him for the argument he made; it did his heart and his head credit—made a speech on the bill granting the overflowed lands to the States in which they lie, in which he argued this whole policy, and argued it ably and well before the whole country; but he never introduced a homestead proposition in the shape it is here, though he covered the whole subject in his speech.

Then, in the first instance, it is seen, on an examination of the Journals, that notice was given of the homestead bill. It was introduced and committed in the House of Representatives before my respected friend from Alabama (Mr. McConnell) ever offered his proposition as an amendment to the spoliation bill. In 1850, the period to which the Senator from Alabama carries us back in the Senate, the Senator from New York never introduced a homestead bill at all; but half a dozen others did shadow forth a proposition in its broadest sense. None of them were to be referred to by the Senator from Alabama; but the Senator from New York must be brought into connection with it. I do not say that my friend from Alabama intended to be unfair; I do not say that he intended to excite any improper prejudice by this connection; but I will say that his remarks, left as they were, were calculated to do that.

"I wish to make a remark or two in reply to what has

In the first place, we find the Senator from Alabama mistaken in his statement of fact as to the origin of the bill; in the second place, we find him mistaken as to the fact of Mr. SEWARD introducing the proposition eight years ago; in fact, he introduced no such measure at all. The remarkable accuracy with which the Senator from Alabama stated his facts seemed to indicate that he had made himself thoroughly acquainted with the history of the subject. If he had made himself acquainted with all the facts connected with the homestead proposition, I feel assured that he would not have made the statement he did; and not having made himself acquainted with the facts, he was not authorized in making the statement he did.

The Senator denies that this proposition has been approved by the public judgment. Let us see how the facts stand in regard to that statement. The measure, in its present form, was introduced in 1846; it was discussed in and out of Congress up to the 12th of May, 1852; and on that day the bill passed the popular branch of the national Legislature by a two-thirds vote. The bill was then lost in the Senate. Again, in 1854, it was originated in the House of Representatives by the Hon. John L. Dawson, of Pennsylvania, and was again passed by an overwhelming majority of that body, and was sent to the Senate, and lost. If we are to rely upon evidences like these, it is clear and manifest that the public judgment has been recorded in favor of the homestead proposition, the Senator's opinion to the contrary notwithstanding. We can have no safer guide, no better test, than the will of the people reflected through their representatives in their representative capacity.

But the gentleman went on to state that the Senate should not obey the popular will; that it should rather lead it; but in this particular case we find the Senator unwilling to lead, or to follow, either, what we conceive to be the public judgment; but sets himself up in opposition to it. If I were disposed to give another evidence of the popular judgment on this subject, I might mention that the Presiding Officer of this House, the Vice President of the United States, recorded his vote in favor of the homestead bill in 1854; he was placed upon the ticket for the Vice Presidency in 1856, with Mr. Buchanan, and his whole public course was scrutinized; his claims were submitted to the public consideration, and after a full and thorough investigation of his whole public course, there was not an objection urged against him for the Vice Presidency on account of having supported this policy in the Congress of the United States, that I am aware of; but, on the contrary, in many places it was one of the strongest arguments in his favor. Even in the gentleman's own State he received an overwhelming vote, after having supported the homestead measure.

The Senator, in the course of his remarks, admitted that the public judgment of his own State was once for it; but he does not condescend to give us any evidence that that public judgment has been changed. There have been no public meetings, no public demonstrations, no memorial or petition sent to the Congress of the United States against the passage of this measure; but in truth the evidences are all the other way; and so soon as the popular judgment can be brought to bear upon this body, the measure will be consummated and passed here. The Senator assumes, in bold terms, that the Senate should not obey the public judgment; that it should rather lead it. I hold that the Senate should obey the popular judgment, and that a majority of the States should rule in the Senate, as much so as the majority of the congressional districts in the House of Representatives. I hold it to be sound Democratic doctrine that a majority of the States should rule in the Senate; as much so as that a majority should rule in the House of Representatives; and then in a disagreement between the two Houses, measures are lost as contemplated by the Constitution; but in cases of this kind the Democratic party hold, that where a Senator cannot, consistently with his views of right or the Constitution, obey the will of the people of his State, it is his duty to resign, and give his place to some one who will faithfully and honestly obey the high behest of the people.

Sir, I hope the period is not distant when the Senate will have to come down from its present proud and obstinate position, and pass more under the influence of the popular judgment of the respective States. I hope the time will come when the people of the several States will have the constitutional power restored to them of electing their Senators at the ballot-box, as they now elect their Representatives, if not every two years, at least once in six years, thereby creating an immediate responsibility between them and the people. This would be one great step in popularizing our Government. I will say, in this connection, that I am anxious to see the election of President and Vice President made by the electors of each congressional district directly, by the people, in preference to the present mode. Wherever it is practicable, I desire to have the people to do their own public business by themselves, instead of through agents. There is an old and trite adage which I think holds good in public as in private affairs—"whenever you have anything to do, send somebody to do it; but if you want it well done, go and do it yourself." It will hold good in every department of human affairs, public as well as private. Hence, I repeat, I am in favor of popularizing our Government, and, wherever it is practicable, letting the people elect their agents, instead of having their agents selected by other agents, as Senators now are by the Legislatures—in some instances by intrigue and other anti-Democratic appliances. Let the people be heard, and let their mature judgment be final.

I have felt it my duty to say this much in setting the history of this great measure right, as I humbly conceive the greatest measure of the age or of modern times; and it will ultimately be spread upon your statute-book as the law of the land.

Mr. PUGH. If the Senator from Tennessee will permit me, I think we have barely time to send a message to the House, and receive one in return. With his permission, I move that the Secretary send a message to the House that the Senate has discharged its business, and is ready for an adjournment. The Senator can proceed after that motion.

The motion was agreed to.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. FITCH. I wish to move for an executive session, for the purpose indicated by the Senator from Arkansas. It will take but a moment. It is a matter of importance, and pertains to our records.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Tennessee. I have nothing more to say.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business.

At six o'clock the doors were reopened, and the Senate adjourned sine die.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

MONDAY, June 14, 1858.

The House met at ten o'clock, a. m. Prayer by the Rev. J. C. GRANBURY.

The Clerk then proceeded to read the Journal of Saturday.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

During the reading of the Journal, a message was received from the President by Mr. JAMES BUCHANAN HENRY, his Private Secretary, informing the House that he had approved and signed the following bills:

An act granting a pension to Mrs. Mary A. M. Jones;

An act making appropriations for sundry civil expenses of Government for the year ending June 30, 1859;

An act making appropriations for the support of the Army, for the year ending June 30, 1859;

An act making supplemental appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859;

An act granting an invalid pension to John Holland, of Arkansas;

An act to establish certain post roads;

An act granting an invalid pension to William Randolph;

An act making appropriations for the transportation of the United States mail, by ocean steamers and otherwise, during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859;

An act to supply deficiencies in the appropriations for the current and contingent expenses of the Indian department, and for fulfilling treaty stipulations with various Indian tribes, for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858;

An act making appropriations for the expenses of collecting the revenue from customs;

An act making appropriations for the naval service for the year ending June 30, 1859;

An act making an appropriation for the completion of the military road from Astoria to Salem, in Oregon Territory; and

An act granting an invalid pension to William Howell, of Tennessee.

READING OF THE JOURNAL.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. It had better be read.

Mr. WASHBURNE, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules to enable me to move to dispense with the further reading of the Journal. It will take till eleven o'clock to read the Journal.

The SPEAKER. There are twenty more pages.

Mr. FLORENCE. I submit the point of order that there is a motion now pending to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order raised by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLORENCE. Is there not a motion pending to suspend the rules?

The SPEAKER. This question comes up before you can reach that matter at all.

The House divided on Mr. WASHBURNE's motion, and there were—ayes 107, noes 18.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended.

The further reading of the Journal was then dispensed with.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 582) to authorize a loan not exceeding $20,000,000; when the Speaker signed the same.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the time for the adjournment of the present session of Congress shall be, and is hereby, extended from twelve o'clock, m., to half past two o'clock, p. m., this day.

I move the previous question on that resolution.

The SPEAKER. Is there any objection to the introduction of the resolution?

Mr. SANDIDGE. I object.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I have a resolution which, I think, meets the emergency of the case better than that, and I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow it to be read.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move a suspension of the rules to enable me to offer the resolution.

The question was taken; and the rules were suspended.

The question recurred upon seconding the demand for the previous question.

Mr. SAVAGE. I rise to a question of order. The previous question has not been demanded since the rules were suspended, and I desire to offer an amendment.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order.

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask the gentleman from Pennsylvania to allow my proposition to be read.

Mr. CURRY. I object.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, the resolution was agreed to.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It will be remembered that on Saturday night, upon receiving information that a difference of opinion existed between the Senate and the House on the subject of legislation on the Post Office appropriation bill, the House laid that bill upon the table. In doing that, the House meant no discourtesy to the coordinate branch of Congress; but, as I understand it, they meant by that vote emphatically to declare their dissent to legislation in appropriation bills at the close of the session.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have learned since, that that difficulty may be obviated, so that we may adjourn at two o'clock. It can only be arrived at in one way; and I wish the House to understand that. I propose to move that the bill be taken from the table by moving to reconsider the vote by which it was put there. I shall move, then, when the bill is before the House, to reconsider the vote by which five out of the ten amendments of the Senate were concurred in. The text of the bill has been passed upon by both Houses. There were ten amendments; five of which, as I have stated, were concurred in. My opinion is that, if the ten amendments be left open between the two Houses, a conference committee may be enabled to make a report.

Mr. GARNETT. I desire to ask the gentleman whether one of the amendments he intends to recede from is the one giving a subsidy of $14,000 to the Collins line?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I do not propose to recede from any. My motion is, that the amendments shall be left open for the action of a committee of conference between the two Houses. That is one of the amendments in which both Houses have concurred.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. There is no objection, I hope, to the proposition of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MORGAN. Is the House to vote on the amendments again?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to move a general disagreement to them, so as to send them to a conference committee.

Mr. MORGAN. So the bill is to go to the Senate precisely as it went before?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. It will go there with amendments of the Senate disagreed to by the House.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania in this way: when the bill is taken up, he will move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to certain of the Senate amendments to the Post Office appropriation bill. We will then disagree to those amendments—to all the amendments which the Senate put upon that bill when they first sent it back here. If the Senate will not recede from its amendments, then the Senate will ask for a committee of conference.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I desire to understand the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means. Does he, in taking this bill from the table, propose to open any amendments that have been concluded by the concurring votes of the two Houses?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I propose to take the bill from the table. Then I propose to reconsider the vote by which five of the amendments of the Senate were concurred in. That will open the whole subject.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I want to know why the gentleman proposes to go back and open amendments which have been concurred in?

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. We have concurred in five of the ten amendments. If we recede from that concurrence, then the whole subject will be open between the two bodies. The two Houses cannot agree in reference to the five now open between them, but if the ten be opened, I know that they will agree to a report.

Mr. BURNETT. I rise to a question of order. I understand that there was no objection to taking the bill up.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I understand that it has not been taken up.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. No debate is in order.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. If I am in order, I want to understand this matter that I may vote intelligently. I do not see how the basis for negotiation will be enlarged by cutting down that which both Houses have concurred in. For instance: both Houses agreed that the publication of the list of letters unclaimed for should be given, instead of to two or three papers, to the paper that would do it the cheapest. Is it possible that the gentleman wants to disagree to that amendment which has already been agreed to by both Houses? How will that enlarge the basis for negotiation?

Mr. WASHBURN, of Illinois. I raise the question of order that debate is not in order; and I ask that it be decided.

Mr. HOUSTON. If debate is in order, it is premature at this time.

The SPEAKER. The first proposition is to take up the bill and amendments from the table. If that be done, then the question will come up upon the amendments heretofore disagreed to. The gentleman from Pennsylvania proposes to move a reconsideration of the vote by which the House concurred in certain amendments. If that be done, then he proposes to move that the House insist on its disagreement to the Senate amendments, and ask for another committee of conference. If there be no objection, the bill will be considered as taken from the table. The proposition will then be in order to insist upon our disagreement and ask another committee of conference. It will also be in order to move to reconsider the votes by which the House concurred in certain amendments of the Senate.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I rise to a question of order. Will it be in order, as the Speaker has stated, to reconsider the vote by which we concurred in the Senate amendments—those amendments having been already once reconsidered, and the motion to reconsider laid upon the table?

The SPEAKER. It will require a two-thirds vote for the gentleman from Pennsylvania to get his motion before the House.

Mr. HOUSTON. I object to further debate. Let us have a vote.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to taking the bill from the Speaker's table?

Mr. CLEMENS. I object. I understand ["Order!" "Order!"] that by this arrangement it is proposed—[shouts of "Order!"]

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move to suspend the rules.

The SPEAKER. It is, in any point of view, desirable that the motion to suspend the rules should prevail.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The rules were suspended, (two thirds having voted therefor,) and the amendments of the Senate brought before the House for consideration.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. What is now the question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Senate amendments are before the House, and the question is: "Will the House further insist on their disagreement? will they adhere? or will they recede?"

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move that the House further insist on its disagreement, and ask another committee of conference.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I thought I had the floor. I move to reconsider the vote by which the House agreed to five out of the ten Senate amendments.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. It will require a two-thirds vote to take the motion to reconsider from the table.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. Is not the motion of the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. STEPHENS] in order?

The SPEAKER. It is.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask for a vote upon that motion.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I was upon the floor when the gentleman from Georgia rose and made his motion. Before making a motion I made an inquiry of the Chair in order to enable me to make my motion in order. What I wish to do is to make a motion to reconsider the vote by which the House concurred in five out of the ten amendments of the Senate to this bill. I make that motion now, if it is in order.

Mr. CLEMENS. I desire to make a single remark in reply to the gentleman from Pennsylvania, [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES.] [Cries of "Order!"]

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. CLEMENS. I know it is not; but I ask the consent of the House to make a single remark. [Loud cries of "Object!" and "Order!"]

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask for a vote upon the motion of the gentleman from Georgia, [Mr. STEPHENS.]

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] is one of such a nature as will take precedence of the motion of the gentleman from Georgia. The gentleman from Pennsylvania moves to suspend the rules to enable him to submit a motion to take from the table the motion to reconsider the vote by which certain amendments of the Senate were concurred in.

Mr. CLEMENS. I wish to know if the effect of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. J. GLANCY JONES] is not to open up this whole controversy again, ["Order!" "Order!"] and place the House at the mercy of the Senate? [Shouts of "Order!"] I rise to a question of order.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia is out of order; and must take his seat.

Mr. CLEMENS. Well, I ask for information, what will be the effect of the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, if it prevails?

["Order!" "Order!"]

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I rise to a question of order. I submit that the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania is in order without the suspension of the rules. The bill, with the amendments of the Senate unacted on, are before the House, with the motion to reconsider attaching to those which have been concurred in. Now, I want to know what is to prevent the motion to reconsider from being taken from the table?

The SPEAKER. That is the motion the gentleman from Pennsylvania makes; but, under the practice of the House, it requires a two-thirds vote, objection being made, to enable him to submit the motion.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. But I submit that the bill and amendments being before the House, and the motion to reconsider attaching to the five amendments which have been concurred in, it is in order to move to take up the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. If the practice suggested by the gentleman from Tennessee were to prevail, it would defeat the whole object of laying the motion to reconsider on the table, if it could at any time be taken up by a simple majority vote. So far as these amendments which have been concurred in are concerned, they have passed from the control of the House, unless by a suspension of the rules, just as much as the original text of the bill.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. If the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania be voted down, what will be the next question before the House?

The SPEAKER. The motion of the gentleman from Georgia, to further insist and ask for another committee of conference.

Mr. CLEMENS. I ask for the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were not ordered, only three members voting therefor.

The rules were suspended—ayes 123, noes 10; and

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES submitted his motion to take from the table the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The question is, "Will the House reconsider the vote?"

Mr. GARNETT. I wish to know if that question is susceptible of division; because I am in favor of the amendment giving the printing of the Post Office blanks to the lowest bidder, and do not wish to recede from it.

The SPEAKER. The question cannot be divided.

Mr. STANTON. I move the previous question on the reconsideration.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the vote was reconsidered.

Mr. J. GLANCY JONES. I move that the House do non-concur in all the amendments of the Senate; and on that I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the amendments were non-concurred in.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move that a committee of conference be appointed.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. PHILLIPS, WASHBURN, of Illinois, and DOWELL, were appointed the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendments were non-concurred in, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

JAMES H. GLANDING.

The SPEAKER stated the business first in order to be the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. AHL] to suspend the rules so as to discharge the Committee of the Whole House from the further consideration of Senate bill (No. 292) for the relief of James H. Glanding.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I would advise my friends in the House not to put any bill on its passage that has passed the Senate; because, if they do, they will be in a worse condition than if they remain as they are, as the President will sign no private bill passed to-day.

Mr. AHL. On that statement I withdraw the motion to suspend the rules.

Mr. FLORENCE. My colleague [Mr. AHL] withdraws his motion to suspend the rules, for the reason that the bill, if passed, would be in a worse condition than it is now in, and he is willing to trust to the justice of the House at the next session.

MINNESOTA REPRESENTATIVES.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Accounts of this House pay out of the contingent fund of the House, to W. W. PHELPS and JAMES M. CAYANAOUGH, Representatives from the State of Minnesota, compensation at the rate of $250 per month, from the 13th of October, 1857, to the 13th of May, the date of the admission of the State.

It is not necessary to discuss this resolution. It is only giving them pay back to the date of their election.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object. I think they ought to be paid only from the time the State was admitted.

Mr. HARRIS, of Illinois. I move to suspend the rules; and I call for tellers.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. Let us have the yeas and nays, and see who will vote for this. All these things have to pass in review within the next four years.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 64, nays 92; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Atkins, Avery, Barkdale, Billingshurst, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Burns, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Cox, Curry, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Mississippi, Dewart, Dimmick, Edmundson, Faulkner, Florence, Gilman, Gooch, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Jackson, Kelly, Leidy, Leiter, Maclay, McKibbin, McQueen, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Maynard, Miles, Milton, Niblack, Nichols, John S. Phelps, Quinman, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Ruffin, Russell, Sandage, Savage, Searing, Shorter, Sickles, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, Whiteley, and John V. Wright—64.

NAYS—Messrs. Andrews, Bingham, Blair, Boeck, Brayton, Bufinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Case, Caskie, Ezra Clark, Clemens, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Coffax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cragin, Burton Craig, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Edie, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gartrell, Gilmer, Goode, Goodwin, Grow, Robert B. Hall, Hill, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Lotcher, Lovejoy, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Ohio, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Reagan, Ritchie, Royce, Seales, Henry M. Shaw, Judson W. Sherman, Spinner, Stailworth, Stanton, Talbot, Tappan, Miles Taylor, Thayer, Tompkins, Trippe, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Winslow, Wood, Woodson, Wortendyke, and Zollcoffer—92.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

During the calling of the roll,

Mr. BONHAM stated that if he had been in when his name was called, he should have voted "ay."

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President by Mr. James BUCHANAN HENRY, his private Secretary, informing the House that he had approved and signed an act to authorize a loan not exceeding the sum of $20,000,000.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House to change the hour for the adjournment of Congress, with an amendment, in which he was directed to ask the concurrence of the House.

EXTENSION OF THE SESSION.

The message from the Senate was taken up and read, as follows:

IN SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,
June 14, 1858.

Resolved, That the Senate agree to the resolution of the House of Representatives changing the hour for the adjournment of Congress, with the following amendment: Strike out "half past two o'clock this day," and insert in lieu thereof "twelve o'clock to-morrow."

Mr. PHILLIPS. I move to concur in the amendment of the Senate, with an amendment to strike out "twelve o'clock to-morrow," and insert in lieu thereof "six o'clock, p. m., this day." Whatever we can do by twelve o'clock to-morrow, we can do by six o'clock to-day. I move the previous question.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I hope the House will not concur in the amendment of the Senate, and that, if the Senate refuses to concur in half past two o'clock, we shall adjourn at twelve o'clock to-day.

Mr. WASHBURN, of Maine. So do I. The Senate have been playing this game quite long enough; and I hope we shall not concur in their amendment.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman will withdraw the demand for the previous question, I will propose an amendment which, I think, will meet the views of all sides. It is, that we accept the Senate amendment, with a proviso that no legislative business shall be transacted by the two Houses after a certain hour.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I insist on the previous question.

Mr. DAVIDSON. If the House will give me its attention for one moment, I beg leave to say to the gentleman from Maine, and to the House, that the public business can be concluded by six o'clock; and if they will agree to that amendment, it is understood all round that that will suit all parties.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under the operation thereof, Mr. PHILLIPS's amendment was agreed to, and the amendment of the Senate, as amended, was concurred in.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the amendment was concurred in; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

UNFINISHED BUSINESS OF COMMITTEES.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution. It is necessary in order to continue the business of the present session which is in the hands of the committees over to the next:

Resolved, That all bills, resolutions, and other papers referred to the standing committees of the House at the first session of this Congress, upon which no reports shall have been made at the time of adjournment, shall be returned informally to the Clerk, and shall, by virtue of this resolution, stand recommitted at the commencement of the next session of Congress to said committees, into whose possession the Clerk is hereby directed to restore them.

Mr. FLORENCE. If the resolution shall be received, will it be in order to move to amend it, so as to take from the drawers of members reports which they have been authorized to make?

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest that it has never been permitted that reports should be made and placed upon the Calendar in that way. The resolution of the gentleman from New York is in the usual shape.

Mr. FLORENCE. I desired to know, because I have my drawer full of reports, and I suppose other gentlemen are in the same position.

Mr. LETCHER. I do not suppose that one man in twenty of us has heard one word of that resolution.

ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported, as truly enrolled, a bill and resolution of the following titles; when the Speaker signed the same.

An act for the relief of Sherlock & Shirley; and

A joint resolution to correct an error in an act for the relief of Stephen R. Rowan approved June 1, 1858.

In presenting the report,

Mr. DAVIDSON said: These bills would have been here on Saturday but for the negligence of the officers of the Senate. I thought this statement necessary for the purpose of putting the matter right.

THE UNFINISHED BUSINESS—AGAIN.

The SPEAKER. The Chair desires to say that the resolution of the gentleman from New York is in the usual form, and is necessary if the House intends to resume its business at the commencement of the next session where it closed at the expiration of this.

Mr. COBB. It is precisely the usual resolution which has passed at the first session of every Congress for the last ten years.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish to make this inquiry of the Chair: if this resolution is adopted in cases where reports have been agreed on, but not presented to the House, will it be competent for the committees which shall be appointed at the next session, if they are composed of different members, to make different reports?

Mr. COBB. Certainly.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I think, then, the business before committees might as well go to the Clerk, and be referred at the next session.

Mr. FLORENCE. Will it be in order to move that such memorials as have been acted upon in committee shall go upon the Calendar?

The SPEAKER. The Chair supposes the resolution will be amendable.

Mr. FLORENCE. Then I submit the amendment I have indicated to allow reports upon memorials which have been acted on in committee, to be presented and go upon the Calendar.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. That amendment is not in order. The resolution has not been received by the House, and is not before us for amendments. If the resolution is received, I propose to demand the previous question, and cut off amendments.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the resolution?

Mr. CLEMENS. I object.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to suspend the rules.

The question was taken; and the rules were suspended, (two thirds having voted therefor.)

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE demanded the previous question upon the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put.

The resolution was then adopted.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

POST ROAD BILL.

Mr. STANTON. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce a bill to repeal the second section of the act entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," approved June 14, 1858.

Mr. HAWKINS. I object.

[A message was here received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had agreed to the amendment of this House to the amendment of the Senate to the resolution of the House changing the time for the adjournment of Congress.]

Mr. STANTON. I move, then, that the rules be suspended.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask that I may be allowed to say a word or two on the subject.

Mr. JEWETT. I think the gentleman ought to be permitted to be heard.

Mr. HOUSTON. I think it is due to the gentleman from Indiana that he should be heard.

Mr. ENGLISH. Two minutes will be sufficient.

Mr. BURROUGHS objected, but subsequently withdrew his objection.

Mr. ENGLISH. Mr. Speaker, this second section was adopted in the Senate as an amendment to the post road bill. I did not have time to examine all of the amendments of the Senate to that bill, and what I stated to the House on Saturday, in reference to it, was from information mainly derived from others. It is proper, however, that I should remark, that I did see an amendment somewhat like this. It was shown to me by a gentleman from North Carolina. He proposed to make it imperative that the Postmaster General should do certain things as to the mail service between eastern cities and New Orleans. I stated that I should object to it in that shape; but that, if it were left to the Postmaster General to pursue the course indicated or not, as he pleased, I should have no objection to it. I am astonished that, this morning, there prevails an idea that this Senate amendment has reference to ocean service between eastern cities and New Orleans. Nothing of the kind was intended, as I believe. It refers to land service, and is therefore legitimately upon the post road bill. The language may be more indefinite than it should be, but I am assured by all the parties that land and not ocean service is intended. So I understood it, and so I understand it yet; but, whether so or not makes no material difference, as the matter is left to the discretion of the Postmaster General to make the best arrangement as to the transmission of the mails between the eastern cities and the great commercial city of the South. I see nothing wrong in it; but, under the circumstances, will vote to repeal.

Mr. STANTON. The amendment authorizes either ocean or land service, and the objection to it is that it is not an ordinary and usual provision, creating a post road. It goes beyond the ordinary purposes of a post road bill, and confers special authority upon the Postmaster General in reference to a specific and very important route. It passed the House without the knowledge of any member, and, whether it be right or wrong, I take it that it is such a provision as ought not to pass in that manner. The House was not conscious of there being anything in it except the usual provisions for post roads. We did not think that it conferred special power in reference to any road, inland or ocean. I insist, therefore, that it is due to the House that they should repeal this section of the bill, and confine the bill strictly to the establishment of post roads, without any general legislation in regard to them. I move a suspension of the rules.

Mr. ENGLISH. I have no feeling in reference to this matter, and have not the slightest objection to the course being pursued which was indicated by the gentleman from Ohio.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. WINSLOW. I want to speak on this question.

Several MEMBERS objected.

The House was divided; and there were—ayes 124, noes 15.

So the rules were suspended.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I move to reconsider the vote by which the rules were suspended.

Mr. STANTON. Is that motion in order? I never heard of a motion to reconsider a suspension of the rules. It is no measure of legislation.

The SPEAKER. It is frequently an important step toward legislation.

Mr. STANTON. I will make no question of order. I move to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. This matter can be settled by calling the yeas and nays on the suspension of the rules.

Mr. JOHN COCHRANE. I withdraw the motion to reconsider, and demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The SPEAKER. In reference to the motion to reconsider, authority is found in the 56th rule, which provides that, when a motion has been once made, and carried in the affirmative or negative, it shall be in order for any member of the majority to move to reconsider.

Mr. WINSLOW. I want to make a statement in reference to this matter.

The SPEAKER. Debate is in order only by unanimous consent.

Mr. GROW. We have heard the statements of both sides. If the gentleman [Mr. WINSLOW] can be replied to, I have no objection to his proceeding; otherwise, I will object.

The SPEAKER. Debate is not in order.

Mr. STANTON. I think that the discussion had better take place after the rules shall have been suspended.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 120, nays 45; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Billingham, Blair, Brayton, Buflinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Case, Caskie, Chapman, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cobb, Clark B. Cochrane, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, James Craig, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Groesbeck, Grow, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kelsey, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Olin, Parker, Peyton, John S. Phelps, William W. Phelps, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Ready, Ricard, Ritchie, Robbins, Savage, Scales, Searing, Judson W. Sherman, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stanton, Talbot, Tappan, Thayer, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Israel Washburn, White, Wood, John V. Wright, and Zollicoffer—120.

NAYS.—Messrs. Ahl, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Horace F. Clark, Clemens, John Cochrane, Burton Craige, Davidson, Dowdell, Eustis, Gartrell, Gilmer, Hawkins, Hill, Huyler, Jackson, Jenkins, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Maclay, McQueen, Miles, Millson, Moore, Freeman H. Morse, Pendleton, Quitman, Reagan, Reilly, Russell, Sandidge, Scott, Henry M. Shaw, Sickles, Stallworth, James A. Stewart, George Taylor, Ward, Winslow, Woodson, and Wortendyke—45.

So (two thirds voting in favor thereof) the rules were suspended, and the bill was introduced.

Mr. FOSTER stated, pending the vote, that Mr. ABBOTT was ill, and unable to attend the session of the House.

POST OFFICE APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I rise to a privileged question. The managers on the part of the House, on the committee of conference on the Post Office appropriation bill, have instructed me to make the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses to the bill of the House (No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending 30th June, 1859, having met, after a full and free conference have agreed to recommend, and do recommend, to their respective Houses, as follows: That the Senate recede from its first, second, third, fourth, fifth, sixth, seventh, eighth, ninth, and tenth amendments.

R. M. T. HUNTER,

D. L. YULEE,

Managers on the part of the Senate.

HENRY M. PHILLIPS,

ELIHU B. WASHBURN,

JAMES F. DOWDELL,

Managers on the part of the House.

It will be observed, Mr. Speaker, that the Senate have receded from all their amendments; and I desire to say that one of the Senators avowed and recognized the propriety of abstaining from legislation on the general appropriation bills. In that view all the Senate amendments were receded from. I demand the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered.

Mr. MORGAN. I consider this a snap judgment, taken in an unfair way. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the House that, whether the report be adopted or not, if the Senate agree to the report, the bill is passed.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. And really there is no question before the House.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The report of the committee of conference was agreed to.

Mr. PHILLIPS moved to reconsider the vote by which the report was agreed to, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I rise to a privileged question. I move that the House take a recess till five o'clock.

The SPEAKER. The Chair would suggest to the gentleman that the Senate have not yet notified the House that they have concurred in the report of the committee of conference.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I desire to offer a resolution to rescind the resolution fixing the time of adjournment, and fixing it at two o'clock to-day.

The SPEAKER. There is a matter already pending which must first be disposed of.

POST ROUTE BILL—AGAIN.

The bill to repeal the second section of the act entitled "An act to establish certain post roads," approved June 14, 1858, was then read a first and second time.

Mr. STANTON. I move the previous question on the engrossment of the bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think it is very illiberal on the part of the gentleman from Ohio not to allow me to say a word.

Mr. STANTON. If it is the pleasure of the House, I will withdraw the demand for the previous question, and occupy about three minutes myself, and then give way to the gentleman from North Carolina.

[Cries of "No!" "Vote!" "Question!"]
Mr. STANTON. All I want is to have the matter understood.

[Cries of "Question!"]

Mr. KEITT. I wish to inquire, whether, if this bill passes, it will not have to be engrossed and sent to the Senate, and then enrolled and sent to the President, before it becomes a law; and whether it is not too late for all that to be done?

The SPEAKER. That is a matter for the House to consider, and not the Chair.

Mr. WINSLOW. I rise to a question of order. I wish to inquire whether it is in order now, by a new bill, to repeal a law upon which the House has come to a question at this session. I know it is not in order in the British Parliament; but I do not know what the ruling has been in this House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair overrules the question of order. There have been various precedents in the House of Representatives; certainly one very remarkable one, where the Minnesota land grant was repealed by an amendment to a pension bill.

Mr. WINSLOW. I think it a very bad precedent.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks it right and proper that the House should have this power, and knows of no parliamentary law that would deny the right to the House.

Mr. EUSTIS. I hope the gentleman from Ohio will withdraw the previous question; I am satisfied that there are not thirty members in the House who know what they are voting upon.

Mr. LETCHER. I object to debate.

The previous question was seconded; and the main question ordered.

Mr. McQUEEN demanded the yeas and nays on ordering the bill to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WINSLOW demanded tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. STANTON and CRAIGE, of North Carolina, were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported thirty-five in the affirmative.

So the yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 122, nays 42; as follows:

YEAS.—Messrs. Ahl, Andrews, Barksdale, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bocoek, Brayton, Buflinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Caskie, Chapman, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cobb, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Curry, Curtis, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dawes, Dean, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Edie, Edmundson, Elliott, English, Faulkner, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gilman, Gooch, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Groesbeck, Grow, Lawrence W. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hoard, Hopkins, Horton, Houston, Howard, Jewett, George W. Jones, J. Glancy Jones, Owen Jones, Kilgore, Knapp, Lamar, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, McKibbin, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Maynard, Morgan, Morrill, Edward Joy Morris, Mott, Niblack, Olin, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Pottle, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Ritchie, Roberts, Royce, Sandidge, Savage, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Singleton, William Smith, Spinner, Stallworth, Stanton, Stevenson, Talbot, Thayer, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Wade, Walbridge, Walton, Elihu B. Washburne, Woodson, and John V. Wright—122.

NAYS.—Messrs. Adrain, Bowie, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Horace F. Clark, Clemens, John Cochrane, Cockerill, Burton Craige, Davidson, Dewart, Dowdell, Eustis, Gartrell, Gilmer, Robert B. Hall, Hawkins, Keitt, Kelly, Jacob M. Kunkel, Maclay, McQueen, Miles, Millson, Freeman H. Morse, Pendleton, Robbins, Ruffin, Scales, Searing, Henry M. Shaw, Stephens, James A. Stewart, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Ward, Israel Washburn, Winslow, Wood, and Wortendyke—42.

So the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time, and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

Mr. STANTON. I now move the previous question on the passage of the bill.

Mr. DAVIDSON. I desire to say a word to the House. There is a story in circulation that this section was put upon the bill surreptitiously. As I am the chairman of the Committee of Enrollment on the part of the House, and have had charge of all the business, I desire to call the attention of the House to that charge, and to say that the bill came to the committee-room with all the proper solemnities and forms which belong to the two Houses, and I received it there and had it enrolled. I consider it due to myself to call the attention of the House to this fact at once.

Mr. ENGLISH. I ask the gentleman to withdraw the demand for the previous question for a moment, to enable me to say, in justification of myself and of the Post Office Committee of the Senate, that I have received a note from the chairman of that committee, stating that the committee never dreamed of such an application or construction being given to this amendment as seems to have been given to it by many members upon this floor. It is not intended to apply to sea service at all, but only to land routes; and besides, it establishes nothing, and does no more than authorize the Postmaster General to act, or not act, in the premises as he may think best for the public service. It is not at all unusual for general legislation to be put upon post route bills; and in this case the amendment of the Senate, I think, pertains to the general subject embraced in the bill. I have no personal feeling about it whatever.

Mr. STANTON. The idea I had was that it was reported from the Post Office Committee of the Senate, and adopted without the Senate knowing what it was, and came to this House and was agreed to without the House knowing what it was.

Mr. WINSLOW. The gentleman is mistaken. It was read in open Senate.

Mr. HAWKINS. Will the gentleman from Ohio yield to me for one word?

Mr. STANTON. I cannot withdraw the call for the previous question.

Mr. HAWKINS. The gentleman's information is incorrect. The amendment was read in the Senate and listened to attentively.

Mr. STANTON. All I have to say about it is that I have been informed by a Senator from Virginia and a Senator from Pennsylvania that the amendment was not read in the Senate.

Mr. HAWKINS. I have been informed to the contrary.

Mr. WINSLOW. And so have I, by the Senator from Florida.

Mr. STANTON. I insist on the demand for the previous question.

The previous question on the passage of the bill was seconded, and the main question ordered to be put; and, under the operation thereof, the bill was passed.

Mr. STANTON moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REVISION OF THE RULES.

Mr. WINSLOW. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution, to which I presume there will be no opposition:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed, consisting of the Speaker and four members, to be named by him, whose duty it shall be to digest the rules of order, to suggest such alterations and amendments as they may deem advisable, and to report the same back to the House for its action at an early day in the next session.

There being no objection, the resolution was received.

Mr. CLEMENS. I move to amend by striking out that provision which provides that the members of the committee shall be named by the Speaker, and insert "by vote of the House."

Mr. WINSLOW. That amendment is not in order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair hopes the gentleman will be indulged in offering the amendment.

Mr. LETCHER. Is it contemplated that the committee shall sit during the recess?

Mr. WINSLOW. Certainly not. They are to report at an early day the next session. They will not require to be long in session.

Mr. PHILLIPS. I hope the gentleman will modify his resolution so as to allow the committee to meet such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, for the purpose of revising the joint rules.

Mr. WINSLOW. I have no objection to that as an addition to my resolution.

The question being on Mr. CLEMENS's amendment,

Mr. CLEMENS demanded tellers.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CLAY and BLAIR were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—aye 1, noes 130.

So the amendment was rejected.

The resolution was then adopted.

OLD SOLDIERS' BILL.

Mr. SAVAGE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to introduce the following resolution:

Resolved, That the bill of the House (No. 259) granting pensions to the soldiers of the war of 1812 and the Indian wars about that period, be made the special order for the second Tuesday in December next, to continue from day to day until finally disposed of.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. DAVIDSON demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 95, nays 40; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Ahl, Andrews, Arnold, Atkins, Bennett, Bingham, Blair, Bowie, Brayton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Burroughs, Case, Cavanaugh, Ezra Clark, John B. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cobb, John Cochran, Cockerill, Coffax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Davidson, Davis of Massachusetts, Dawes, Dean, Dimmick, Durfee, Edie, Elliott, Fenton, Florence, Foley, Foster, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Gilmer, Gooch, Goodwin, Gregg, Grow, Robert B. Hall, J. Morrison Harris, Hatch, Hawkins, Hoard, Horton, Howard, Huyler, Jewett, Knapp, John C. Kunkel, Leidy, Leiter, Humphrey Marshall, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Matteson, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Niblack, Palmer, Parker, Peyton, Powell, Ready, Reilly, Ricard, Robbins, Roberts, Royce, Savage, Shorter, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, Spinner, Talbot, George Taylor, Tompkins, Tripp, Underwood, Walton, Ellihu B. Washburne, White, Wood, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—95.

NAYS—Messrs. Billingham, Bocoock, Boyce, Branch, Caskie, Clemens, Burton Craige, Curry, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Indiana, Davis of Mississippi, Davis of Iowa, Dowdell, Edmundson, Garnett, Goode, Groesbeck, Thomas L. Harris, Haskin, Hopkins, Houston, George W. Jones, Keitt, Lovejoy, Miles, Milson, Moore, Mott, Nichols, Pendleton, Quitman, Ruffin, Sandidge, Scales, Henry M. Shaw, William Smith, Miles Taylor, Wade, Walbridge, and Winslow—40.

So the rules were suspended, (two thirds voting in the affirmative.)

Pending the above call,

Mr. POTTLE stated that he was out when his name was called; and that, if he had been present, he would have voted in the affirmative.

Mr. LETCHER would have voted in the negative.

Mr. HILL would have voted in the negative.

On motion of Mr. SINGLETON, it was by unanimous consent

Ordered, That leave be granted for the withdrawal from the files of the House of the petition and papers in the case of J. W. Crane for losses sustained in the Creek war, in order that they may be referred to the Court of Claims.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I ask the unanimous consent of the House that the select committee on the artists' memorial be continued until the next session.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I object.

The vote was then announced, as above reported.

Mr. SAVAGE. I demand the previous question on the resolution.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question was ordered.

The resolution was adopted.

Mr. SAVAGE. I move to reconsider the vote just taken, and also move that the motion to reconsider be laid upon the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

NIAGARA FALLS CANAL.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the select committee, to which was referred several memorials relating to a ship canal round the Falls of Niagara, be continued as organized until the 4th of March next, with authority to report at any time.

Mr. LETCHER. I object.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I move that the rules be suspended.

Mr. CRAIGE, of North Carolina. I move that the House take a recess until half past five o'clock, p. m.

Mr. BURROUGHS. I object.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I demand the yeas and nays on the motion to suspend the rules, and call for tellers on the yeas and nays.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. CRAIGE, of North Carolina, and MARSHALL, of Kentucky, were appointed.

The House was divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 33, noes 98.

So the yeas and nays were ordered, (one fifth of those present voting in the affirmative.)

[A message was received from the Senate, by ASBURY DICKINS, their Secretary, notifying the House that that body had adopted the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes between the two Houses on the Post Office appropriation bill.]

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I move that there be appointed, by the Speaker, a committee of three, to join with such committee as may be appointed by the Senate, to wait upon the President, and inform him that the Houses have got through with their business, and are ready to adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and Messrs. SMITH, of Tennessee, Grow, and JOHN C. KUNKEL, were appointed.

The question then recurring on the motion to suspend the rules, it was taken; and it was decided in the negative—yeas 65, nays 69; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Adrain, Andrews, Bennett, Billingham, Bingham, Blair, Bowie, Brayton, Burlingame, Burroughs, Caruthers, Case, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clemens, Clark B. Cochran, John Cochran, Cockerill, Coffax, Comins, Covode, Cox, Dean, Dewart, Dimmick, Dodd, Durfee, Elliott, Fenton, Foster, Goodwin, Grow, Haskin, Hoard, Horton, Howard, John C. Kunkel, Leidy, Lovejoy, Humphrey Marshall, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Oliver A. Morse, Mott, Nichols, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Searing, Judson W. Sherman, William Smith, Spinner, Tappan, George Taylor, Tompkins, Underwood, Wade, Walton, Ward, Ellihu B. Washburne, and Zollicoffer—65.

NAYS—Messrs. Ahl, Bocoock, Boyce, Branch, Bryan, Buffinton, Burnett, Burns, Caskie, Cavanaugh, Clay, Cobb, Burton Craige, Curry, Davis of Iowa, Dowdell, Edie, Edmundson, English, Florence, Foley, Garnett, Gartrell, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Granger, Gregg, Groesbeck, Thomas L. Harris, Hatch, Hill, Hopkins, Houston, Jewett, George W. Jones, Keitt, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, Leiter, Letcher, McQueen, Mason, Matteson, Miles, Milson, Freeman H. Morse, Niblack, Olin, Peyton, Powell, Purviance, Quitman, Ready, Reilly, Royce, Ruffin, Sandidge, Henry M. Shaw, Shorter, Samuel A. Smith, Stallworth, Stephens, Stevenson, Miles Taylor, Walbridge, White, Wortendyke, and John V. Wright—69.

So the rules were not suspended, (two thirds not voting in the affirmative.)

Pending the above call,

Mr. CLEMENS said: Mr. Speaker, I understand this is the resolution of the gentleman from New York who, during this session, courteously yielded me five minutes of his time, and I vote "ay."

The vote was then announced, as above reported.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled an act (H. R. No. 556) making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending the 30th of June, 1859; when the Speaker signed the same.

ARTISTS' MEMORIAL.

Mr. MARSHALL, of Kentucky. I renew my motion for leave for the committee on the artists' memorial to report at the next session of Congress. It was raised so late that we have not been able to attend to the subject at all.

There being no objection, it was so ordered.

MESSAGE FROM THE PRESIDENT.

A message was received from the President of the United States by Mr. J. B. HENRY, his Private Secretary, announcing that he had approved and signed a bill making appropriations for the service of the Post Office Department during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1859.

FINAL ADJOURNMENT.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, (the Senate concurring,) That the President of the Senate and the Speaker of the House of Representatives adjourn their respective Houses sine die, this day, at half past two o'clock, p. m.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I object.

Mr. JEWETT, of Kentucky. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia. I will withdraw my objection if I can get the floor to offer a resolution of inquiry, which I have been seeking an opportunity for the last fortnight to offer.

The rules were suspended.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. I move the previous question.

The previous question was seconded, and the main question ordered; and, under its operation, the resolution was adopted.

CONSULAR OFFICERS.

Mr. BOWIE, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the House, at its next session, whether any consul general, consul, or commercial agent, embraced in section B of the act of 18th August, 1856, has been engaged, in violation of said act, in mercantile business as a merchant, factor, broker, or other trader, or as a clerk or agent of any such person, directly or indirectly; and that he communicate to this House all information and correspondence that may have been received on the subject.

EMPLOYÉS OF THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. HOARD asked unanimous consent to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be furnished to this House, as soon as practicable after the first Monday in December next, a complete list of all persons employed in permanent or temporary situations as clerks, agents, superintendents, commissioners, store-keepers, civil engineers, draughtsmen, computers, messengers, assistant messengers, laborers, and all other persons doing clerical or messenger's duty in each of the Departments, bureaus, and offices connected with the executive branch of the Government in the city of Washington, including the offices of the Superintendent of the Coast Survey, the Superintendent of Public Printing, the Superintendent of the National Observatory, the Commissioner of Public Buildings, surveying and exploring expeditions, the marine barracks, the navy-yard, the military asylum, and the arsenal and its appendages, at the end of the fiscal year ending June 30, 1858, and at the end of the fiscal years 1859 and 1860; with the rate of compensation of each employed, and the State and congressional district (according to present apportionment) where he or she resided at the time of appointment.

Mr. CLEMENS. I object to the resolution. The information is already in the Blue Book.

Mr. HOARD. I move to suspend the rules.

Mr. RUFFIN. I would suggest an amendment, so as to require the name of the place where the person was appointed.

Mr. KEITT. And how many children they have. [Laughter.]

Mr. HOARD. I call for tellers on the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were ordered; and Messrs. HOWARD and FOLEY were appointed.

The House divided; and the tellers reported—ayes 62, noes 59.

So (two thirds not voting in favor thereof) the rules were not suspended.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message was received from the Senate, by Mr. ASBURY DICKINS, its Secretary, informing the House that the Senate had passed a bill of the House, entitled "An act in relation to courts and the holding of the terms thereof in the several Territories of the United States." Also, that the Senate had agreed to the resolution of the House for the appointment of a committee to wait upon the President of the United States, and inform him that if he has no further communication to make, the two Houses are now ready to close the present session of Congress.

PAY, ETC., OF THE NAVY.

Mr. SMITH, of Virginia, by unanimous consent, offered the following resolution; which was read, considered, and agreed to:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, requested to report to this House at the opening of its next session:

1st. The pay and amount of allowances made by existing law to each grade of the commissioned officers of the Navy of the United States, and a similar statement as to the corresponding grades in the naval service of Great Britain, France, and Russia, the whole to be presented in its results in tabular form.

2d. His opinion, as to the policy of increasing the grade or rank in our naval service, the number of each of such increased grade or grades, and the amount of pay, &c., to be allowed to each of such grades.

3d. The number of officers, of each grade, necessary to command our Navy as now existing by law, allowing no cruise to be of longer duration than two years, and no leave on shore for more than six months, and the pay, &c., which should be allowed to such sea-going officers, not discriminating between being at sea or on shore under the limitations stated.

4th. The number of officers of each grade necessary to command and manage the various establishments on shore of every description connected with our naval service, including the bureaus, &c., specifying each establishment, and the number of officers, with their grades, in each, and the aggregate of all such officers, to be of those no longer fit, from any cause, for sea-going service, yet worthy, capable, and fit for duty on shore; and, to prevent shore duty from being sought by sea-going officers, to report the per centum of decrease from sea-going pay which should be allowed to those on duty on shore only.

5th. The pay or pension which should be allowed to such officers as are not fit for duty, afloat or on shore, without any demerit or fault of their own, and who, in all such cases, are retired from service and taken from the line of promotion.

ENROLLED BILL.

Mr. DAVIDSON, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled.

An act (H. R. No. 59) in relation to courts, and the holding of the terms thereof, in the several Territories of the United States; when the Speaker signed the same.

PAY OF A STENOGRAPHER.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask the unanimous consent of the House to offer the following resolution:

Resolved, That there be paid to the stenographer of the select committee raised to inquire into the facts and circumstances attending the sale of the Pennsylvania Bank property to the United States, the sum of $200 for his services in reporting the testimony taken before the said committee.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I object to the resolution. The committee only examined two or three witnesses.

Mr. FLORENCE. I move to suspend the rules, and with the consent of the House I will make a brief explanation. The committee could not get that testimony reported without the aid of this stenographer. We fixed upon this small sum, believing that the House was willing to pay for the services of this gentleman, and if there is any objection to the amount, I will strike that out and insert the usual compensation. It is but just that the reporter who has performed his duties faithfully should be paid.

Mr. BURNETT. I would ask if this stenographer was not at the same time stenographer to another committee?

Mr. FLORENCE. No, sir; he was not.

Mr. MORRIS, of Pennsylvania. Was the stenographer employed by the authority of the House?

Mr. FLORENCE. The committee could not have fulfilled the duty devolved upon them without the aid of this gentleman, and the sum is very small.

Mr. GILMAN. I cheerfully concur in all that has been said by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. FLORENCE. I ask for tellers on the motion to suspend the rules.

Tellers were appointed, and Messrs. CLARK, of Connecticut, and COCKERILL, were appointed.

The House divided, and the tellers reported—ayes 92, noes 9. No quorum voting.

Mr. FLORENCE demanded the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. HOUSTON. If the gentleman from Pennsylvania will modify his resolution, so as to give this reporter the usual rate of compensation, I presume there will be no difficulty. He ought to be paid.

Mr. FLORENCE. I have no objection to that.

Mr. LETCHER. I understand that will be more than the sum named in the resolution. I object.

The question was taken; and it was decided in the affirmative—yeas 111, nays 18; as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ahl, Arnold, Avery, Bennett, Billinghurst, Bingham, Blair, Branch, Bratton, Buffinton, Burlingame, Burnett, Burns, Cavanaugh, Ezra Clark, Horace F. Clark, Clawson, Clay, Cockerill, Colfax, Comins, Corning, Covode, Cox, Cragin, Burton, Craig, Curtis, Davidson, Davis of Maryland, Davis of Massachusetts, Davis of Iowa, Dean, Dewart, Dimmick, Dodd, Dowdell, Durfee, Elliott, Florence, Foley, Foster, Garnett, Gillis, Gilman, Goode, Goodwin, Granger, Gregg, Grow, Thomas A. Harris, Haskin, Hawkins, Hill, Board, Houston, Howard, J. Glancy Jones, Keitt, Knapp, Jacob M. Kunkel, John C. Kunkel, Leidy, Leiter, Letcher, Lovejoy, Matteson, Miles, Millson, Morgan, Edward Joy Morris, Freeman H. Morse, Mott, Niblack, Nichols, Ohio, Palmer, Parker, Pendleton, Peyton, John S. Phelps, Phillips, Purviance, Quitman, Reagan, Ritchie, Robbins, Roberts, Sandidge, Scales, Scott, Judson W. Sherman, Shorter, Siskies, Singleton, Samuel A. Smith, William Smith, Spinner, James A. Stewart, Talbot, Tappan, George Taylor, Miles Taylor, Tippe, Underwood, Walbridge, Ward, Israel Washburn, White, Winslow, Wood, and Wortendyke—111.

NAYS—Messrs. Burroughs, Caskie, Cobb, James Craig, Faulkner, Groesbeck, Lawrence W. Hall, Hopkins, Huyler, Jewett, George W. Jones, McQueen, Samuel S. Marshall, Mason, Ready, Royce, Ruffin, and Stevenson—18.

So the rules were suspended, (two thirds having voted in favor thereof.)

During the call of the roll,

Mr. HOUSTON said: I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania is willing to modify his resolution, so as to allow this stenographer to be paid at the same rate the others are paid, and I presume the resolution may be received by unanimous consent, without going through with the call of the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The House, by a vote, has just ascertained that no quorum was present, and the Chair thinks the roll had better be called.

The result having been announced,

Mr. FLORENCE. I now, in accordance with what seems to be the wish of gentlemen around me, move to amend by striking out "$200," and inserting "the usual rate of compensation."

The amendment was agreed to; and the resolution, as amended, adopted.

Mr. FLORENCE moved to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was adopted; and also moved to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

REPORT FROM THE PRESIDENT.

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee, from the committee appointed to wait on the President, reported that they had performed that duty, and that he informed them that he had no further communication to make to Congress.

On motion of Mr. CLAY, the House then took a recess until a quarter before six, p. m.

EVENING SESSION.

The House reassembled at a quarter before six.

PRINTING OF EVANS'S GEOLOGICAL SURVEY.

Mr. BENNETT, of New York. I desire to call up the motion to reconsider the vote on the resolution ordering the geological report of Dr. Evans's survey of Oregon and Washington to be printed. I understand the gentleman from Tennessee, [Mr. JONES,] who made the motion to reconsider, is willing to withdraw it.

Mr. RUFFIN. I object to that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York has the right to call up the motion to reconsider.

[A message was here received from the Senate by Mr. DICKINS, their Secretary, informing the House that in the temporary absence of the Vice President, the Senate had elected BENJAMIN FITZPATRICK as President pro tempore.]

Mr. LETCHER. I should like to inquire of the gentleman from New York how much the printing of this book will cost?

Mr. BENNETT. I understand it will cost $26,000.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I wish simply to say that, while any member has the right to call up the motion to reconsider, no gentleman has the right to withdraw it, if objection be made. I understand that objection is made to my withdrawing the motion. In my opinion, it is not necessary to print this document at all; but the House can dispose of the motion to reconsider as it shall see proper.

Mr. BENNETT. I wish to say simply that the whole expense which has been incurred in making this survey will be lost, unless this report is printed. It is not proposed to print any extra numbers at all. The resolution is simply to print the usual number.

Mr. RUFFIN. I wish to know if this matter has not been referred to the Committee on Printing, and if they have not declined to recommend any action on the subject for the present session? I understand they have postponed the matter until the next session.

Mr. BENNETT. That was in relation to the printing of extra copies.

Mr. SINGLETON. In reply to the inquiry of the gentleman from North Carolina, I will say that the question has been before the Committee on Printing, and that we came to the conclusion that the matter required more investigation than we were able to give it during the present session. We therefore postponed all action on the subject until the next session. It is very doubtful whether it ought to be printed at all.

Mr. STEPHENS, of Georgia. Are there plates and drawings to accompany the work?

Mr. SINGLETON. There are both plates and drawings.

Mr. JONES, of Tennessee. I will say that I saw Dr. Evans, the geologist who made the survey, during the recess; and he informed me that there were both plates and drawings to accompany the report, which are to be printed, if it is printed at all. I understood from him that it was desirable that five thousand extra copies should be printed, and that the cost of printing, as estimated by the Commissioner of the General Land Office, would be some twenty-two thousand dollars; and that, according to the estimate of the Superintendent of Public Printing, the cost would be $23,000. I understood the gentleman from Ohio, [Mr. NICHOLS,] who is a member of the Committee on Printing, that, according to their estimate, the cost would be $16,000.

Mr. BENNETT. I move to lay the motion to reconsider on the table.

Mr. BURNETT. I call for the yeas and nays on that motion.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BENNETT. I withdraw the motion to lay on the table.

At this time much confusion prevailed in the Hall.

The SPEAKER. The Chair appeals to gentlemen to resume their seats and preserve order. The Chair hopes the House will rise in order, if they have not been able to sit in order. [Laughter.]

Mr. SMITH, of Tennessee. I have merely to say, in reference to the action of the Committee on Printing, that the subject of printing the usual number has not been before them at all, and is a matter with which they have nothing to do at all.

The hour of six having arrived, in accordance with the concurrent resolution of the two branches of Congress,

The SPEAKER declared the present session of the House adjourned sine die.

The following letter was not received by us until the 3d of July, when the speech had been stereotyped, printed, and sent off to subscribers. All we can do now to correct the error is, to publish Mr. Crawford's letter in the Daily and in the Congressional Globe, and index it, to point out the error, which may be found on page 2910 of the Congressional Globe:

COLUMBUS, GEORGIA, June 29, 1858.

SIR: Inclosed I send you the correction of some remarks submitted by me, and published in the Globe of the 25th instant. Strike out the word "or," and it will be right as it is. I am made to say exactly what I did not say.

Respectfully,
M. J. CRAWFORD.
